NAARAH (נַעֲרָה, na'ārāh; B, αἱ κόμαι αὐτῶν, hai kōmai autōn, A, Νααράδ, Naarathā; AV Naarath): A town in the territory of Ephraim (Josh 16 7). It appears as "Naaran" in 1 Ch 7 28 (B, Naapánv, Naarnán, A, Naapán, Naarán). Onom (s.v. "Noorath") places it 5 Rom miles from Jericho. The name has not been recovered, and no identification is certain. The position would agree with that of el-'Aujeh, about 5 miles N.E. of Jericho.

NAARAI, nā'a-rī (נַעֲרִי, na'aray): Son of Ezbai, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 37). In the || passage (2 S 23 35), he is called "Paarai the Arbite." The true forms of the name and description are uncertain (see Budde, Richter u. Samuel, and Curtis, Chronicles).

NAARAN, nā'a-ran, NAARATH, nā'a-rath (נַעֲרָן, na'ārān, נַעֲרָת, na'ārāth). See NAARAH.

NAASHON, nā'a-shon, nā-ash'on, NAASON, nā'a-son, NAASSON, nā-as'on (Ναασών, Naassōn): AV Gr form of "Nahshon" (thus RV) (Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32).

NAATHUS, nā'a-thus (Νάαθος, Náathos): One of the sons of Addi who put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 31). It apparently corresponds to "Adna" of Ezr 10 30, of which it is a transposition. B reads Δάθος, Láthos, probably confusing A and Δ.

NABAL, nā'bal (נָבָל, nābhāl, "foolish" or "wicked"; Ναβάλ, Nabál): A wealthy man of Maon in the highlands of Judah, not far from Hebron, owner of many sheep and goats which he pastured around Carmel in the same district. He was a churlish and wicked man (1 S 25 2 ff). When David was a fugitive from Saul, he and his followers sought refuge in the wilderness of Paran, near the possessions of Nabal, and protected the latter's flocks and herds from the marauding Bedouin. David felt that some compensation was due him for such services (vs 15 and 25), so, at the time of sheep-shearing—an occasion of great festivities among sheep masters—he sent 10 of his young men to Nabal to solicit gifts of food for himself and his small band of warriors. Nabal not only refused any assistance or presents, but sent back insulting words to David, whereupon the latter, becoming very angry, determined upon the extermination of Nabal and his household and dispatched 400 men to execute his purpose. Abigail, Nabal's wife, a woman of wonderful sagacity and prudence as well as of great beauty, having learned of her husband's conduct and of David's intentions, hurriedly proceeded, with a large supply of provisions, dainties and wine, to meet David and to apologize for her husband's unkind words and niggardliness, and thus succeeded in thwarting the bloody and revengeful plans of Israel's future king. On her return home she found her husband in the midst of a great celebration ("like the feast of a king"), drunken with wine, too intoxicated to realize his narrow escape from the sword of David. On the following morning, when sober, having heard the report of his wife, he was so overcome with fear that he never recovered from the shock, but died 10 days later (vs 36–38). When David heard of his death, he sent for Abigail, who soon afterward became one of his wives. W. W. DAVIES

NABARIAS, nab-a-rī'as (Ναβάριας, Nabarias, B, Ναβηρίας, Nabarietas): One of those who stood upon Ezra's left hand as he expounded the Law (1 Esd 9 44). Esdras (loc. cit.) gives only 6 names, whereas Nehemiah (8 4) gives 7. It is probable that the last (Meshullam) of Nehemiah's list is simply dropped and that Nabarias=Hashbaddanah; or it may possibly be a corruption of Zechariah in Nehemiah's list.

NABATAEANS, nab-a-tē'-anz, NABATHAEANS, nab-a-thē'anz (Ναβαταῖοι, Nabataioi; in 1 Macc 5 25 Σ reads ἀναβάταις οἱ, anabátaiis hoi, V, 'Αναβατταῖοις, Anabattaióis; AV Nabathites, more correctly "Nabataeans"):

A Sem (Arabian rather than Syrian) tribe whose home in early Hellenistic times was S.E. of Pal, where they had either supplanted or mingled with the Edomites (cf Mal 1 1–5). In Josephus' day they were so numerous that the territory between the Red Sea and the Euphrates was called Nabatene (Ant, I, xii, 4). They extended themselves along the E. of the Jordan with Petra as their capital (Strabo xvi.779; Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4; XVII, iii, 2; BJ, I, vi, 2, etc). Their earlier history is shrouded in obscurity. Jerome, Quaest in Gen 25 13, following the hint of Jos (Ant, I, xii, 4), asserts they were identical with the Ishmaelite tribe of Nebaioth, which is possible, though Nebaioth is spelled with נ and Nabataeans with ט. They were apparently the first allies of the Assyrians in their invasions of Edom (cf Mal 1 1 ff). They were later subdued by Sennacherib (Sayce, New Light from the Ancient Monuments, II, 430), but before long regained their independence and resisted Ashurbanipal (Rawlinson, note, ad loc.). According to Alexander Polyhistor (Fr. 18), they were included in the nomadic tribes reduced by David. Their history is more detailed from 312 BC (Diod. Sic. xix), when Antigonos I (Cyclops) sent his general Athenaeus with a force against them in Petra. After an initial advantage, the army of Athenaeus was almost annihilated. Demetrius, the son of Antigonos, was sent against them a few years later, with little success, though he arranged a friendship with them. The first prince mentioned is Aretas I, to whom the high priest Jason fled in 169 BC. They were friendly to the early Maccabees in the anti-Hellenistic struggle, to Judas in 164 BC (1 Macc 5 25) and to Jonathan in 160 BC (9 35).

Toward the end of the 2d cent. BC on the fall of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid Dynasties, the Nabataeans under King Erotimus founded

2. A Strong Kingdom a strong kingdom extending E. of the Jordan (in 110 BC). Conscious now of their own strength, they resented the ambition of the Hasmonean Dynasty—their former allies—and opposed Alexander Jannaeus (96 BC) at the siege of Gaza (Jos, Ant, XIII, xiii, 3). A few years later (90 BC) Alexander retaliated by attacking Obedas I, king of the Nabataeans, but suffered a severe defeat E. of the Jordan (Jos, Ant, XIII, xiii, 5; BJ, I, iv, 4). Antiochus XII of Coele-Syria next led an expedition against the Nabataeans, but was defeated and slain in the battle of Kana (Jos, Ant, XIII, xv, 1–2; BJ, I, iv, 7–8). Consequently, Aretas III seized Coele-Syria and Damascus and gained another victory over Alexander Jannaeus at Adida (in 85 BC). The Nabataeans, led by Aretas (III ?), espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, be-

3. Conflicts sieged the latter in Jerus and provoked the interference of the Romans, by whom under Scaurus they were defeated (Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4f; BJ, I, vi, 2f). After the capture of Jerus, Pompey attacked Aretas, but was satisfied with a payment (Jos, ib), and Damascus was added to Syria, though later it appears to have again passed into the hands of Aretas (2 Cor 11 32). In 55 BC Gabinius led another force against the Nabataeans (Jos, ib). In 47 BC Malchus I assisted Caesar, but in 40 BC refused to assist Herod against the Parthians, thus provoking both the Idumaeen Dynasty and the Romans. Antony made a present of part of Malchus' territory to Cleopatra, and the Nabataean kingdom was further humiliated by disastrous defeat in the war against Herod (31 BC).

Under Aretas IV (9 BC—40 AD) the kingdom was recognized by Augustus. This king sided with the Romans against the Jews, and further gained a great victory over Herod the Nation Antipas, who had divorced his daughter to marry Herodias. Under King Abias an expedition against Adiabene came to grief. Malchus II (48—71 AD) assisted the Romans in the conquest of Jerus (Jos, BJ, III, iv, 2). Rabel (71—106 AD) was the last king of the Nabataeans as a nation. In 106 AD their nationality was broken up by the unwise policy of Trajan, and Arabia, of which Petra was the capital, was made a Rom province by Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria. Otherwise they might have at least contributed to protecting the West against the East. Diodorus (loc. cit.) represents the Nabataeans as a wild nomadic folk, with no agriculture, but with flocks and herds and engaged in considerable trading. Later, however, they seem to have imbibed considerable Aramaean culture, and Aram. became at least the language of their commerce and diplomacy. They were also known as pirates on the Red Sea; they secured the harbor of Elah and the Gulf of 'Akaba. They traded between Egypt and Mesopotamia and carried on a lucrative commerce in myrrh, frankincense and costly wares (KGF, 4th ed [1901], I, 726—44, with full bibliography).

NABATHITES, nab'a-thits: AV=RV "Nabathaeans."

NABOTH, nā'both, nā'bōth (נָבוֹת, nābhōth, from נָבַת, nūbh, "a sprout"; Ναβουθαί, Nabouthai): The owner of a vineyard contiguous to the palace of King Ahab. The king desired, by purchase or exchange, to add the vineyard to his own grounds. Naboth, however, refused to part on any terms with his paternal inheritance. This refusal made Ahab "heavy and displeased" (1 K 21 4). Jezebel, the king's wife, then took the matter in hand, and by false accusation on an irrelevant charge procured the death of Naboth by stoning (1 K 21 7—14). As Ahab was on his way to take possession of the vineyard he met Elijah the prophet, who denounced his vile act and pronounced judgment on king and royal house. A temporary respite was given to Ahab because of a repentant mood (1 K 21 27—29); but later the blow fell, first upon himself in a conflict with Syria (1 K 22 34—40); then upon his house through a conspiracy of Jehu, in which Jehoram, Ahab's son, and Jezebel, his wife, were slain (2 K 9 25—26.30 ff). In both cases the circumstances recalled the foul treatment of Naboth.

NABUCHODONOSOR, nab-ū-kō-don'ō-sor (Ναβουχοδονοσορ, Nabouchodonosor): LXX and Vulg form of "Nebuchadnezzar" ("Nebuchadrezzar") found in AV of the Apoc in 1 Esd 1 40. 41.45.48; 2 10; 5 7; 6 26; Ad Est 11 4; Bar 1 9.11.12. It is the form used in AV of the Apoc throughout. In RV of Jth and Tob 14 15, the form "Nebuchadnezzar" is given.

NACON, nā'kon, THE THRESHING FLOOR OF (נָכֹן, nākhōn; AV Nachon): The place where Uzzah was smitten for putting forth his hand to steady the ark, hence called afterward "Perezuzzah" (2 S 6 8); in the || passage (1 Ch 13 9)

we have כִּידֹן, kīdhon, and in Jos (Ant, VII, iv, 2) Χειδών, Cheidōn. In 1 S 23 23 the word nākhōn occurs, and is trd "of a certainty," m "with the certainty" or "to a set place"; also in 1 S 26 4 it is trd "of a certainty," m "to a set place." It is uncertain whether in 1 S 6 6 it is a place-name at all, and no successful attempt has been made to identify either Nacon or Chidon; possibly they are both personal names. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

NACHOR, nā'kor (Ναχώρ, Nachōr) AV; Gr form of "Nahor" (thus RV). Grandfather of Abraham (Lk 3 34).

NADAB, nā'dab (נָדָב, nādhābh, "noble"; Ναδάβ, Nadāb):

(1) Aaron's first-born son (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2; 26 60; 1 Ch 6 3 [Heb 5 29]; 24 1). He was permitted with Moses, Aaron, the 70 elders, and his brother Abihu to ascend Mt. Sinai and behold the God of Israel (Ex 24 1.9). He was associated with his father and brothers in the priestly office (Ex 28 1). Along with Abihu he was guilty of offering "strange fire," and both "died before Jeh" (Lev 10 1.2; Nu 3 4; 26 61). The nature of their offence is far from clear. The word rendered "strange" seems in this connection to mean no more than "unauthorized by the Law" (see זָרָה, zūr, in BDB, and cf Ex 30 9). The proximity of the prohibition of wine to officiating priests (Lev 10 8.9) has given rise to the erroneous suggestion of the Midr that the offence of the brothers was drunkenness.

(2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 28.30).

(3) A Gibeonite (1 Ch 8 30).

(4) Son of Jeroboam I and after him for two years king of Israel (1 K 14 20; 15 25). While Nadab was investing Gibbethon, a Phili stronghold, Baasha, who probably was an officer in the army, as throne-robbers usually were, conspired against him, slew him and seized the throne (1 K 15 27—31). With the assassination of Nadab the dynasty of Jeroboam was extirpated, as foretold by the prophet Ahijah (1 K 14). This event is typical of the entire history of the Northern Kingdom, characterized by revolutions and counter-revolutions.

NADABATH, nā'da-bath (Ναδαβαθ, Nadabāth; AV Nadabatha, na-dab'a-tha): A city E. of the Jordan from which the wedding party of Jambri were coming when Jonathan and Simon attacked them and slew very many, designing to avenge the murder of their brother John (1 Macc 9 37 ff). Nebo and Nabathaca have been suggested as identical with Nadabath. Clermont-Ganneau would read rhabatha, and identify it with Rabbath-ammon. There is no certainty.

NAGGAI, nag'ī, nag'ā-i (Ναγγαί, Naggai; AV Nagge): In Lk 3 25, the Gr form of the Heb name נֹגַח (q.v.).

NAHALAL, nā'hal-al (נַחֲלָל, nahālāl; B, Βαθμάν, Baithmán, A, Νααλῶλ, Naalōl, and other forms): A city in the territory of Zebulun assigned with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites, out of which the Canaanite inhabitants were not driven (Josh 19 15, AV [incorrectly] "Nahalal"; 21 35; Jgs 1 30, "Nahalol"). In the Talm Jerus (Meg., i.1) it is identified with Mahlul. This name might correspond either with 'Ain Māhil, or with Mā'lul. The former lies about 3½ miles N.E. of Nazareth on a hill near the eastern boundary of Zebulun. The latter is situated about 3½ miles W. of Nazareth, near the southern border of Zebulun. The change of n to m is not unusual. W. EWING

NAHALIEL, na-hā'li-el, na-hal'i-el (נַחֲלִיֶּל, nahālī'ēl, "torrent valley of God"; B, Μαβαήλ, Manāēl, A, Νααλιήλ, Naaliēl): A place where Israel encamped on the way from Arnon to Jericho, named with Mattanah and Bamoth (Nu 21 19). Onom places it near to the Arnon. It is natural to seek for this "torrent valley" in one of the tributaries of the Arnon. It may be Wādy Wāleh, which drains a wide area to the N.E. of the Arnon; or perhaps Wādy Zerkā Ma'in farther to the N.

NAHALLAL, na-hal'al, NAHALOL, nā'ha-lol. See NAHALAL.

NAHAM, nā'ham (נַחַם, naham, "comfort"): A Judahite chieftain, father of Keilah the Garmite (1 Ch 4 19); the passage is obscure.

NAHAMANI, nā-ha-mā'nī, na-ham'a-nī (נַחֲמָנִי, nahāmānī, "compassionate"): One of the twelve heads who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 7). The name is wanting in the || list (Ezr 2 2). In 1 Esd 5 8 he is called "Eneneus" (RVm "Enenis").

NAHARAI, nā'ha-rī (נַחֲרַי, nahāray), NAHARI, nā'ha-rī (נַחֲרִי, nahray): One of David's heroes, Joab's armor-bearer (2 S 23 37, AV "Nahari"; 1 Ch 11 39).

NAHASH, nā'hash (נָחָשׁ, nāhāsh, "serpent"; Naás, Naás):

(1) The father of Abigail and Zeruiah, the sisters of David (2 S 17 25; cf 1 Ch 2 16). The text in 2 S, where this reference is made, is hopelessly corrupt; for that reason there are various explanations. The rabbis maintain that Nahash is another name for Jesse, David's father. Others think that Nahash was the name of Jesse's wife; but it is not probable that Nahash could have been the name of a woman. Others explain the passage by making Nahash the first husband of Jesse's wife, so that Abigail and Zeruiah were half-sisters to King David.

(2) A king of Ammon, who, at the very beginning of Saul's reign, attacked Jabesh-gilead so successfully, that the inhabitants sued for peace at almost any cost, for they were willing to pay tribute and serve the Ammonites (1 S 11 1 ff). The harsh king, not satisfied with tribute and slavery, demanded in addition that the right eye of every man should be put out, as "a reproach upon Israel." They were given seven days to comply with these cruel terms. Before the expiration of this time, Saul, the newly anointed king, appeared on the scene with an army which utterly routed the Ammonites (1 S 11 1 ff), and, according to Jos, killed King Nahash (Ant, VI, v, 3).

If the Nahash of 2 S 10 2 be the same as the king mentioned in 1 S 11, this statement of Jos cannot be true, for he lived till the early part of David's reign, 40 or more years later. It is, of course, possible that Nahash, the father of Hanun, was a son or grandson of the king defeated at Jabesh-gilead by Saul. There is but little agreement among commentators in regard to this matter. Some writers go so far as to claim that "all passages in which this name [Nahash] is found refer to the same individual."

(3) A resident of Rabbath-ammon, the capital of Ammon (2 S 17 27). Perhaps the same as Nahash (2), which see. His son Shobi, with other trans-Jordanic chieftains, welcomed David at Mahanaim with sympathy and substantial gifts when the old king was fleeing before his rebel son Absalom. Some believe that Shobi was a brother of Hanun, king of Ammon (2 S 10 1).

W. W. DAVIES

NAHATH, nā'hath (נַחַת, nahath):

(1) A grandson of Esau (Gen 36 13; 1 Ch 1 37).
(2) A descendant of Levi and ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 26); also called "Toah" (1 Ch 6 34) and "Tohu" (1 S 1 1).

(3) A Levite who, in the time of Hezekiah, assisted in the oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" (2 Ch 31 13).

NAHBI, nā'bī (נַחְבִּי, nahbī): The representative of Naphtali among the 12 spies (Nu 13 14).

NAHOR, nā'hor (נָחֹר, nāhōr; in the NT Ναχώρ, Nachōr):

(1) Son of Serug and grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11 22-25; 1 Ch 1 26).

(2) Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen 11 26.27.29; 22 20.23; 24 15.24.47; 29 5; Josh 24 2).

A city of Nahor is mentioned in Gen 24 10; the God of Nahor in Gen 31 53. In AV Josh 24 2; Lk 3 34, the name is spelled "Nachor."

NAHSHON, nā'shon (נַחֲשֹׁן, nahshōn; LXX and NT, Ναασσών, Naassōn): A descendant of Judah; brother-in-law of Aaron and ancestor of David and of Jesus Christ (Ex 6 23; Nu 1 7; 1 Ch 2 10.11; Ruth 4 20; Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32).

NAHUM, nā'hum (Ναούμ, Naoum; AV Naum): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy, the 9th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 25).

LITERATURE

I. Authorship and Date.—The name Nahum (נַחֲמִי, nahūm; LXX and NT Ναούμ, Naoum; Jos, Naoumos) occurs nowhere else

1. Name in the OT; in the NT it is found in Lk 3 25. It is not uncommon in the Mish, and it has been discovered in Phoen inscriptions. It means "consolation," or "consoler," and is therefore, in a sense, symbolical of the message of the book, which is intended to comfort the oppressed and afflicted people of Judah.

Of the personal life of Nahum, practically nothing is known. In 1 1 he is called "the Elkoshite," that is, an inhabitant of Elkosh. Un-

2. Life and Home fortunately, the location of this place is not known. One tradition, which cannot be traced beyond the 16th cent. AD, identifies the home of Nahum with a modern village Elkush, or Alkosh, not far from the left bank of the Tigris, two days' journey N. of the site of ancient Nineveh. A second tradition, which is at least as old as the days of Jerome, the latter part of the 4th cent., locates Elkosh in Galilee, at a place identified by many with the modern El-Kauze, near Ramieh. Others identify the home of the prophet with Capernaum, the name of which means "Village of Nahum." A fourth tradition, which is first found in a collection of traditions entitled "Lives of the Prophets," says "Nahum was from Elkosh, beyond Bet Gabre, of the tribe of Simeon." A place in the S. is more in harmony with the interest the prophet takes in the Southern Kingdom, so that the last-mentioned tradition seems to have much in its favor, but absolute certainty is not attainable.

The Book of Nahum centers around the fall and destruction of Nineveh. Since the capture of the city is represented as still in the future,

3. Date it seems evident that the prophecies were delivered some time before 607–

606 BC, the year in which the city was destroyed. Thus the latest possible date of Nahum's activity is fixed. The earliest possible date also is indicated by internal evidence. In 3 8 ff the prophet speaks of the capture and destruction of No-amon, the Egypt Thebes, as an accomplished fact. The expedition of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, against Egypt, which resulted in the fall of Thebes, occurred about 663 BC. Hence the activity of Nahum must be placed somewhere between 663 and 607.

As to the exact period between the two dates there is disagreement among scholars. One thing is made quite clear by the prophecy itself, namely, that at the time the words were spoken or written, Nineveh was passing through some grave crisis. Now we know that during the second half of the 7th cent. BC Assyria was threatened three times: (1) the revolt of Shamash-shumukin of Babylon against his brother, the king of Assyria, 650–648 BC; (2) the invasion of Assyria and threatened attack upon Nineveh by some unknown foe, perhaps the Scythians, about 625 BC; (3) the final attack, which resulted in the fall and destruction of Nineveh in 607–606 BC.

The first crisis does not offer a suitable occasion for Nahum's prophecy, because at that time the city of Nineveh was not in any danger. Little is known concerning the second crisis, and it is not possible either to prove or to disprove that it gave rise to the book. On the other hand, the years immediately preceding the downfall of Nineveh offer a most suitable occasion. The struggle continued for about 2 years. The united forces of the Chaldeans and Scythians met determined resistance; at last a breach was made in the northeast corner of the wall, the city was taken, pillaged and burned. Judah had suffered much from the proud Assyrian, and it is not difficult to understand how, with the doom of the cruel oppressor imminent, a prophet-patriot might burst into shouts of exultation and triumph over the distress of the cruel foe. "If," says A. B. Davidson, "the distress of Nineveh referred to were the final one, the descriptions of the prophecy would acquire a reality and naturalness which they otherwise want, and the general characteristics of Heb prophecy would be more truly conserved." There seems to be good reason, therefore, for assigning Nahum's activity to a date between 610 and 607 BC.

II. The Book.—Nahum is the prophet of Nineveh's doom. Ch 1 (+2 2) contains the decree of Nineveh's destruction. Jeh is a God

1. Contents of vengeance and of mercy (vs 2,3); though He may at times appear slack in punishing iniquity, He will surely punish the sinner. No one can stand before Him in the day of judgment (vs 4–6). Jeh, faithful to those who rely upon Him (ver 7), will be terrible toward His enemies and toward the enemies of His people (ver 8). Judah need not fear: the present enemy is doomed (vs 9–14), which will mean the exaltation of Judah (1 15; 2 2). The army appointed to execute the decree is approaching, ready for battle (2 1–4). All efforts to save the city are in vain; it falls (vs 5,6), the queen and her attendants are captured (ver 7), the inhabitants flee (ver 8), the city is sacked and left a desolation (vs 9–13). The destruction of the bloody city is imminent (3 1–3); the fate is well deserved and no one will bemoan her (vs 4–7); natural strength and resources will avail nothing (vs 8–11); the soldiers turn cowards and the city will be utterly cut off (vs 12–18); the whole earth will rejoice over the downfall of the cruel oppressor (ver 19).

Opinions concerning the religious significance of the Book of Nahum may differ, but from the standpoint of language and style all students assign to Nahum an exalted

2. Style place among the prophet-poets of the ancient Hebrews; for all are impressed with the intense force and picturesqueness of his language and style. "Each prophet," says Kirkpatrick, "has his special gift for his particular work. Nahum bears the palm for poetic power. His short book is a Pindaric ode of triumph over the oppressor's fall." So also G. A. Smith: "His language is strong and brilliant; his rhythm rumbles and rolls, leaps and flashes, like the horsemen and chariots he describes."

Until recently no doubts were expressed concerning the integrity of the book, but within recent years scholars have, with growing unanimity,

3. Integrity denied the originality of 1 2–2 2 (Heb 2 3), with the exception of 2 1, which is considered the beginning of Nahum's utterances. This change of opinion is closely bound up with the alleged discovery of distorted remnants of an old alphabetic poem in ch 1 (HDB, art. "Nahum"; Expos, 1898, 207 ff; ZATW, 1901, 225 ff; Eiselen, Minor Prophets, 422 ff). Now, it is true that in 1 2–7 traces of alphabetic arrangement may be found, but even here the artistic arrangement is not carried through consistently; in the rest of the chapter the evidence is slight.

The artificial character of acrostic poetry is generally supposed to point to a late date. Hence those who believe that ch 1 was originally an alphabetic poem consider it an exilic or post-exilic production, which was at a still later date prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum. In support of this view it is pointed out further that the prophecy in ch 1 is vague, while the utterances in chs 2 and 3 are definite and to the point. Some derive support for a late date also from the language and style of the poem.

That difficulties exist in ch 1, that in some respects it differs from chs 2 and 3, even the students of the Eng. text can see; and that the Heb text has suffered in transmission is very probable. On the other hand, the presence of an acrostic poem in ch 1 is not beyond doubt. The apparent vagueness is removed, if ch 1 is interpreted as a general introduction to the more specific denunciation in chs 2 and 3. And a detailed examination shows that in this, as in other cases, the linguistic and stylistic data are indecisive. In view of these facts it may safely be asserted that no convincing argument has been presented against the genuineness of 1 2–2 2. "Therefore," says G. A. Smith, "while it is possible that a later poem has been prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum, and the first ch supplies many provocations to belief in such a theory, this has not been proved, and the able essays of proof have much against them. The question is open."

III. Teaching.—The utterances of Nahum center around a single theme, the destruction of Nineveh.

1. The Character of Jehovah His purpose is to point out the hand of God in the impending fall of the city, and the significance of this catastrophe for the oppressed Hebrews. As a result they contain little direct religious teaching; and what there is of it is confined very largely to the opening vs of ch 1. These vs emphasize the two-fold manifestation of the Divine holiness, the Divine vengeance and the Divine mercy (1 2,3). The manifestation of the one results in the destruction of the wicked (1 2), the other in the salvation of the oppressed (1 15; 2 2). Faith in Jeh will secure the Divine favor and protection (1 7).

The fierceness of Nahum, and his glee at the thought of Nineveh's ruin, may not be in accord with the injunction, "Love thine enemy"; but it should be borne in mind that it is not personal hatred that prompts the prophet; he is stirred of Nineveh by a righteous indignation over the outrages committed by Assyria. He considers the sin and overthrow of Nineveh, not merely in their bearing upon the fortunes of Judah, but in their relation to the moral government of the whole world; hence his voice gives utterance to the outraged conscience of humanity.

While Nahum's message, in its direct teaching, appears to be less spiritual and ethical than that of his predecessors, it sets in a clear light Jeh's sway over the whole universe, and emphasizes the duty of nations as well as of individuals to own His sway and obey His will. This attitude alone will assure permanent peace and prosperity; on the other hand, disobedience to His purpose and disregard of His rule will surely bring calamity and distress. The emphasis of these ethical principles gives to the message of Nahum a unique significance for the present day and generation. "Assyria in his hands," says Kennedy, "becomes an object-lesson to the empires of the modern world, teaching, as an eternal principle of the Divine government of the world, the absolute necessity, for a nation's continued vitality, of that righteousness, personal, civic, and national, which alone exalteth a nation."

In a broad sense, 1 15 is of Messianic import. The downfall of Nineveh and Assyria prepares the way for the permanent redemption and exaltation of Zion: "the wicked one shall no more pass through thee."

NAIDUS, nā'i-dus (A, Νάειδος, Náeidōs, B, Νάιδος, Náaidōs): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 31), apparently = "Benaiah" of Ezr 10 30, of which it is probably a corruption or the latter part.

NAIL, nāl: (1) As denoting the finger-nail, the Heb word is צִפְּרֶן, cippōren (Dt 21 12), the captive woman "shall shave her head, and pare her nails." The latter was probably intended to prevent her from marrying her beauty by scratching her face, an act of self-mutilation oriental women are repeatedly reported to have committed in the agony of their grief. Aram. מַסְמֵר, ṣphar (Dnl 4 33, "his nails like birds' claws"). (2) As pin or peg (for tents, or driven into the wall) the word is יָרֵד, yā-thēdh (in Jgs 4 21 RV, "tent-pin"); in Isa 22 23, "a nail in a sure place" is a peg firmly driven into the wall on which something is to be hung (ver 24); cf Eccl 12 11, where the word is masm'rōth, cognate with masmēr below. (3) For nails of iron (1 Ch 22 3) and gold (2 Ch 3 9), and in Isa 41 7 and Jer 10 4, the word is מַסְמֵר, masmēr. (4) In the NT the word is ἄλος, hēlos, used of the nails in Christ's hands (Jn 20 25), and "to nail" in Col 2 14 ("nailing it to the cross") is προσῆλω, proselōō.

In a figurative sense the word is used of the hard point of a stylus or engraving tool: "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point [lit. "claw," "nail"] of a diamond: it is graven upon the tablet of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars" (Jer 17 1).

NAIN, nā'in (Nālv, Nain): This town is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the visit of Jesus and the miracle of raising the widow's son from the dead (Lk 7 11). The name persists to this day, and in the form of Nein clings to a small village on the northwestern slope of Jebel ed-Duhy ("Hill of Moreh"), the mountain which, since the Middle Ages, has been known as Little Hermon. The modern name of the mountain is derived from Neby Duhy whose wely crowns the height above the village. There are many ancient remains, proving that the place was once of considerable size. It was never inclosed by a wall, as some have thought from the mention of "the gate." This was probably the opening between the houses by which the road entered the town. Tristram thought he had found traces of an ancient city wall, but this proved to be incorrect. The ancient town perhaps stood somewhat higher on the hill than the present village. In the rocks to the E. are many tombs of antiquity. The site commands a beautiful and extensive view across the plain to Carmel, over the Nazareth hills, and away past Tabor to where the white peak of Hermon glitters in the sun. To the S. are the heights of Gilboa and the uplands of Samaria. The village, once prosperous, has fallen on evil days. It is said that the villagers received such good prices for simsum that they cultivated it on a large scale. A sudden drop in the price brought them to ruin, from which, after many years, they have not yet fully recovered.

NAIOTH, nā'yoth, nī'ōth (נִיּוֹת, nāyōth; B, אֲדָוָה, Adāth, A, נַאֲוִיּוֹת, Naviōth): This is the name given to a place in Ramah to which David went with Samuel when he fled and escaped from Saul (1 S 19 18, etc). The term has often been taken as meaning "houses" or "habitations"; but this cannot be justified. There is no certainty as to exactly what the word signified. Clearly, however, it attached to a particular locality in Ramah; and whatever its etymological significance, it denoted a place where the prophets dwelt together. On approaching it in pursuit of David, Saul was overcome by the Spirit of God, and conducted himself like one "possessed," giving rise to the proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets?"

W. EWING

NAKED, nā'ked, NAKEDNESS, nā'ked-nes: "Naked" in the OT represents various derivatives of עָרָה, 'ārāh, and עָרָה, 'ārāh, chiefly עָרֹם, 'arōm (adj.) and עָרְוָה, 'erwāh (noun); in the NT the adj. is γυμνός, gumnós, the noun γυμνότης, gumnótēs, with vb. γυμνῆσαι, gumnēsaíō, in 1 Cor 4 11. In Ex 32 25; 2 Ch 28 19, AV adds פָּרַע, pāra', "break loose," "cast away restraint." Both the Gr and Heb forms mean "without clothing," but in both languages they are used frequently in the sense of "lightly clad" or, simply, "without an outer garment." So, probably, is the meaning in Jn 21 7—Peter was wearing only the chiton (see DRESS); and so perhaps in Mk 14 51.52 and Mic 1 8. In Isa 20 2-4, however, the meaning is lit. (for the "three years" of ver 3 see the comms.). So in Gen 2 25; 3 7, where the act of sin is immediately followed by the sense of shame (see Delitzsch, Bib. Psychology, and Gunkel, ad loc.). A very common use of "naked" is also "without proper clothing" (Job 22 6; 1 Cor 4 11, etc), whence, of course, the expression "clothe the naked." "Nakedness," in addition, is used as a euphemism in 1 S 20 30. A slightly different euphemistic usage is that of Lev 18 19, which in Ezk 16 36.37 is played off against the literal sense (cf Ezk 22 10; 23 18.29). The point of Gen 9 22.23 is a little hard to grasp, but apparently there is here again a euphemism—this time for a particularly horrible act (see the comms. and cf Hab 2 15). Possibly some of these euphemisms are due to the Massoretes (see OT Texts). The Jews objected vigorously to exposure of the body (even athletes insisting on a loin-cloth [cf 2 Macc 4 12.13]), and compulsory nudity was the extreme of shame and humiliation (Isa 20 2-4; Lam 1 8; Hos 2 3; Nah 3 5, etc). The relation of this attitude to Israel's high sexual morality needs no explanation.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

NAME, nām (נָם, shēm; ὄνομα, ónoma; Lat nomen [2 Esd 4 1]; vbs. ὀνομάζω, onomázo; Lat nomino [2 Esd 5 26]): A "name" is that by which a person, place or thing is marked and known. In Scripture, names were generally descriptive of the person, of his position, of some circumstance affecting him, hope entertained concerning him, etc, so that "the name" often came to stand for the person. In Acts 1 15; Rev 3 4, ónoma stands for "persons"; cf Nu 26 53, 55.

1. OT Word and Use.—The word for "name" in the OT is shēm (also the name of one of the sons of Noah). The etymology is uncertain, although it may be from shāmāh (obs.), "to set a mark"; shum is the Aram. form. For the name as descriptive of the person see NAMES. Besides designating persons, the name also stands for fame, renown, reputation, character gained or expressed, etc (Gen 6 4; 2 S 7 9.23, etc); it might be an "evil name" (Dt 22 14.19); the "name" is also equivalent to a "people" or "nation" (which might be "blotted out," i.e. destroyed [Dt 7 24, etc]); to speak or write "in the name" signified authority (Ex 5 23; 1 K 21 8, etc); to "call one's name" over a place or people indicated possession or ownership (2 S 12 28; Am 9 12, etc); to act "in the name" was to represent (Dt 25 6); to be called or known "by name" indicated special individual notice (Ex 31 2; Isa 43 1; 45 3.4). Gen 2 19.20 even displays a conception of identity between the name and the thing.

"To name" is sometimes 'amar, "to say" (1 S 16 3); dābhar, "to speak" (Gen 23 16); nākabh, "to mark out" (Nu 1 17); kārā, "to call" (Gen 48 16; Isa 61 6).

Of special interest is the usage with respect to the name of God. (For the various Divine names and their significance see GOD, NAMES OF.) He revealed Himself to Israel through Moses by a new name (which was at the same time that of the God of their fathers)—JEHOVAH (q.v.) (Yahweh)—the nature of which should be shown by His manifestations on their behalf (Ex 3 13-16; 15 2.3). The "name" of God was therefore not a mere word, but the whole of "the Divine manifestation, the character of God as revealed in His relations to His people and in His dealings with them (Ex 9 16; Josh 7 9; 9 9, etc). The "name" of Jeh" was proclaimed to Moses on Mt. Sinai, "Jeh, Jeh, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness and truth," etc (Ex 34 6); the name Jehovah (so revealed) was (Ex 3 15) His "memorial Name" (so, often, in ARV; see MEMORIAL). His sole Deity was such an important element in His name that Dt 6 4 f was termed the "Shema" (from shema, "hear," the first word in ver 4), the first article of Israelitish faith, taught to all the children, written on the phylacteries, and still recited as the first act in public and private worship "twice a day by every adult male Jew." Where Jeh is said to record His name, or to put His name in a place (or person), some special Divine manifestation is implied, making the place or person sacred to Him (Ex 20 24; 1 K 8 16). His "name" was in the angel of His Presence (Ex 23 21); what He does is "for his great name's sake," in fidelity to and vindication of His revealed character and covenant relationship (2 Ch 6 32; Ps 25 11); the great things He should do would be "for a name" (Isa 55 13); He would give His people a new name, "an everlasting name" (Isa 56 5); to be "called by" the name of Jeh is "to be his people" (2 Ch 7 14; Isa 43 7); it implies "protection," etc (Isa 63 19; Jer 14 8.9); to "call upon" the name of Jeh was "to worship him" as God (Gen 21 33; 26 25, etc); "to confess" His name, to "acknowledge him" (1 K 8 33.35); to love, trust, act in, etc., "the name," was to love, trust, etc, Jeh Himself (Ps 5 11; 7 17). Very frequently, esp. in the Ps and prophecies of Isa and Jer, "the name" of God stands for "God himself"; to "forget his name" was "to depart from him" (Jer 23 27); "to minister, prophesy, or speak" in His name signified Divine appointment, inspiration, authority (Jer 11 21; 14 14.15, etc); we have "swearing by" or "in" the name of Jeh (Dt 6 13); to take His name "in vain" was to swear falsely (Ex 20 7; Lev 19 12); we have "blessing" in His name (Dt 10 8); "cursing" (2 K 2 24). In Lev 24 11, we have the case of one who "blasphemed the Name, and cursed," the penalty for which was death by stoning (vs 13-16). In later Jewish usage (cf Wisd 14 21) the sacred name Jeh was not pronounced in reading the Scriptures, Adhōnāy ("my Lord") being substituted for it (the vowels belonging to Adhōnāy were written with the consonants of the Divine name, hence the frequent term "the Lord" in AV, for which ARV substitutes "Jeh."

II. NT Word and Use.—In the NT ónoma has frequently also the significance of denoting the

"character," or "work" of the person, 1. Character e.g. Mt 1 21, "Thou shalt call him and Work name Jesus; for it is he that shall of the save," etc (Lk 1 31; 2 21; 1 63, Person "His name is John"; cf the new names given to Simon, James and John;

Saul's new name of "Paul"). The "name" of God has the same relation to the character of God as in the OT (Mt 6 9; "Father, glorify thy name," Jn 12 28); it is manifested by Christ (Jn 17 26; cf ver 3); the name of Jesus, as manifesting God, takes the place of the name of Jeh in the OT (cf Jas 2 7 with Jer 14 9, and see below); to Him is given "the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow . . . and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father," Phil 2 9.10 (cf Isa 45 23); "It is not the name Jesus, but the name of Jesus" (Lightfoot), i.e. the name ("Lord") received by Jesus; we have with reference to Jesus simply "the Name" (Acts 5 41, "worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name"; Jas 5 14 [probable text, WH], "in the Name"; 3 Jn ver 7, "for the sake of the Name"); the "name of Christ" is equivalent to "Christ himself" (Mt 10 22; 19 29); it is the same thing as "his manifestation" (Jn 20 31); therefore "to believe on his name" is to believe in Him as manifested in His life and work (Jn 1 12; 2 23); "in the name of God" means sent by God, as representing Him, with Divine authority (Mt 21 9; 23 39); in like manner, we have "prophesying" or "preaching" in the name of Jesus (Acts 4 18; 5 28). The "name of Jesus" represented His "authority" and "power," e.g. working miracles in His name (Mt 7 22; Mk 9 39; Acts 4 7, "by what name [or "power"] have ye done this?"), and it is contrasted with casting out evil spirits by some other name or power (Acts 16 18; 19 17). The gospel of salvation was to be preached "in his name," by His authority and as making it effectual (Lk 24 47); sinners were justified "through his name" (Acts 10 43; 1 Cor 6 11); sins were forgiven "for his name's sake" (1 Jn 2 12); men "called upon the name" of Jesus, as they had done on that of Jeh (Acts 9 14.21 [cf 7 59]; Rom 10 13.14).

"To name the name" of Christ was to belong to Him (2 Tim 2 19); the calling of His name on the Gentiles signified their acceptance as God's people (Acts 15 17 [quoted from Am 9 12]; cf Rom 1 5); to "hold fast his name" is to be true to Him as made known (Rev 2 13; 3 8); to be "gathered together in his name," to "do all things in his name," is as "acknowledging him" (Mt 18 20; Col 3 17); "to baptize in" or "into the name" of Jesus Christ (Acts 2 38; 22 16, "calling on his name," contrasted with baptizing into one's own name in 1 Cor 1 13, etc) is "to call over them his name" (in the rite), as claiming them for Christ and as their acknowledgment of Him or of faith in Him—becoming His disciples; similarly, to baptize “into [eis] the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit,” represents “dedication to” God as He has been revealed in Christ.

“In the name of” means “as representing” (or as being), e.g. “in the name of a prophet,” of “a righteous man,” or of “a disciple” (Mt 10 41.42); to receive a little child “in Christ’s name,” i.e. as belonging to Him, is to receive Himself (Mt 18 5; Mk 9 37; ver 41 to disciples, RV “because ye are Christ’s,” m “Gr in name that ye are [Christ’s]”: Lk 9 48; cf Mt 18 20; Mk 13 6, “Many shall come in my name”; Lk 21 8).

The significance of the name of Jesus in relation to prayer deserves special notice. To pray in the name of Jesus, to ask anything in His name, according to His promises, 2. In Relation to Prayer “Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do” (Jn 14 13; cf 14 14; 15 16; 16 23); “Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask . . . that your joy may be made full” (Jn 16 24), is not merely to add to our prayers (as is so often unthinkingly done): “we ask all in the name of Jesus,” or “through Jesus Christ our Lord,” etc, but to pray or ask as His representatives on earth, in His mission and stead, in His spirit and with His aim; it implies union with Christ and abiding in Him, He in us and we in Him. The meaning of the phrase is, “as being one with me even as I am revealed to you.” Its two correlatives are “in me” (Jn 6 56; 14 20; 15 4 ff; 16 33; cf 1 Jn 5 20), and the Pauline “in Christ” (Westcott, The Gospel according to St. John).

I. Form of Hebrew, or, More Broadly, Semitic, Proper Names.—The Heb proper name consists of a single word, a phrase, or a sentence.

1. Various Types (1) Where the name is a single word, other than a vb., it may be (a) a common noun, concrete, as Barak, “lightning,” Tola, “crimson worm,” Elon, “oak,” Achsah, “anklet,” Deborah, “bee”; or abstract, as Uzzah, “strength,” Manoah, “rest,” Hannah, “grace”; or either abstract or concrete, as Zebul, “habitation”; (b) a participle, as Saul, “asked,” Zeruiah, “cleft”; (c) an adj., as Ikkesh, “perverse,” Maharai, “impetuous,” Shimei, “famous”; or (d) a word that may be either an adj. or an abstract noun according to circumstances. Such are formations after the norm of kaṭīl, as Shammua’, which are generally adjs.; and formations by means of the ending am or on, as Adullam, Zalmon, Gideon, or, with the rejection of the final n, Shilo[h] and Solo-mo[n]. (2) The name may be a phrase, consisting of (a) two nouns, as Penuel, “face of God,” Samuel, “name of God,” Ish-bosheth, “man of shame”; or (b) an adj. and a noun, as Jedidiah, “beloved of Jeh”; or (c) a preposition and one or more nouns, as Besodeiah, “in the intimacy of Jeh” (Neh 3 6). (3) When the name is a sentence, the predicate may be (a) a noun, the copula being implied, as Abijah, “Jeh is a father,” Eliab, “God is a father,” Elimelech, “God is king”; or (b) an adj., as Tobijah, “Jeh is good” (Zec 6 10); or (c) a participle, as Obed-edom, “Edom is serving”; or (d) a finite vb. This last type exhibits five or six varieties: the subject stands before a perfect, as Jonathan, “Jeh hath given,” Jehoshaphat, “Jeh hath judged,” Eleazar, “God hath helped,” Elkanah, “God hath formed”; or before an imperfect, as Eliabha, “God hideth Himself”; or the subject comes after a perfect, as Benaiah, “Jeh hath built,” Shephatiah, “Jeh hath judged,” Asahel, “God hath made”; or after an imperfect, as Jezreel, “God doth sow.” Very often the subject is the pronoun included or implied in the verbal form, as Nathan, “he hath given,” Hillel, “he hath praised,” Jair, “he enlighteneth,” Jephthah, “he openeth.” Occasionally the predicate contains an object of the vb., as Shealtiel, “I have asked God” (Ezr 3 2), or a prepositional phrase, as Hephzibah, “my delight is in her” (2 K 21 1). The sentence-name is usually a declaration, but it may be an exhortation or a prayer, as Jerubbaal, “let Baal strive,” and Hoshea, “save!” (Nu 13 16), or it may be a question, as Micaiah, “who is like Jeh?” All of the foregoing illustrations have been taken from the Books of Jgs and S, unless otherwise noted.

The proper name is treated as one word, whether on analysis it consists of a single word, a phrase, or a sentence; and as such it is subject to the laws of accent and quantity which govern the Heb word. (1) A common noun used as a name undergoes the variations of pronunciation due to the custom of lengthening a short vowel in pause and to the laws which control the aspiration of certain labials, linguals, and palatals. Thus the name Perez, “breach,” which appears also as Pharez in AV of the OT, occurs in the Heb text in the four forms perez, parez, pherez and pharez (Ruth 4 18; Neh 11 4.6). (2) In a name consisting of a phrase the normal advance of the accent as usual causes the loss of a pretonic vowel, as is indicated by the suspended letter in J’didiah, “beloved of Jeh”; requires a short vowel in a closed unaccented syllable, as in Mahalāl’el, “praise of God”; allows contraction, as in Bêth-el, “house of God”; and occasions the return of a segholate noun to its primitive form, as in Abdiel, “servant of God,” where the vowel i is an archaism which has lingered in compound names, but has generally disappeared elsewhere in speech. (3) Names which consist of a sentence are also accented as one word, and the pronunciation is modified accordingly. The synonyms Eliam and Ammiel, “God is a kinsman,” not only exhibit the common archaism in the retention of the vowel i, but the name Eliam also shows the characteristic lengthening of the vowel in the final accented syllable, so common in nouns. The four forms Eliphalet, Eliphalet, Elpelet and Elpalet, meaning “God is deliverance,” represent the variations of the Heb due to the causes already mentioned (1 Ch 3 8; 14 5.7; see AV and RV). The requirements regarding the elision and the quantity and quality of vowels, on the shifting of the accent, are also regularly met by the various types of sentence-names in which the predicate is a vb. Thus the personal names ’ēlīshāmā and ’elnāthān (subject followed by vb. in the perfect): ’elyākīm, ’elyahbā, and yehōyākhīn (subject and imperfect): gedhalyāh, yekholyāhū, bārakh’el, in which the first vowel is protected by the implied reduplication of the Piel species, benāyāh, ’āsāh’el, and ’āsāh-’el, ’āsī’el, hāzāh’el and hāzā’el and pedah’el (perfect and subject); yigdalyāhū, yibhneyāh, ya’āsī’el, yahdī’el, yehallel’el, yēsīmī’el (imperfect and subject); yerubba’al and yāshobh’ām (jussive and subject; ū in sharpened, and ō in closed, syllable; in Jashobeam the first long vowel is retained by a secondary accent, marked by metheg); nāthān and yipthāh, i.e. Jephthah. Ibnēiah shows the customary apocopation of the imperfect of Lamedh-he vbs.; and the names Benaiah to Pedahel show the methods of combining the perfect of such vbs. with a following element. The short vowel of the final closed syllable of the imperfect is elided, if the final consonant is permitted to begin the syllable of the next element of the name, as in Jezreel, Jekabzeel, Jerahmeel, Ezekiel, Jehizkiah (see the Heb form of these names); but it is not elided in Ishmael, although the consonant is attached to the following syllable; and elision is avoided, as in Jipthah-el, by keeping the ultimate and penultimate syllables distinct. Jehucal, a Hophal imperfect, is peculiar in not lengthening the vowel in the accented final syllable, when the vb. is used as a personal name.

When the name was a sentence in Heb, its constituent parts could be transposed without changing the meaning. Thus the father

3. Transposition of constituent parts—of Bathsheba was called Ammiel, "a kinsman is God," and Eliam, "God is a kinsman" (2 S 11 3; 1 Ch 3 5); and similarly, in letters written from Pal to the king of Egypt in the 14th cent. BC, Ilimiki is also called Milkili, the name in either form signifying "God is king." Ahaziah, king of Judah, is called Jehoahaz (cf 2 Ch 21 17 with 22 1), a legitimate transposition of the vb. and subject, and meaning in each case, "Jeh hath laid hold."

Not only did transposition take place, but the substitution of a cognate root and even the use of a different part of the vb. also occurred. Thus King Jehoiachin (2 K 24 6; Jer 52 31) was known also as Jeconiah (Jer 24 1; 28 4) and Coniah (22 24, 28; 37 1). The two names Jehoiachin and Jeconiah have exactly the same meaning, "Jeh doth establish"; and Coniah is a synonym, "the establishing of Jeh." The Divine name which begins Jehoiachin is transferred to the end in Jeconiah and Coniah; and the Hiphil imperfect of the vb. kān, which is seen in Jehoiachin, has been replaced by the Qal imperfect of the vb. kānan in Jeconiah, and by the construct infinitive of the same species in Coniah. Parallel cases occur in Assy and Bab lit., among which the two forms of the king's name, Zamama-shum-iddina and Zamama-nadin-shum, exhibit both the transposition of constituent parts and an interchange of preterite and participle.

Twin forms like Abiner and Abner, Abishalom and Absalom, Elizaphan and Elzaphan, are not the full name and its abbreviation by

4. Methods of abbreviation—variant, equally legitimate, modes of combining the constituent parts. The common methods of shortening were:

(1) contraction by the rejection of a weak consonant or the apocope of a final unaccented vowel, notably illustrated by the Divine name yēhō at the beginning and yāhū at the end of proper names: hence Jehoash became Joash (2 K 12 1, 19), and Amaziahu became Amaziah (2 K 14 1 Heb text, and 8); (2) abbreviation of composite geographical names by the omission of the generic noun or its equivalent: Jerusalem, which to the Hebrews meant "foundation of peace," was shortened to Salem, "peace" (Ps 76 2); Kiriath-baal, "city of Baal" (Josh 15 60), to Baal or Baalah (Josh 15 9, 10; cf 2 S 6 2); Beeshterah, "house or temple of Astarte," to Ashtarothe; Beth-lebaoth, "house of lionesses," to Lebaoth; Beth-azmaveth to Azmaveth; Beth-rehob to Rehob; Beth-bamoth to Bamoth (M S, l. 27, with Nu 21 19); Beth-baal-meon to Baal-meon (Nu 32 38; Josh 13 17); the same custom existed among the Moabites who spoke of this town indifferently as Beth-baal-meon and Baal-meon (M S, ll. 9, 30); (3) abbreviation by the omission of the Divine name: thus the name of the idolater Micaiah, which means, "who is like Jeh?" (Jgs 17 1, 4 [Heb]), was shortened to Micah, "who is like?" (vs 5, 8); and similarly in the case of three other men, namely the prophet (Micaiah, Jer 26 18 ERV, and Micah, Mic 1 1), the Levite musician (Neh 12 35 with 11 17, 22), and the father of Abdon (2 K 22 12 with 2 Ch 34 20).

The king of Judah, Yauhazi, as he was known to the Assyrians, i.e. Jehoahaz, "Jeh hath laid hold," is called simply Ahaz, "he hath laid hold," in the Heb records. The town of Jabneel, "God doth cause to be built," was shortened to Jabneh, "he doth cause to be built" (Josh 15 11; 2 Ch 26 6; cf 1 Macc 4 15); Paltiel, "deliverance of God," was curtailed to Palti, "deliverance" (1 S 25 44; 2 S 3 15); Abijah, "Jeh is father," to Abi (2 Ch 29 1 with 2 K 18 2); and Bamoth-baal, "high places of Baal," to Bamoth (Josh 13 17 with Nu 21 19). Abdi, Othni, Uzzi, and not a few other similar names, probably represent curtailment of this sort. The omission of the Divine title has parallels in Assy and Bab lit.; thus Nabu-nadin-ziri and Nabu-shum-ukin were called Nadinu and Shum-ukin respectively (Dynastic Tablet no. 2, col. iv, 4, 5, with Bab Chron., col. i, 13, 16).

(4) Abbreviation by the elision of the initial consonant, yet so that the remainder is a synonymous name of complete grammatical form. The name of King Hezekiah was written by the Hebrews both yēhīzkiyāh, "Jeh doth strengthen," and hizkiyāh, "Jeh is strength." The two forms interchange many times in 2 Ch 29-33. Similarly, Jeconiah was shortened to Coniah, as has already been noticed; the name of the town Jekabzeel, "God bringeth together," to Kabzeel, "God's bringing together" (Neh 11 25 with Josh 15 21; 2 S 23 20); Meshelemiah, "Jeh is recompensing," to Shelemiah, "Jeh's recompensing" (1 Ch 26 1, 2 with ver 14); Meshullam, "recompensed," to Shallum, "recompensed" (1 Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11 with 1 Ch 6 12; Ezr 7 2).

II. The Range of Proper Names.—(1) Not exclusively descriptive.—Simonis in his Onomasticum, published in 1741, and Gesenius in his

1. Personal Names from 1835 to 1853, endeavored to interpret the proper names as though they were ordinarily intended to characterize the person who bore them. Embarrassed by the theory, Gesenius tr^d Malchiel by "rex Dei, h. e. a Deo constitutus"; and Simonis tr^d Malchi-shua by "regis auxilium, i.e. auxilium s. salus regi patri praestita"; Ammizabad was rendered by Gesenius "famulus largitoris, h.e. Jehovae," and by Simonis "populum (i.e. copiosissimum liberorum turbam) donavit"; Gesenius tr^d Gedaliah "quem Jehova educavit vel roboravit," Zerariah "cui Jehova ortum dedit," Jehoazadak "quem Jehova justum fecit," and Joel "cui Jehova est deus, i.e. cultor Jehovae"; but Simonis rendered Joel by "Jehova (est) Deus . . . vel (cui) Jehova Deus (est)." Now Malchiel means "God is king," Malchi-shua "the king, i.e. God, is salvation" (cf Joshua), Ammizabad "the Kinsman hath endowed," Gedaliah "Jeh is great," Zerariah "Jeh hath risen in splendor," Jehoazadak "Jeh is righteous," and Joel, if a compound name, "Jeh is God." A moment's reflection makes clear that these names do not describe the persons who bear them, but in every case speak of God. They emphasize the important facts that personal names might be, and often were, memorial and doctrinal, and that personal names were a part of the ordinary speech of the people, full of meaning and intelligible to all, subject to the phonetic laws of the Hebrews, and obedient to the rules of grammar.

(2) Drawn from a wide field.—Parents named their children, and contemporaries dubbed people, from physical and spiritual traits, whether a beauty or a blemish; thus Hophni, "pertaining to the fist," Japhia, "gleaming," Ikkes, "perverse," Ira, "watchful," Gareb, "rough-skinned," and Hiddai, "joyful." Children were called by the names of natural objects, as Peninnah, "coral," Rimmon, "pomegranate," Tamar, "palm tree," Nahash, "serpent," Eglah, "heifer," Aiah, "bird of prey," and Laish, "lion"; or after kinsfolk or remoter members of the clan, as Absalom's daughter Tamar bore the name of her father's beautiful sister, and as the priest Phinehas took his strange name from the noted Phinehas, who belonged to the same father's house in earlier days. Or the name given to the child furnished a memorial of events in the national history, like Ichabod, "the glory is not" (1 S 4 21), and probably Obed-edom, "Edom is serving" (cf 1 S 14 47; 21 7); or it told of circumstances attending the child's birth, as Saul, "asked," and Elishama, "God hath heard"; or it embodied an article of the parent's creed, as Joab and Abijah, "Jeh is a father," Joel, "Jeh is God"; or it expressed a hope concerning the child or bore witness to a prophecy, as Jedidiah, "beloved of Jeh," and Solomon, "peaceable" (2 S 12 25; 1 Ch 22 9). Sometimes the name of the tribe or race to which a man belonged became his popular designation, as Cush, "Cushite." All of these examples have been cited from the records of one period of Israel's history, the times of Samuel and David.

(3) Influences leading to choice.—The people in general gathered names for their children freely from all parts of this wide field, but in certain circles influences were at work which tended to restrict the choice to a smaller area. These influences were religious: (a) In homes of piety conscious nearness to God on the part of the parents naturally prompted them to bestow religious names upon their children. The name may be without distinct religious mark in its form and meaning, as Ephraim, "double fruitfulness," Manasseh, "making to forget," and yet have been given in acknowledgment of God's grace and be a constant reminder of His goodness (Gen 41 51.52); or the name may be religious in form, as Shemaiah, "Jeh hath heard," and publicly testify to the parents' gratitude to God. (b) The covenant relation, which Jeh entered into with Israel, made the name Jehovah, and that aspect of God's character which is denoted by this name, peculiarly precious to the people of God, and thenceforth the word Jehovah became a favorite element in the personal names of the Israelites, though not, of course, to the exclusion of the great name EL, "God." (c) Among the kings in the line of David, the consciousness of their formal adoption by Jeh to be His vicegerents on the throne of Israel (2 S 7; Ps 2) found expression in the royal names. Jeh, the God of Israel, was acknowledged in the personal name Abijah, borne by the son and successor of Rehoboam. But his was an isolated case, unless the name Asa is an abbreviated form. But with Jehoshaphat, Abijah's grandson, early in the 9th cent., the custom became established. Henceforth it was conventional for the king of Judah to have for his name a sentence with Jeh as its subject. The only exceptions among the 16 successors of Asa on the throne were Manasseh and his son Amon, both of whom were notoriously apostate from Jeh. The full name of Ahaz was Jehoahaz. Josiah's son Shallum as king was known as Jehoahaz; and his brother Eliakim, when placed on the throne by Pharaoh-nechoh, was given the name Jehoiakim. (d) Akin to the influence exerted by the relation of the kings to the God of Israel, and manifesting almost equal power contemporaneously with it, was the influence of official connection with the sanctuary, either as priests or as subordinate ministers, and it frequently led to the choice of an ecclesiastical name containing the word God or Jeh. During the five centuries and a half, beginning near the close of Solomon's reign and extending to the end of Nehemiah's administration, 22 high priests held office, so far as their names have been preserved in the records. Of these pontiffs 17 bear names which are sentences with Jeh as subject, and another is a sentence with EL as subject. The materials for investigation along this line are not complete, as they are in the case of the kings, and ratios derived from them are apt to be erroneous; but evidently the priests of Jeh's temple at Jerus not only recognized the appropriateness for themselves and their families of names possessing a general religious character, but came to favor such as expressly mentioned God, esp. those which mentioned God by His name of Jehovah.

(4) Popularity of names: hard to determine.—Until abundant data come to light for all periods of the history, it is precarious to attempt to determine the relative popularity of the various kinds and types of names in any one generation, or to compare period with period with respect to the use or neglect of a particular class of names. For, first, in no period are the names which have been transmitted by the Heb records many as compared with the thousands in use at the time; and, secondly, the records deal with the historical event which was conspicuous at the moment, and rarely mention persons other than the actors in this event.

At one time men and women from the middle class of society are asserting themselves in the national life, and the personal names current in the families of farmers, shopkeepers and soldiers obtain place in the annals; at another time, when the activities of the court are of paramount importance, it is mainly names that were current in official circles which are chronicled; at yet another period, when matters of the national worship engaged the attention of the state, ecclesiastics and laymen from pious families, whose names were quite likely to have a religious meaning, receive mention. Very few names outside of the particular circle concerned are preserved in the records. It is unwarranted, therefore, to draw inferences regarding the relative use of particular names, secular names, for instance, at different periods of the history of Israel, by comparing the number of these names found in a record of political uprisings in the army with the number of similar names in the narrative of an episode which occurred at a later date and in which only priests took part. It is comparing things that differ. It is comparing the number of certain names current in military circles with the number of the same names among ecclesiastics, in order to learn whether these names were more common among the people as a whole in the one period than in the other.

The brine of its waters led the ancient Hebrews to call the Dead Sea the Salt Sea. Bethesda, "house of mercy," received its name from the belief in the healing virtue of its waters; Lebanon, "white," from the snows that cover its crest; Sidon on the Mediterranean Sea and Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, from their fisheries; Tyre, from the great rock in the sea on which it was built; the valley of Elah, from the terebinth tree; Luz, from the almond tree; Shittim, from the acacia groves on the eastern terrace of the Jordan valley; and Jericho, from the fragrance of its palms and balsams. The "crags of the wild goats" and En-ge-di, "kid spring" (1 S 24 1.2), were in a desolate, rocky region where the wild goats had their home; Aijalon signifies "place of harts," and Etam denotes a "place of beasts and birds of prey." The hopes of a people and pride in their town were expressed in names like Joppa, "beauty," Tirzah, "pleasantness," Janoah, "rest," Shiloh, "tranquillity," and Salem, "peace." The resemblance of the Sea of Galilee in shape to a harp secured for it its ancient name of Chinnereth. Poetic imagination saw in majestic Mt. Hermon likeness to a soldier's breastplate, and forthwith the mountain was called Serion and Senir. The sanctuary of a deity might give name to a town, hence Beth-dagon, Beth-anath, and Ashtarothe. Sometimes the name of a place commemorated a victory, as rock Oreb, rock Zeeb, and Eben-ezer (Jgs 7 25; 1 S 7 12); or enshrined a religious transaction or experience, Beth-el and Beracah (Gen 28 17-19; 2 Ch 20 26); or told of a migration, as when colonists gave the name of their native town to their new settlement (Jgs 1 23-26). Often the name of the founder or other famous inhabitant became attached to a town, and that for various reasons. It was often necessary to distinguish places of the same name from each other by this method; thus certain of the towns called Gibeah became Gibeath-saul and Gibeath-phinehas. The Jebusite stronghold captured by David was named by him the city of David, and was known by this name, as a quarter of Jerus, for many generations (2 S 5 9; 2 K 16 20). The practice was common among the Sem contemporaries of Israel, as is illustrated by Dur-sharruken, "Sargonsburg," and Kar-shalmanasharidu, "Shalmaneser's fortress." A town might also be named after the tribe which inhabited it or after the ancestor of the tribe, as Dan (Jgs 18 29), and possibly under not a few geographical designations a tribal name is hidden, even when the fact has escaped record and is not revealed by the form of the name. In an inquiry after the origin of a geographical designation the first consideration is due to the causes known to be ordinarily at work in giving rise to names of the same aspect as the one under scrutiny; and only when they fail to yield a suitable explanation are less obvious causes worthy of serious attention.

III. Characteristics of Biblical References.—As a rule, Sem words clearly reveal their origin and structure. The Semite might, indeed, err with respect to the particular meaning intended, where a word was current in several significations. Thus the vale of bākhā', mentioned in Ps 84 7 (Eng. 6), is open to two interpretations: namely, "valley of Baca," so called from the balsam trees in it, and "valley of weeping," as the VSS render the unusual form, regarding it as equivalent to a similar word meaning "weeping." The pl. b'khā'im, "mulberry or balsam trees" (2 S 5 23. 24), was understood by Jos to denote a grove known by the name Weepers (Ant, VII, iv, 1; cf LXX). In those rare cases where several derivations were possible, the Israelite may not always have known which thought was intended to be embodied in the name which he heard. But he discerned the alternative possibilities; and a parent, in bestowing a name ambiguous in its derivation, might be deliberately taking advantage of its power to be the vehicle for the suggestion and expression of two thoughts (Gen 30 23.24; Joseph being derivable from both yāṣaph and 'āṣaph).

That the object of the Bib. writer was not to make known the derivation of the proper names is clear from cases like Esek, Rehoboth and Ishmael (Gen 16 11; 26 20.22): Isaac called the name of the well, Contention, because the herdsmen of Gerar "contended" with him; another well he called Broad Places (roomy places), because Jeh had "made room" for him; and Hagar was directed to name the son that she was about to bear "God doth hear," because Jeh had "heard" her affliction. The narrator's purpose was not to declare that the Heb word for contention, 'ēsek, is derived from the Heb vb. for "contend," 'āṣak, and that the name "God doth hear," yishma'ēl, signifies God doth hear, yishma'ēl. These derivations and meanings were plain. The purpose was to state the circumstances which led to the choice of the name. There are instances also where no part of the name reappears in the words that state the reason for the use of the name. For example, the name Maher-shalal-hash-baz is not explained by citing the words which compose it. One noun of the composite name appears, indeed, in the exposition of the meaning, but accidentally as it were, and without prominence or significance of position (Isa 8 3.4). Samuel is a notable example of this method. Hannah called his name Samuel, saying, 'Because of Jeh I asked him' (1 S 1 20). Simonis, Ewald and Nestle derive the name from sh'mū'ēl, "heard of God." This etymology would fully satisfy the reason given for the mother's choice of the name; but the suggested derivation is far-fetched, for it is not customary for a Heb word to lose the strong guttural 'ayin. The guttural was not lost, but was distinctly heard, in Ishmael, where there is the same concurrence of sounds as in sh'mū'ēl. Kimhi, on the other hand, suggested that Samuel is a contraction of shā'ul mē'ēl, "asked of God"; and Ewald asserts that this origin is the theory of the narrator (Lehrbuch der hebräischen Sprache, 275, n. 3). This is incredible. Such a contraction is "alien to the genius of the Heb language" (Driver, Text of Samuel, 13), and the absence of the two consonants aleph and lamedh before the letter m in the midst of the name Samuel would of itself prevent the Semite from imagining such an etymology. The derivation and meaning of Samuel were not obscure. The type was common, and was esp. familiar by reason of the name Peniel, "face of God" (Gen 32 30f). Samuel means "name of God" (Gesenius). As Jacob, upon his return from Paddan-aram, in fulfilment of his vow erected an altar at Beth-el as a memorial of God's bestowal of the promised blessings and named the place thus consecrated "The God of Beth-el" (Gen 35 1.3.7), so Hannah having by vow dedicated to Jeh the son for whose birth she was praying, now that her prayer has been answered and the son given, calls him "The name of God" in commemoration of the Giver. The Bib. narrator states the motive which led the mother to choose the name Samuel for her child. In this explanation no part of the name is used. Moreover, the slight assonance between sh'mū'ēl and sh'ēl in 1 S 1 20 was unsought, for these words are separated in the Heb text, and the emphasis is placed on the gift's being "from Jeh." The history of the discussion concerning this name shows how far astray criticism has been led by the false theory that the purpose of the narrator was to analyze the name and declare its derivation.

Reuben affords evidence to the same effect. The name was known to the early Hebrews in this form exclusively. It is attested by their most ancient literature (Gen 29 32; 30 14; Jgs 5 15.16), by the entire OT, by the Gr tr (A, B and Lucian), by the Tgs, and by the NT (Rev 7 5). Yet in the 1st cent. Jos, adding a Gr termination, wrote Roubelos; and later the Syr version gave the name as Rūbil, and the Ethiopic version as Rōbel and Rūbel. The late variation is reasonably explained as a softening of the pronunciation, which had come into vogue in certain circles. The liquids, or, to speak particularly regarding Reuben, the liquids n and l, sometimes interchanged, giving rise to two forms for a word in the same language or in kindred languages (Gesenius, Thesaurus, 727; Wright, Comp. Grammar, 67; Zimmermann, Vergleichende Grammatik, § 11a). Notwithstanding the evidence furnished by the literature, preference has been given to Reubel as the original form on the ground that "the only plausible explanation of the etymology" given in Gen 29 32 "is that it is based on the form" Re'ūbel = Re'ū ba'al (Skinner, Gen, 386). An exhibition of the etymology was needless, however, and was not the end which the writer had in view. His purpose was to state the occasion for bestowing this particular name upon the child; and in stating it he does full justice to the clear meaning of the good, simple Heb of the name Reuben. The name signifies either "vision of a son" or "Behold ye! a son." In either case the emphatic word is "son." As Hannah, taunted on account of her barrenness, besought God to look on her affliction and give her a man-child (1 S 1 11), so Leah, using the same words, speaking of the same mercy already shown her, and with the same thought in mind, exclaimed: "Jeh hath looked upon my affliction; for now my husband will love me," and she called the name of her son "Look ye! It's a son" (or, "vision of a son"): A male child was to her a proof of God's regard for her misery, and a guaranty of the future love of her husband for her. Moreover, the name kept the thought constantly before the mind of her husband. Gesenius remarks that Reuben means "properly, 'See ye, a son!'" but the sacred writer in Gen 29 32 explains it as for rā'āh (rā'ūy) bē'oniy, "provided in my affliction" (Lexicon, Thesaurus). This curious specimen of criticism may be regarded as the reductio ad absurdum of the hypothesis that the Heb writers intend to give the derivation of the proper names. The result of endeavoring to force the words of the explanation into an intentional etymology compels the assumption that the Heb writer misunderstood one of the simplest phrases of his own language and proposed a contraction impossible in itself and utterly foreign to the principles which underlie Heb speech.

Allusions to proper names are made for the purpose of stating the reason for the bestowal of the name, of pointing out a coincidence

3. Allusions between the name and the character
Linked with or experience of its bearer, or of attaching a prophecy; and it is common to link the allusion with the name by employing the root that underlies the name, or a cognate root, or some other word that resembles the name in sound: (1) Statement of the reason for the choice of the name: In the case of Simeon, the root of the name is used (Gen 29 33). Words of this type (with the termination on) are formed from nouns and vbs., and have the force of ads., diminutives, or abstract nouns, and are sometimes used as concrete nouns (Stade, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Grammatik, § 296). The Israelite at once recognized the root and formation of the name Simeon, which was a favorite with the Hebrews, and he knew that it could express the abstract idea of hearing. In Gen 29 33 the narrator is not seeking to impart etymological information; but it is clear that he discerned the derivation when he gave the reason for the choice of this particular name for Leah's second son: "[Leah] said, Because Jeh hath heard that I am hated, he hath therefore given me this son also: and she called his name Simeon." The root of the name is used as a vb. in the statement of the motive. It was convenient and natural to do so, since the vb. shāma' was the proper word to express the idea and was one of the most common words in the language. There would be no reason to suppose that identity with the root of the name was intentional, except that care is taken by the narrator in the case of the other sons of Jacob to maintain a similar correspondence. Accordingly, that form of paronomasia is employed where a word is used that is one with the name in derivation, but differs from the name in form and grammatically is a different part of speech.

In the case of Cain a cognate root is used. The name is a segholate noun from the root kūn, which means "to form," and then specifically to form at the anvil. Cain may accordingly be an abstract noun and denote formation, or a concrete noun denoting a forged weapon, or the agent in the work, namely a smith. In stating the reason for giving this name to the child, it was not feasible to use the vb. kūn, because of the technical meaning which had become attached to it. To avoid misunderstanding the cognate vb. kānāh is employed, which has radically the same significance, but is without the technical implications (Gen 4 1). The result is that kind of paronomasia which exists between words of similar sound and cognate origin, but difference of meaning.

In the case of Noah a root unrelated to the name in origin, but containing a similar sound, is used. The Bib. narrator does not state whether the name Noah is the transliteration of a foreign word or is its tr into Heb; he merely declares that as given it expressed the father's hope that through this child men were to have relief from the ancient curse upon the ground. If the name is Heb. its root may be nūah, "rest." At any rate it promptly suggested to the ear of the Hebrew the idea of rest. But the vb. nūah is used in Heb. as is the corresponding vb. "rest" in Eng., to express the two ideas of relief and cessation. Lamech did not mean that his son would cause men to cease from work, but that he would secure for them restful relief from toil due to God's curse on account of sin (Gen 5 29, with a reference to 3 17-19). The writer does not use the ambiguous word. To avoid ambiguity, yet with a view to preserving assonance with Noah, he employs the vb. nāham, which has as one of its meanings the sense of comfort and relief.

(2) The indication of a coincidence between the character or experience of a person and his name: Naomi, returning to her home bereaved and in poverty, saw the contrast between her present condition and her name; and she played upon her name by using a word of opposite meaning, saying: 'Call me not Pleasant, call me Bitter; for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me' (Ruth 1 20). In whatever sense Nabal's name may have been bestowed upon him originally, at any rate his wife saw the correspondence between his name in its ordinary meaning and his conduct toward David, and she played upon it, saying: 'Fool is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25 25). Likewise the agreement between Jacob's character and a meaning that his name has in Heb was seen, and called forth the bitter word-play: 'Is he not rightly named "He supplants"? for he hath supplanted me these two times' (Gen 27 36). Isaac, so far as the formation is concerned, may be an abstract noun meaning "laughter," or a concrete noun, "laughing one," or a vb. in the imperfect, "he laughs" or "one laughs" (cf Stade, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Grammatik, § 259a). Whichever specific meaning may have been in the mind of Abraham when he gave the name to his son, yet by reason of its ever speaking of laughter the name was a constant reminder to the parents of the laughter of unbelief with which they had listened to the promise of his birth (Gen 17 17; 18 12). But in due time the child of promise has been born. His name, as determined upon, is Isaac. This Sarah knows (17 19; 21 3). Accordingly, the theme with which she greets his advent is laid in her mouth. She plays upon the name Isaac, using the root of the word in various forms, first as a noun and then as a vb., and giving to the vb. a new subject and to the thought a new turn. Instead of the laughter of unbelief, with which the promise was received, 'God,' she says, 'hath prepared for me laughter [of joy], everyone that heareth [of the event] will laugh [with joy] for me' (21 6; cf Ps 126 2).

(3) Attachment of a prophecy to a name: Paronomasia in all of its forms is used for this purpose. A meaning of the name, or a sound heard in it, or a contrast suggested by it may be played upon. In these several ways the prophet Micah plays upon successive names in one paragraph (Mic 1 10-15). In answer to Abraham's prayer in behalf of Ishmael, a promise is given concerning the lad, which is introduced by a play upon his name: 'As for the boy [named] "God heareth," I have heard thee' (Gen 17 18.20). To Gad a prophecy is attached in Gen 49 19. Two cognate roots are employed: gādhadh, which underlies the word rendered troop or marauding band, and gūdh, which means "to press." In the use not only of the root of the name Gad, but of a different root also that is similar in sound, it is evident that the purpose is simply to play upon the name. The brief oracle is uttered almost exclusively by means of variations in the vocalization of the two roots, producing one of the most successful word-plays in Heb literature.

Judah is a noun corresponding to the Hophal imperfect, and means "thing being praised," "object of praise." In bestowing this name upon her child the mother signified that Jeh was the object of her praise; for she said: "Now will I praise Jeh" (Gen 29 35). In Gen 49 8 a prophecy is spoken concerning Judah. The same etymology and meaning are recognized as before, but the application is different. The birth of Judah had made God an object of praise, the great deeds of the tribe of Judah were destined to make that tribe an object of praise. To quote the oracle: "'Object of praise," thee shall thy brothers praise.' In this difference of reference and in the repetition of the significant word consists the play upon the name.

Dan is played upon in much the same way. The name may be a participle, used as a noun, and be rendered "judge"; but it probably belongs to that numerous class in which the names are vbs. in the perfect, and signifies, "he hath judged." His adoptive mother had called his name Dan, because God had heard her complaint and decided the cause in her favor (Gen 30 6). In attaching the prophecy, the name is played upon by changing the subject, and, in order to refer to the future, by substituting the imperfect for the perfect of the vb.: 'He hath judged' shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel' (Gen 49 16). NANAEA, na-nē'a (Navaia, Nanaia; AV Nanea): A female deity worshipped by the Assyrians, Babylonians and Persians and other Asiatic peoples, the Nana or Nanai of the Babylonians, known as "the lady of Babylon." The name means "the undefiled," and probably represented originally the productive powers of Nature (genetrix), and as such was the companion of the sun-god. She was identified with Ishtar in Assyria and Ashtoreth in Phoenicia, by the Greeks as Aphrodite (Clem. Alex. Protr., 19), but sometimes as Artemis the huntress (Paus. iii.16.8; Plut. Artax. xxvii). Strabo (xv. 733) identifies her with Anaïtis (=Anahita), the Asian Artemis. She was the Venus, but sometimes the Diana, of the Romans. There are many variants of the name: Anaea (Strabo xvi.738), Aneitis (Plut. Artax. xxvii), Tanais (Clem. Alex., loc. cit.), also Tanath, sometimes in Phoen inscriptions, Tanata, Anta (Egyp). In 2 Macc 1 13 ff, a fictitious account is given of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, in a temple of Nanaea in Persia, by the treachery of Nanaea's priests. The public treasury was often placed in Nanaea's temple; this, Epiphanes was anxious to secure under the pretext of marrying the goddess and receiving the money as a dowry. The priests threw down great stones "like thunderbolts" from above, killed the king and his suite and then cut off their heads. But 1 Macc 6 1 ff, which is more reliable, gives a different account of the death of Epiphanes after an attempt to rob a rich temple in Elymais. The account of 2 Macc 1 13 ff must be mere legend, as far as Epiphanes is concerned, but may have been suggested or colored by the story of the death of Antiochus the Great, who met his death while plundering a temple of Belus near Elymais (Strabo xvi.1.18; Diod. Sic. 573; Justin, xxxii.2). The temple of Nanaea referred to in 2 Macc 1 13 ff may be identified with that of Artemis (Polyb. xxxi.11; Jos, Ant. XII, ix, 1) or Aphrodite (Appian, Syr. 66; Rawlinson, Speaker's Comm.). S. NAOMI, nā'ō-mī, nā-ō'mī, nā-ō'mī (נָּוִי, no'ōmī, probably = "pleasantness"; LXX B, Νοεμίν, Noēmein, A, Νοεμμε[ν], Noēmmē[n]): Wife of Elimelech and mother-in-law of Ruth (Ruth 1 2—4 17). She went with her husband to the land of Moab, and after his death returned to Bethlehem. When greeted on her return, she told the women of the town to call her, not no'ōmī ("pleasantness"), but mārāh ("bitterness"), "for," she said, "the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me." She advised Ruth in her dealings with Boaz, and afterward nursed their child.

The name may mean "my joy," "my bliss," but is perhaps better explained according to the traditional interpretation as "the pleasant one."

NAPHISH, nā'fish (נָּפִישׁ, nāphīsh; Ναφής, Naphés, D, Ναφθ, Naphéth): A son of Ishmael (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 1 31). Naphish, along with other Hagrite clans, was overwhelmingly defeated by the Israelitish tribes on the E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 19, AV "Nephish"). Their descendants are mentioned among the Nethinim by the name "Nephisim," AV and RVm "Nephusim" (Ezr 2 50); "Nephuseshim," AV and RVm "Nephishesim" (Neh 7 52); "Naphisi" (1 Esd 5 31).

NAPHISI, naf'i-sī (Ναφισι, Naphisi, B, Ναφεισει, Napheisei): The name of one of the families which went up out of captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31) = "Nephuseshim" of Neh 7 52; "Nephisim" of Ezr 2 50. See NAPHISH.

I. The Patriarch.—The 5th son of Jacob, and the 2d born to him by Rachel's handmaid, Bilhah. He was full brother of Dan (Gen 30

1. Name 7 ff).

At his birth Rachel is said to have exclaimed, naphṭālē 'ēlōhīm niphṭaltī, "wrestlings of God"—i.e. "mighty wrestlings"—"have I wrestled." Her sister's fruitfulness was a sore trial to the barren Rachel. By her artifice she had obtained children, the offspring of her maid ranking as her own; and thus her reproach of childlessness was removed. The name N. given to this son was a monument of her victory. She had won the favor and blessing of God as made manifest in the way yearned for by the oriental heart, the birth of sons.

Personal details regarding the patriarch N. are entirely wanting in Scripture; and the traditions have not much to say about him.

3. Historical and Traditional Details According to Tg Pseudojon, he was a swift runner. It also tells us that he was one of the 5 brethren whom Joseph chose to represent the family of Jacob in the presence of Pharaoh. He is said to have been 132 years old at his death (Test. XII P, viii, 1, 1). When Jacob and his family moved to Egypt, N. had 4 sons (Gen 46 24). In Egypt, he died and was buried.

II. Tribe of Naphtali.—When the first census was taken in the wilderness, the tribe numbered 53,400 fighting men (Nu 1 43; 2 30).

1. Relative Position At the second census, the numbers had shrunk to 45,400 (Nu 26 43 ff); but see NUMBERS. The position of Naphtali in the desert was on the N. of the tabernacle with the standard of the camp of Dan, along with the tribe of Asher (Nu 2 25 ff). The standard, according to Jewish tradition, was a serpent, or basilisk, with the legend, "Return of Jehovah to the many thousands of Israel" (Tg Pseudojon on Nu 2 25). When the host was on the march, this camp came in the rear (Nu 2 31). The prince of the tribe at Sinai was Ahira ben Enan (2 29). Among the spies the tribe was represented by Nahbi ben Vophsi (13 14). Prince Pedahel ben Ammihud was chosen from N. to assist in the division of the land (34 28). Toward the end of David's reign the ruler of the tribe was Jeremoth ben Azriel (1 Ch 27 19). Hiram the Tyrian artificer is described as "the son of a widow of the tribe of N." (1 K 7 14). But in 2 Ch 2 14 he is called "the son of a woman of the daughters of Dan." Jgs 5 15 does not definitely associate Barak with the tribe of Issachar; his residence was at Kedesh (Jgs 4 6); it is therefore possible that he belonged to the tribe of N.

In the allocation of the land, the lot of N. was the last but one to be drawn (Josh 19 32—39). The boundaries are stated with great fullness.

2. Location in Palestine While it is yet impossible to trace them with certainty, the identification of sites in recent years, for which we are mainly indebted to the late Col. Conder, makes possible an approximation. The territory was bounded on the E. by the Sea of Galilee and the upper reaches of the Jordan. Jos makes it extend to Damascus (Ant, V, i, 22); but there is nothing to support this. The southern boundary probably ran from the point where Wādy el-Breh enters the Jordan, westward along the northern side of the valley to Mt. Tabor. The western border may have gone up by way of Haṭṭin (Ziddim) and Yākrūk (Hukkuk) to Kefr 'Anān (Hannathon), bending there to the W., including the land of er-Rāmeḥ (Ramah) until it reached the territory of Asher. Running northward again until nearly opposite Tyre, it bent eastward, and once more northward to the Liṭāny (Leontes), taking in the larger part of what is called by the Arabs Belād Beshārah and Belād es-Shukīf. Nineteen cities in N. are named in Josh 19 32 ff. Among them was the famous city of refuge, KEDESH-NAPHTALI (q.v.), on the heights to the W. of the Waters of Merom, where extensive ruins are still to be seen (20 7). It, along with Hammoth-dor and Kartan, was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 23; 1 Ch 6 76).

The land lying around the springs of the Jordan was included in the lot of N. It is clear that from this part, as well as from the cities named in Jgs 1 33, N. did not drive out the Canaanites. These the Danites found in possession at the time of their raid. There is no indication that N. resented in any way this incursion of their kindred tribe into their territory (Jgs 18).

The district thus indicated includes much excellent land, both pastoral and arable. There are the broad, rich terraces that rise away to

3. Physical Features the N. and N.W. of the Sea of Galilee, with the fertile plain of Gennesaret on the seashore. The mountains immediately N. of the sea are rocky and barren; but when this tract is passed, we enter the lofty and spacious lands of upper Galilee, which from time immemorial have been the joy of the peasant farmer. Great breadths there are which in season yield golden harvests. The richly diversified scenery, mountain, hill and valley, is marked by a finer growth of trees than is common in Pal. The terebinth and pine, the olive, mulberry, apricot, fig, pomegranate, orange, lemon and vine are cultivated to good purpose. Water is comparatively plentiful, supplied by many copious springs. It was one of the districts from which Solomon drew provisions, the officer in charge being the king's son-in-law, Ahimaaz (1 K 4 15).

The free life of these spacious uplands, which yielded so liberally to the touch of the hand of industry, developed a robust manhood

4. Distinction of the Tribe and a wholesome spirit of independence among its inhabitants. According to Jos, who knew them well (BJ, III, iii, 2), the country never lacked multitudes of men of courage ready to give a good account of themselves on all occasions of war. Its history, as far as we know it, afforded ample opportunity for the development of warlike qualities. In the struggle with Sisera, N. was found on the high places of the field (Jgs 5 18). To David's forces at Hebron, N. contributed a thousand captains "and with them with shield and spear thirty and seven thousand" (1 Ch 12 34). Their position exposed them to the first brunt of attack by enemies from the N.; and in the wars of the kings they bore an important part (1 K 15 20; 2 K 12 18; 13 22); and they were the first on the W. of the Jordan to be carried away captive (2 K 15 29). See GALILEE.

The largest town in Mt. Naphtali today is Safed, on the heights due N. of the Sea of Galilee, often spoken of as the "city set on a hill." It is built in the form of a horseshoe, open to the N., round the Castle Hill, on which are the ruins of the old fortress of the Templars. This is a position of great strength, which could hardly fail to be occupied in ancient times, although, so far, it cannot be identified with any ancient city. It contains between 20,000 and 30,000 inhabitants. Over against it to the N.W., beyond the deep gorge of Naphtali: Safed.

Wādy Leimūn, rises Jebel Jermuk, the highest mountain in Pal proper (c 4,000 ft.) which may be the scene of the TRANSFIGURATION (q.v.). The inhabitants of Safed were massacred by Sultan Bibars in 1266. The city suffered severely from earthquake in 1759; and it shared with Tiberias, also a city of N., the disaster wrought by the earthquake of 1837. It is one of the holy cities of the Jews.

6. Labors of Jesus In the land of N. Jesus spent a great part of his public life, the land of Gennesaret, Bethsaida, Capernaum and Chorazin all lying within its boundaries (cf Mt 4 15). W. EWING

NAPHTALI, MOUNT (נַפְתָּלִי, har naphṭālī; ἐν τῷ ὄρει τῷ Νεφθαλεῖ, en tō ʾorei tō Nephthalei): This was the most northerly of the three divisions of the Western Range, which derived their names from those of the tribes holding chief sway over them—Mt. Judah, Mt. Ephraim, and Mt. Naphtali (Josh 20 7 AV, RV replaces "Mount" by "the hill country of").

NAPHTHAR, naf'thār (AV): RV "Nephthar."

NAPHTUHIM, naf-tū'him (נַפְתֻּחִים, naphṭūhīm; LXX Νεφθαλεῖμ, Nephthaleim): A son of Mizraim (Gen 10 13; 1 Ch 1 11); but, according to most modern authorities, a district or a dependency of Egypt. Among the many efforts at identification the following deserve notice: Naphtuhim=(1) Nephthys (Νέφθυς, Néphthus) in the N.E. of Egypt; (2) Na-ptah, i.e. the people of Ptah, the dwellers in the neighborhood of Memphis; (3) Nathu (according to Herodotus, Naθῶ, Nathō), which occurs in Assurbanipal's Annals as the name of a part of Lower Egypt; (4) Erman (ZATW, X, 118), by the change of a letter, reads Petemhim, which signifies "The Northland"; (5) Spiegelberg sees in the word an old designation of the Delta, and would therefore render the name, "the people of the Delta" (cf Johns, HDB; Skinner and Holzinger on Gen).

JOHN A. LEES

NAPKIN, nap'kin (σουδάριον, soudáριον; Lat sudarium): In Lk 19 20, the cloth in which the "unprofitable servant" wrapped the money of his lord; cf Jn 11 44; 20 7; see DRESS, 7; HANDKERCHIEF.

NARCISSUS, nār-sis'us (Ναρκίσσος, Narkissos): In Rom 16 11 St. Paul sends greetings to "them of the household of Narcissus, that are in the Lord." "The last words may suggest that, though only the Christians in this household have a greeting sent to them, there were other members of it with whom the church had relations" (Denney).

Narcissus is a common name, esp. among freedmen and slaves. But, as in the case of Aristobulus, some famous person of this name must be meant. Conybeare and Howson mention two, one the well-known favorite of Claudius, the other a favorite of Nero. The latter, who was put to death by Galba (Dio Cass. lxi.3), they think to be the Narcissus meant here (St. Paul, ch xix). On the other hand, Bishop Lightfoot (Phil, 175) holds that "the powerful freedman Narcissus, whose wealth was proverbial [Juv. Sat. xiv.329], whose influence with Claudius was unbounded, and who bore a chief part in the intrigues of this reign, alone satisfies this condition." Shortly after the accession of Nero, he had been put to death by Agrippina (Tac. Ann. xiii.1; Dio Cass. lx.34) in 54 AD. As this occurred three or four years before the Ep. to the Rom was written, some think another Narcissus is meant. However, as was usual in such cases, his property would be confiscated, and his slaves, becoming the property of the emperor, would swell "Caesar's household" as Narcissiani.

NASBAS, nas'bas (Νασβάς, Nasbás, נ, נאבָאָס, Nabád, read by Fritzsche): A name otherwise unknown. It occurs only in Tob 11 18, "And Achiarus, and Nasbas his brother's son," came to Tobit's wedding. Opinions are divided as to whether he was "brother's son" of Tobit or Achiarus. AVm gives the suggestion of Junius, "Achiacharus who is also called Nasbas," thus identifying Nasbas with Achiacharus, which might gain support from 1 22 where Achiacharus is mentioned as "brother's son" of Tobit. See ACHIACHARUS; AMAN. נ reads "Achiacharus and Nabad his brother's sons," which is corrected by another hand to "brother's son" (ἐξάδελφος, ἐξάδελφος). The Itala gives "Nabal avunculus ["maternal uncle"] illius"; the Vulg "Nabath consobrinus ["cousins"] Tobiae"; Syr "Laban his sister's son." This person is probably identical with the "Aman" of Tob 14 10 (see variety of readings under AMAN) and the nephew in Harris' Story of Ahikar and His Nephew.

NASI, nā'sē (B, Nasēl, Nasēl, A, Nasēl, Nasith; AV Nasith): The head of one of the families which went up with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 32) = "Neziah" of Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56.

NASOR, nā'sor. See HAZOR.

NATHAN, nā'than (נָתָן, nāthān, "gift"; Ναθάμ, Nathām): A court prophet in David's reign and a supporter of Solomon at his accession. There are three main incidents in his career as depicted in the OT.

The two || narratives, 2 S 7 1-17=1 Ch 17 1-15, of which the former is the original, relate how David confided to Nathan his intention to build a house for Jeh's ark.

1. Nathan and David's Temple-Plans Nathan at first blesses the project, but that same night is given a Divine message, and returns to tell the king that instead of David building a house for Jeh, Jeh will build a house for David: "I will set up thy seed after thee, . . . and I will establish his kingdom. . . . I will be his father, and he shall be my son: if he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men" (2 S 7 12-14). Ver 13 says that "He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever," but this disturbs the one great thought of the passage, which is that God will build a house for David, and which is also the thought in David's prayer (vs 18-29).

The word "seed" in ver 12 is collective and so throughout the passage, so that the prophecy does not refer to any individual, but, like Dt 17 14-20; 18 15-22, belongs to the group of generic prophecies. Nor is it Messianic, for ver 14 could not be reconciled with the sinlessness of Jesus. The message is rather a promise of the ever-merciful providence of God in dealing with David's family. (See, however, C. A. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, 126 ff.) Budde, who says that the section belongs to the 7th cent. and is certainly preëxilic in the leading thought of the passage, sees in the prophecy something of the idealism of Amos and Hosea, for the prophet teaches that Jeh dwells, not in "a holy place made with hands" (He 9 11.24), but rather in the life of the nation as represented by the direct succession of Davidic kings. This presents an extension of the teaching of Paul that the very body itself is a sanctuary unto God (1 Cor 6 19).

2 S 12 1-25 narrates Nathan's rebuke of David for his adultery, and for causing the death of Uriah; and then comes an account of

2. Nathan the death of Bathsheba's child. In and David's vs 1-15a, we have Nathan's parable Sin of the rich man and the poor man's ewe lamb, and the application of it to David's conduct. But several difficulties arise when we ask exactly what Nathan's message to David was: vs 13 f represent the prophet as saying that God has forgiven David but that the child will die, while vs 10-12 speak of a heavy punishment that is to come upon David and his family, and ver 16 does not show any indication of a prophecy as to the child's death. Commentators regard vs 1-15a as later in origin than chs 11, 12 in the main, and hold vs 10-12 to be still later than the rest of vs 1-15a. Budde omits vs 9aβ. 10aba.11.12, but regards even the rest of the story as interrupting the connection between 11 27b and 12 15b, and therefore of later date.

1 K 1 is a part of "one of the best pieces of Heb narrative in our possession" (H. P. Smith, OT Hist, 153, n. 2). It narrates the part that

3. Nathan and Solomon's Accession Nathan played in the events that led to Solomon's accession. David was getting old and feeble, and the succession had not been settled. When Adonijah, who was probably the eldest son living, gave a banquet to some of his father's state officials, Nathan, who was one of those that had not been invited, incited Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, to remind David of his promise to her that Solomon should succeed to the throne. This she did, and in the middle of her audience with David, Nathan appears with the news of Adonijah's feast and proclamation as king. Solomon is then anointed king by David's command, Nathan being one of his chief supporters. It has been suggested that it is only Nathan who interprets Adonijah's feast as a claim to the throne, but this contradicts ver 5. Yet, whereas in the two sections treated above Nathan is the prophet of Jeh, he is represented in 1 K as an intriguing court politician, planning very cleverly an opportune entrance into David's presence at the very time that Bathsheba has an audience with the king. The || narrative of 1 Ch 28 makes no mention of Nathan, Solomon being there represented as Divinely elected to succeed David.

1 K 4 5 mentions a Nathan as father of Azariah and Zabud, two of the chief officers of Solomon. He is probably the prophet.

1 Ch 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29 refer to "the words" or rather "the acts of Nathan the prophet" as well as those of Samuel and Gad. "There can be no doubt that these are nothing more than references to the narratives in which Samuel, Nathan and Gad are mentioned in our Books of Samuel" (Curtis on 1 Ch 29 29). In 2 Ch 29 25, sanction is claimed for Levitical temple-music as being commanded by God through Nathan and Gad.

Curtis (on 1 Ch 29 29) observes that Nathan is always called nābhī ("prophet") in S and K and not rō'eh or hōzeh, "seer."

NATHAN:

(1) A prophet (2 S 7; Ps 51, title). See preceding article.

(2) A son of King David (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5; 14 4).

(3) Father of Igal, one of David's heroes (2 S 23 36). In 1 Ch 11 38, we have "Joel the brother of Nathan"; LXX B has "son" in this ver, but it is impossible to say whether Igal or Joel is the correct name.

(4) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 36), whose son is called Zabad, whom some suppose to be the same as Zabad (1 K 4 5). On this view this Nathan is the same as the prophet (see 1, above).

(5) A companion of Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 16 and 1 Esd 8 44).

(6) Nathanas (1 Esd 9 34), one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 39).

(7) Name of a family (Zec 12 12).

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

NATHANAEL, na-than'ā-el (Ναθαναήλ, Nathanaēl):

(1) One of the "captains over thousands" who furnished the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = "Nethanel" of 2 Ch 35 9.

(2) (Ναθανάηλος, Nathanáēlos, BA om): One of the priests who had married a "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 22) = "Nethanel" of Ezr 10 22.

(3) An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

(4) One of the Twelve Apostles. See next article.

NATHANAEL (Ναθαν, nathan, "God has given"; Ναθαναήλ, Nathanaēl): Nathanael, who was probably a fisherman, belonged to Cana in Galilee (Jn 21 2). According to the "Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles" (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50), N. was the same as Simon, the son of Cleopas, and was one of the Twelve. He was among those who met and conversed with Jesus during the preaching of John the Baptist at Bethany beyond Jordan (cf Jn 1 28). From the manner of the invitation extended to him by Philip (Jn 1 45), it is evident that N. was well versed in ancient Scripture, and that in him also the preaching of John had aroused a certain expectancy. His reply to Philip, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1 46), was prompted, not by any ill repute of the place, but by its petty insignificance and familiarity in N.'s eyes. To this question Philip made no direct answer, but replied, "Come and see." It was the answer best fitted to the man and the occasion; it appealed to N.'s fair-mindedness and sincerity of purpose. He responded nobly to the call, and on approaching Jesus was received with the words: "Behold, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" (Jn 1 47). It was a tribute to that singleness of heart which enabled him to overcome his initial prejudice. The same candor and openness distinguished the after-interview of N. with Jesus, as is evident by his question, "Whence knowest thou me?" (Jn 1 48). The reply of Jesus was not what he expected. It concerned the time he had spent under the fig tree, kneeling, no doubt, in silent prayer and communion with God, and brought to mind all the sacred hopes and aspirations of that hour. It taught him that here was One who read on the instant the inmost secrets of his heart, and was Himself the ideal for whom he was seeking; and it drew from him the confession, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art King of Israel" (Jn 1 49).

Although N. is mentioned by name only once again in the NT, where he is one of the seven who witnessed the appearance of the risen Jesus at the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 21 2), it is evident that the connection and companionship of N. with Jesus must have been much closer than those two incidents would lead us to suppose. Accordingly, attempts have been made to identify him with other NT characters, the most commonly accepted being Bartholomew (cf BARTHOLOMEW). The principal arguments in support of this identification are: (1) N. is never mentioned by the synoptists, and Bartholomew is never mentioned by John, who further implies that N. was one of the twelve disciples (cf Jn 20 24-26; 21 2); (2) in the Synoptists, Philip is closely connected with Bartholomew (cf lists of the apostles), and in John with N. (cf Jn 1 45 ff); (3) the fact that most of the other apostles bear two names. Arguments are also adduced to identify him with Simon the Cananaean (cf SIMON). N. has also been identified with Matthew and Matthias (based on the similarity of name-meanings), with John the son of Zebedee, with Stephen, and even with Paul.

NATHANIAS, nath-a-ni'as (Ναθανίας, Nathanas): One of those who put away their foreign wives (1 Esd 9 34) = "Nathan" of Ezr 10 39.

NATHAN-MELECH, nā'than-mē'lek (נָתָן־מֶלֶךְ, nathan-melekh, "king's gift"): A Judean official, to whose chamber King Josiah removed "the horses of the sun" (2 K 23 11). LXX calls him "Nathan, the king's eunuch" (Ναθάν βασιλέως τοῦ εὐνοῦχου, Nathan basilēōs tou eunouchou).

NATIONS, nā'shunz. See GENTILES; GOIM; HEATHEN; TABLE OF NATIONS.

NATIVITY, na-tiv'i-ty, OF MARY, GOSPEL OF THE. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

NATURAL, nat'ū-ral, NATURE, nā'tūr (τῆς, lēh; ψυχικός, psuchikós, φυσικός, phusikós, φύσις, phúsis):

"Natural" is the tr of lēh, "freshness or vigor" (Dt 34 7). Of Moses it is said, "His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

1. As Used in the OT "Nature" in the sense of a system or constitution does not occur in the OT. The world and men, each individual, were conceived as being the direct creation of a supra-mundane God, and conserved by His power and Spirit. The later conception of "nature" came in through Gr influences.

In the Apoc, we find "nature" in the sense of innate character or constitution (Wisd 7 20, "the natures [phúseis] of living creatures"; 13 1, "Surely vain are all men by nature" [phúsei], 3 Macc 3 29, "mortal nature" [phúsis]).

In the NT "nature" (phúsis) is frequently found in the latter sense (Rom 1 26, "against nature"; 2 14, "by nature"; 2 27; 11 24, also

2. As Used in the NT "contrary to nature"; 1 Cor 11 14, "Doth not even nature itself teach you?"; Gal 2 15; 4 8; Eph 2 3; in 2 Pet 1 4, we have "that ye might be partakers of the divine nature," RVm "or, a"); phúsis occurs also in Jas 3 7, "every kind of beasts," RVm "Gr nature," also "mankind" (ver 7), RVm "Gr the human nature." "Natural" (Rom 11 21.24) is the tr of katá phúsin, "according to nature." Paul in 1 Cor speaks of "the natural man" (2 14, ARVm "or unspiritual, Gr psychical") and of a "natural body" (15 44 bis), the Gr word being psuchikos, "of the soul" (psuchē), the animal, natural, principle, as contrasted with what pertains to the higher principle of the spirit (pneúma). In 1 Cor 15 46 the contrast is expressed, "Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural," ARVm "Gr psychical." The "natural man" is the man in whom the spirit is unquickened, the "natural body" is that corresponding to the psychical or soul-nature, the "spiritual body" that corresponding to the Spirit as the dominant principle of the life. In Jude ver 10, we have phusikōs, "naturally," "naturally, as brute beasts," RV "naturally, like the creatures without reason"; genesis, "origin," "birth," is tr^d "natural" (Jas 1 23, "his natural face," RVm "Gr the face of his birth"); and "nature" (3 6, "the course of nature," RV "the wheel of nature," m "or birth") ("wheel" probably means "circle of nature" [the whole creation; see COURSE]); gnēsios, "genuine" ("true to right nature"), "legitimate," "sincere," is tr^d "naturally" (Phil 2 20, "who will naturally care for your state," RV "truly," m "Gr genuinely"). NATURAL FEATURES, fē'tūrz: As has been pointed out by various authors (cf HGHL), the principal physical features of Pal run in N. and S. lines, or rather about from S.S.W. to N.N.E.

The lowland or Shephelah (AV "vale, valley, plain, or low country") includes the maritime plain and the western foothills.

The hill country consists of the mountains of Judaea, and its features are continued northward to the plain of Esdraelon and southward to the Sinaitic peninsula. It is rocky and has very little water. Except for the few fountains, the scanty population depends upon rain water collected during the winter months.

The Arabah (RV) includes the Jordan valley from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, as well as the depression running from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akabah. It is to the latter depression that the name Wādī-ul-'Arabah is now applied by the Arabs. It is bounded on the E. by Mt. Seir or Edom, and on the W. by the mountains of the Sinaitic peninsula. Its highest point, about halfway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, is a few hundred ft. higher than the level of the Mediterranean, but nearly 2,000 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea. From this point the valley slopes southward to the Gulf of Akabah, and northward to the Dead Sea. The lower Jordan valley slopes from about 600 ft. below ocean-level at the Sea of Galilee to about 1,300 ft. below ocean-level at the Dead Sea.

To the E. are the highlands of Gilead and Moab rising abruptly from the valley, as does the hill country of Judaea on the W. The country to the

"Up to Jerusalem" from the Good Samaritan's Inn.

E. of the Jordan-Dead Sea-Arabah depression, to the whole of which the name Ghaur (Ghōr) is applied by the Arabs, is a great table-land sloping gradually to the E. from the sharp edge which overlooks the Ghaur. It has no conspicuous peaks. What appear to be peaks when viewed from the Ghaur are irregularities of its western contour, which are invisible or appear as slight mounds to the observer who looks westward from any point some miles to the E. Mt. Nebo, for instance, when seen from Mādeba is not readily distinguishable. This is because it really does not rise above the general level of the table-land. The small annual rainfall on the heights near the Ghaur diminishes eastward, and the desert begins within from 20 to 40 miles.

Another term much used by OT writers is South or Negeb, which embraces the southernmost portion of the promised land, and was never effectively occupied by the Israelites. Its uttermost boundary was the "river of Egypt" (al-'Arish), and coincides roughly with the present boundary between the Ottoman territory on the E. and the Anglo-Egypt territory of Sinai on the W.

The term slopes, 'āshēdhōth, AV "springs," occurs in Josh 10 40, "So Joshua smote all the land, the hill-country . . . and the lowland, and the slopes, and all their kings"; and again in Josh 12 7, 8, "And Joshua gave it . . . for a possession according to their divisions; in the hill-country, and in the lowland, and in the Arabah, and in the slopes, and in the wilderness, and in the South." In the former passage, it seems to refer to the foothills which form the eastern or higher part of the lowland or Shephelah. In the latter passage, it might mean the same, or it might mean the descent from the Judean hills to the Ghaur. In Dt 3 17; 4 49; Josh 12 3; 13 20, we have "the slopes of Pisgah" ('āshēdhōth-ha-pisgāh, "springs of Pisgah"), which denotes the descent from the heights of Moab to the Ghaur. The same word occurs in the sing. in Nu 21 15, referring to the descent to the Arnon. "Slopes," therefore, does not seem to be a term applied to any particular region.

The wilderness is usually the desert of the wandering, including the central part of the Sinaitic peninsula, but it is by no means always used in this sense, e.g. Josh 8 15, 20, 24, where it clearly refers to a region near Ai. "The wilderness" of Mt 4 1 is thought to be the barren portion of Judaea between Jerus and the Jordan. See CHAMPAIGN; COUNTRY; DESERT; EAST; HILL; LOWLAND; SOUTH.

NAUGHT, nôt, NAUGHTY, nô'ti, NAUGHTINESS, -nes: In the sense of bad, worthless, worthlessness, the words in AV represent the Heb נָכַר, ra', changed in RV to "bad" (2 K 2 19; Prov 20 14; Jer 24 2), נָכַר, rō', retained in RV "naughtiness" (1 S 17 28), נָכַר, havvāh, rendered in RV in Prov 11 6 "iniquity," and in 17 4 "mischievous." In Prov 6 12, "naughty person," lit. "man of Belial," is in RV "worthless person." In the NT, "superfluity of naughtiness" in Jas 1 21 (for kakia, kakia) becomes in RV "overflowing of wickedness," m "malice," and in Wisd 12 10 AV's "naughty generation" (πονηρός, ponērós) is made into "by birth . . . evil."

NAVE, nāv (1 K 7 33). See SEA, MOLTEN.

NAVE, nā'vê (נָוֵה, Nauê): Gr form of the Heb proper name "Nun" (so RV), found only in AV of Sir 46 1.

NAVEL, nā'v'l (שֶׁרֶת, shōr [LXX in Prov 3 8 suggests a different reading, viz. instead of שֶׁרֶת, shorrekhā, שֶׁרֶת, shērekhā=שֶׁרֶת, she'erekhā, "thy flesh"]): The AV translates the Heb shārīr in the description of Behemoth (Job 40 16) by "navel," where modern translators have substituted "muscles"; similarly in the tr of shōrer (Cant 7 2) it has been replaced by "body." There remain two passages of RV where "navel" is retained as the tr of shōr. Thus we find the word used, pars pro toto, for the whole being: "It [the fear of Jeh] will be health to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones" (Prov 3 8). The uttermost neglect which a new-born babe can experience is expressed by Ezekiel: "In the day thou wast born thy navel [i.e. umbilical cord] was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to cleanse thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all" (Ezk 16 4).

NAZARENE, naz-a-rēn', naz'a-rēn (Ναζαρηνός, Nazārēnós; Nazōraios in Mt, Jn, Acts and Lk): A derivative of Nazareth, the birthplace of Christ. In the NT it has a double meaning: it may be friendly and it may be inimical.

On the lips of Christ's friends and followers, it is an honorable name. Thus Matthew sees in it a fulfillment of the old Isaian prophecy 1. An Hon- orable Title (Isa 11 1 [Heb]): "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken through the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene" (Mt 2 23). According to an overwhelming array of testimony (see Meyer, Comm., in loc.), the name Nazareth is derived from the same √ nāṣar, found in the text quoted from Isa. We have here undoubtedly to do with a permissible accommodation.

It is not quite certain that Matthew did not intend, by the use of this word, to refer to the picture of the Messiah, as drawn in Isa 53, on account of the low estimate in which this place was held (Jn 1 46). Nor is it permissible, as has been done by Tertullian and Jerome, to substitute the word "Nazarite" for "Nazarene," which in every view of the case is contrary to the patent facts of the life of the Saviour.

Says Meyer, "In giving this prophetic title to the Messiah he entirely disregards the historical meaning of the same (LXX Isa 11 1, ánthos), keeps by the relationship of the name Nazareth to the word nāṣar, and recognizes by virtue of the same, in that prophetic Messianic name neṣer, the typical reference to this—that Jesus through His settlement in Nazareth was to become a 'Nazōraios,' a 'Nazarene.'" This name clung to Jesus throughout His entire life. It became His name among the masses: "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by" (Mk 10 47; Lk 24 19). Perhaps Matthew, who wrote after the event, may have been influenced in his application of the Isaian prophecy by the very fact that Jesus was popularly thus known. Even in the realm of spirits He was known by this appellation. Evil spirits knew and feared Him, under this name (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34), and the angels of the resurrection morning called Him thus (Mk 16 6), while Jesus applied the title to Himself (Acts 22 8). In the light of these facts we do not wonder that the disciples, in their later lives and work, persistently used it (Acts 2 22; 3 6; 10 38).

If His friends knew Him by this name, much more His enemies, and to them it was a title of scorn and derision. Their whole attitude was compressed in that one word 2. A Title of Scorn of Nathanael, by which he voiced his doubt, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1 46). In the name "Nazarene," the Jews, who opposed and rejected Christ, poured out all the vials of their antagonism, and the word became a Jewish heritage of bitterness. It is hard to tell whether the appellation, on the lips of evil spirits, signifies dread or hatred (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34). With the gatekeepers of the house of the high priest the case is clear. There it signifies unadulterated scorn (Mt 26 71; Mk 14 67). Even in His death the bitter hatred of the priests caused this name to accompany Jesus, for it was at their dictation written above His cross by Pilate (Jn 19 19). The entire Christian community was called by the leaders of the Jewish people at Jerus, "the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24 5). If, on the one hand, therefore, the name stands for devotion and love, it is equally certain that on the other side it represented the bitter and undying hatred of His enemies.

NAZARETH, naz'a-reth (Ναζαρέτ, Nazaréτ, Naẓapét, Nazaréth, and other forms): A town in Galilee, the home of Joseph and the Virgin Mary, and for about 30 years

1. Notice Confined to the scene of the Saviour's life (Mt 2 the NT 23; Mk 1 9; Lk 2 39.51; 4 16, etc).

He was therefore called Jesus of Nazareth, although His birthplace was Bethlehem; and those who became His disciples were known as Nazarenes. This is the name, with slight modification, used to this day by Moslems for Christians, Naṣarā—the sing. being Naṣrāny.

The town is not named in the OT, although the presence of a spring and the convenience of the site make it probable that the place was occupied in old times. Quaresimus learned that the ancient name was Medīna Abīat, in which we may recognize the Arab. el-Medīnat el-baidah, "the white town." Built of the white stone supplied by the limestone rocks around, the description is quite accurate. There is a reference in Mish (M'nā-ḥōth, viii.6) to the "white house of the hill" whence wine for the drink offering was brought. An elegy for the 9th of Ab speaks of a "course" of priests settled in Nazareth. This, however, is based upon an ancient midrash now lost (Neubauer, Géogr. du Talm., 82, 85, 190; Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Capernaum, 142). But all this leaves us still in a state of uncertainty.

The ancient town is represented by the modern en-Nāsirah, which is built mainly on the western and northwestern slopes of a hollow among the lower hills of Galilee, just before they sink into the plain of Esdraelon. It lies about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean at Haifa. The road to the plain and the coast goes over the southwestern lip of the hollow; that to Tiberias and Damascus over the heights to the N.E. A rocky gorge breaks down southward, issuing on the plain between two craggy hills. That to the W. is the traditional Hill of Precipitation (Lk 4 29). This, however, is too far from the city as it must have been in the days of Christ. It is probable that the present town occupies pretty nearly the ancient site; and the scene of that attempt on Jesus' life may have been the cliff, many feet in height, not far from the old synagogue, traces of which are still seen in the western part of the town. There is a good spring under the Greek Orthodox church at the foot of the hill on the N. The water is led in a conduit to the fountain, whither the women and their children go as in old times, to carry home in their jars supplies for domestic use. There is also a tiny spring in the face of the western hill. To the N.W. rises the height on which stands the sanctuary, now in ruins, of Neby Sa'in. From this point a most beautiful and extensive view is obtained, ranging on a clear day from the Mediterranean on the W. to the Mountain of Bashan on the E.; from Upper Galilee and Mt. Hermon on the N. to the uplands of Gilead and Samaria on the S. The whole extent of Esdraelon is seen, that great battlefield, associated with so many heroic exploits in Israel's history, from Carmel and Megiddo to Tabor and Mt. Gilboa.

There are now some 7,000 inhabitants, mainly Christian, of whom the Greek Orthodox church claims about 3,000. Moslems number about 1,600. There are no Jews. It is the chief market town for the pastoral and agricultural district that lies around it.

In Nazareth, Jesus preached His first recorded sermon (Lk 4 16 ff), when His plainness of speech aroused the homicidal fury of His hearers. "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief" (Mt 13 58). Finding no rest or security in Nazareth, He made His home in Capernaum. The reproach implied in Nathanael's question, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1 46), has led to much speculation.

NAZARETH, FROM THE ROAD TO THE PLAIN OF ESDRAELON.

By ingenious emendation of the text Cheyne would read, "Can the Holy One proceed from Nazareth?" (EB, s.v.). Perhaps, however, we should see no more in this than the acquiescence of Nathanael's humble spirit in the lowly estimate of his native province entertained by the leaders of his people in Judaea.

Christians are said to have first settled here in the time of Constantine (Epiphanius), whose mother Helena built the Church of the Annunciation. In crusading times it was the seat of the bishop of Bethsean.

5. Later History

It passed into Moslem hands after the disaster to the Crusaders at Hattin (1183). It was destroyed by Sultan Bibars in 1263. In 1620 the Franciscans rebuilt the Church of the Annunciation, and the town rose again from its ruins. Here in 1799 the French general Junot was assailed by the Turks. After his brilliant victory over the Turks at Tabor, Napoleon visited Nazareth. The place suffered some damage in the earthquake of 1837.

Protestant Missions are now represented in Nazareth by agents of the Church Missionary Society, and of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society.

NAZIRITE, naz'î-rît (נָזִירִית, nāzîr, connected with נָזַר, nāzhar, "to vow"; vaîeîp, nazeîr, vaîeî- rial possession, but the Nazirite consecrated himself or herself, and took a vow of separation and self-imposed discipline for the purpose of some special service, and the fact of the vow was indicated by special signs of abstinence. The chief OT passages are Jgs 13 5-7; 16 17; Nu 6; Am 2 11,12; cf Sir 46 13 (Heb); 1 Macc 3 49-52.

The question has been raised as to whether the Nazirite vow was of native or foreign origin in Israel.

The idea of special separation, however, seems in all ages to have appealed to men of a particular temperament, and we find something of the kind in many countries and always linked with special abstinence of some kind; and from all that is said in the Pent we should infer that the custom was already ancient in Israel and that Mosaism regulated it, bringing it into line with the general system of religious observance and under the cognizance of the Aaronic priests. The critics assign the section dealing with this matter (Nu 6 1-21) to P, and give it a late date, but there cannot be the least doubt that the institution itself was early. It seems not unlikely that on the settlement in Canaan, when the Israelites, having failed to overcome the native population, began to mix freely with them, the local worship, full of tempting Dionysiac elements, brought forth this religious protest in favor of Israel's ancient and simpler way of living, and as a protection against luxury in settling nomads. It is worthy of note that among the Semites vine-growing and wine-drinking have ever been considered foreign to their traditional nomadic mode of life. It was in this same protest that the Rechabites, who were at least akin to the Nazirites, went still farther in refusing even in Canaan to abandon the nomadic state. See RECHABITES.

The Pent, then, makes provision for the Nazirite vow being taken by either men or women, though the OT does not record a single instance of a female Nazirite. Further, it provides only for the taking of the vow for a limited time, that is, for the case of the "Nazirite of days." No period of duration is mentioned in the OT, but the Mish, in dealing with the subject, prescribes a period of 30 days, while a double period of 60 or even a triple one of 100 days might be entered on. The conditions of Naziritism entailed: (1) the strictest abstinence from wine and from every product of the vine; (2) the keeping of the hair unshorn and the beard untouched by a razor; (3) the prohibition to touch a dead body; and (4) prohibition of unclean food (Jgs 13 5-7; Nu 6).

The ceremonial of initiation is not recorded, the Pent treating it as well known. The Talm tells us that it was only necessary for one to express the wish that he might be a Nazirite. A formal vow was, however, taken; and from the form of renewal of the vow, when by any means it was accidentally broken, we may judge that the head was also shorn on initiation and the hair allowed to grow during the whole period of the vow.

The accidental violation of the vow just mentioned entailed upon the devotee the beginning of the whole matter anew and the serving of the whole period. This was entered on by the ceremonial of restoration, in the undergoing of which the Nazirite shaved his head, presented two turtle-doves or two young pigeons for sin and burnt offerings, and re-consecrated himself before the priest, further presenting a lamb for a trespass offering (Nu 6 9-12).

When the period of separation was complete, the ceremonial of release had to be gone through.

It consisted of the presentation of burnt, sin and peace offerings with their accompaniments as detailed in Nu 6 13-21, the shaving of the head and the burning of the hair of the head of separation, after which the Nazirite returned to ordinary life.

The consecration of the Nazirite in some ways resembled that of the priests, and similar words are used of both in Lev 21 12 and Nu 6 17, the priest's vow being even designated nēzer. It opened up the way for any Israelite to do special service on something like semi-sacerdotal lines. The priest, like the Nazirite, dared not come into contact with the dead (Lev 21 1), dared not touch wine during the period of service (Lev 10 9), and, further, long hair was an ancient priestly custom (Ezk 44 20).

The only "Nazirites for life" that we know by name are Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist, but to these Jewish tradition adds

7. Nazirites for Life Absalom in virtue of his long hair. We know of no one voluntarily taking the vow for life, all the cases recorded being those of parents dedicating their children. In rabbinical times, the father but not the mother might vow for the child, and an interesting case of this kind is mentioned in the dedication of Rabbi Chanena by his father in the presence of Rabban Gamaliel (Nāzir, 29b).

Samson is distinctly named a Nazirite in Jgs 13 7 and 16 17, but it has been objected that his case does not conform to the regulations in the Pent. It is said that he must have partaken of wine when he made a feast for his friends, but that does not follow and would not be so understood, say, in a Moslem country today. It is further urged that in connection with his fighting he must have come into contact with many dead men, and that he took honey from the carcass of the lion. To us these objections seem hypercritical. Fighting was specially implied in his vow (Jgs 13 5), and the remains of the lion would be but a dry skeleton and not even so defiling as the ass's jawbone, to which the critics do not object.

Samuel is nowhere in the OT called a Nazirite, the name being first applied to him in Sir 46 13 (Heb), but the restrictions of his dedication seem to imply that he was. Well-

9. Samuel's Case hausen denies that it is implied in 1 S 1 11 that he was either a Nathin ("a gift, [one] 'given' unto Jeh"); cf Nu 3 9; 18 6) or a Nazirite. In the Heb text the mother's vow mentions only the uncut hair, and first in LXX is there added that he should not drink wine or strong drink, but this is one of the cases where we should not regard silence as final evidence. Rather it is to be regarded that the visible sign only is mentioned, the whole contents of the vow being implied.

It is very likely that Nazirites became numerous in Israel in periods of great religious or political excitement, and in Jgs 5 2 we may paraphrase, 'For the long-haired champions in Israel.' That they should be raised up was considered a special token of God's favor to Israel, and the tempting of them to break their vow by drinking wine was considered an aggravated sin (Am 2 11, 12). At the time of the captivity they were looked upon as a vanished glory in Israel (Lam 4 7 m), but they reappeared in later history.

So far as we can discover, there is no indication that they formed guilds or settled communities like the "Sons of the Prophets." In 11. Did Not some sense the Essenes may have continued the tradition, and James, the Lord's brother (Euseb., HE, II, xxiii, 3, following Hegesippus), and also Banus, tutor of Jos (Vita, 2), who is probably the same as the Buni mentioned as a disciple of Jesus in Sanh. 43a, were devotees of a kind resembling Nazirites. Berenice's vow was also manifestly that of the Nazirite (Jos, BJ, II, xv, 1).

The case of John the Baptist is quite certain, and it was probably the means of introducing the custom among the early Christians. It

12. Among Early Christians was clearly a Nazirite's vow which Paul took, "having shorn his head in Cenchræ" (Acts 18 18), and which he completed at Jerus with other Christians similarly placed (Acts 21 23).

As the expenses of release were heavy for poor men, such were at times aided in this matter by their richer brethren. Thus Agrippa, on his return from Rome, assisted many Nazirites (Jos, Ant, XIX, vi, 1), and Paul was also at charges with others (Acts 21 23).

We come across something of the same kind in many countries, and we find special abstinence always emphasized. Thus we meet with a class of "votaries" as early as the days of Hammurabi, and his code devotes quite a number of sections to them. Among other restrictions they were prohibited from even entering a wineshop (Sect, 110).

Then we are familiar with the Hieródouloi of the Greeks, and the Vestal Virgins of the Romans.

The word nēzir also appears in Syr and was applied to the maidens devoted to the service of Belthis. In the East, too, there have always been individuals and societies of ascetics who were practically Nazirites, and the modern dervish in nearly every way resembles him, while it is worthy of record in this connection that the Moslem (an abstainer by creed) while under the vow of pilgrimage neither cuts his hair nor pares his nails till the completion of his vow in Mecca. NEAH, nē'a (נֶאֱחַ, ha-nē'ah, "the neah"; Ἀννούα, Annouá): A town in the lot of Zebulun (Josh 19 13), mentioned along with Gath-hepher and Rimmon. It is possibly identical with "Neiel" (ver 27). No name resembling either of these has yet been recovered, although the district in which the place must be sought is pretty definitely indicated. It may probably have lain to the N. of Rimmon (Rummāneh), about 4 miles N.E. of Sef-fūriyeh.

NEAPOLIS, nē-ap'ō-lis (Νεάπολις, Neápolis; WH, Néa Pólis): A town on the northern shore of the Aegean, originally belonging to Thrace but later falling within the Rom province of Macedonia. It was the seaport of Philippi, and was the first point in Europe at which Paul and his companions landed; from Troas they had sailed direct to Samothrace, and on the next day reached Neapolis (Acts 16 11). Paul probably passed through the town again on his second visit to Macedonia (Acts 20 1), and he certainly must have embarked there on his last journey from Philippi to Troas, which occupied 5 days (Acts 20 6). The position of Neapolis is a matter of dispute. Some writers have maintained that it lay on the site known as Eskei (i.e. "Old") Kavalla (Cousinéry, Macédoine, II, 109 ff), and that upon its destruction in the 6th or 7th cent. AD the inhabitants migrated to the place, about 10 miles to the E., called Christopolis in mediaeval and Kavalla in modern times. But the general view, and that which is most consonant with the evidence, both literary and archaeological, places Neapolis at Kavalla, which lies on a rocky headland with a spacious harbor on its western side, in which the fleet of Brutus and Cassius was moored at the time of the battle of Philippi (42 BC; Appian Bell. Civ. iv.106). The town lay some 10 Rom miles from Philippi, with which it was connected by a road leading over the mountain ridge named Symbolum, which separates the plain of Philippi from the sea.

The date of its foundation is uncertain, but it seems to have been a colony from the island of Thasos, which lay opposite to it (Dio Cassius xlvii.35). It appears (under the name Neopolis, which is also borne on its coins) as a member both of the first and of the second Athenian confederacy, and was highly commended by the Athenians in an extant decree for its loyalty during the Thasian revolt of 411-408 BC (Insacr. Graec., I, Suppl. 51). The chief cult of the city was that of "The Virgin," usually identified with the Gr Artemis. (See Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, III, 180; Cousinéry, Voyage dans la Macédoine, II, 69 ff, 109 ff; Heuzey and Daumet, Mission archéol. de Macédoine, 11 ff.)

NEAR, nēr, NIGH, nī (chiefly קָרִיב, kārōbh, "to draw near," קָרַב, kārahb; ἑγγύς, eggús): Used of proximity in place (Gen 19 20; 45 10; Ex 13 17; Ps 22 11; Jn 3 23, etc), time (Jer 48 16; Ezk 7 7; 30 3; Mk 13 28), or kinship (Lev 21 2; Ruth 3 12), but also employed of moral nearness. Jeh is "nigh" to them that are of a broken heart (Ps 34 18). God draws nigh to His people, and they to Him (Jas 4 8). The antithesis is God's "farness" from the wicked.

NEARIAH, nē-a-rī'a (נֶעְרִיָּה, nē'aryāh):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 22 f).

(2) A descendant of Simeon (1 Ch 4 42).

In both instances LXX reads "Noadiah."

NEBAI, nē'bī, nē-bā'i, neb'ā-i (נֶבַי, nēbhay). See NOBAI.

NEBAIOTH, nē-bā'yoth, nē-bī'ōth (נְבִיּוֹת, nēbhayōth; LXX Ναβαῖοθ, Nabaiōth): Firstborn of Ishmael (Gen 25 13; 28 9; 36 3; 1 Ch 1 29). Isa 60 7 mentions the tribe Nebaioth with Kedar, with an allusion to its pastoral nature: "the rams of Nebaioth" are to serve the ideal Zion as sacrificial victims. Again associated with Kedar, the name occurs frequently in Assyrian inscriptions. The tribe must have had a conspicuous place among the northern Arabs. Jos, followed by Jerome, regarded Nebaioth as identical with the Nabataeans, the great trading community and ally of Rome, whose capital and stronghold was Petra. This view is widely accepted, but the name "Nabataean" is spelled with a t, and the interchange of t and b, although not unparalleled, is unusual. If the name is Arab., it is probably a fem. pl., and in that case could have no connection with the Nabataeans.

NEBALLAT, nē-bal'at (נֶבֶלָט, nēballāt; Ναβαλλάτ, Naballāt): A town occupied by the Benjamites after the exile, named along with Lod and Ono (Neh 11 34). It is represented by the modern Beit Nebāla, 4 miles N.E. of Lydda.

NEBAT, nē'bat (נֶבֶט, nēbhāt): Father of Jeroboam I (1 K 11 26, and frequently elsewhere). The name occurs only in the phrase "Jeroboam the son of Nebat," and is evidently intended to distinguish Jeroboam I from the later son of Joash. See JEROBOAM.

NEBO, nē'bō (נְבוֹ, nēbhō; Assyrian Nabu): The Bab god of literature and science. In the Bab mythology he is represented as the son and interpreter of Bel-merodach (cf Isa 46 1; Bel and Nebo there represent Babylon). His own special shrine was at Borsippo. His planet was Mercury. His name enters into Bib. names, as "Nebuchadnezzar," and perhaps "Abed-nego" (Dnl 1 7, for "Abed-nebo, servant of Nebo"). See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

NEBO (נְבוֹ, nēbhō; Ναβαῖ, Nabai):

(1) This town is named in Nu 32 3 between Sebam and Beon (which latter evidently represents Baal-meon of ver 38), after Heshbon and Elealeh, as among the cities assigned by Moses to Reuben. It was occupied by the Reubenite clan Bela (1 Ch 5 8). Here it is named between Aroer and Baal-meon. In their denunciations of wrath against Moab, Isaiah names it along with Medeba (Isa 15 2) and Jeremiah with Kiriathaim (Jer 48 1), and again (ver 22) between Dibon and Beth-diblathaim. Mesha (M S) says that by command of Chemosh he went by night against the city, captured it after an assault that lasted from dawn till noon, and put all the inhabitants to death. He dedicated the place to Ashtar-chemosh. Jerome (Comm. on Isa 15 2) tells us that at Nebo was the idol of Chemosh. The site which seems best to meet the requirements of the passages indicated is on the ridge of Jebel Nebā to the S.W. of Hesbān, where ruins of an ancient town bearing the name of en-Nebā are found (Buhl, GAP, 266).

(2) (נְבוֹ, nēbhō; B, Ναβὼ, Nabori, A, Ναβῶ, Nabō, and other forms): Fifty-two descendants of the inhabitants of Nebo returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 29; Neh 7 33). The place was in Judah and is named after Bethel and Ai. There is nothing, however, to guide us as to its exact position. It may be represented by either Beit Nubā, 12 miles N.W. of Jerus, or Nuba, which lies about 4 miles S.S.E. of 'Id el-Mā' (Adullam).

NEBO, MOUNT (נְבוֹ, har nēbhō; Ναβῶ, Nabau): A mountain in the land of Moab which Moses ascended at the command of God in order that he might see the Land of Promise which he was never to enter. There also he was to die. From the following passages (viz. Nu 33 47; Dt 32 49; 34 1), we gather that it was not far from the plain of Moab in which Israel was encamped; that it was a height standing out to the W. of the mountains of Abarim; that it lay to the E. of Jericho; and that it was a spot from which a wide and comprehensive view of Pal could be obtained. None of these conditions are met by Jebel 'Atfārūs, which is too far to the E., and is fully 15 miles S. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Jebel 'Osha, again, in Mt. Gilead, commands, indeed, an extensive view; but it lies too far to the N., being at least 15 miles N. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Both of these sites have had their advocates as claimants for the honor of representing the Bib. Nebo.

The "head" or "top" of Pisgah is evidently identical with Mt. Nebo (Dt 34 1). After Moses' death he was buried "in the valley in the land of Moab," over against Beth-peor.

The name Nebā is found on a ridge which, some 5 miles S.W. of Hesbān and opposite the northern end of the Dead Sea, runs out to the W. from the plateau of Moab, "sinking gradually: at first a broad brown field of arable land, then a flat top crowned by a ruined cairn, then a narrower ridge ending in the summit called Siāghah, whence the slopes fall steeply on all sides. The name Nebo or Neba [the "knob" or "tumulus"] applies to the flat top with the cairn, and the name Tal'at es-Sufa to the ascent leading up to the ridge from the N. Thus we have three names which seem to connect the ridge with that whence Moses is related to have viewed the Promised Land, namely, first, Nebo, which is identically the same word as the modern Neba; secondly, Siāghah, which is radically identical with the Aram. Se'ath, the word standing instead of Nebo in the Tg of Onkelos [Nu 32 3], where it is called the burial place of Moses; thirdly, Tal'at es-Sufa, which is radically identical with the Heb Zuph (צֻפְּה), whence Mizpah (מִצְפָּה) and Zophim (צֹפִים). . . . The name Pisgah is not now known, but the discovery of Zophim [cf Nu 23 14] confirms the view now generally held, that it is but another title of the Nebo range."

Neither Mt. Hermon nor Dan (Tell el-Kādy) is visible from this point; nor can Zoar be seen; and if the Mediterranean is the hinder sea, it also is invisible. But, as Driver says ("Dt," ICC, 419), the terms in Dt 34 1.3 are hyperbolic, and must be taken as including points filled in by the imagination as well as those actually visible to the eye. Mr. Birch argues in favor of Tal'at el-Benāt, whence he believes Dan and Zoar to be visible, while he identifies "the hinder sea" with the Dead Sea (PEFS, 1898, 110 ff).

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, neb-ū-kad-nez'ar, NEBUCHADREZZAR, -rez'ar: Nebuchadnezzar, the second king of Babylon of that name, is best known as the king who conquered Judah, destroyed Jerus, and carried the people of the Jews captive to Babylon. Of all the heathen monarchs mentioned by name in the Scriptures, N. is the most prominent and the most important. The prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and the last chs of K and Ch centered about his life, and he stands preëminent, along with the Pharaohs of the oppression and the exodus, among the foes of the kingdom of God. The documents which have been discovered in Babylon and elsewhere within the last 75 years have added much to our knowledge of this monarch, and have in general confirmed the Bib. accounts concerning him.

His name is found in two forms in the Bible, Nebuchadnezzar and Nebuchadrezzar. In the LXX he is called Ναβουχοδονοσορ, Nabouchodonosor, and in the Vulg Nabuchodonosor. This latter form is found also in the AV Apoc throughout and in RV 1 Esd, Ad Est and Bar, but not Jth or Tob. This change from r to n which is found in the two writings of the name in the Heb and the Aram. of the Scriptures is a not uncommon one in the Sem languages, as in Burnaburiyash and Buraburiyash, Ben-hadad and Bar-hadad (see Brockelmann's Comparative Grammar, 136, 173, 220). It is possible, however, that the form Nebuchadnezzar is the Aram. tr of the Bab Nebuchadrezzar. If we take the name to be compounded of Nabu-kudurri-usur in the sense "O Nebo, protect thy servant," then Nabu-kedina-usur would be the best tr possible in Aramaic. Such trs of proper names are common in the old VSS of the Scriptures and elsewhere. For example, in WAI, V, 44, we find 4 columns of proper names of persons giving the Sumerian originals and the Sem trs of the same; cf Bar-hadad in Aram. for Heb Ben-hadad. In early Aram. the s had not yet become t (see Cooke, Text-Book of North-Sem Inscriptions, 188 f); so that for anyone who thought that kudurru meant "servant," N. would be a perfect tr into Aram. of Nebuchadrezzar.

The father of N. was Nabopolassar, probably a Chaldaean prince. His mother is not known by name. The classical historians mention two wives: Amytis, the daughter of Astyages, and Nitocris, the mother of Nabunaid. The monuments mention three sons: Evil-merodach who succeeded him, Marduk-shum-usur, and Marduk-nadin-ahi. A younger brother of N., called Nabu-shum-lishir, is mentioned on a building-inscription tablet from the time of Nabopolassar.

The sources of our information as to the life of N. are about 500 contract tablets dated according to the days, months and years of his reign of 43 years; about 30 building and honorific inscriptions; one historical inscription; and in the books of Jer, Ezk, Dnl, and K. Later sources are Ch, Ezr, and the fragments of Berosus, Menander, Megasthenes, Abydenus, and Alexander Polyhistor, largely as cited by Jos and Eusebius.

From these sources we learn that N. succeeded his father on the throne of Babylon in 604 BC, and reigned till 561 BC. He probably commanded the armies of Babylon from 609 BC. At any rate, he was at the head of the army which defeated Pharaoh-necoh at Carchemish on the Euphrates in 605 BC (see 2 K 23 31; 2 Ch 35 20 ff). After having driven Necoh out of Asia and settled the affairs of Syria and Pal, he was suddenly recalled to Babylon by the death of his father. There he seems quietly to have ascended the throne. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim (or 3d according to the Bab manner of reckoning [Dnl 1 1]), he came up first against Jerus and carried away part of the vessels of the temple and a few captives of noble lineage. Again, in Jehoiakim's 11th year, he captured Jerus, put Jehoiakim, its king, into chains, and probably killed him. His successor, Jehoiachin, after a three months' reign, was besieged in Jerus, captured, deposed, and carried captive to Babylon, where he remained in captivity 37 years until he was set free by Evil-merodach. In the 9th year of Zedekiah, N. made a 4th expedition against Jerus which he besieged, captured, and destroyed (see Jer 52). In addition to these wars with Judah, N. carried on a long siege of Tyre, lasting 13 years, from his 7th to his 20th year. He had at least three wars with Egypt. The first culminated in the defeat of Necoh at Carchemish; the second in the withdrawal of Hophra (Apries) from Pal in the 1st year of the siege of Jerus under Zedekiah; and the third saw the armies of N. entering Egypt in triumph and defeating Amasis in N.'s 37th year. In the numerous building and honorific inscriptions of N. he makes no mention by name of his foes or of his battles; but he frequently speaks of foes that he had conquered and of many peoples whom he ruled. Of these peoples he mentions by name the Hittites and others (see Langdon, 148-51). In the Wady-Brissa inscription, he speaks of a special conquest of Lebanon from some foreign foe who had seized it; but the name of the enemy is not given.

The monuments justify the boast of N.: "Is not this great Babylon that I have built?" (Dnl 4 30).

Among these buildings special emphasis is placed by N. upon his temples and shrines to the gods, particularly to Marduk, Nebo and Zarpinat, but also to Shamash, Sin, Gula, Ramman, Mah, and others. He constructed, also, a great new palace and rebuilt an old one of his father's. Besides, he laid out and paved with bricks a great street for the procession of Marduk, and built a number of great walls with moats and moat-walls and gates. He dug several broad, deep canals, and made dams for flooding the country to the N. and S. of Babylon, so as to protect it against the attack of its enemies. He made, also, great bronze bulls and serpents, and adorned his temples and palaces with cedars and gold. Not merely in Babylon itself, but in many of the cities of Babylonia as well, his building operations were carried on, esp. in the line of temples to the gods.

The inscriptions of N. show that he was a very religious man, probably excelling all who had preceded him in the building of temples, in the institution of offerings, and the observance of all the ceremonies connected with the worship of the gods.

His larger inscriptions usually contain two hymns and always close with a prayer. Mention is frequently made of the offerings of precious metals, stones and woods, of game, fish, wine, fruit, grain, and other objects acceptable to the gods. It is worthy of note that these offerings differ in character and apparently in purpose from those in use among the Jews. For example, no mention is made in any one of N.'s inscriptions of the pouring out or sprinkling of blood, nor is any reference made to atonement, or to sin.

No reference is made in any of these inscriptions to N.'s insanity. But aside from the fact that we could scarcely expect a man to publish his own calamity, esp. madness, it should be noted that according to Langdon we have but three inscriptions of his written in the period from 580 to 561 BC.

If his madness lasted for 7 years, it may have occurred between 580 and 567 BC, or it may have occurred between the Egypt campaign of 567 BC and his death in 561 BC. But, as it is more likely that the "7 times" mentioned in Dnl may have been months, the illness may have been in any year after 580 BC, or even before that for all we know.

No mention is made on the monuments (1) of the dream of N. recorded in Dnl 2, or (2) of the image of gold that he set up, or (3) of the fiery furnace.

8. Miracles, from which the three children were delivered (Dnl 3). As to (1), it may be said, however, that a belief in dreams was so universal among all the ancient peoples, that a single instance of this kind may not have been considered as worthy of special mention.

The annals of Ashur-ban-pal and Nabu-naid and Xerxes give a number of instances of the importance attached to dreams and their interpretation. It is almost certain that N. also believed in them. That the dream recorded in Dnl is not mentioned on the monuments seems less remarkable than that no dream of his is recorded. As to (2) we know that N. made an image of his royal person (šalam šarrutiya, Langdon, XIX, B, col. x, 6; cf the image of the royal person of Nabopolassar, id, p. 51), and it is certain that the images of the gods were made of wood (id, p. 155), that the images of Nebo and Marduk were conveyed in a bark in the New Year's procession (id, pp. 157, 159, 163, 165) and that there were images of the gods in all the temples (id, passim); and that N. worshipped before these images. That N. should have made an image of gold and put it up in the Plain of Dura is entirely in harmony with what we know of his other "pious deeds." (3) As to "the fiery furnace," it is known that Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, says that his own brother, Shamash-shumukin, was burned in a similar furnace.

The failure of N. to mention any of the particular persons or events recorded in Dnl does not disprove their historicity, any more than his failure to mention the battle of Carchemish, or the siege of Tyre and Jerus, disproves them. The fact is, we have no real historical inscription of N., except one fragment of a few broken lines found in Egypt.

NEBUSHAZBAN, neb-û-shaz'ban (נְבוּשַׁזְבַּן, nēbhūshaz'bhān = Assyrian Nabusezib-anni, "Nebo delivers me"; AV Nebushasban): An important officer (the Rab-saris, "chief captain" or "chief eunuch") of the Bab army, who with Nergal-sharezer and others was appointed to see to the safety of Jeremiah after the taking of Jerus (Jer 39 13).

NEBUZARADAN, neb-û-zār-ā'dan, -zār'a-dan (נְבוּזַרְאֲדָן, nēbhūzar'ādān = Assyrian Nabu-zaradīdina, "Nebo has given seed"; Νεβουζαρδάν, Nebouzaradān): Nebuchadnezzar's general at the siege of Jerus (2 K 25 8.11.20 || Jer 52 12.15.26; 39 9. 10.11.13). Under the title of "captain of the guard," he commanded the army, and, after the fall of the city, carried out his master's policy with regard to the safety of Jeremiah, the transport of the exiles, and the government of those who were left in the land.

NECHO, NECHOH, nē'kō. See PHARAOH-NECOH.

NECK, nek (צֶנֶק, ṣawwār, צֶנֶקָא, ṣawwār, צֶנֶקָה, ṣawwārōn, צֶנֶקָה, ṣawwārāh, Aram. צֶנֶק, ṣawwar [Dnl 5 7.16.29], עֶרֶף, 'ōreph, מִצְרֶקֶת, miphreketh [1 S 4 18]; wōtos, nōtos, "back" [Bar 2 33]; occasionally the words צֶנֶק, gārōn [Isa 3 16; Ezk 16 11], and צֶנֶקָה, gargrōth, pl. of gargārāh, lit. "throat" [Prov 1 9; 3 3.22; 6 21], are tr^d "neck"): The neck is compared with a tower for beauty (Cant 4 4; 7 4) and is decorated with necklaces and chains (Prov 1 9; 3 3.22; 6 21, Heb gargrōth; Ezk 16 11, Heb gārōn, "throat"; Dnl 5 7.16.29, Heb ṣawwār). It is also the part of the body where the yoke, emblem of labor and hardship, dependence and subjection, is borne (Dt 28 48; Jer 27 8.11. 12; 28 14; Acts 15 10). "To shake off the yoke," "to break the yoke," or "to take it off" is expressive of the regaining of independence and liberty, either by one's own endeavors or through help from outside (Gen 27 40; Isa 10 27; Jer 28 11; 30 8). Certain animals which were not allowed as food (like the firstborn which were not redeemed) were to be killed by having their necks ('ōreph) broken (Ex 13 13; 34 20); the turtle-doves and young pigeons, which were sacrificed as sin offerings or as burnt offerings, had their heads wrung or pinched off from their necks (Lev 5 8). In 1 S 4 18 the Heb word miphreketh signifies a fracture of the upper part of the spinal column caused by a fall.

It was a military custom of antiquity for the conqueror to place his foot upon the vanquished. This custom, frequently represented in sculpture on many an Egyp temple wall, is referred to in Josh 10 24; Bar 4 25 and probably in Rom 16 20 and Ps 110 1. St. Paul praises the devotion of Aquila and Priscilla, "who for my life laid down their own necks" (Rom 16 4). See FOOTSTOOL.

To "fall on the neck" of a person is a very usual mode of salutation in the East (Gen 33 4; 45 14; 46 29; Tob 11 9.13; Lk 15 20; Acts 20 37). In moments of great emotion such salutation is apt to end in weeping on each other's neck.

Readiness for work is expressed by "putting one's neck to the work" (Neh 3 5). Severe punishment and calamity are said to "reach to the neck" (Isa 8 8; 30 28).

The Lord Jesus speaks of certain persons for whom it were better to have had a millstone put around the neck and to have been drowned in the sea. The meaning is that even the most disgraceful death is still preferable to a life of evil influence upon even the little ones of God's household (Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42; Lk 17 2).

To "make the neck stiff," to "harden the neck" indicates obstinacy often mingled with rebellion (Ex 32 9; 33 3.5; 34 9; 2 Ch 30 8; 36 13; Neh 9 16.17.29; Ps 75 5 [RVm "insolently with a haughty neck"]; Prov 29 1; Jer 7 26). Cf σκληροτράχηλος, sklērotráchēlos, "stiffnecked" (Acts 7 51). Similarly Isaiah (48 4) speaks of the neck of the obstinate sinner as resembling an iron sinew.

NECKLACE, nek'lās (רַבִּידָה, rābhīdh, "chain"): A neck-chain ornament, worn either separately (Ezk 16 11), or with pendants (Isa 3 19), such as crescents (Isa 3 18) or rings (Gen 38 25); sometimes made of gold (Gen 41 42; Dnl 5 29), or of strings of jewels (Cant 1 10). Even beasts of burden were sometimes so adorned by royalty (Jgs 8 26). It was considered suggestive of pride (Ps 73 6) or of filial loyalty (Prov 1 9). The word does not occur in AV, but such adornments have always been popular in all the Bible lands.

NECO, nē'kō (נֶכֶד, nēkhō [2 Ch 35 22; 36 4]). See PHARAOH-NECOH.

NECODAN, nek-kō'dan. See NEKODA.

NECROMANCY, nek'rō-man-si. See ASTROLOGY, 1; DIVINATION; WITCHCRAFT.

NEDABIAH, ned-a-bī'a (נְדַבְיָה, nēdhabhyāh): A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 18).

NEEDLE, nē'd'l (ῥαφίς, rhapfis): The word "needle" occurs only 3 t, viz. in the reference to Christ's use of the proverb: "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Mt 19 24; Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25). This saying ought to be accepted in the same sense as Mt 23 24, "Ye blind guides, that strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel!" Christ used them to illustrate absurdities. A rabbinical || is cited, "an elephant through a needle's eye." Some writers have attempted to show that rhapfis referred to a small gate of a walled oriental city. No evidence of such a use of the word exists in the terms applied today in Bib. lands to this opening. "Rich man" here has the connotation of a man bound up in his riches. If a man continues to trust in his earthly possessions to save him, it would be absurd for him to expect to share in the spiritual kingdom where dependence upon the King is a first requisite.

The fact that needles are not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible should not be taken to indicate that this instrument was not used. Specimens of bone and metal needles of ancient origin show that they were common household objects. See CAMEL.

NEEDY, nēd'i (נָדִי, 'ebhyōn). See Poor.

NEESING, nē'zing (Job 41 18, AV, ERV "by his neesings a light doth shine," ARV "sneezings"): "Neese" in Elizabethan Eng. (through two distinct derivations) could mean either "sneeze" or "snort," and it is impossible to say which force was intended by the AV editors. The Heb is עֲשִׂישָׁה, 'āšīshāh, a word found only here, but connected with a Sem √ meaning "sneeze," or, perhaps, "snort." Job 41 18 is part of the description of the "leviathan" or crocodile. This animal has a habit of inflating himself, and after this he discharges through his nostrils the moist, heated vapor, which sparkles in the sunlight. The act is neither a "sneeze" nor a "snort," but the latter word is sufficiently descriptive. There is no allusion to legendary "fire-spouting" monsters. Cf Job 39 20; Jer 8 16.

In the older edd of AV "neeeded" is found in 2 K 4 35: "and the child neeeded seven times" (later edd and RV "sneezed"). BURTON SCOTT EASTON

NEGEB, neg'eb (נֶגֶב, ha-neghebbh, "the negeb," or simply, נֶגֶב, neghebbh, from a √ meaning "to be dry," and therefore in the first instance

1. Meaning implying the "dry" or "parched regions," hence in LXX it is usually τῆς ἐρήμου, érēmos, "desert," also νάγες, náges): As the Negeb lay to the S. of Judah, the word came to be used in the sense of "the South," and is so used in a few passages (e.g. Gen 13 14) and in such is τῆς λῆψ, lēps (see GEOGRAPHY).

The Eng. tr is unsuitable in several passages, and likely to lead to confusion. For example, in Gen 13 1 Abram is represented as going "into the South" when journeying northward from Egypt toward Bethel; in Nu 13 22 the spies coming from the "wilderness of Zin" toward Hebron are described as coming "by the South," although they were going north. The difficulty in these and many other passages is at once obviated if it is recognized that the Negeb was a geographical term for a definite geographical region, just as Shephelah, lit. "lowland," was the name of another district of Pal. In RV "Negeb" is given in m, but it would make for clearness if it were restored to the text.

This "parched" land is generally considered as beginning S. of ed Dāhariyeb—the probable site of DEBIR (q.v.)—and as stretching S.

2. Description in a series of rolling hills running in a general direction of E. to W. until the actual wilderness begins, a distance of perhaps 70 miles (see NATURAL FEATURES). To the E. it is bounded by the Dead Sea and the southern Ghor, and to the W. there is no defined boundary before the Mediterranean. It is a land of sparse and scanty springs and small rainfall; in the character of its soil it is a transition from the fertility of Canaan to the wilderness of the desert; it is essentially a pastoral land, where grazing is plentiful in the early months and where camels and goats can sustain life, even through the long summer drought. Today, as through most periods of history, it is a land for the nomad rather than the settled inhabitant, although abundant ruins in many spots testify to better physical conditions at some periods (see I, 5, below). The direction of the valleys E. or W., the general dryness, and the character of the inhabitants have always made it a more or less isolated region without thoroughfare. The great routes pass along the coast to the W. or up the Arabah to the E. It formed an additional barrier to the wilderness beyond it; against all who would lead an army from the S., this southern frontier of Judah was always secure. Israel could not reach the promised land by this route, through the land of the Amalekites (Nu 13 29; 14 43-45).

The Negeb was the scene of much of Abram's wanderings (Gen 12 9; 13 1.3; 20 1); it was in this district that Hagar met with the angel (Gen 16 7.14); Isaac (Gen 24 62) and Jacob (Gen 37 1; 46 5) both dwelt there. Moses

3. OT
References sent the spies through this district to the hill country (Nu 13 17.22); the Amalekites then dwelt there (ver 29) and apparently, too, in some parts of it, the Avvim (Josh 13 3.4). The inheritance of the children of Simeon, as given in Josh 19 1-9, was in the Negeb, but in Josh 15 21-32 these cities are credited to Judah (see SIMEON). Achish allotted to David, in response to his request, the city of ZIKLAG (q.v.) in the Negeb (1 S 27 5f); the exploits of David were against various parts of this district described as the Negeb of Judah, the Negeb of the Jerahmeelites, and the Negeb of the Kenites, while in 1 S 30 14 we have mention of the Negeb of the Cherethites and the Negeb of Caleb. To this we may add the Negeb of Arad (Jgs 1 16). It is impossible to define the districts of these various clans (see separate arts. under these names). The Negeb, together with the "hill-country" and the "Shephelah," was according to Jeremiah (17 26; 32 44; 33 13) to have renewed prosperity after the captivity of Judah was ended.

When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerus the Edomites sided with the Babylonians (cf Lam 4 21f; Ezk 35 3-15; Ob vs 10-16), and during

4. Later
History the absence of the Jews they advanced north and occupied all the Negeb and Southern Judaea as far as Hebron

(see JUDAEA). Here they annoyed the Jews in Maccabean times until Judas expelled them from Southern Judaea (164 BC) and John Hyrcanus conquered their country and compelled them to become Jews (109 BC). It was to one of the cities here—Malatha—that Herod Agrippa withdrew himself (Jos, Ant, XVIII, vi, 2).

The palmy days of this district appear to have been during the Byzantine period: the existing ruins, so far as they can be dated at all, belong to this time. Beersheba was an important city with a bishop, and Elusa (mentioned by Ptolemy in the 2d cent.) was the seat of a bishop in the 4th, 5th and 6th cents. After the rise of Mohammedanism the land appears to have lapsed into primitive conditions. Although lawlessness and want of any central control may account for much of the retrogression, yet it is probable that Professor Ellsworth Huntington (loc. cit.) is right in his contention that change of climate has had much to do with the rise and fall of civilization and settled habitation in this district. The district has long been given over to the nomads, and it is only quite recently that the Turkish policy of planting an official with a small garrison at Beersheba and at 'Aujeh has produced some slight change in the direction of a settled population and agricultural pursuits.

It is clear that in at least two historic periods the Negeb enjoyed a very considerable prosperity.

What it may have been in the days of the Patriarchs it is difficult to judge; all we read of them suggests a purely nomadic life similar to the Bedouin of today but with better pasturage. In the division of the land among the tribes mention is made of many cities—the Heb mentions 29 (Josh 15 21-32; 19 1-9; 1 Ch 4 28-33)—and the wealth of cattle evidently was great (cf 1 S 15 9; 27 9; 30 16; 2 Ch 14 14f). The condition of things must have been far different from that of recent times.

The extensive ruins at Bīr es Seba' (Beersheba) Khalasa (Elusa), Ruheibeh (REHOBOTH, q.v.), 'Aujeh and other cities, together with the signs of orchards, vineyards and gardens scattered widely around these and other sites, show how comparatively well populated this area was in Byzantine times in particular. Professor Huntington (loc. cit.) concludes from these ruins that the population of the large towns of the Negeb alone at this period must have amounted to between 45,000 and 50,000.

The whole district does not support 1,000 souls today.

NEHELAMITE, nē-hel'a-mīt, THE (נְהֵלָמִי, ha-nehēlāmī): The designation of Shemaiah, a false prophet who opposed Jeremiah (Jer 29 24.31.32). The word means "dweller of Nehelam," but no such place-name is found in the OT. Its etymology, however, suggests a connection with the Heb hālam, "to dream," and this has given rise to the rendering of AVm "dreamer."

LITERATURE

Nehemiah, the son of Hacaliah, is the Jewish patriot whose life is recorded in the Bib. work named after him. All that we know about him from contemporary sources is found in this book; and so the readers of this article are referred to the Book of Neh for the best and fullest account of his words and deeds. See EZRA-NEHEMIAH.

All that is known of his family is that he was the son of Hacaliah (1 1) and that one of his brothers was called Hanani (1 2; 7 2);

1. Family the latter a man of sufficient character and importance to have been made a ruler of Jerus.

From Neh 10 1-8 some have inferred that he was a priest, since Nehemiah comes first in the list of names ending with the phrase, "these were the priests." This view is supported by the Syr and Arab. VSS of 10 1, which read: "Nehemiah the elder, the son of Hananiah the chief of the priests"; and by the Lat Vulg of 2 Macc 1 21, where he is called "Nehemiah the priest," and possibly by 2 Macc 1 18, where it is said that Nehemiah "offered sacrifices, after that he had bulid the temple and the altar."

The argument based upon Neh 10 1-8 will fall to the ground, if we change the pointing of the "Seraiah" of the 3d verse and read "its princes," referring back to the princes of ver 1. In this case, Nehemiah and Zedekiah would be the princes; then would come the priests and then the Levites.

Some have thought that he was of the royal line of Judah, inasmuch as he refers to his "fathers' sepulchres" at Jerus (2 3). This would be a good argument only if it could be shown that none but kings had sepulchres at Jerus.

It has been argued again that he was of noble lineage because of his position as cupbearer to the king of Persia. To substantiate this argument, it would need to be shown that none but persons of noble birth could serve in this position; but this has not been shown, and cannot be shown.

From the fact that Nehemiah was so grieved at the desolation of the city and sepulchres of his fathers and that he was so jealous for

2. Youth the laws of the God of Judah, we can justly infer that he was brought up by pious parents, who instructed him in the history and law of the Jewish people.

Doubtless because of his probity and ability, he was apparently at an early age appointed by Artaxerxes, king of Persia, to the responsible position of cupbearer to the king.

3. Cupbearer of the King There is now no possible doubt that this king was Artaxerxes, the first of that name, commonly called Longimanus, who ruled over Persia from 464 to 424 BC.

The mention of the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, in a letter written to the priests of Jerus in 407 BC, among whom Johanan is esp. named, proves that Sanballat must have ruled in the time of Artaxerxes I rather than in that of Artaxerxes II.

The office of cupbearer was "one of no trifling honor" (Herod. iii.34). It was one of his chief duties to taste the wine for the king to see that it was not poisoned, and he was even admitted to the king while the queen was present (Neh 2 6). It was on account of this position of close intimacy with the king that Nehemiah was able to obtain his commission as governor of Judaea and the letters and edicts which enabled him to restore the walls of Jerus.

The occasion of this commission was as follows: Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and other men of Judah came to visit Nehemiah

4. Governor while he was in Susa in the 9th month of the 20th year of Artaxerxes. They reported that the Jews in Jerus were in great affliction and that the wall thereof was broken down and its gates burned with fire. Thereupon he grieved and fasted and prayed to God that he might be granted favor by the king. Having appeared before the latter in the 1st month of the 21st year of Artaxerxes, 444 BC, he was granted permission to go to Jerus to build the city of his fathers' sepulchres, and was given letters to the governors of Syria and Pal and esp. to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, ordering him to supply timber for the wall, the fortress, and the temple. He was also appointed governor of the province of which Jerus was the capital.

Armed with these credentials and powers he repaired to Jerus and immediately set about the restoration of the walls, a work in which he was hindered and harassed by Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and others, some of them Jews dwelling in Jerus. Notwithstanding, he succeeded in his attempt and eventually also in providing gates for the various entrances to the city.

Having accomplished these external renovations, he instituted a number of social reforms. He appointed the officers necessary for better government, caused the people to be instructed in the Law by public readings, and expositions; celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles; and observed a national fast, at which the sins of the people were confessed and a new covenant with Jeh was solemnly confirmed. The people agreed to avoid marriages with the heathen, to keep the Sabbath, and to contribute to the support of the temple. To provide for the safety and prosperity of the city, one out of every ten of the people living outside Jerus was compelled to settle in the city. In all of these reforms he was assisted by Ezra, who had gone up to Jerus in the 7th year of Artaxerxes.

Once, or perhaps oftener, during his governorship Nehemiah returned to the king. Nothing is known

5. Death as to when or where he died. It is certain, however, that he was no longer governor in 407 BC; for at that time according to the Aram. letter written from Elephantine to the priests of Jerus, Bagohi was occupying the position of governor over Judaea. One of the last acts of Nehemiah's government was the chasing away of one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib, because he had become the son-in-law to Sanballat, the governor of Samaria. As this Joiada was the father of Johanan (Neh 12 22) who, according to the Aram. papyrus, was high priest in 407 BC, and according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii.1) was high priest while Bagohi (Bogoas) was general of Artaxerxes' army, it is certain that Nehemiah was at this time no longer in power. From the 3d of the Sachau papyri, it seems that Bagohi was already governor in 410 BC; and, that at the same time, Dalayah, the son of Sanballat, was governor in Samaria. More definite information on these points is not to be had at present.

LITERATURE.—The only early extra-Bib. data with regard to Nehemiah and the Judaea of his times are to be found: (1) in the Egypt papyri of Elephantine ("Aramäische Papyri und Ostraka aus einer jüdischen Militär-Kolonie zu Elephantine," *Altorientalische Sprachdenkmäler des 5. NEHEMIAS, nē-hē-mī'as: Gr form of Heb Nehemiah.

(1) Nēemias, Neemias, one of the leaders of the return under Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 8) = "Nehemiah" of Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7.

(2) Nēemias, Neemias, B, Naiulas, Naimias, the prophet Nehemiah (1 Esd 5 40 where AVm reads "N. who also is Atharias"). Neither Nehemias nor Atharias is found in the || Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 65, but תִּרְשָׁתָהּ, ha-tirshāthā = Tirshatha, "the governor," by whom Zerubbabel must be intended. Thus the Heb word for "governor" has been converted into a proper name and by some blunder the name Nehemiah inserted, perhaps because he also was known by the title of "governor."

NEHILOTH, ne-hil'oth, nē'hi-loth (Ps 5, title). See MUSIC.

NEHUM, nē'hūm (נְהֻם, nē'hūm): One of the twelve heads of the people who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 7). In the || passage (Ezr 2 2), the name appears as REHUM (q.v.), and in 1 Esd 5 8 as "Roimus."

NEHUSHTA, nē-hush'ta (נְהֻשְׁתָּא, nē'hush'tā): Mother of King Jehoiachin (2 K 24 8). She was the daughter of Elnathan of Jerus. After the fall of the city she was exiled with her son and his court (2 K 24 12; Jer 29 2).

NEHUSHTAN, nē-hush'tan (נְהֻשְׁתָּן, nē'hush'tān; cf נְהֻשֶׁת, nē'hōsheth, "brass," and נָחָשׁ, nāhāsh, "serpent"):

1. Traditional viz. in 2 K 18 4. In the account there given of the reforms carried out by Hezekiah, it is said that "he brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made; for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it; and he called it Nehushtan." According to RVm the word means "a piece of brass." If this be correct, the sense of the passage is that Hezekiah not only breaks the brazen serpent in pieces but, suiting the word to the act, scornfully calls it "a [mere] piece of brass." Hezekiah thus takes his place as a true reformer, and as a champion of the purification of the religion of Israel. This is the traditional interpretation of the passage, and fairly represents the Heb text as it now stands.

There are at least three considerations, however, which throw doubt upon this interpretation. In the first place, the word N. is not a common noun, and cannot mean simply "a piece of brass." The point of the Bib. statement is entirely lost by such a construction. It is emphatically a proper noun, and is the special name given to this particular brazen serpent. As such it would be sacred

2. Derivation: A to all worshippers of the brazen serpent, and familiar to all who frequented the Temple. In the second Proper Noun place, it is probable that N. is to be derived from nāhāsh, "serpent," rather than from nē'hōsheth, "brass," (1) because the Gr VSS, representing a form of the Heb text earlier than MT, suggest this in their transliteration of N. (B, Nesthalei; A, Nesthān); (2) because the Heb offers a natural derivation of N. from nāhāsh, "serpent"; and (3) because the name of the image would more probably be based on its form than on the material out of which it was made. In the third place, the reading, "and it was called," which appears in RVm, is decidedly preferable to that in the text. It not only represents the best reading of the Heb, but is confirmed by the similar reading, "and they called it," which appears in the Gr VS referred to above. These readings agree in their indication that N. was the name by which the serpent-image was generally known during the years it was worshipped, rather than an expression used for the first time by Hezekiah on the occasion of its destruction.

Whichever derivation be adopted, however, the word must be construed as a proper name. If it be derived from "brass," then the tr must be, not "a piece of brass," but "The [great] Brass," giving the word a special sense by which it refers unequivocally to the well-known image made of brass. If it be derived from "serpent," then the tr must be, "The [great] Serpent," the word in this case referring in a special sense to the well-known image in serpent form. But the significance of the word probably lies far back of any etymological explanation of it that can now be given. It is not a term that can be adequately explained by reference to verbal roots, but is rather an epitome of the reverence of those who, however mistakenly, looked upon the brazen serpent as a proper object of worship.

In view of the foregoing it may be concluded, (1) that N. was the (sacred) name by which the brazen serpent was known during the years "the children of Israel did burn incense to it"; (2) that the word is derived from nāhāsh, "serpent"; and (3) that it was used in the sense of "The Serpent," par excellence. NEIEL, nē-i'el (נְעִיֶל, nē'i'ēl; B, Ἰναήλ, Inaēl, A, Ἀνιήλ, Aniēl): A town on the boundary between Zebulun and Asher mentioned between Jiftah-el and Cabul (Josh 19 27). It may be the same as Neah (ver 13), but the place is not identified.

NEIGH, nā (נָחַל, ṣāhal, "to cry aloud," "neigh"): Figuratively used to indicate lustful desire (Jer 5 8; cf 13 29).

NEIGHBOR, nā'bēr (רֵעֵ, rē', נְעִיבִית, 'āmūth, "friend," קָרֹב, kārōbh, שָׁכֵן, shākhēn; δ πλησίον, ho plēstion, "near," γείτων, geitōn,

1. As Described in the OT [cf 2 Macc 6 8; 9 25], "inhabitant"; Lat proximus [2 Esd 15 19], civis [9 45; 10 2, RVm "townman"]): In the OT, the relationship of neighborhood involves moral and social obligations which are frequently emphasized. These are in the main described in negative rather than positive terms; e.g. there are special injunctions not to bear false witness against a neighbor (Ex 20 16; Dt 5 20; Prov 25 18), or in any way to deal falsely with him, defraud him, frame malicious devices or harbor evil thoughts against him (Ex 20 17; Lev 6 2; 19 13; Dt 23 24 f; Ps 15 3; 101 5; Prov 24 28; Jer 22 13; Zec 8 17), or to lead him into shameful conduct (Hab 2 15), or to wrong him by lying carnally with his wife (Lev 18 20). But the supreme law that underlies these negative injunctions is stated positively, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev 19 18). In this verse the term "neighbor" is defined by the expression, "the children of my people." Here, and generally in the OT, the term implies more than mere proximity; it means one related by the bond of nationality, a fellow-countryman, compatriot. Jeh being regarded as a national God, there was no religious bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with other nations. Conduct which was prohibited between fellow-Jews was permitted toward a foreigner, e.g. the exaction of interest (Dt 23 19,20).

In the NT, this limitation of moral obligation to fellow-countrymen is abolished. Christ gives a wider interpretation of the commandment in Lev 19 18, so as to include in it those outside the tie of nation or kindred. This is definitely done in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10 25-37), where, in answer to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus shows that the relationship is a moral, not a physical one, based not on kinship but on the opportunity and capacity for mutual help. The word represents, not so much a rigid fact, but an ideal which one may or may not realize (ver 36, "Which of these three, thinkest thou, proved [lit. became, not was] neighbor," etc). This larger connotation follows naturally as a corollary to the doctrine of the universal Fatherhood of God. The commandment to love one's neighbor as one's self must not be interpreted as if it implied that we are to hate our enemy (an inference which the Jews were apt to make); human love should be like the Divine, impartial, having all men for its object (Mt 5 43 ff). Love to one's fellow-men in this broad sense is to be placed side by side with love to God as the essence and sum of human duty (Mt 22 35-40 || Mk 12 28-31). Christ's apostles follow His example in giving a central position to the injunction to love one's neighbor as one's self (Jas 2 8, where it is called the "royal law," i.e. the supreme or governing law; Rom 13 9; Gal 5 14).

NEKEB, nē'keb: This name occurs only in combination with "Adami" (אָדָמִי הַנֶּכֶב, 'ādhāmī ha-nekeb, "Adami of the pass"); LXX reads the names of two places; καὶ Ἀρμὲ καὶ Νάβωκ, καὶ Ἀρμὲ καὶ Νάβωκ (B); καὶ Ἀρμὰ καὶ Νάβεβ, καὶ Ἀρμὰ καὶ Νάβεβ (Josh 19 33), so we should possibly read "Adami and Nekeb." Neubauer says (Géog. du Talm., 225) that later the name of Nekeb was Ciyadathah. It may therefore be represented by the modern Seiyādeh, not far from ed-Dāmīeh to the E. of Tabor, about 4 miles S.W. of Tiberias. The name of Nekeb, a town in Galilee, appears in the list of Thothmes III.

NEKODA, nē-kō'da (נֶקֹדָא, nēkōdhā):

(1) Head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50; cf 1 Esd 5 31).

(2) Head of a family which failed to prove its Israelitish descent (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62; cf 1 Esd 5 31,37). In the || vs of 1 Esd the names are given thus: NOEBA and NEKODAN (q.v.).

NEKODAN, nē-kō'dan (Νεκωδάν, Nekōdán; RVm "Nekoda"; AV Necodan):

(1) Head of a family which returned from exile, but "could not show their families nor their stock" (1 Esd 5 37) = "Nekoda" of Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62. (2) See NOEBA.

NEMUEL, nem'ū-el, nē-mū'el (נִמְרוּאֵל, nēmū'āl):

(1) A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 26 9).

(2) A son of Simeon (Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24). The name occurs also in the form "Jemuel" (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15). According to Gray (HPN), either form is etymologically obscure; but Nemuel is probably correct, for it is easier to account for its corruption into Jemuel than vice versa. The patronymic Nemuelites occurs once (Nu 26 12).

NEPHEA, nē-fē'a. See MUSIC.

NEPHEG, nē'feg (נֶפֶג, nephegh, "sprout," "shoot"):

(1) Son of Izhar, and brother of Korah of the famous trio, Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Ex 6 21).

(2) A son of David (2 S 5 15; 1 Ch 3 7; 14 6).

NEPHEW, nef'ū, nev'ū. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

NEPHI, nē'fī. See NEPHTHAL.

NEPHILIM, nef'ī-lim (נֶפִילִים, nephīlīm): This word, trd "giants" in AV, but retained in RV, is found in two passages of the OT—one in Gen 6 4, relating to the antediluvians; the other in Nu 13 33, relating to the sons of Anak in Canaan. In the former place the Nephilim are not necessarily to be identified with the children said to be borne by "the daughters of men" to "the sons of God" (vs 2,4); indeed, they seem to be distinguished from the latter as upon the earth before this unholy commingling took place (see Sons of God). But it is not easy to be certain as to the interpretation of this strange passage. In the second case they clearly represent men of gigantic stature, in comparison with whom the Israelites felt as if they were "grasshoppers." This agrees with Gen 6 4, "the mighty men that were of old, the men of renown." LXX, therefore, was warranted in translating by gigantes. JAMES ORR

NEPHIS, nē'fis. See NIPHIS.

See NAPHISH; NEPHUSHESIM.

NEPHTHAR, nef'thār (Νεφθαρά, Nephthar; A and Swete, Nephthar, AV and Vulg Naphthar), NEPHTHAI (Νεφθαί, Nephthai, al. Νεφθαί, Nephthai, Fritzsch, Νεφά, Nephā, AV and Vulg, following Old Lat, Nephi; Swete, following A, gives Nephthar twice): According to 2 Mace 1 19-36, at the time of the captivity the godly priests took of the altar fire of the temple and concealed it "privily in the hollow of a well that was without water," unknown to all. "After many years"

(upon the Return), before offering the sacrifices, Nehemiah sent the descendants of the godly priests to fetch the hidden fire. They reported they could find no fire but only "thick water" (ῥῆμα παχύ, hūdōr pachū), which he commanded them to draw up and sprinkle upon the wood and the sacrifices. After an interval the sun shone forth from behind a cloud and the liquid ignited and consumed the sacrifices. Nehemiah then commanded them to pour (καταχεῖν, katachein, al. κατέχειν, katêchein, and κατασχεῖν, kataschein) the rest of the liquid upon great stones. Another flame sprang up which soon spent itself, "whereas the light from the altar shone still" (RVm, the exact meaning being doubtful). When the king of Persia investigated it, he inclosed the spot as sacred. Nehemiah and his friends called the thick liquid "Nephthar," "which is by interpretation 'cleansing'" (καθαρισμός, katharismós), "but most men call it Nephthai."

No satisfactory explanation is to hand of either name, one of which is probably a corruption of the other. And no word exists in the Heb like either of them with the meaning of "cleansing," "purification." The Vulg applies the name to the spot (hunc locum), not the thing. The story probably originated in Persia, where naphtha was abundant. The ignition of the liquid by the hot rays of the sun and the appearance of the words render it highly probable that it was the inflammable rock-oil naphtha, the combustible properties of which were quite familiar to the ancients (Pliny, NH, ii. 109; Plutarch, Alex. 35; Diosc., i.101; Strabo, Geogr. xvi.1, 15); the words then are probably corruptions of what the Greeks termed νάφθα, nāphtha. Ewald (Hist., V, 163) says: "This is but one of the many stories which sought in later times to enhance the very high sanctity of the Temple, with reference even to its origin." S. ANGUS

NEPHTOAH, nef-tō'a, nef'tō-a (נֶפְתּוֹחַ, neph-tō'h, occurs only in the expression מַעְיָן מֵי נֶפְתּוֹחַ, ma'yan mē n., "the fountain of the waters of Nephtoah"; LXX πηγὴ ὕδατος Ναφθῶ, pēgē hūdatos Naphthō): This spring was on the border line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 9; 18 15). The place is usually identified with Liftā, a village about 2 miles N.W. of Jerus, on the east bank of the Wādī beit Hanīna. It is a village very conspicuous to the traveler along the high road from Jaffa as he nears Jerus. There are ancient rock-cut tombs and a copious spring which empties itself into a large masonry reservoir. The situation of Liftā seems to agree well with the most probable line of boundary between the two tribes; the spring as it is today does not appear to be so abundant as to warrant such an expression as "spring of the waters," but it was, like many such sources, probably considerably more abundant in OT times.

Conder would identify Liftā with the ancient ELEPH (q.v.) of Benjamin, and, on the ground that the Talm (see Talm Bab, Yōmā 31a) identifies Nephtoah with ETAM (q.v.), he would find the site of Nephtoah at 'Ain 'Atān, S. of Bethlehem. The Talm is not a sufficiently trustworthy guide when unsupported by other evidence, and the identification creates great difficulty with the boundary line. See PEF, III, 18, 43, Sh XVII.

NEPHUSHESIM, nē-fush'ē-sim, NEPHISHESIM, nē-fish'ē-sim (נֶפִּישִׁים, nēphūsh'ēsim, נֶפִּישִׁים, nēphish'ēsim): The former is the K'thibh (Heb "written") form of the name adopted in RV; the latter the K'rē (Heb "read") form adopted in AV and RVm (Neh 7 52). See NAPHISH; NEPHISIM.

NER, nēr (נֵר, nēr, "lamp"): Father of Abner

(1 S 14 50 f; 26 5.14, etc); grandfather of Saul (1 Ch 8 33). Other references, though adding no further information are 2 S 2 8.12; 3 23.25; 28.37; 1 K 2 5.32, etc.

NEREUS, nēr'ūs, nēr'ē-us (Νηρέυς, Nēreús): The name of a Rom Christian to whom with his sister St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). Nereus and the others saluted with him (ver 15) formed a small community or "house church." The name of the sister is not given, but the name Nereis is found on an inscription of this date containing names of the emperor's servants (Lightfoot, Phil. 176). Among the Acta Sanctorum connected with the early church in Rome are the "Acts of Nereus and Achilleus" which call them chamberlains of Domitilla, the niece of Vespasian, and relate their influence over her in persuading her to remain a virgin. NERGAL, nār'gāl (נֶרְגַּל, nēr'ghal): A Bab deity, identified with the planet Mars, and worshipped at Cutha (cf 2 K 17 30). See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

NERGAL-SHAREZER, nūr-gal-sha-rē'zar (נֶרְגַּל-שָׂרֵזֶר, nēr'ghal-shar'ezēr, Heb form of Assyrian Nergal-sar-ušur, "O Nergal, defend the prince"): A Bab officer, the "Rab-mag," associated with Nebushazban in the care of Jeremiah after the fall of Jerus (Jer 39 3.13). According to Hommel (art. "Babylon," HDB) and Sayce (HDB, s.v.), Nergal-sharezer is to be identified with Neriglissar who succeeded Evil-merodach on the throne of Babylon (cf Cheyne and Johns, EB, s.v.).

NERI, nēr'ī (Νηρι, Nēri [Tisch., Treg., WH], TR, Npῑ, Nēri; for Heb נֶרְיָה, nēriyāh): The name of an ancestor of Jesus, the grandfather of Zerubbabel (Lk 3 27). See NERIAH.

NERIAH, nēr'ī'a (נֶרְיָה, nēriyāh, "whose lamp is Jeh"): The father of Seraiah and of Baruch, Jeremiah's friend and secretary (Jer 32 12.16; 36 4.8.32; 43 3). In Bar 1 1 the Gr form of the name, Nnp(e)las, Nēr(e)las, is given, and this shortened, Neri, occurs in the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

NERIAS, nēr'ī'as (Νη[ε]λας, Nēr[e]las): The Gr form of Heb Neriah found only in Bar 1 1 as the father of Baruch="Neriah" of Jer 32 12; 36 4 f; 43 3. To Baruch's brother, Seraiah, the same genealogy is ascribed in Jer 51 59.

LITERATURE

The fifth Rom emperor, b. at Antium December 15, 37 AD, began to reign October 13, 54, d. June 9, 68.

I. Name, Parentage and Early Training.—His name was originally Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus.

but after his adoption into the Claudian gens by the emperor Claudius, he became Nero Claudius Caesar Germanicus. His father was Enaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus ("Brazen-beard"), a man sprung from an illustrious family and of vicious character. His mother was Agrippina the younger, the daughter of Germanicus and the elder Agrippina, sister of the emperor Caius (Caligula) and niece of the emperor Claudius. On the birth of the child, his father predicted, amid the congratulations of his friends, that any offspring of himself and Agrippina could only prove abominable and disastrous for the public (Suet. Nero vi: detestabile et malo publico). At the age of three the young Domitius lost his father and was robbed of his estates by the rapacity of Caius. In 39 his mother was banished for supposed complicity in a plot against Caius. N. was thus deprived of his mother and at the same time left almost penniless. His aunt, Domitia Lepida, now undertook the care of the boy and placed him with two tutors, a dancer and a barber (Suet. vi). On the accession of Claudius, Agrippina was recalled, and N. was restored to his mother and his patrimony (41 AD).

Nero (Brit. Mus.).

II. Agrippina's Ambition for Nero.—She cared little for her son's moral education, but began immediately to train him for high position. She aimed at nothing less than securing the empire for N. With a view to this she must gain influence over her uncle, the emperor Claudius, who was very susceptible to female charms. At first the path was by no means easy, while the licentious empress, Messalina, was in power. But on the fall and death of Messalina (48 AD)—for which Agrippina may have intrigued—the way seemed opened. With the assistance of the emperor's freedman, Pallas, Agrippina proved the successful candidate for Claudius' affections. She now felt secure to carry out the plans for the elevation of her son: (1) She secured his betrothal to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius, having previously, by the villainy of Vitellius, broken off the engagement between Octavia and Lucius Silanus (ib., xlviii). Later, N. married this unfortunate lady. (2) Vitellius again obliged by securing a modification of Rom law so as to permit a marriage with a brother's (not sister's) daughter, and in 49 Agrippina became empress. (3) In the meantime she had caused Seneca to be recalled from banishment and had entrusted to him the education of N. for imperial purposes. (4) The adoption of her son by Claudius (50 AD). (5) She next secured early honors and titles for N. in order to mark him out as Claudius' successor. (6) She caused Britannicus, Claudius' son, to be kept in the background and treated as a mere child, removing by exile or death suspected supporters of Britannicus. (7) Agrippina was far-sighted and anticipated a later secret of Rom imperialism—the influence of the armies in the nomination of emperors. For this cause she took an active interest in military affairs and gave her name to a new colony on the Rhine (modern Cologne). But she did not forget the importance of securing the praetorian guard and Burrus the prefect. (8) She persuaded Claudius to make a will in favor of her son. All was now ready. But Claudius did not like the idea of excluding his son Britannicus from power, and murmurs were heard among the senate and people. Delay might prove fatal to Agrippina's plans, so (9) Claudius must die. The notorious Locusta administered poison in a dish of mushrooms, and Xenophon, Agrippina's physician, thrust a poisoned feather down Claudius' throat on the pretence of helping him to vomit. Burrus then took N. forth and caused him to be proclaimed imperator by the praetorians.

III. Nero's Reign.—Nero's reign falls into three periods, the first of which is the celebrated quinquennium, or first 5 years, characterized by good government at home and in the provinces and popularity with both senate and people. Agrippina, having seated her son on the throne, did not purpose to relinquish power herself; she intended to rule along with him. And at first N. was very devoted to her and had given as watchword to the guard, "the best of mothers" (Tac. Ann. xiii.2; Suet. ix). This caused a sharp conflict with Seneca and Burrus, who could not tolerate Agrippina's arrogance and unbounded influence over her son. In order to detach him from his mother they encouraged him in an amour with a Gr freedwoman, Acte (Tac. Ann. xiii.12). This first blow to Agrippina's influence was soon followed by the dismissal from court of her chief protector Pallas. She now threatened to bring forth Britannicus and present him as the rightful heir to the throne. This cost Britannicus his life, for N., feeling insecure while a son of Claudius lived, compassed his death at a banquet. A hot wine cup was offered Britannicus, and to cool it to taste, cold water was added which had been adulterated with a virulent poison. The victim succumbed immediately. All eyes fastened on N. in suspicion, but he boldly asserted that the death was due to a fit of epilepsy—a disease to which Britannicus had been subject from childhood. Such was the fate of Agrippina's first protégé. She next took up the cause of the despised and ill-treated Octavia, which so incensed her son that he deprived her of her guards and caused her to remove from the palace. Agrippina now disappears for the next few years to come into brief and tragic prominence later. Seneca and Burrus undertook the management of affairs, with results that justified the favorable impression which the first 5 years of N.'s reign made upon the Rom people. Many reforms were initiated, financial, social and legislative. These ministers treated N. to counsels of moderation and justice, dictating a policy which left considerable activity to the senate. But perceiving the bent of his evil nature, they allowed him to indulge in low pleasures and excesses with the most profligate companions, thinking, perhaps, either that the young ruler would in this way prove less harmful to the public, or that, after sowing his wild oats, he would return to the serious business of government. But in both ways they were sorely disappointed, for N., having surrendered himself to the basest appetites, continued to go from excess to excess. He surrounded himself with the most dissolute companions, conspicuous among whom were Salvius Otho and Claudius Senecio.

The former had a wife as ambitious as she was unprincipled, and endowed, according to Tacitus, with every gift of nature except an

2. Poppaea Sabina (68 AD) "honorable mind." Already divorced before marrying Otho, she was minded to employ Otho merely as a tool to enable her to become N.'s consort.

With the appearance of Poppaea Sabina, for such was her name, opens the second period of N.'s reign. She proved his evil star. Under her influence he shook off all restraints, turned a deaf ear to his best advisers and plunged deeper into immorality and crime. She allowed, if not persuaded, N. to give her husband a commission in the distant province of Lusitania. Her jealousy could tolerate no possible rival. She plotted the death of Agrippina to which she easily persuaded N. to consent. This foul crime was planned and carried out with the greatest cunning. Anicetus, admiral of the fleet, undertook to construct a vessel that would sink to order. N. invited his mother to his villa at Baiae at the Quinquatrus celebration. After the banquet she was persuaded to return to Bauli by the vessel prepared. But the plan did not succeed, and Agrippina saved herself by swimming ashore. She pretended to treat the matter as an accident, sending a freedman to N. to inform him of her escape. Anicetus, however, relieved N. of the awkward position by pretending that Agrippina's freedman had dropped a dagger which was considered proof enough of her guilt. Deserted by her friends and slaves except one freedman, she was quickly dispatched by her murderers. N. gave out that she died by suicide (Suet. xxxiv; Tac. Ann. cxli-cxlviii).

N. no longer made any secret of taking Poppaea as his mistress, and, under her influence, bid defiance to the best Rom traditions and

3. Poppaea plunged deeper into dissipation. In 62 AD matters grew much worse by Tigellinus the death of the praetorian prefect, Burrus. Seneca lost in him a powerful ally, and Poppaea gained in one of the new prefects, Sofonius Tigellinus, a powerful ally. She succeeded in causing Seneca to retire from the court. Next she determined to remove Octavia. A charge of adultery was first tried, but as the evidence proved too leaky, N. simply divorced her because of barrenness. Then Anicetus was persuaded to confess adultery with her, and the innocent Octavia was banished to the island of Pandateria, where a little later she was executed at Poppaea's orders and her head brought to her rival (62 AD). Poppaea was now empress, and the next year bore a daughter to N., but the child died when only three months old. Two years later Poppaea herself died during pregnancy, of a cruel kick inflicted by N. in a fit of rage (65 AD). He pronounced a eulogy over her and took a third wife, Statilia Messalina, of whom he had no issue.

N., having by his extravagance exhausted the well-filled treasury of Claudius (as Caius did that of Tiberius), was driven to fill his coffers by confiscations of the estates of rich nobles against whom his creature Tigellinus could trump the slightest plausible charge. But even this did not prevent a financial crisis—the beginning of the bankruptcy of the later Rom empire. The provinces which at first enjoyed good government were now plundered; new and heavy taxes were imposed. Worst of all, the gold and silver coinage was depreciated, and the senate was deprived of the right of copper coinage.

This difficulty was much increased by the great fire which was not only destructive to both private and state property, but also necessitated the providing thousands of homeless with shelter, and lowering the price of corn. On July 18, 64, this great conflagration broke out in Circus Maximus. A high wind caused it to spread rapidly over a large portion of the city, sweeping before it ill-built streets of wooden houses. At the end of six days it seemed to be exhausted for lack of material, when another conflagration started in a different quarter of the city. Various exaggerated accounts of the destruction are found in Rom historians: of the 14 city regions 7 were said to have been totally destroyed and 4 partially. N. was at Antium at the time. He hastened back to the city and apparently took every means of arresting the spread of the flames. He superintended in person the work of the fire brigades, often exposing himself to danger. After the fire he threw open his own gardens to the homeless. The catastrophe caused great consternation, and, for whatever reasons, suspicion seemed to fix upon N. Rumor had it that on hearing the Greek verse, "When I am dead let the earth be wrapped in fire," he interrupted, "Nay rather, while I live" (Suet. xxxviii); that he had often deplored the ugliness of the city and wished an opportunity to rebuild it; that he purposely set it on fire in order to find room for his magnificent Domus Aurea ("Golden House"); that when the city was burning he gazed upon it from the tower of Maecenas delighted with what he termed "the beauty of the conflagration"; that he recited in actor's costume the sack of Troy (Suet. xxxviii; Tac. Ann. xv.38 ff). In spite of all these reports N. must be absolved of the guilt of incendiarism.

Such public calamities were generally attributed to the wrath of the gods. In the present case everything was done to appease the offended deity. Yet, in spite of all, suspicion still clung to N. "Wherefore in order to allay the rumor he put forward as guilty [subdidit reos], and afflicted with the most exquisite punishments those who were hated for their abominations [flagitia] and called 'Christians' by the populace. Christus, from whom the name was derived, was punished by the procurator Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius. This noxious form of religion [exitiabilis superstitio], checked for a time, broke out again not only in Judaea its original home, but also throughout the city [Rome] where all abominations meet and find devotees. Therefore first of all those who confessed [i.e. to being Christians] were arrested, and then as a result of their information a large number [multitudo ingens] were implicated [reading coniuncti, not convicti], not so much on the charge of incendiarism as for hatred of the human race. They died by methods of mockery; some were covered with the skins of wild beasts and then torn by dogs, some were crucified, some were burned as torches to give light at night . . . whence [after scenes of extreme cruelty] immiseration was stirred for them, although guilty and deserving the worst penalties, for men felt that their destruction was not on account of the public welfare but to gratify the cruelty of one [Nero]" (Tac. Ann. xv.44). Such is the earliest account of the first heathen persecution (as well as the first record of the crucifixion by a heathen writer). Tacitus here clearly implies that the Christians were innocent (subdidit reos), and that N. employed them simply as scapegoats. Some regard the conclusion of the paragraph as a contradiction to this—"though guilty and deserving the severest punishment" (adversus fontes et novissima exempla meritos). But Tacitus means by fontes that the Christians were "guilty" from the point of view of the populace, and that they merited extreme punishment also from his own standpoint for other causes, but not for arson. Fatebantur does not mean that they confessed to incendiarism, but to being Christians, and qui fatebantur means there were some who boldly confessed, while others tried to conceal or perhaps even denied their faith.

5. Persecution of Christians

But why were the Christians selected as scapegoats? Why not the Jews, who were both numerous and had already offended the Rom government and had been banished in great numbers? Or why not the many followers of the oriental religions, which had proved more than once obnoxious? (1) Poppaea was favorable to Judaism and had certainly enough influence over N.

to protect the Jews; she was regarded by them as a proselyte and is termed by Jos (Ant. XX. viii. 11) θεοσεβής, theosebēs, "god-fearing." When the populace and N. were seeking victims for revenge, the Jews may have been glad of the opportunity of putting forward the Christians and may have been encouraged in this by Poppaea. Farrar (Early Days of Christianity, I, ch iv) sees "in the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish malice, the only adequate explanation of the first Christian persecution." (2) Closely connected with this was doubtless the observation by the Rom government that Christianity was an independent faith from Judaism. This may first have been brought home to the authorities by the trial of Paul before N., as suggested by Ramsay (Expos., July, 1893). Judaism was a recognized and tolerated religion, a religio licita, and Christianity when divorced from Judaism became a religio illicita and punishable by the state, for Christianity first rose "under the shadow of licensed Judaism" (sub umbraculo licitae Judaecorum religionis: Tert. Apol., xxi). (3) As Christianity formed a society apart from Rom society, all kinds of crimes were attributed to its followers, Thyestean feasts, nightly orgies, hostility to temples and images. These flagitia seemed summed up in odium humani generis, "hatred for the human race." (4) They were easily selected as being so numerous and making most progress in a line opposed to Rom spirit; cf ingens multitudo (Tac. Ann., xv. 44; Clemens Rom., Cor I 6, πολλὰ πλήθος, pollá plēthos; cf also "great multitude" of Rev 7 9; 19 1). (5) No doubt, too, early Christian enthusiasm was unequivocal in its expressions, esp. in its belief of a final conflagration of the world and its serene faith amid the despair of others.

In the meantime Tigellinus' tyranny and confiscations to meet N.'s expenses caused deep discontent among the nobles, which culminated in the famous conspiracy at

6. Conspiracy of Piso (65 AD) . Piso. The plot was prematurely betrayed by Milichus. An inquisition followed in which the most illustrious victims who perished were Seneca the philosopher, Lucan the poet, Lucan's mother, and later Annaeus Mela, brother of Seneca and father of Lucan, T. Petronius Arbiter, "the glass of fashion." Finally, "N. having butchered so many illustrious men, at last desired to exterminate virtue itself by the death of Thrasea Paetus and Barea Soranus" (Tac. Ann. xvi. 21 f).

Having cleared every suspected person out of the way, he abandoned the government in Rome to

7. Visit to Greece (66 AD) . long visit to Greece (66-68 AD), where he took part in musical contests and games, himself winning prizes from the obsequious Greeks; in return for which N. bestowed upon them "freedom." N.

was so un-Roman that he was perfectly at home in Greece, where alone he said he was appreciated by cultured people. In the meantime the revolt of Vindex in Gaul commenced (68 AD), but it was soon quelled by Verginius Rufus on account of its national Gaulic character. Galba of Hither Spain next declared himself legatus of the senate and the Rom people. N. was persuaded to return to Rome by Helius; he confiscated Galba's property, but his weakness and hesitancy greatly helped the cause of the latter.

Nymphidius Sabinus, one of the prefects, won over the guard for Galba, by persuading the irresolute emperor to withdraw from Rome

8. Death of Nero and then told the praetorians that N. had deserted them. N. was a coward, both in life and in death. While he had the means of easily crushing Galba, he was revolving plans of despair in his Servilian gardens, whether he should surrender himself to the mercies of the Parthians or to those of Galba; whether Galba would allow him the province of Egypt; whether the public would forgive his past if he showed penitence enough. In his distraction a comforter asked him in the words of Virgil, "Is it then so wretched to die?" He could not summon the courage for suicide, nor could he find one to inflict the blow for him: "Have I then neither friend nor foe?" Phaon a freedman offered him the shelter of his villa a few miles from Rome. Here he prepared for suicide, but with great cowardice. He kept exclaiming, "What an artist I am to perish!" (Qualis artifex pereo, Suet. xlix). On learning that he was condemned to a cruel death by the senate, he put the weapon to his throat and was assisted in the fatal blow by Epaphroditus his secretary. A centurion entered pretending he had come to help: "Too late—this is fidelity," were Nero's last words. His remains were laid in the family vault of the Domitii by his two nurses Ecloga and Alexandria and his concubine Acte (Suet. l). Thus perished on July 9, 68 AD the last of the line of Julius Caesar in his 31st year and in the 14th of his reign.

IV. Downfall and Character.—The causes of his downfall were briefly: (1) his lavish expenditure leading to

1. Seven Causes of Downfall burdensome taxation and financial insecurity; (2) tyranny and cruelty of his favorites; (3) the great fire which brought dissatisfaction to fasten suspicion on N. and the consequent enlargement of his private abode at the expense of the city—esp. the Golden House; (4) the unpopular measure of the extension of Rom franchise to Greece and favored foreigners; (5) the security engendered by the success with which the conspiracy of Piso was crushed; (6) the discovery of another "secret of empire," that an emperor could be created elsewhere than at Rome, that the succession of emperors was not hereditary but rested with the great armies, and (7) the cowardice and weakness which N. displayed in the revolt which led to his death.

His reign is memorable for the activity of Seneca, the great fire, the persecution of Christians, the beginning of the bankruptcy of the later Rom empire, the Armenian disaster of Paetus (62 AD) retrieved by Corbulo and the humiliation of Parthia, the outbreak of the insurrection in Judaea (66 AD), which ended in the destruction of Jerus.

Nero ranks with Gaius for folly and vice, while his cruelties recall the worst years of Tiberius. Very effeminate in his tastes, particularly about the

2. Character arrangement of his hair and proud of his voice, his greatest fault was inordinate vanity which courted applause for performances on non-Rom lines. He neglected his high office and degraded Rom gravitas by zeal for secondary pursuits. N., like his three predecessors, was very susceptible to female charms. He was licentious in the extreme, even to guilt of that nameless vice of antiquity—love of a male favorite. His cruelty, both directly and through his instruments, made the latter part of his reign as detestable as the quinquennium had been golden. He loved the extravagant and luxurious in every exaggerated form. He was a weakling and a coward in his life, and esp. in his death. Of his personal appearance we are told his features were regular and good; the expression of his countenance, however, was somewhat repelling. His frame was ill proportioned—slender legs and big stomach. In later years his face was covered with pimples.

V. "Nero Redivivus."—It seems as if there was something lovable even about this monster, which led a freedman to remain faithful to the last, and his two old nurses and cast-off concubine to care affectionately for his remains, and for a long time there were not wanting hands to strew his grave with spring and autumn flowers and to display his effigy (Suet. lvi). But, whether from the strange circumstances of his death, or the subsequent terrible confusion in the Rom world, or from whatever cause, there soon arose a belief that N. had not really died, but was living somewhere in retirement or had fled among the Parthians, and that he was destined in a short time to return and bring great calamity upon his enemies or the world (quasi vivens et brevi magno inimicorum malo reversuri: Suet. lvii). This belief was a force among the Parthians who were ready to take up arms at the report of a pseudo-Nero (Tac. Hist. 1.2). In the confusion of the year of the four emperors, Greece and Asia were disturbed by the report of the advent of N. (Tac. Hist. ii. 8), and the historian promises to mention the fortune and attempts of other pseudo-Neros. This belief was taken up by the Jews and amalgamated with their legend of Antichrist. In Asc Isa 4 (1st cent. AD), the Antichrist is clearly identified with N.: "Belial shall appear in the shape of a man, the king of wickedness, the matricide." It occurs again and again in both the Jewish and Christian sections of the Sib Or (3 66 ff; 4 117 f. 135 ff; 5 100 f. 136 f. 216 f.). How far N. was regarded by the Christians as the historical personage of Antichrist is a disputed point. That the common belief of the revival or advent of N. should influence contemporary Christian thought in days of social and political turmoil is highly probable. Bousset (Comm.) regards the beast of Rev 13 as Rome, and the smitten head whose "deathstroke was healed" as N., and some scholars take Rev 17 10 f as referring to N. The "scarlet-colored beast" of 17 3 may be intended either for the Rom government in general or for N. in particular. That the number 666 (Rev 13 18) represents in Heb letters the numerical equivalent of Neron Kesar is significant, for the Jewish Christians would be familiar with gematriyā (the numerical equivalent of names). See NUMBER. Cf Farrar, Early Days, ch xxviii, sec. 5. In later times the idea of a twofold Antichrist seems to have arisen—one for the Jews and one for the Gentiles; cf esp. Commodian, Carm. Apol. (926): "to us N. became Antichrist, to the Jews the other" (nobis Nero factus Antichristus, ille Judaeis). There was an alternate theory that N. had really been killed, but that he would rise again (Sib Or 5 216 f; Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xx.19: unde nonnulli ipsum resurrectionem et futurum Antichristum suspiciuntur).

VI. Nero and Christianity.—The name Nero does not occur in the NT, but he was the Caesar to whom Paul appealed (Acts 25 11)

1. Nero and at whose tribunal Paul was tried the NT after his first imprisonment. It is quite likely that N. heard Paul's case in person, for the emperor showed much interest in provincial cases. It was during the earlier "golden quinquennium" of N.'s reign that Paul addressed his ep. to the Christians at Rome, and probably in the last year of N.'s reign (68 AD) Paul suffered death near the city, though Harnack (Chronologie) places his death in the first Neronian persecution of 64. Although the NT gives no hint of a possible visit or sojourn of Peter in Rome, such a sojourn and subsequent martyrdom are highly probable and almost certain from the early persistent tradition, esp. in Clement of Rome, Ignatius and Papias, and later in Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and the Liber Pontificalis (catalogue of popes). His execution at Rome under Nero is practically certain.

The first persecution to which Christianity was subjected came from the Jews: the first heathen persecution took place under N. Up to this time the Rom government had been on friendly terms with Christianity, as Christianity was either not prominent enough to cause any disturbance of society or was con-

2. Neronian Policy and Christianity

founded by the Romans with Judaism (sub umbraculo licitae Judaeorum religionis: Tert. Apol., xxi). Paul, writing to the Christians of the capital, urged them to "be in subjection to the higher powers" as "ordained of God" (Rom 13 1ff), and his high estimation of the Rom government as power for the good of society was probably enhanced by his mild captivity at Rome which permitted him to carry on the work of preaching and was terminated by an acquittal on the first trial (accepting the view of a first acquittal and subsequent activity before condemnation at a second trial). But soon, whether because of the trial of Paul, a Rom citizen, at Rome (about 63), or the growing hostility of the Jews, or the increasing numbers and alarming progress of the new religion, the distinction between Christianity and Judaism became apparent to the Rom authorities. If it had not yet been proscribed as a religio illicita ("unlicensed religion"), neither had it been admitted as a religio licita. Christianity was not in itself as yet a crime; its adherents were not liable to persecution "for the name." According to one view the Neronian persecution was a spasmodic act and an isolated incident in imperial policy: the Christians were on this occasion put forward merely to remove suspicion from N. They were not persecuted either as Christians or as incendiaries, but on account of flagitia and odium humani generis, i.e. Thyestean feasts, Oedipodean incest and nightly orgies were attributed to them, and their withdrawal from society and exclusive manners caused the charge of "hatred for society." The evidence of Tacitus (Ann. xv.44) would bear out this view of the Neronian persecution as accidental, isolated, to satisfy the revenge of the mob, confined to Rome and of brief duration. The other view is, however, preferable, as represented by Ramsay (Church in the Rom Empire, ch xi) and E. G. Hardy (Studies in Rom History, ch iv). Suetonius speaks of the persecution of Christians as a permanent police regulation in a list of other seemingly permanent measures (Nero xvi: afflicti supplicis Christiani genus hominum superstitionis novae ac maleficae), which is not inconsistent with the account of Tacitus—who gives the initial step and Suetonius the permanent result. The Christians by these trials, though not convicted of incendiarism, were brought into considerable prominence; their unsocial and exclusive manners, their withdrawal from the duties of state, their active proselytism, together with the charges of immorality, established them in Rom eyes as the enemies of society. Christianity thus became a crime and was banned by the police authorities. Suetonius gives a "brief statement of the permanent administrative principle into which N.'s action ultimately resolved itself" (Ramsay, op. cit., 232). No formal law needed to be passed, the matter could be left with the praefect of the city. A trial must be held and the flagitia proved before an order for execution, according to Ramsay, but Hardy holds that henceforth the name itself—nomen ipsum—was proscribed. A precedent was now established of great importance in the policy of the imperial government toward Christianity (see, further, ROMAN EMPIRE; CHRISTIANITY). There is no reason to suppose that the Neronian persecution of 64 extended beyond Rome to the provinces, though no doubt the attitude of the home government must have had considerable influence with provincial officers. Paul seems to have gone undisturbed, or at least with no unusual obstacles, in his evangelization after his acquittal. The authorities for a general Neronian persecution and formal Neronian laws against Christianity are late; cf Orosius (Hist. vii.7, "[Nero] was the first to put to death Christians at Rome and gave orders that they should be subjected to the same persecution throughout all the provinces").

NEST (ἵδ, kēn; νεοσιᾶ, neossiā, nossiā; in the NT κατασκήνωσις, kataskēnōsis; Lat nidus): A receptacle prepared by a bird for receiving its eggs and young. Nests differ with species. Eagles use a large heap of coarse sticks and twigs on the cleft of a mountain (Job 39 27 ff; Jer 49 16; Ob ver 4); hawks prefer trees; vultures, hollow trees or the earth; ravens, big trees; doves and pigeons, trees or rocky crevices (Jer 48 28); hoopoes, hollow trees; swallows, mud nests under a roof, on cliffs or deserted temples; owls, hollow trees, dark places in ruins or sand burrows (on the kippōz of Isa 34 15 see OWL); cranes, storks and herons, either trees (Ps 104 17) or rushes beside water (storks often choose housetops, as well).

Each nest so follows the building laws of its owner's species that any expert ornithologist can tell from a nest which bird built it. Early in incubation a bird deserts a nest readily because it hopes to build another in a place not so easily discoverable and where it can deposit more eggs. When the young have progressed until their quickening is perceptible through the thin shells pressed against the breast of the mother, she develops a boldness called by scientists the "brooding fever." In this state the wildest of birds frequently will suffer your touch before deserting the nest. Esp. is this the case if the young are just on the point of emerging. The first Bib. reference to the nest of a bird will be found in Balaam's fourth prophecy in Nu 24 21: "And he looked on the Kenite, and took up his parable and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thy nest is set in the rock." Here Balaam was thinking of the nest of an eagle, hawk or vulture, placed on solid rock among impregnable crags of mountain tops. The next reference is among the laws for personal conduct in Dt 22 6: "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way, in any tree or on the ground, with young ones or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young." Beyond question this is the earliest law on record for the protection of a brooding bird. It is probable that it was made permissible to take the young, as the law demanding their use, at least in the case of pigeons and doves, for sacrifice. In 29 18, Job cries,

"Then I said, I shall die in my nest,
And I shall multiply my days as the sand."

that is, he hoped in his days of prosperity to die in the home he had builded for his wife and children. In Ps 84 3 David sings,

"Yea, the sparrow hath found her a house,
And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young,
Even thine altars, O Jeh of hosts,
My King, and my God."

These lines are rich and ripe with meaning, for in those days all the world protected a temple nest, even to the infliction of the death penalty on anyone interfering with it. This was because the bird was supposed to be claiming the protection of the gods. Hebrew, Arab and Egyptian guarded all nests on places of worship. Pagan Rome executed the shoemaker who killed a raven that built on a temple, and Athens took the same revenge on the man who destroyed the nest of a swallow. Isaiah compared the destruction of Assyria to the robbing of a bird's nest: "And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the peoples; and as one gathereth eggs that are forsaken, have I gathered all the earth: and there was none that moved the wing, or that opened the mouth, or chirped" (Isa 10 14; cf 16 2). Matthew quotes Jesus as having said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head" (Mt 8 20=Lk 9 58). GENE STRATTON-PORTER

NETAIM, nē'ta-im, nē'ta-im, nē-tā'im (נְטַאִים, nē'tā'im; B, 'Aḡaḡa, Azaeim, A, 'Araḡa, Azaeim): In 1 Ch 4 23 AV reads "those that dwell among plants and hedges," RV "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah." The latter may be taken as correct. Gederah was in the Judean Shephelah. Here also we should seek for Netaim; but no likely identification has yet been suggested.

NETHANEL, nē-than'el, neth'a-nel (נֶתְנָאֵל, nē'than'el, "God has given"; Naḡavaḡa, Nathanael; AV Nethaneel, nē-than'el):

(1) A chief or prince of Issachar (Nu 1 8; 2 5; 7 18.23; 10 15).

(2) The 4th son of Jesse (1 Ch 2 14).

(3) One of the trumpet-blowers before the ark when it was brought up from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15 24).

(4) A Levite scribe, the father of Shemaiah (1 Ch 24 6).

(5) The 5th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4).

(6) One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 7).

(7) A Levite who gave cattle for Josiah's Pass-over (2 Ch 35 9).

(8) One of the priests who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 22; cf 1 Esd 9 22).

(9) A priest registered under the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12 21).

(10) A Levite musician who assisted at the dedication of the walls (Neh 12 36). JOHN A. LEES

NETHANIAH, neth-a-nī'a (נֶתְנִיָּה, nē'thanyāhū, "Jeh has given"; Naḡavias, Nathanas):

(1) An Asaphite musician (1 Ch 25 2.12).

(2) A Levite who accompanied the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 8).

(3) The father of Jehudi (Jer 36 14).

(4) The father of Ishmael, the murderer of Gedaliah (Jer 40 8.14.15; 41, 11 t; 2 K 25 23.25). Some MSS of LXX read here Mathanias.

NETHINIM, neth'i-nim (נֶתְיִימִים, nē'thinīm, "given"; Naḡeivēim, Natheineim; AV Nethinims):

A group of temple-servants (1 Ch 9 1. Meaning 2 and 16 t in Ezr and Neh). The word has always the article, and does not occur in the sing. The LXX translators usually transliterate, but in one passage (1 Ch 9 2) they render, "the given ones" (hoi dedomenoi). The Syr (Pesh) also, in Ezr, Neh, transliterates the word, but in 1 Ch 9 2 renders it by a word meaning "sojourners." The meaning "given" is suggestive of a state of servitude, and Jos seems to confirm the suggestion by calling the N. "temple-slaves" (hierodouloi) (Ant, XI, v, 1). It should, however, be noted that another form of this word is employed in the directions regarding the Levites: "Thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him on behalf of the children of Israel" (Nu 3 9; cf also 8 16.19).

Of the history of the N. in earlier times there are but few and uncertain traces. When Joshua discovered that he had been beguiled

by the Gibeonites into a covenant to let them live, he reduced their tribe to servitude, and declared, "Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall never fail to be of you bondmen, both hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God" (Josh 9 23.27). It is no doubt tempting to see in the Gibeonites the earliest N., but another tradition traces their origin to a gift of David and the princes for the service of the Levites (Ezr 8 20). Their names, too, indicate diversity of origin; for besides being mostly un-Hebrew in aspect, some of them are found elsewhere in the OT as names of non-Israelitish tribes. The Meunim, for example (Ezr 2 50=Neh 7 52), are in all likelihood descended from the Meonites or Maonites who are mentioned as harassing Israel (Jgs 10 12), as in conflict with the Simeonites (1 Ch 4 41), and as finally overcome by Uzziah (2 Ch 26 7). The next name in the lists is that of the children of Nephisim. These may be traced to the Hagrite clan of Naphish (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 5 19). In both Ezr and Neh, the list is immediately followed by that of the servants of Solomon, whose duties were similar to, it may be even humbler than, those of the N. These servants of Solomon appear to be descendants of the Canaanites whom Solomon employed in the building of his temple (1 K 5 15). All these indications are perhaps slight; but they point in the same direction, and warrant the assumption that the N. were originally foreign slaves, mostly prisoners of war, who had from time to time been given to the temple by the kings and princes of the nation, and that to them were assigned the lower menial duties of the house of God.

At the time of the return from the exile the N. had come to be regarded as important. Their number was considerable: 392 accompanied Zerubbabel at the first Return in 538 BC (Ezr 2 58=Neh 7 60).

3. Post-exilic History When Ezra, some 80 years later, organized the second Return, he secured a contingent of N. numbering 220 (Ezr 8 20). In Jerus they enjoyed the same privileges and immunities as the other religious orders, being included by Artaxerxes' letter to Ezra among those who should be exempt from toll, custom and tribute (Ezr 7 24). A part of the city in Ophel, opposite the Water-gate, was assigned them as an official residence (Neh 3 26.31), and the situation is certainly appropriate if their duties at all resembled those of the Gibeonites (see Ryle, "Ezra and Nehemiah," in Cambridge Bible, Intro, 57). They were also organized into a kind of guild under their own leaders or presidents (Neh 11 21).

The N. are not again mentioned in Scripture. It is probable that they, with the singers and porters, became gradually incorporated in the general body of Levites; their name passed ere long into a tradition, and became at a later time a butt for the scorn and bitterness of the Talmudic writers against everything that they regarded as un-Jewish.

NETOPHAH, nê-tô'fa (נֶטֶפָח, nê'tôphāh; LXX Νετωφά, Netôphá, Νεφωτά, Nephōtá, and other variants): The birthplace of two of David's heroes, Maharai and Heleb (2 S 23 28,29), also of Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, one of the captains who came to offer allegiance to Gedaliah (2 K 25 23; Jer 40 8). "The villages of the Netophathites" are mentioned (1 Ch 9 16) as the dwellings of certain Levites and (Neh 12 28, AV "Netophathi") of certain "sons of the singers."

The first mention of the place itself is in Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26; 1 Esd 5 18 (RV "Netophas"), where we have lists of the exiles returning from Babylon under Zerubbabel; the place is mentioned between Bethlehem and Anathoth and in literary association with other cities in the mountains of Judah, e.g. Gibeon, Kiriath-jearim, Chephereh and Beeroth. In this respect it is most plausible to identify it with ΝΕΠΤΟΑΗ (q.v.), although the disappearance of the terminal guttural in the latter creates a difficulty. Conder has suggested a site known as Kh. Umm-Toba, N.E. of Bethlehem, an ancient site, but not apparently of great importance. Beit Nettif, an important village on a lofty site in the Shephelah near the "Vale of Elah," also appears to have an echo of the name, and indeed may well be the Beth Netophah of the Mish (Sh'bhū'ōth, ix.5; Neubauer, Géogr., 128), but the position does not seem to agree at all with that of the OT Netophah. For Kh. Umm-Toba see PEF, III, 128; for Beit Nettif, PEF, III, 24; RBE, II, 17; both Sh XVII.

NETOPHAS, nê-tô'fas (B, Netēbas, Netēbas, A, Νετωφά, Netôphā): A town named in 1 Esd 5 18, identical with "Netophah" of Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26.

NETOPHATHI, nê-tof'a-thī, NETOPHATHITES, nê-tof'a-thīts. See NETOPHAH.

NETTLES, net'lz: (1) נֶטְרֵל, hārūl (Job 30 7; Prov 24 31; Zeph 2 9 m, in all, "wild vetches"); the tr "nettles" is due to the supposed derivations of hārūl from an (obs.) נֶטְרֵל, hārāl, meaning "to be sharp" or "stinging," but a tr "thorns" (as in Vulg) would in that case do as well. LXX has φρύγανα ἄγρια, phrūgana āgria, "wild brushwood," in Job, and certainly the association with the "saltwort" and the reim, "broom," in the passage would best be met by the supposition that it means the low thorny bushes plentiful in association with these plants. "Vetch" is suggested by the Aram., but is very uncertain. (2) קִמּוֹשׁ, kimmōsh (Isa 34 13; Hos 9 6), and pl. קִמּוֹשִׁים, kimmōshōnīm (Prov 24 31), tr^d (EV) "thorns," because of the tr of hārūl as "nettles" in the same ver. From Isa 34 13 kimmōsh is apparently distinct from thorns, and the tr "nettle" is very probable, as such neglected or deserted places as described in the three references readily become overgrown with nettles in Pal. The common and characteristic Pal nettle is the Urtica pilulifera, so called from the globular heads of its flowers.

NETWORK, net'wŭrk (שֶׁבַחָה, shēbhākāh): RV in 2 K 25 17; 2 Ch 4 13 (also in pl., vs 12,13), for "wreathen work" and "wreath" in AV (of the adornment of the capitals of the pillars of Solomon's temple; see JACHIN AND BOAZ). "Networks" in Isa 19 9 is in RV correctly rendered "white cloth." In ARV "network" is substituted for "pictures" in AV (Prov 25 11), "baskets" in ERV, m "filigree work."

NEW, nū, NEWNESS, nū'nes (חֲדָשׁ, hādhash; kainós, kainós, víos, néos):

The word commonly tr^d "new" in the OT is hādhash, "bright," "fresh," "new" (special interest was shown in, and importance attached to, fresh and new things and events); Ex 1 8; Dt 20 5; 22 8; 24 5; 1 S 6 7; 2 S 21 16; Ps 33 3, "a new song"; Jer 31 31, "new covenant"; Ezk 11 19, "a new spirit"; 18 31, "new heart"; 36 26, etc; hōdhash is "the new moon," "the new-moon day," the first of the lunar month, a festival, then "month" (Gen 29 14, "a month of days"); it occurs frequently, often tr^d "month"; we have "new moon" (1 S 20 5,18,24, etc); tīrōsh is "new [sweet] wine" (Neh 10 39; in Joel 1 5; 3 18, it is āsīs, RV "sweet wine"); in Acts 2 13, "new wine" is gleukos.

Other words in the OT for "new" are hādhash, Aram. (Ezr 6 4); tāri, "fresh" (Jgs 15 15, RV "a fresh jaw-bone of an ass"); berī'ah, a "creation" (Nu 16 30, "if Jeh make a new thing, RVm "create a creation"); bākhār, "to be first-fruits" (Ezk 47 12; so RVm); kām, "setting," is tr^d "newly" (Jgs 7 19); also mik-kārōbh, "recently" (Dt 32 17, RV "of late"); news is shemū'ah, "report," "tidings"; Prov 25 25, "good news from a far country."

In the NT "new" (mostly kainos, "new," "fresh," "newly made") is an important word. We have the title of the "New Testament" 2. In the itself, rightly given by ARV as "New NT Covenant," the designation of "the new dispensation" ushered in through Christ, the writings relating to which the volume contains. We have "new covenant" (kainos) in Lk 22 20, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (ERVm "testament"; in Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24, "new" is omitted in RV, but in Mt m "many ancient authorities insert new," and in Mk "some ancient authorities"); 1 Cor 11 25, ERVm "or testament"; 2 Cor 3 6, ERVm "or testament"; He 8 8, ERVm "or testament"; in ver 13, "covenant" is supplied (cf He 12 24, neos).

Corresponding to this, we have (2 Cor 5 17, AV and RV), "The old things have passed away; behold, they are become new"; 1b, "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature," RVm "there is a new creation"; Gal 6 15, m "or creation," "new man" (Eph 2 15; 4 24; Col 3 10 [neos]); "new commandment" (Jn 13 34); "new doctrine" (Acts 17 19); "new thing" (17 21); "newness of life" (kainōtēs) (Rom 6 4); "newness of the spirit" (7 6; cf 2 Cor 5 17); "a new name" (Rev 2 17; 3 12); "new heavens and a new earth" (2 Pet 3 13); "new Jerusalem" (Rev 3 12; 21 2); "new song" (Rev 5 9); cf "new friend" and "new wine" (Sir 9 10b,c); artēgēnnētos, "newborn" (1 Pet 2 2); prōsphatos, "newly slain," "new" (He 10 20, RV "a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh"; cf Sir 9 10a; Jth 4 3); "new" is the tr of neos, "new," "young" (1 Cor 5 7; Col 3 10, "new man"; He 12 24, "new covenant").

The difference in meaning between kainos and neos, is, in the main, that kainos denotes new in respect of quality, "the new as set over against that which has seen service, the outworn, the effete, or marred through age"; neos, "new [in respect of time], that which has recently come into existence," e.g. kainōn mnēmeion, the "new tomb" in which Jesus was laid, was not one recently made, but one in which no other dead had ever lain; the "new covenant," the "new man," etc, may be contemplated under both aspects of quality and of time (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, 209 f).

In Mt 9 16; Mk 2 21, agnaphos, "unsmoothed,"

"unfinished," is tr^d "new," "new cloth," RV "undressed." For "new bottles" (Lk 5 38 and ||'s), RV has "fresh wine-skins." W. L. WALKER

NEZIAH, nē-zī'a (נֶזִּיחַ, nēzī'h): The head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56), called in 1 Esd 5 32, "Nasi" (AV and RVm "Nasith").

NEZIB, nē'zib (נֶזִּיב, nēzīb; B, Ναεῖβ, Naeib, A, Νεσῖβ, Nesib): A town in the Judaeen Shephelah, mentioned along with Keilah and Mareshah (Josh 15 43). Onom places it 7 miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), on the road to Hebron. It is represented today by Beit Nasib, a village with ancient remains some 2 miles S.W. of Khirbet Kila (Keilah).

NIBHAZ, nib'haz (נִבְחָז, nibhaz): Given as the name of an idol of the Avvites, introduced by them into Samaria (2 K 17 31), but otherwise unknown. The text is supposed to be corrupt.

NIBSHAN, nib'shan (נִבְשָׁן, ha-nibhshān; B, Ναφλαζών, Naphlazōn, A, Νεβσάν, Nebsán): A city in the Judaeen wilderness named between Secacah and the City of Salt (Josh 15 62). Onom knows the place but gives no clue to its identification. The site has not been recovered. Wellhausen suggests the emendation of nibhshān to kibhshān, "furnace" (*Proleg.*², 344).

NICANOR, nī-kā'nor, nī'kā-nór (Νικάνωρ, Nīkánōr): The son of Patroclus and one of the king's "chief friends" (2 Macc 8 9), a Syrian general under Antiochus Epiphanes and Demetrius Soter. After the defeat of Seron by Judas, Epiphanes entrusted his chancellor Lysias with the reduction of Judaea (1 Macc 3 34 ff). Nicanor was one of the three generals commissioned by Lysias—the others being Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, and Gorgias (3 38). The campaign began in 166 BC; the Syrians were defeated at Emmaus (3 57 ff), while

Gorgias at a later stage gained a victory at Jamnia over a body of Jews who disobeyed Judas (5 58). The account given in 2 Macc differs considerably, both in omissions and in additions (2 Macc 8 9 ff). There Nicanor, not Gorgias, is the chief in command. The battle of Emmaus is not mentioned, but "the thrice-cursed Nicanor," having in overweening pride invited a thousand slave-dealers to accompany him to buy the Jewish captives, was humiliated, and his host was destroyed, he himself escaping "like a fugitive slave" to Antioch (2 Macc 8 34 f). After the death of Epiphanes, Eupator and Lysias (the last two at the hands of Demetrius [1 Macc 7 2]), Nicanor appears again under King Demetrius in the struggle between Alcimus and Judas. Alcimus, having been seated in the priesthood by Demetrius' officer Bacchides, could not hold it against Judas and the patriots. He appealed again to Demetrius, who this time selected Nicanor, now governor of Cyprus (2 Macc 12 2) and known for his deadly hatred of the Jews, to settle the dispute and slay Judas (14 12 ff; 1 Macc 7 26 ff). Nicanor was appointed governor of Judaea on this occasion. Again 1 and 2 Macc differ. According to 1 Macc, Nicanor sought in vain to seize Judas by treachery. Then followed the battle of Capharsalama ("village of peace"), in which the Syrians were defeated, though Jos (Ant., XII, x, 5) says Judas was defeated. Nicanor retired to Jerus, insulted the priests and threatened the destruction of the temple unless they delivered up Judas. He then retired to Beth-horon to find Judas posted opposite him at Adasa (1 Macc 7 39 ff), 3½ miles distant. Here on the 13th of the 12th month Adar (March), 161 BC, the Syrians sustained a crushing defeat, Nicanor himself being the first to fall. The Jews cut off his head and proud right hand and hanged them up beside Jerus. For a little while Adasa gave the land of Judah rest. The people ordained to keep this "day of great gladness" year by year—the 13th of Adar, "the day before the day of Mordecai" (Feast of Purim). 2 Macc mentions that Simon, Judas' brother, was worsted in a first engagement (14 17), omits the battle of Capharsalama, and represents Nicanor, struck with the manliness of the Jews, as entering into friendly relations with Judas, urging him to marry and lead a quiet life, forgetful of the king's command until Alcimus accused him to Demetrius. The latter peremptorily ordered Nicanor to bring Judas in all haste as prisoner to Antioch (14 27). The scene of the final conflict (Adasa) is given only as "in the region of Samaria" (15 1). According to this account, it was Judas who ordered the mutilation of Nicanor and in a more gruesome fashion (15 30 ff). It is possible that the Nicanor, the Cypriarch or governor of Cyprus of 2 Macc 12 2, is a different person from Nicanor, the son of Patroclus—a view not accepted in the above account. S. ANGUS

NICANOR (Νικάνωρ, Nīkánōr): One of "the seven" chosen to superintend "the daily ministration" of the poor of the Christian community at Jerus (Acts 6 5). The name is Gr.

NICODEMUS, nik-ō-dē'mus (Νικόδημος, Nīkódēmos): A Pharisee and a "ruler of the Jews," mentioned only by St. John. He (1) interviewed Christ at Jerus and was taught by Him the doctrine of the New Birth (Jn 3 1-15), (2) defended Him before the Sanhedrin (Jn 7 50-52), and (3) assisted at His burial (Jn 19 39-42).

This meeting, which it has been surmised took place in the house of St. John (Jn 3 1-15), was one of the results of Our Lord's ministry at Jerus during the first Passover (cf Jn 3 2 with Jn 2 23). Although N. had been thus won to believe in the Divine nature of Christ's mission, his faith was yet very incomplete in that he believed Him to be inspired only after the fashion of the OT prophets. To this faint-hearted faith corresponded his timidity of action, which displayed itself in his coming "by night," lest he should offend his colleagues in the Sanhedrin and the other hostile Jews (ver 2). In answer to the veiled question which the words of N. implied, and to convince him of the inadequacy of mere intellectual belief, Christ proclaimed to him the necessity for a spiritual regeneration: "Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (ver 3). This was interpreted by N. only in its materialistic sense, and therefore caused him bewilderment and confusion (ver 4). But Christ, as on another occasion when dealing with His questioners on a similar point of doctrine (cf Jn 6 52.53), answered his perplexity only by repeating His previous statement (ver 5). He then proceeded to give further explanation. The rebirth is not outward but inward, it is not of the body but of the soul (ver 6). Just as God is the real agent in the birth of the body, so also is He the Creator of the New Spirit; and just as no one knoweth whence cometh the wind, or "whither it goeth," yet all can feel its effects who come under its influence, so is it with the rebirth. Only those who have experienced it as a change in themselves, wrought by the Divine Power, are qualified to judge either of its reality or of its effects (vs 7.8). But N., since such experience had not yet been his, remained still unenlightened (ver 9). Christ therefore condemned such blindness in one who yet professed to be a teacher of spiritual things (ver 10), and emphasized the reality in His own life of those truths which He had been expounding (ver 11). With this, Christ returned to the problem underlying the first statement of N. If N. cannot believe in "earthly things," i.e. in the New Birth, which, though coming from above, is yet realized in this world, how can he hope to understand "heavenly things," i.e. the deeper mysteries of God's purpose in sending Christ into the world (ver 12), of Christ's Divine sonship (ver 13), of His relationship to the atonement and the salvation of man (ver 14), and of how a living acceptance of and feeding upon Him is in itself Divine life (ver 15; cf Jn 6 25-65)?

1. The Interview

The above interview, though apparently fruitless at the time, was not without its effect upon N. At the Feast of Tabernacles, when the Sanhedrin was enraged at Christ's proclamation of Himself as the "living water" (Jn 7 37.38), N. was emboldened to stand up in His defence. Yet here also he showed his natural timidity. He made no personal testimony of his faith in Christ, but sought rather to defend Him on a point of Jewish law (Jn 7 50-52; cf Ex 23 1; Dt 1 16.17; 17 6; 19 15).

By this open act of reverence N. at last made public profession of his being of the following of Christ. His wealth enabled him to provide the "mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds," with which the body of Jesus was embalmed (Jn 19 39 ff.).

3. The Burial

The Gospel of Nicodemus and other apocryphal works narrate that N. gave evidence in favor of Christ at the trial before Pilate, that he was deprived of office and banished from Jerus by the hostile Jews, and that he was baptized by St. Peter and St. John. His remains were said to have been found in a common grave along with those of Gamaliel and St. Stephen.

Nicodemus is a type of the "well-instructed and thoughtful Jew who looked for the consummation of national hope to follow in the line along which he had himself gone, as being a continuation and not a new beginning" (Westcott). The manner in which the Gospel narrative traces the overcoming of his natural timidity and reluctant faith is in itself a beautiful illustration of the working of the Spirit, of how belief in the Son of Man is in truth a new birth, and the entrance into eternal life.

NICOLAITANS, nik-ō-lā'i-tanz (Νικολαῖται, Nikolaítai): A sect or party of evil influence in early Christianity, esp. in the 7

1. The Sect churches of Asia. Their doctrine was similar to that of Balaam, "who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication" (Rev 2 14.15). Their practices were strongly condemned by St. John, who praised the church in Ephesus for "hating their works" (Rev 2 6), and blamed the church in Pergamum for accepting in some measure their teaching (Rev 2 15). Except that reference is probably made to their influence in the church at Thyatira also, where their leader was "the woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess" (Rev 2 20; cf ver 14), no further direct information regarding them is given in Scripture.

Reference to them is frequent in post-apostolic literature. According to Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., i. 26.3; iii.10.7), followed by Hippolytus

2. References (Philos., vii.36), they were founded by Nicolaüs, the proselyte of Antioch, who was one of the seven chosen to serve at the tables (Acts 6 5). Irenaeus, as also Clement of Alexandria (Strom., ii.20), Tertullian and others, unite in condemning their practices in terms similar to those of St. John; and reference is also made to their gnostic tendencies. In explanation of the apparent incongruity of such an immoral sect being founded by one of "good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom" (cf Acts 6 3), Simcox argues that their lapse may have been due to reaction from original principles of a too rigid ascetism. A theory, started in comparatively modern times, and based in part on the similarity of meaning of the Gr "Nikolaüs," and the Heb "Balaam," puts forward the view that the two sects referred to under these names were in reality identical. Yet if this were so, it would not have been necessary for St. John to designate them separately.

The problem underlying the Nicolaitan controversy, though so little direct mention is made of it in Scripture, was in reality most im-

3. Nicolaitan Controversy portant, and concerned the whole relation of Christianity to paganism and its usages. The Nicolaitans disobeyed the command issued to the gentile churches, by the apostolic council held at Jerus in 49-50 AD, that they should refrain from the eating of "things sacrificed to idols" (Acts 15 29). Such a restriction, though seemingly hard, in that it prevented the Christian communities from joining in public festivals, and so brought upon them suspicion and dislike, was yet necessary to prevent a return to a pagan laxity of morals. To this danger the Nicolaitans were themselves a glaring witness, and therefore St. John was justified in condemning them. In writing to the Corinthians, St. Paul gives warning against the same evil practices, basing his arguments on consideration for the weaker brethren (cf 1 Cor 8).

NICOLAÛS, nik-ō-lā'us (EV), NICOLAS, nik-ō-las (Νικόλαος, Nikólaos): One of "the seven" chosen to have the oversight of "the daily ministration" to the poor of the church in Jerus (Acts 6 5). He is called "a proselyte of Antioch"; the other 6 were therefore probably Jews by birth. This is the first recorded case of the admission of a proselyte into office in the Christian church. Some of the church Fathers (Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Pseudo-Tertullian) state that he was the founder of the sect called NICOLAITANS (q.v.) (Rev 2 15). Other Fathers seem to suggest that this was a vain claim made by this sect in seeking apostolic authority for their opinions. It may be that the opinions of this sect were an antinomian exaggeration of the preaching of Nicolaüs. S. F. HUNTER

NICOPOLIS, ni-kop'ō-lis (Νικόπολις, Nikópolis): A city in Pal, half-way between Jaffa and Jerus, now called Amnās, mentioned in 1 Macc 3 40.57 and 9 50. The earlier city (Emmaus) was burnt by Quintilius Varus, but was rebuilt in 223 AD as Nicopolis.

The Nicopolis, however, to which Paul urges Titus to come (πρός με εἰς Νικόπολιν, ἐκεῖ γάρ κέρκερα παραχειμάσαι, prós me eis Nikópolin, ekei gár kékrika paracheimásai [Tit 3 12]) is probably the city of that name situated on the southwest promontory of Epirus. If this view is correct, the statement made by some writers that from Eastern Greece (Athens, Thessalonica, Philippi, Corinth) Paul's labors extended to Italy, that he never visited Western Greece, requires modification. It is true that we do not hear of his preaching at Patras, Zacynthus, Cephallenia, Corcyra (the modern Corfu), which, as a way-station to and from Sicily, always held preëminence among the Ionian islands; but there can be little doubt that, if his plan of going to Nicopolis was carried out, he desired to evangelize the province of Epirus (as well as Acarnania) in Western Greece. Indeed, it was in this very city of Nicopolis, probably, that he was arrested and taken to Rome for trial—during one of the winters between 64–67 AD.

Nicopolis was situated only a few miles N. of the modern Prevesa, the chief city of Epirus today, the city which the Greeks bombarded in 1912 in the hope of wresting it from the Turks. The ancient city was founded by Augustus, whose camp happened to be pitched there the night before the famous fight with Antony (31 BC). The gulf, called Ambracia in ancient times, is now known as Arta. On the south side was Actium, where the battle was fought. Directly across, only half a mile distant, on the northern promontory, was the encampment of Augustus. To commemorate the victory over his antagonist, the Rom emperor built a city on the exact spot where his army had encamped ("Victory City"). On the hill now called Michalitz, on the site of his own tent, he built a temple to Neptune and instituted games in honor of Apollo, who was supposed to have helped him in the sea-fight. Nicopolis soon became the metropolis of Epirus, with an autonomous constitution, according to Gr custom. But in the time of the emperor Julian (362) the city had fallen into decay, at least in part. It was plundered by the Goths, restored by Justinian, and finally disappeared entirely in the Middle Ages, so far as the records of history show. One document has Νικόπολις ἡ νῦν Πρέβεζα, Nikópolis hē nūn Prébeza, "N., which is now Prebeza." In the time of Augustus, however, Nicopolis was a flourishing town. The emperor concentrated here the population of Aetolia and Acarnania, and made the city a leading member of the Amphictyonic Council. There are considerable ruins of the ancient city, including two theaters, a stadium, an aqueduct, etc.

NIGHT, nīt (for the natural usage and the various terms, see DAY AND NIGHT):

Figurative uses: The word "night" (לַיְלָה, lay-lāh, or לַיִל, layil) is sometimes used fig. in the OT.

Thus Moses compares the brevity of time, the lapse of a thousand years, to "a watch in the night" (Ps 90 4).

Adversity is depicted by it in such places as Job 35 10; cf Isa 8 20; Jer 15 9. Disappointment and despair are apparently depicted by it in the "burden of Dumah" (Isa 21 11.12); and spiritual blindness, coming upon the false prophets (Mic 3 6); again sudden and overwhelming confusion (Am 5 8; Isa 59 10 AV, נֶשֶׁפֶּה, nesheph, "twilight" as in RV).

On the lips of Jesus (Jn 9 4) it signifies the end of opportunity to labor; repeated in that touching little allegory spoken to His disciples when He was called to the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11 9.10). Paul also uses the figure in reference to the Parousia

(Rom 13 12), where "night" seems to refer to the present aeon and "day" to the aeon to come. He also uses it in 1 Thess 5 5.7 where the status of the redeemed is depicted by "day," that of the unregenerate by "night," again, as the context shows, in reference to the Parousia. In Rev 21 25 and 22 5, the passing of the "night" indicates the realization of that to which the Parousia looked forward, the establishment of the kingdom of God forever. NIGHT-HAWK, nīt'hōk (תַּחֲמָשׁ, tahmās, "tachmas"; גְּלֹאֵץ, glauṣ, but sometimes strouthós, and seirēnos; Lat caprimulgus): The Heb tahmās means "to tear and scratch the face," so that it is very difficult to select the bird intended by its use. Any member of the eagle, vulture, owl or hawk families driven to desperation would "tear and scratch" with the claws and bite in self-defence. The bird is mentioned only in the lists of abominations (see Lev 11 16; Dt 14 15). There are three good reasons why the night-hawk or night-jar, more properly, was intended. The lists were sweeping and included almost every common bird unfit for food. Because of its peculiar characteristics it had been made the object of fable and superstition. It fed on wing at night and constantly uttered weird cries. Lastly, it was a fierce fighter when disturbed in brooding or raising its young. Its habit was to lie on its back and fight with beak and claw with such ferocity that it seemed very possible that it would "tear and scratch the face." Some commentators insist that the bird intended was an owl, but for the above reasons the night-jar seems most probable; also several members of the owl family were clearly indicated in the list. See HAWK.

NIGHT-MONSTER, nīt'mon-stēr (לַיְלִית, lāilith, LXX ὄνοκενταῦρος, onokentauros; Vulg lamia):

- I. THE ACCEPTED TRANSLATION
 1. Professor Rogers' Statement
 2. Exception to the Statement
- II. FOLKLORE IN THE OT
 1. Paucity of References
 2. References in Highly Poetical Passages
 3. The References Allusive
 4. Possibility of Non-mythological Interpretation
 5. The Term lāilith.

I. The Accepted Translation.—The term "night-monster" is a hypothetical tr of the Heb term לִילִית, lilith, used once only, in Isa 34 14. The word is tr^d in AV "screech-owl" m "night monster," RV "night-monster," m "Lilith." The term "night-monster" is also an interpretation, inasmuch as it implies that the Heb word is a Bab loan-word, and that the reference indicates a survival of primitive folklore.

Concerning this weird superstition, and its strange, single appearance in the Book of Isa, Professor Rogers has this to say: "The lil, or ghost, was a night-demon of terrible and baleful influence upon men, and Statement only to be cast out with many incantations. The lil was attended by a serving maid, the ardat lil ('maid of night'), which in the Sem development was transferred into the fem. lilithu. It is most curious and interesting to observe that this ghost-demon lived on through the history of the Bab religion, and was carried over into the Heb religion, there to find one single mention in the words of one of the Heb prophets" (Rel. of Assyria and Babylonia, 76, 77).

Exception is to be taken to this statement, admitting the etymological assumption upon which it rests, that "lilith" is a word in 2. Exception mythology, on the ground that the Statement conception of a night-demon has no place in the religion of the Hebrews as exhibited in the Scriptures. It is certainly worthy of more than passing notice that a conception which is very prominent in the Bab mythology, and is worked out with great fullness of doctrinal and ritualistic detail, has, among the Hebrews, so far receded into the background as to receive but one mention in the Bible, and that a bald citation without detail in a highly poetic passage.

The most that can possibly be said, with safety, is that if the passage in Isa is to be taken as a survival of folklore, it is analogous to those survivals of obsolete ideas still to be found in current speech, and in the lit. of the modern world (see LUNATIC). There is no evidence of active participation in this belief, or even of interest in it as such, on the part of the prophetic writer. On the contrary, the nature of the reference implies that the word was used simply to add a picturesque detail to a vivid, imaginative description. All positive evidence of Heb participation in this belief belongs to a later date (see Buxtorf's Lex., s.v. "Talmud").

II. Folklore in the OT.—Attention has been called elsewhere to the meagreness, in the matter of detail, of OT demonology (see DEMON, DEMONOLOGY; COMMUNION WITH DEMONS). A kindred fact of great importance should be briefly noticed here, namely, that the traces of mythology and popular folklore in the Bible are surprisingly faint and indistinct. We have the following set of items in which such traces have been discovered: "Rahab" (רָהַב, rāhāb), mentioned in Job 9 13; 26 12; Isa 51 9; "Tanin" (תַּנִּין, tannīn), Isa 27 1; "Leviathan" (לִוְיָתָן, livyāthān), Job 3 8; Ps 74 14; Isa 27 1; Ezk 29 3; Job 41 passim; the "serpent in the sea," in Am 9 3; "Seirim" (שְׂעִירִים, se'irim), 2 Ch 11 15; Lev 17 7; 2 K 23 8; Isa 13 21; 34 14; "Alukah" (אַלֻכָּה, ālūkāh), Prov 30 15; "Azazel" (עֲזָזֵל, āzā'zēl), Lev 16 8.10.26; "Lilith" (ut sup.), Isa 34 14.15.

A review of these passages brings certain very interesting facts to light.

The references are few in number. Rahab is mentioned 3 t; Tanin (in this connection), once; Leviathan, 5 t; the serpent in the

1. Paucity of sea, once; Seirim, 5 t (twice with reference to idols); Alukah, once; Azazel, 3 t in one ch and in the same connection; Lilith, once.

These references, with the single exception of Azazel to which we shall return a little later, are all in highly poetical passages. On general grounds of common-sense we should not ascribe conscious and deliberate mythology to writers or speakers of the Bible in passages marked by imaginative description and poetic imagery, any more than we should ascribe such beliefs to modern writers under like circumstances. Poetry is the realm of truth and not of matter of fact. In passages of this tenor, mythology may explain the word itself and justify its appropriateness, it does not explain the use of the term or disclose the personal view of the writer.

All these references are in the highest degree allusive. They exhibit no exercise of the mythological fancy and have received no embroidery with details. This is most significant. So far as our specific references are concerned, we are dealing with petrified mythology, useful as literary embellishment, but no longer interesting in itself.

Every one of these words is sufficiently obscure in origin and uncertain in meaning to admit the possibility of a non-mythological interpretation; indeed, in several of the parallels a non-mythological use is evident. Bible-Dict. writers are apt to say (e.g. concerning lilith) that there is no doubt concerning the mythological reference. The reader may discover for himself that the lexicographers are more cautious (see BDB, in loc.). The use of "Rahab" in Job 26 12 is not mythological for the simple reason that it is figurative; the use of "Leviathan" in Isa 27 1 and Ezk 29 3 comes under the same category. In Job 40 and 41, if the identification of behemoth and leviathan with hippopotamus and crocodile be allowed to stand and the mythological significance of the two be admitted, we have the stage where mythology has become a fixed and universal symbolism which can be used to convey truth apart from the belief in it as reality (see LEVIATHAN; "Job," New Cent. Bible, p. 335; Meth. Rev., May, 1913, 429 ff). The sea serpent of Am 9 3 is not necessarily the dragon or Tiamat, and the use of the term is merely suggestive. The term se'ir is in literal use for "he-goat" (Nu 15 24, et al.) and is doubtful throughout. Ewald translates it "he-goat" in Isa 34 14 and "Satyr" in 13 21. It means lit. "shaggy monster" (Vulg pilosus). We do not hesitate on the basis of the evidence to erase "Alukah" (Prov 30 15, RV "horse-leech," by some tr^d "vampire") and "Azazel" (Lev 16 8, etc), interpreted as a "demon of the desert," from the list of mythological words altogether. As ripe a scholar as Perowne ("Prov," Cambridge Bible) combats the idea of vampire, and Kellogg ("Lev," Expositor's Bible, in loc.) has simply put to rout the mythological-demonic interpretation of Azazel. Even in the case of lilith the derivation is obscure, and the objections urged against the demonic idea by Alexander have not altogether lost their force (see Comm. on Isa, in loc.). There is a close balance of probabilities in one direction or the other.

One further fact with regard to lilith must be considered. The term occurs in a list of creatures, the greater part of which are matter-of-fact animals or birds. A comparative glance at a half-dozen tr^a of the passage Isa 34 11-14 will convince any reader that there are a great many obscure and difficult words to be found in the list. Following Delitzsch's tr we have:

Term lilith "pelican," "hedge-hog," "horned-owl," "raven," "wild-dog," "ostrich," "forest-demon" (s^eir), "night-monster." This is a curious mixture of real and imaginary creatures. Alexander acutely observes that there is too much or too little mythology in the passage. One of two conclusions would seem to follow from a list so constructed: Either all these creatures are looked upon as more or less demonic (see Whitehouse, HDB, art.

"Demon," with which of W. M. The writer of Isa 34 14, who was not constructing a scientific treatise, but using his imagination, has constructed a list in which are combined real and imaginary creatures popularly supposed to inhabit unpeopled solitudes. There still remains a by no means untenable supposition that none of the terms necessarily are mythological in this particular passage.

NILE, nīl (Νεῖλος, Neilos, meaning not certainly known; perhaps refers to the color of the water, as

A river of North Africa, the great river of Egypt. The name employed in the OT to designate the Nile is in the Heb נַיִל, y'ōr, Egyp āūr, earlier, ātūr, usually tr^d "river," also occasionally "canals" (Ps 78 44; Ezk 29 3 ff). In a general way it means all the water of Egypt. The Nile is also the principal river included in the phrase נְהַרֵּי קִישׁ, nahārē kūsh, "rivers of Ethiopia" (Isa 18 1). Poetically the Nile is called יָם, yām, "sea" (Job 41 31; Nah 3 8; probably Isa 18 2), but this is not a name of the river. שִׁיחֹר, shihōr, not always written fully, has also been interpreted in a mistaken way of the Nile (see SHIHOR). Likewise נְהַר מִצְרַיִם, nahar miṣrayim, "brook of Egypt," a border stream in no way connected with the Nile, has sometimes been mistaken for that river. See RIVER OF EGYPT.

I. The Nile in Physical Geography.—The Nile is formed by the junction of the White Nile and the Blue Nile in lat. $15^{\circ} 45'$ N. and long. $32^{\circ} 45'$ E. The Blue N. rises in the highlands of Abyssinia, lat. $12^{\circ} 30'$ N., long. 35° E., and flows

1. Descrip- N.W. 850 miles to its junction with tion the White N. The White N., the principal branch of the N., rises in Victoria Nyanza, a great lake in Central Africa, a few miles N. of the equator, long. 33° E. (more exactly the N. may be said to rise at the headwaters of the Ragera River, a small stream on the other side of the lake, 3° S. of the equator), and flows N. in a tortuous channel, 1,400 miles to its junction with the Blue N. From this junction-point the N. flows N. through Nubia and Egypt 1,900 miles and empties into the Mediterranean Sea, in lat. 32° N., through 2 mouths, the Rosetta, E. of Alexandria, and the Damietta, W. of Port Said. There were formerly 7 mouths scattered along a coast-line of 140 miles.

The Nile originated in the Tertiary period and has continued from that time to this, though by the subsidence of the land 220 ft. along the Mediterranean shore in the Pluvial times, the river was very much shortened. Later in the Pluvial times the land rose again and is still rising slowly.

2. Geologi- the Mediterranean shore in the Pluvial times, the river was very much cal Origin shortened. Later in the Pluvial times the land rose again and is still rising slowly.

Cultivable Egypt is altogether the product of the N., every particle of the soil having been brought down by the river from the heart of the continent and deposited along the banks and esp. in the delta at the mouth of the river. The banks have risen higher and higher and extended farther and farther back by the deposit of the sediment, until the valley of arable land varies in width in most parts from 3 or 4 miles to 9 or 10 miles. The mouth of the river, after the last elevation of the land in Pluvial times, was at first not far from the lat. of Cairo. From this point northward the river has built up a delta of 140 miles on each side, over which it spreads itself and empties into the sea through its many mouths.

The watering of Egypt by the inundation from the N. is the most striking feature of the physical character of that land, and one of the most interesting and remarkable physical phenomena in the world.

4. The In- The inundation is produced by the combination of an indirect and a direct cause. The indirect cause is the rain and melting snow on the equatorial mountains in Central Africa, which maintains steadily a great volume of water in the White N. The direct cause is torrential rains in the highlands of Abyssinia which send down the Blue N. a sudden great increase in the volume of water. The inundation has two periods each year. The first begins about July 15 and continues until near the end of September. After a slight recession, the river again rises early in October in the great inundation. High Nile is in October, 25 to 30 ft., low Nile in June, about $12\frac{1}{2}$ ft. The Nilometer for recording the height of the water of inundation dates from very early times. Old Nilometers are found still in situ at Edfu and Assuan. The watering and fertilizing of the land is the immediate effect of the inundation; its ultimate result is that making of Egypt which is still in progress. The settling of the sediment from the water upon the land has raised the surface of the valley about 1 ft. in 300 to 400 years, about 9 to 10 ft. near Cairo since the beginning of the early great temples. The deposit varies greatly at other places. As the deposit of sediment has been upon the bottom of the river, as well as upon the surface of the land, though more slowly, on account of the swiftness of the current, the river also has been lifted up, and thus the inundation has extended farther and farther to the E., and the W., as the level of the valley would permit, depositing the sediment and thus making the cultivable land wider, as well as the soil deeper, year by year. At Heliopolis, a little N. of Cairo, this extension to the E. has been 3 to 4 miles since the building of the great temple there.

Cross-Section of Nilometer.

At Luxor, about 350 miles farther up the river, where the approach toward the mountains is much steeper, the extension of the good soil to the E. and the W. is inconsiderable.

The ancient Egyptians were right in calling all the waters of Egypt the N., for wherever water is

5. The obtained by digging it is simply the Infiltration N. percolating through the porous soil. This percolation is called the infiltration of the N. It always extends as far on either side of the N. as the level of the water in the river at the time will permit. This infiltration, next to the inundation, is the most important physical phenomenon in Egypt. By means of it much of the irrigation of the land during the dry season is carried on from wells. It has had its influence also in the political and religious changes of the country (cf below).

II. The Nile in History.—Some of the early temples were located near the N., probably because of the deification of the river.

1. The Lo- The rising of the cation of surface of the land, and at the same time of the bed of the river, from the inundation lifted both Egypt and its great river, but left the temples down at the old level. In time the infiltration of the river from its new higher level reached farther and farther and rose to a higher level until the floor of these old temples was under water even at the time of lowest N., and then gods and goddesses, priests and ceremonial all were driven out. At least two of the greatest temples and most sacred places, Heliopolis and Memphis, had to be abandoned. Probably this fact had as much to do with the downfall of Egypt's religion, as its political disasters and the actual destruction of its temples by eastern invaders. Nature's God had driven out the gods of Nature.

Some prehistoric burials are found on the higher ground, as at Kefr 'Amar. A thousand years of history would be quite sufficient to teach Egyptians that the N. was still making Egypt.

2. The Lo- Thenceforth, cemeteries were located at cation of the mountains on the eastern and the Cemeteries western boundaries of the valley. Here they continue to this day, for the most part still entirely above the waters of the inundation—and usually above the reach of the infiltration.

The widening of the cultivable land by means of long canals which carried the water from far up the river to levels higher than that of the inundation, farther down the river was practised from very early times. The substitution of dams for long canals was reserved for modern engineering skill. Three great dams have been made: the first a little N. of Cairo, the greatest at Assuan, and the last near Asyut.

Famines in Egypt are always due to failure in the quantity of the waters of inundation. Great famines have not been frequent. The cause of the failure in the water of inundation is now believed to be not so much a lack of the water of inundation from the

4. Famines Blue N. as the choking of the channel of the White N. in the great marsh land of the Sudan by the sud, a kind of sedge, sometimes becoming such a tangled mass as to close the channel and impede the flow of the regular volume of water so that the freshet in the Blue N. causes but little inundation at the usual time, and during the rest of the year the N. is so low from the same cause that good irrigation by canals and wells is impossible. A channel through the sud is now kept open by the Egypt government.

III. The Nile in Religion.—One of the gods of the Egypt pantheon was Hapi, the Nile. In early times it divided the honors with Ra, the

1. The Nile sun-god. No wonder it was so. If as a God the Egyptians set out to worship Nature-gods at all, surely then the sun and the Nile first.

The origin of the Osirian myth is still much discussed. Very much evidence, perhaps conclusive evidence, can be adduced to prove that it rose originally from the Nile; that in Osirian Osiris was first of all the N., then the water of the N., then the soil, the product of the waters of the N., and then Egypt, the N. and all that it produced.

Egypt was the Egyptian's little world, and Egypt was the Nile. It was thus quite natural for the Egyptians in considering the celestial

3. The Celestial Nile world to image it in likeness of their own world with a celestial Nile flowing through it. It is so represented in the mythology, but the conception of the heavens is vague. M. G. KYLE

NIMRAH, nim'ra (נִמְרָה, nimrah; B, Νάμβρα, Námbrā, A, Ἀμβράμ, Ambrám), or BETH-NIMRAH (בֵּית נִמְרָה, bēth nimrah; B, Ναμπράμ, Nambrám, A, Ἀμπράν, Ambrán [Nu 32 36], B, Βαιθαναβρά, Baihanabrā, A, Βηθανά, Bēthaná [Josh 13 27]): These two names evidently refer to the same place; but there is no reason to think, as some have done, from the similarity of the names, that it is identical with NIMRIM (q.v.). On the contrary, the indications of the passages cited point to a site E. of the Jordan valley and N. of the Dead Sea. About 11 miles N.E. of the mouth of the Jordan, where Wādy Nimrin, coming down from the eastern up-lands, enters the plain, stands a hill called Tell Nimrin, with tombs and certain traces of ancient building. This may be certainly identified with Nimrah and Beth-nimrah; and it corresponds to Bethnambris of Onom, which lay 5 Rom miles N. of Livias.

NIMRIM, nim'rim (נִמְרִים, mē nimrim; B, Νεβρίν, Nebreín, A, Ἐβρίμ, Ebrím [Jer 48 34], τὸ ὕδωρ τῆς Νιμρίμ, tó hūdōr tēs Nimreím [Isa 15 6]): The meaning appears to be "pure" or "whole-some water." The name occurs only in Isa 15 6 and Jer 48 34 in oracles against Moab. In each case it is mentioned in association with Zoar and Horonaim. It is therefore probably to be sought to the S.E. of the Dead Sea. Onom places a town, Bannamareim, to the N. of Zoar, and identifies it with the OT "Nimrim," as it seems, correctly. The name is still found in Wādy Numeirah, opening on the sea at Burj Numeirah, N. of Ghōr es-Sāfiyeh. The waters of Nimrim may be sought either in Moiyet Numeirah or in the spring higher up, where lie the ruins of a town in a well-watered and fruitful district (Buhl, GAP, 272).

NIMROD, nim'rod (נִמְרֹד, nimrōdh; Νεβρώδ, Nebrōd): A descendant of Ham, mentioned in "the generations of the sons of Noah" (Gen 10; cf 1 Ch 1 10) as a son of Cush. He established his kingdom "in the land of Shinar," including the cities "Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh" (ver 10), of which only Babel, or Babylon, and Erech, or Uruk, have been identified with certainty. "The land of Shinar" is the old name for Southern Babylonia, afterward called Chaldaea ('ereç kasdīm), and was probably more extensive in territory than the Šumer of the inscriptions in the ancient royal title, "King of Shumer and Accad," since Accad is included here in Shinar. Nimrod, like other great kings of Mesopotamian lands, was a mighty hunter, possibly the mightiest and the prototype of them all, since to his name had attached itself the proverb: "Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before Jeh" (ver 9). In the primitive days of Mesopotamia, as also in Pal, wild animals were so numerous that they became a menace to life and property (Ex 23 29; Lev 26 22); therefore the king as benefactor and protector of his people hunted these wild beasts. The early conquest of the cities of Babylonia, or their federation into one great kingdom, is here ascribed to Nimrod. Whether the founding and colonization of Assyria (ver 11) are to be ascribed to N. will be determined by the exegesis of the text. EV reads: "Out of that land he [i.e. Nimrod] went forth into Assyria, and builded Nineveh," etc, this tr assigning the rise of Assyria to N., and apparently being sustained by Mic 5 5.6 (cf J. M. P. Smith, "Micah," ICC, in loc.); but ARV^m renders: "Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh," which tr is more accurate exegetically and not in conflict with Mic 5 6, if in the latter "land of Nimrod" be understood, not as parallel with, but as supplemental to, Assyria, and therefore as Babylon (cf comms. of Cheyne, Pusey, S. Clark, in loc.).

N. has not been identified with any mythical hero or historic king of the inscriptions. Some have sought identification with Gilgamesh, the flood hero of Babylonia (Skinner, Driver, Delitzsch); others with a later Kassite king (Haupt, Hilprecht), which is quite unlikely; but the most admissible correspondence is with Marduk, chief god of Babylon, probably its historic founder, just as Asshur, the god of Assyria, appears in ver 11 as the founder of the Assyrian empire (Wellhausen, Price, Sayce). Lack of identification, however, does not necessarily indicate mythical origin of the name. See ASTRONOMY, II, 11; BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF, IV, 7; MERODACH; ORION. EDWARD MACK NIMSHI, nim'shī (נִמְשִׁי, nimshī): The grandfather of Jehu (2 K 9 2.14). Jehu's usual designation is "son of Nimshi" (1 K 19 16).

LITERATURE

I. Beginnings, Name, Position.—The first Bib. mention of Nineveh is in Gen 10 11, where it is stated that NIMROD (q.v.) or Asshur

1. First Biblical Mention went out into Assyria, and builded N. and Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, and Resen between N. and Calah, with the addition, "the same is the great city."

Everything indicates that these statements are correct, for N. was certainly at one time under Bab rule, and was at first not governed by Assyr kings, but by iššakē or viceroys of Aššur, the old capital. To all appearance N. took its name from the Bab Nina near Lagaš in South Babylonia, on the Euphrates, from which early foundation it was probably colonized. The native name appears as Ninua or Ninā (Nināa), written with the character for "water enclosure" with that for "fish"

2. Etymology of the Name Ninā and the Sem nūn, "fish." The Bab Nina was a place where fish were very abundant, and Ištar or Nina, the goddess of the city, was associated with Nin-mah, Merodach's spouse, as goddess of reproduction. Fish are also plentiful in the Tigris at Mosul, the modern town on the other side of the river, and this may have influenced the choice of the site by the Bab settlers, and the foundation there of the great temple of Ištar or Nina. The date of this foundation is unknown, but it may have taken place about 3000 BC.

N. lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, at the point where the Khosr falls into that stream. The outline of the wall is rectangular on the W., but of an irregular shape on the E. The western fortifications run from N.W. to S.E., following, roughly, the course of the river, which now flows about 1,500 yards from the walls, instead of close to them, as anciently.

II. Nineveh and Its Surroundings.—According to the late G. Smith, the southwestern wall has a length of about 2½ miles, and is joined at

1. Its Walls its western corner by the northwestern wall, which runs in a northeasterly direction for about 1½ miles. The northeastern wall, starting here, runs at first in a southeasterly direction, but turns southward, gradually approaching the southwestern wall, to which, at the end of about 3¼ miles, it is joined by a short wall, facing nearly S., rather more than half a mile long.

The principal mounds are Kouyunjik, a little N.E. of the village of 'Amusiye, and Nebi-Yunas, about 1,500 yards to the S.E. Both

2. Principal Mounds and Gateways of these lie just within the S.W. wall. Extensive remains of buildings occupy the fortified area. Numerous openings occur in the walls, many of them ancient, though some seem to have been made after the abandonment of the site. The principal gate on the N.W. was guarded by winged bulls (see Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, 2d series, pl. 3; Nineveh and Babylon, 120). Other gates gave access to the various commercial roads of the country, those on the E. passing through the curved outworks and the double line of fortifications which protected the northeastern wall from attack on that side, where the Ninevites evidently considered that they had most to fear.

According to G. Smith, the circuit of the inner wall is about 8 miles, and Captain Jones, who made a trigonometrical survey in 1854,

3. Extent and Population within the Walls estimated that, allotting to each inhabitant 50 sq. yards, the city may have contained 174,000 inhabitants. If the statement in Jon 4 11, that the city contained 120,000 persons who could not discern between their right hand and their left, be intended to give the number of the city's children only, then the population must have numbered about 600,000, and more than three cities of the same extent would have been needed to contain them. It has therefore been supposed—and that with great probability—that there was a large extension of the city outside its walls. This

4. Extent outside the Walls is not only indicated by Jon 3 3, where it is described as "an exceeding great city of three days' journey" to traverse, but also by the extant ruins, which stretch S.E. along the banks of the Tigris as far as Nimroud (Calah), while its northern extension may have been regarded as including Khorsabad.

Concerning the positions of two of the cities mentioned with N., namely, Calah and Resen, there can be no doubt, notwithstanding that

5. Calah, Resen and Rehoboth-Ir Resen has not yet been identified—Calah is the modern Nimroud, and Resen lay between that site and N.

The name Rehoboth-Ir has not yet been found in the inscriptions, but Fried. Delitzsch has suggested that it may be the rēbit Ninua of the inscriptions, N.E. of N. If this be the case, the N. of Jonah contained within it all the places in Gen 10 11,12, and Khorsabad besides.

Taking the outlying ruins from N. to S., we begin with Khorsabad (Dār-Šarru-kīn or Dār-Šargina),

6. Khorsabad 12 miles N.E. of Kouyunjik, the great palace mound of N. proper. Khorsabad is a great inclosure about 2,000 yards square, with the remains of towers and gateways. The palace mound lies on its northwest face, and consists of an extensive platform with the remains of Sargon's palace and its temple, with a ziggurat or temple-tower similar to those at Babylon, Borsippa, Calah and elsewhere. This last still shows traces of the tints symbolical of the 7 planets of which its stages were, seemingly, emblematic. The palace ruins show numerous halls, rooms and passages, many of which were faced with slabs of coarse alabaster, sculptured in relief with military operations, hunting-scenes, mythological figures, etc, while the principal entrances were flanked with the finest winged human-headed bulls which Assyr art has so far revealed. The palace was built about 712 BC, and was probably destroyed by fire when N. fell in 606 BC, sharing the same fate. Some of the slabs and winged bulls are in the Louvre and the British Museum, but most of the antiquarian spoils were lost in the Tigris by the sinking of the rafts upon which they were loaded after being discovered.

Another outlying suburb was probably Tarbiṣu, now represented by the ruins at Sherif Khan, about 3 miles N. of Kouyunjik. In this lay a temple—

7. Sherif Khan and Selamieh "palace." Sennacherib calls it—dedicated to Nergal. Anciently it must have been a place of some importance, as Esarhaddon seems to have built a palace there, as well as a "seat" for his eldest son, Aššur-bani-âpli. The site of Resen, "between N. and Calah," is thought to be the modern Selamteh, 12 miles S. of N., and 3 miles N. of Nimroud (Calah). It is in the form of an irregular inclosure on a high mound overlooking the Tigris, with a surface of about 400 acres.

No remains of buildings, sculptures or inscriptions have, however, been found there.

After N. itself (Kouyunjik), the ruins known as Nimroud, 14 or 15 miles S.E., are the most important. They mark the site of the ancient Calah, and have already been described under that heading (see p. 539). As there stated, the stone-faced temple-tower seems to be referred to by Ovid, and is apparently also mentioned by Xenophon (see RESEN). The general tendency of the accumulated references to these sites supports the theory that they were regarded as belonging to N., if not by the Assyrians themselves (who knew well the various municipal districts), at least by the foreigners who had either visited the city or had heard or read descriptions of it.

III. The Palaces at Nineveh Proper.—The palaces at N. were built upon extensive artificial platforms between 30 and 50 ft. high, either of sun-dried brick, as at Nimroud, or of earth and rubbish, as at Kouyunjik. It is thought that they were faced with masonry, and that access was gained to of Sennacherib seated on his "standing" throne, while the captives and the spoil of the city passed before him. The grand entrance was flanked by winged bulls facing toward the spectator as he entered. They were in couples, back to back, on each side of the doorway, and between each pair the ancient Bab hero-giant, carrying in one hand the "boomerang," and holding tightly with his left arm a struggling lion (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 137) was represented, just as at his father Sargon's palace at Khorsabad. The upper part of these imposing figures had been destroyed, but they were so massive, that the distinguished explorer attributed their overthrow not to the act of man, but to some convulsion of Nature.

In the north of the mound are the ruins of the palace of Aššur-banī-āpli or Assur-bani-pal, discovered by Hormuzd Rassam. His

2. The latest plan (Asshur and the Land of Palace of Nimrod, Cincinnati and New York, Aššur-banī-1897, plate facing p. 36) does not give the whole of the structure, much of the building having been destroyed; but the general arrangement of the rooms was upon the traditional lines. The slabs with which they were paneled showed bas-reliefs illustrating the

them by means of flights of deep steps, or sloping pathways. Naturally it is the plan of the basement floor alone that can at present be traced, any upper stories that may have existed having long since disappeared. The halls and rooms discovered were faced with slabs of alabaster or other stone, often sculptured with bas-reliefs depicting warlike expeditions, the chase, religious ceremonies and divine figures. The depth of the accumulations over these varies from a few inches to about 30 ft., and if the amount in some cases would seem to be excessive, it is thought that this may have been due either to the existence of upper chambers, or to the extra height of the room. The chambers, which are grouped around courtyards, are long and narrow, with small square rooms at the ends. The partition walls vary from 6 to 15 ft. in thickness, and are of sun-dried brick, against which the stone paneling was fixed. As in the case of the Bab temples and palaces, the rooms and halls open into each other, so that, to gain access to those farthest from the courtyard entrance, one or more halls or chambers had to be traversed. No traces of windows have been discovered, and little can therefore be said as to the method of lighting, but the windows were either high up, or light was admitted through openings in the roof.

The palace of Sennacherib lay in the southeast corner of the platform, and consisted of a courtyard surrounded on all four sides by which the innermost were capable of being rendered private. It was in this palace that were found the reliefs depicting the siege of Lachish, with the representation

Assyr campaigns against Babylonia, certain Arab tribes, and Elam. As far as they are preserved, the sculptures are wonderfully good, and the whole decorative scheme of the paneled walls, of which, probably, the greater part is forever lost, may be characterized, notwithstanding their defects of perspective and their mannerisms, as nothing less than magnificent. The lion-hunts of the great king, despite the curious treatment of the animals' manes (due to the sculptors' ignorance of the right way to represent hair) are admirable. It would be difficult to improve upon the expressions of fear, rage and suffering on the part of the animals there delineated. The small sculptures showing Aššur-banī-āpli hunting the goat and the wild ass are not less noteworthy, and are executed with great delicacy.

IV. Sennacherib's Description of Nineveh.—In all probability the best description of the city is that given by Sennacherib on the cylinder recording his expedition to Tarsus in Cilicia. From ancient times, he says, the circuit of the city had measured 9,300 cubits, and he makes the rather surprising statement that his predecessors had not built either the inner or the outer wall, which, if true, shows how confident they were of their security from attack. He claims to have enlarged the city by 12,515 (cubits). The great defensive wall which he built was called by the Sumerian name of Bad-im-gallab-lu-suku, which he translates as "the wall whose glory overthrows the enemy." He made the brickwork 40 (cubits) thick, which would probably not greatly exceed the estimate of G. Smith, who reckoned it to have measured about 50 ft. The height of the wall he raised to 180 tipki, which, admitting the estimate of Diodorus, should amount to about 100 ft.

1. The Walls

In this inclosing wall were 15 gates, which he enumerates in full. Three of these were situated in the short

2. The Gates—Northwest

Three of these were situated in the short northwest wall—the gate of Hadad; the gate of Uru or Hadad of Tarbisu (Sherif Khan), and the gate of the moon-god Nannar, Sennacherib's own deity. The plans show five openings in the wall on this side, any of which may have been the gate used when going to Tarbisu, but that adorned with winged bulls probably furnished the shortest route.

Halzi-gate; the gate of Šamaš of Gaḡal, the gate of the god Enlil of Kar-Ninlil, and the "covered gate," which seems to have had the reputation of letting forth the fever-demon. After this are mentioned the Šibaniba-gate, and the gate of Halah in Mesopotamia. This last must have been the extreme northeastern opening, now communicating with the road to Khorsabad, implying that Halah lay in that direction.

The gates on the west or river-side of the city were "the gate of Ea, director of my water-springs"; the quay-gate, "bringer of the tribute of my peoples";

4. The Gates—West

the gate of the land of Bari, within which the presents of the Sumuiliites entered (brought down by the Tigris from Babylonia, in all probability); the gate of the tribute-palace or armory; and the gate of the god Sar-ur—"altogether 5 gates in the direction of the W." There are about 9 wide openings in the wall on this side, 2 being on each side of the Kouyunjik mound, and 2 on each side of that called Nebi-Yunus. As openings at these points would have endangered the city's safety, these 4 have probably been eliminated, leaving 2 only N. of Nebi-Yunus, 2 between that and Kouyunjik, and one N. of Kouyunjik. Minor means of exit probably existed at all points where they were regarded as needful.

To the outer wall of the city Sennacherib gave a Sumerian name meaning, "the wall which terrifies the enemy." At a depth of 54 gar,

5. The Outer Wall: the Plan-tations

the underground water-level, its foundations were laid upon blocks of stone, the object of this great depth being to frustrate undermining. The wall was made "high like a mountain." Above and below the city he laid out plantations, wherein all the sweet-smelling herbs of Heth (Pal and Phoenicia) grew, fruitful beyond those of their homeland. Among them were to be found every kind of mountain-vine, and the plants of all the nations around.

In connection with this, in all probability, he arranged the water-supply, conducting a distant water-course to N. by means of conduits. Being a successful venture, he seems to have watered therewith all the people's orchards, and in winter 1,000 corn fields above and below the city. The force of the increased current in the river Khosr was retarded by the creation of a swamp, and among the reeds which grew there were placed wild fowl, wild swine, and deer(?). Here he repeated his exotic plantations, including trees for wood, cotton (apparently) and seemingly the olive.

6. The Water-Supply, etc

Sennacherib's bas-reliefs show some of the phases of the work which his cylinder inscriptions describe. We see the winged bulls, which are of colossal dimensions, sometimes lying on their sledges (shaped like boats or Assyrian ships), and sometimes standing and supported by scaffolding. The sledges rest upon rollers, and are dragged by armies of captives urged to action by taskmasters with whips. Others force the sledges forward from behind by means of enormous levers whose upper ends are held in position by guy-ropes. Each side has to pull with equal force, for if the higher end of the great lever fell, the side which had pulled too hard suffered in killed and crushed, or at least in bruised, workmen of their number. In the background are the soldiers of the guard, and behind them extensive wooded hills. In other bas-reliefs it is apparently the pleasure-grounds of the palace which are seen. In these the background is an avenue of trees, alternately tall and short, on the banks of a river, whereon are boats, and men riding astride inflated skins, which were much used in those days, as now. On another slab, the great king himself, in his hand-chariot drawn by eunuchs, superintends the work.

How long N. had been the capital of Assyria is unknown. The original capital was Aššur, about 50 miles to the S., and probably this continued to be regarded as the religious and official capital of the country. Aššur-našir-apli seems to have had a greater liking for Calah (Nimroud), and Sargon for Khorsabad, where he had founded a splendid palace. These latter, however, probably never had the importance of N., and attained their position merely on account of the reigning king building a palace and residing there. The period of N.'s supremacy seems to have been from the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib to the end of that of Aššur-bani-apli, including, probably, the reigns of his successors likewise—a period of about 98 years (704-606 BC).

8. Nineveh the Later Capital

V. Last Days and Fall of Nineveh.—N., during the centuries of her existence, must have seen many stirring historical events; but the most noteworthy were probably Sennacherib's triumphal entries, including that following the capture of Lachish, the murder of that great conqueror by his sons (the recent theory that he was killed at Babylon needs confirmation), and the ceremonial triumphs of Aššur-bani-āpli—the great and noble Osnappar (Ezr 4 10). After the reign of Aššur-bani-āpli came his son Aššur-ētil-ilāni, who was succeeded by Sin-šarra-iškun (Saracos), but the history of the country, and also of the city, is practically non-existent during these last two reigns. The Assy and Bab records are silent with regard to the fall of the city, but Alexander Polyhistor, Abydenus and Syncellus all speak of it. The best account, however, is that of Diodorus Siculus, who refers to a legend that the city could not be taken until the river became its enemy. Arbaces, the Scythian, besieged it, but could not make any impression on it for 2 years. In the 3d year, however, the river (according to Commander Jones, not the Tigris, but the Khosr), being swollen by rains, and very rapid in its current, carried away a portion of the wall, and by this opening the besiegers gained an entrance. The king, recognizing in this the fulfilment of the oracle, gathered together his concubines and eunuchs, and, mounting a funeral pyre which he had caused to be constructed, perished in the flames. This catastrophe is supposed to be referred to in Nah 1 8: "With an over-running flood he [the Lord] will make a full end of her place [i.e. of N.]," and 2 6: "The gates of the rivers are opened, and the palace is dissolved." The destruction of the city by fire is probably referred to in 3 13.15. The picture of the scenes in her streets—the noise of the whip, the rattling wheels, the prancing horses, the bounding chariots (3 2 ff), followed by a vivid description of the carnage of the battlefield—is exceedingly striking, and true to their records and their sculptures.

I. The Discovery.—In the spring of 1850, the workmen of Sir A. H. Layard at Nineveh made an important discovery. In the ruins of the palace of Assur-bani-pal they found a passage which opened into two small chambers leading one into the other. The doorway was guarded on either side by figures of Ea, the god of culture and the inventor of letters, in his robe of fishskin. The walls of the chambers had once been paneled with bas-reliefs, one of which represented a city standing on the shore of a sea that was covered with galleys. Up to the height of a foot or more the floor was piled with clay tablets that had fallen from the shelves on which they had been arranged in order, and the larger number of them was consequently broken. Similar tablets, but in lesser number, were found in the adjoining chambers. After Layard's departure, other tablets were discovered by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, and then the excavations ceased for many years. The discovery of the Bab version of the account of the Deluge, however, by Mr. George Smith in 1873 led the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph to send him to Nineveh in the hope that the missing portions of the story might be found. He had not been excavating there long before he came across a fragment of another version of the story, and then once more the excavations came to an end. Since then expeditions have been sent by the British Museum which have resulted in the recovery of further remains of the ancient library of Nineveh.

II. The Library.—The tablets formed a library in the true sense of the word. Libraries had existed in the cities of Babylonia from a remote date, and the Assy kings, whose civilization was derived from Babylonia, imitated the example of Babylonia in this as in other respects. The only true book-lover among them, however, was Assur-bani-pal. He was one of the most munificent royal patrons of learning the world has ever seen, and it was to him that the great library of Nineveh owed its existence. New editions were made of older works, and the public and private libraries of Babylonia were ransacked in search of literary treasures.

III. Writing-Materials.—Fortunately for us the ordinary writing-material of the Babylonians and Assyrians was clay. It was more easily procurable than papyrus or parchment, and was specially adapted for the reception of the cuneiform characters. Hence, while the greater part of the old Egypt lit., which was upon papyrus, has perished, that of Babylonia and Assyria has been preserved. In Babylonia the tablets after being inscribed were often merely dried in the sun; in the damper climate of Assyria they were baked in a kiln. As a large amount of text had frequently to be compressed into a small space, the writing is sometimes so minute as to need the assistance of a magnifying glass before it can be read. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the library-chambers of Nineveh Layard found a magnifying lens of crystal, which had been turned on the lathe.

IV. Contents.—The subject-matter of the tablets included all the known branches of knowledge.

Foremost among them are the philological works. The inventors of the cuneiform system of writing had spoken an agglutinative language, called Sumerian, similar to that of the Turks or Finns today; and a considerable part of the early lit. had been written in this language, which to the later Sem Babylonians and Assyrians was what Lat was to the European nations in the Middle Ages. The student was therefore provided with grammars and dictionaries of the two languages, as well as with reading-books and inter-linear tr^s into Assy of the chief Sumerian texts. Besides this, long lists of the cuneiform characters were drawn up with their phonetic and ideographic values, together with lists of Assy synonyms, in which, for example, all the equivalents are given of the word "to go." The Assy lexicographers at times attempted etymologies which are as wide of the mark as similar etymologies given by English lexicographers of a past generation. Sabattu, "Sabbath," for instance, is derived from the two Sumerian words, sa, "heart," and bat, "to end," and so is explained to mean "day of rest for the heart." It is obvious that all this implies an advanced literary culture. People do not begin to compile grammars and dictionaries or to speculate on the origin of words until books and libraries abound and education is widespread.

Astronomy occupied a prominent place in Assy lit., but it was largely mingled with astrology.

2. Astronomy and Astrology The Babylonians were the founders of scientific astronomy; they were the first to calculate the dates of lunar and solar eclipses, and to give names to the signs of the Zodiac. Among the contents of the library of Nineveh are reports from the Royal Observatory, relating to the observation of eclipses and the like.

A knowledge of astronomy was needed for the regulation of the calendar, and the calendar was the special care of the priests, as the

3. Religious Texts festivals of the gods and the payment of tithes were dependent upon it.

Most of the religious texts went back to the Sumerian period and were accordingly provided with Assy tr^s. Some of them were hymns to the gods, others were the rituals used in different temples. There was, moreover, a collection of psalms, as well as numerous mythological texts.

The legal lit. was considerable. The earliest law books were in Sumerian, but the great code compiled by Khammurabi, the

4. Law contemporary of Abraham, was in Sem Babylonian (see HAMMURABI). Like English law, Assyro-Babylonian law was case-made, and records of the cases decided from time to time by the judges are numerous.

Among scientific works we may class the long lists of animals, birds, fishes, plants and stones, together with geographical treatises, and the pseudo-science of omens. Starting from the belief that where two events followed one another, the first was the cause of the second, an elaborate pseudo-science of augury had been built up, and an enormous lit. arose on the interpretation of dreams, the observation of the liver of animals, etc. Unfortunately Assur-banipal had a special predilection for the subject, and the consequence is that his library was filled with works which the Assyriologist would gladly exchange for documents of a more valuable character. Among the scientific works we may also include those on medicine, as well as numerous mathematical tables.

Literature was largely represented, mainly in the form of poems on mythological, religious or historical subjects. Among these the

6. Literature most famous is the epic of the hero Gilgames in twelve books, the Bab account of the Deluge being introduced as an episode in the eleventh book. Another epic was the story of the great battle between the god Merodach and Tiamat, the dragon of chaos and evil, which includes the story of the creation.

Historical records are very numerous, the Assyrians being distinguished among the nations of antiquity by their historical sense.

7. History and Chronology In Assyria the royal palace took the place of the Bab or Egypt temple; and where the Babylonian or the Egyptian would have left behind him a religious record, the Assyrian adorned his walls with accounts of campaigns and the victories of their royal builders. The dates which are attached to each portion of the narrative, and the care with which the names of petty princes and states are transcribed, give a high idea of the historical precision at which the Assyrians aimed. The Assy monuments are alone sufficient to show that the historical sense was by no means unknown to the ancient peoples of the East, and when we remember how closely related the Assyrians were to the Hebrews in both race and language, the fact becomes important to the Bib. student. Besides historical texts the library contained also chronological tables and long lists of kings and dynasties with the number of years they reigned. In Babylonia time was marked by officially naming each year after some event that had occurred in the course of it; the more historically-minded Assyrian named the year after a particular official, called limmu, who was appointed on each New Year's Day. In Babylonia the chronological system went back to a very remote date. The Babylonians were a commercial people, and for commercial purposes it was necessary to have an exact register of the time.

The library contained trading documents of various sorts, more esp. contracts, deeds of sale of property and the like. Now and then we meet with the plan of a building.

8. Commerce There were also fiscal documents relating to the taxes paid by the cities and provinces of the empire to the imperial treasury.

One department of the library consisted of letters, some of them private, others addressed to the king or to the high officials. Nearly a thousand of these have already been published by Professor Harper.

The clay books, it need hardly be added, were all carefully numbered and catalogued, the Assy system of docketing and arranging the tablets being at once ingenious and simple. The librarians, consequently, had no difficulty in finding any tablet or series of tablets that might be asked for. We may gather from the inscription attached to the larger works copied from Bab originals as well as to other collections of tablets that the library was open to all "readers."

NINEVITES, nin'ê-vits (Νινευ[ε]ῖται, Nineu[e]ῖtai): Only in Lk 11 30. The passage (Mt 12 41), with Lk 11 32, has the fuller form, "men of Nineveh," which gives the meaning.

NIPHIS, nī'fis (Νειφίς, Neiphis, A, Φινίς, Phinís; AV Nephis): Given in 1 Esd 5 21 m as = "Magbish" of Ezr 2 30, whose sons are the same in number (156) as those of Niphs, but it would seem rather to be the equivalent of Nebo in ver 29.

NISAN, nī'san (נִסָּן, nīṣān): The first month of the Jewish year in which occurred the Passover and which corresponds to April. The month is the same as Abib, which occurs in the Pent. Nisan occurs in Neh 2 1 and Est 3 7. It denotes "the month of flowers." See CALENDAR.

NISROCH, nis'rok, niz'rok (נִסְרוֹךְ, nīsrōkh): The Assy god in whose temple Sennacherib was worshipping when put to death by his sons (2 K 19 37; Isa 37 38). The name is not found elsewhere. Some identify him with Asshur, the national deity. See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

NITRE, nī'tēr (נִתְרָה, nether; νίτρον, nītron): Nitre as used in AV does not correspond to the present use of that term. Nitre or niter is now applied to sodium or potassium nitrate. The writer has in his collection a specimen of sodium carbonate, called in Arab. natrān, which was taken from the extensive deposits in Lower Egypt where it is found as a deposit underneath a layer of common salt. Similar deposits are found in Syria and Asia Minor. This is probably the "nitre" of the Bible. ARV has rendered nitre "lye" in Jer 2 22, and "soda" in Prov 25 20. Soda or lye has been used as a cleansing agent from earliest times. It effervesces energetically, when treated with an acid; hence the comparison in Prov 25 20 of the heavy-hearted man rolled by the sound of singing to the sizzling of soda on which vinegar has been poured. See VINEGAR.

NO, nō. See NO-AMON.

NOADIAH, nō-a-dī'a (נֹאדִיָּה, nō'adhyāh, "tryst of Jeh"; Noadai, Noadei):

(1) Son of Binnui, one of the Levites to whom Ezra intrusted the gold and silver and sacred vessels which he brought up from Babylon (Ezr 8 33); also called MOETH (q.v.), son of Sabannus (1 Esd 8 63).

(2) A prophetess associated with Tobiah and Sanballat in opposition to Nehemiah (Neh 6 14).

NOAH, nō'a (נֹחַ, nō'h, "rest"; LXX Nōē, Nōē; Jos, Nōxos, Nōchos): The 10th in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Gen 5 28, 29). Lamech here seems to derive the word from the √ נָחַם, nāham, "to comfort," but this is probably a mere play upon the name by Noah's father. The times in which Noah was born were degenerate, and this finds pathetic expression in Lamech's saying at the birth of Noah, "This same shall comfort us in our work and in the toil of our hands, which cometh because of the ground which Jeh hath cursed." Concerning the theory that Noah is the name of a dynasty, like Pharaoh or Caesar, rather than of a single individual, see ANTEDILUVIANS. In his 600th year the degenerate races of mankind were cut off by the Deluge. But 120 years previously (Gen 6 3) he had been warned of the catastrophe, and according to 1 Pet 3 20 had been preparing for the event by building the ark (see ARK; DELUGE). In the cuneiform inscriptions Noah corresponds to "Ḫasisadra" (Xisuthrus). After the flood Noah celebrated his deliverance by building an altar and offering sacrifices to Jeh (Gen 8 20), and was sent forth with God's blessing to be "fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen 9 1), as Adam had been sent forth at the beginning (Gen 1 28). In token of the certainty of God's covenant not to destroy the race again by flood, a rainbow spanned the sky whose reappearance was ever after to be a token of peace. But Noah was not above temptation. In the prosperity which followed, he became drunken from the fruit of the vineyard he had planted. His son Ham irreverently exposed the nakedness of his father, while Shem and Japheth covered it from view (Gen 9 22, 23). The curse upon Canaan the son of Ham was literally fulfilled in subsequent history when Israel took possession of Pal, when Tyre fell before the arms of Alexander, and Carthage surrendered to Rome.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

NOAH (נֹחַ, nō'ah, "movement"): One of the daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 26 33; 27 1; 36 11; Josh 17 3 ff).

NOAH, BOOK (APOCALYPSE) OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

NO-AMON, nō-ā'mon (נֹאֲמֹן, nō'āmōn, Egypt nut, "a city," with the feminine ending t, and Amon, proper name of a god, City Amon, i.e. the "City," par excellence, of the god Amon; tr^d in AV "populous No," following the Vulg in a misunderstanding of the word 'āmōn; RV "No-amon"); Occurs in this form only in Nah 3 8, but אֲמֹן 'āmōn minnō, "Amon of No," occurs in Jer 46 25. Cf also Ezk 30 14-16, where נֹא, nō, is undoubtedly the same city.

The description of No-amon in Nah 3 8 seems to be that of a delta city, but יָם, yām, "sea," in that passage is used poetically for the Nile, as in Job 41 31 and in Isa 18 2. With this difficulty removed, the Egypt etymology of the name leaves no doubt as to the correct identification of the place. The "City Amon" in the days of Nahum, Jeremiah and Ezekiel was Thebes (cf art. "Thebes" in any general encyclopaedia).

NOB, nob (נֹב, nōbh; B, Nombá, Nombá, A, Noḅá, Nobá, and other forms): An ancient priestly town to which David came on his way S. when he fled from Saul at Gibeah (1 S 21 1). Here he found refuge and succor with Ahimelech. This was observed by Doeg the Edomite, who informed the king, and afterward became the instrument of Saul's savage vengeance on the priests, and on all the inhabitants of the city (ch 22). The name occurs in Neh 11 32 in a list of cities, immediately after Anathoth. In Isaiah's ideal account of the Assyrians' march against Jerus, Nob is clearly placed S. of Anathoth. Here, says the prophet, the Assyrian shall shake his hand at the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerus. It was a place, therefore, from which the Holy City and the temple were clearly visible.

The district in which the site must be sought is thus very definitely indicated; but within this district no name at all resembling Nob has been discovered, and so no sure identification is yet possible. 'Anāta (Anathoth) is 2½ miles N.E. of Jerus. Nob therefore lay between that and the city, at a point where the city could be seen, apparently on the great road from the N. Rather more than a mile N. of Jerus rises the ridge Rās el-Meshārif (2,665 ft.), over which the road from the N. passes; and here the traveler approaching from that direction obtains his first sight of the city. It is fittingly named "the look-out." Col. Conder states the case for identifying this height with Mt. Scopus where Titus established his camp at the siege of Jerus (PEFS, 1874, 111 ff). Immediately S. of the ridge, to the E. of the road, there is a small plateau, S. of which there is a lower ridge, whence the slopes dip into Wādī el-Jōz. This plateau, on which Titus may have sat, is a very probable site for Nob. It quite suits the requirements of Isaiah's narrative, and not less those of David's flight. Gibeah lay not far to the N., and this lay in the most likely path to the S. W. EWING

NOBAH, nō'ba (נֹבָה, nōbhāh; B, Ναβάθ, Nabōth, Nabāth, Nabāth, Nabāth, Nabāth):

(1) Nobah the Manassite, we are told, "went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name" (Nu 32 42). There can be little doubt that the ancient Kenath is represented by the modern Kanawāt, on the western slope of Jebel ed-Drūze, the ancient name having survived that of Nobah.

(2) A city which marked the course of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jgs 8 11). It is possible that this may be identical with (1). Cheyne argues in favor of this (EB, s.v. "Gideon"). But its mention along with Jogbehah points to a more southerly location. This may have been the original home of the clan Nobah. Some would read, following the Syr in Nu 21 30, "Nobah which is on the desert," instead of "Nophah which reacheth unto Medeba." No site with a name resembling this has yet been recovered. If it is to be distinguished from Kenath, then probably it will have to be sought somewhere to the N.E. of Rabbath-Ammon ('Ammān). W. EWING

NOBAI, nō'bī, nob'ā-i (נֹבָי, nōbhay, or נֹבִי, nēbhay): One of those who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 19).

NOBLE, nō'b'l, NOBLES, nō'b'lz, NOBLEMAN, nō'b'l-man (נֹבִלִים, hōrīm, נֹבִלִים, 'addir; εὐγενής, eugenēs, κράτιστος, krátistos, βασιλικός, basilikós): "Nobles" is the tr of the Heb hōrīm (occurring only in the pl.), "free-born," "noble" (1 K 21 8.11; Neh 2 16; 6 17, etc); of 'addir, "begirded," "mighty," "illustrious" or "noble" (Jgs 5 13; 2 Ch 23 20, etc); of nādhīb, "liberal," "a noble" (Nu 21 18; Prov 8 16, etc).

Other words are gādōl, "great" (Jon 3 7); yakkir, Aram. "precious" (Ezr 4 10); nāghēd, "a leader" (Job 29 10); partemim, "foremost ones" (Est 1 3; 6 9); acilim, "those near," "nobles" (Ex 24 11); bāriah, "fugitive" (Isa 43 14); kābhēd, "weighty," "honored" (Ps 149 8); eugenēs, "well born" (Acts 17 11; 1 Cor 1 26); krátistos, "strongest," "most powerful" (Acts 24 3; 26 25).

The Apoc, AV and RV, still further enlarges the list. In RV we have megístanes, "great ones" (1 Esd 1 38; 8 26, with éntimos, "in honor," Wisd 15 12). Otherwise RV's uses of "noble" and "nobleness" are for words containing the gen and referring to birth (cf Wisd 8 3; 2 Macc 6 27.31; 12 42; 14 42 bis). AV's uses are wider (Jth 2 2, etc).

Nobleman is, in Lk 19 12, the tr of eugenēs anthrōpos, "a man well born," and in Jn 4 46.49 of basilikos, "kingly," "belonging to a king," a designation extended to the officers, courtiers, etc, of a king, RVm "king's officer"; he was probably an official, civil or military, of Herod Antipas, who was styled "king" (basileus).

For "nobles" (Isa 43 14), AV "have brought down all their nobles," RV has "I will bring down all of them as fugitives," m "or, as otherwise read, all their nobles even," etc; for "nobles" (Jer 30 21), "prince"; ERV has "worthies" for "nobles" (Nah 3 18); RV has "the noble" for "princes" (Prov 17 26); "nobles" for "princes" (Job 34 18; Dnl 1 3), for "Nazarites" (Lam 4 7, m "Nazirites"); "her nobles" for "his fugitives," m "or, as otherwise read, fugitives" (Isa 15 5); ARV has "noble" for "liberal" (Isa 32 5); for "The nobles held their peace," AVm "The voice of the nobles was hid" (Job 29 10). RV has "The voice of the nobles was hushed," m "Heb hid"; for "most noble" (Acts 24 3; 26 25), "most excellent."

W. L. WALKER

NOD, nod (נֹד, nōdh): The land of Eden, to which Cain migrated after the murder of his brother and his banishment by Jeh (Gen 4 16). Conjecture is useless as to the region intended. The ideas of China, India, etc, which some have entertained, are groundless. The territory was evidently at some distance, but where is now undiscoverable.

NODAB, nō'dab (נֹדָב, nōdhābh; Ναδαβαῖοι, Nadabaioi): A Hagrite clan which, along with Jetur and Naphish, suffered complete defeat at the hands of the trans-Jordanic Israelites (1 Ch 5 19). It has been suggested that Nodab is a corruption of Kedemah or of Nebaioth, names which are associated with Jetur and Naphish in the lists of Ishmael's sons (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 1 31), but it is difficult to see how even the most careless copyist could so blunder. There is a possible reminiscence of the name in Nudébe, a village in the Hauran.

NOE, nō'ē (Νῶε, Nôe): AV of Mt 24 37.38; Lk 3 36; 17 26.27; Tob 4 12. Gr form of NOAH (q.v.) (thus RV).

NOEBA, nō'ē-ba (Νοεβά, Noebá): Head of one of the families of temple-servants (1 Esd 5 31) = "Nekoda" of Ezr 2 48.

NOGAH, nō'ga (נֹגַהּ, nōghah, "splendor"): A son of David born at Jerus (1 Ch 3 7; 14 6). In the || list (2 S 5 14.15) this name is wanting. In its Gr form (Naggai, Naggai) it occurs in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 25).

NOHAH, nō'ha (נֹחַהּ, nōhāh, "rest"): The fourth son of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 2). It is probable that in Jgs 20 43, instead of "a resting-place" we should read "Nohah," which may have been the settlement of the family.

NOISE, noiz (קוֹל, kōl, הַמִּוֶּן, hāmōn, שֹׁאֵן, shā'ōn; φωνή, phōnē): "Noise" is most frequently the tr of kōl, "voice," "sound," in AV (Ex 20 18, "the noise of the trumpet," RV "voice"; 32 17 bis.18; Jgs 5 11, "[they that are delivered] from the noise of the archers," RV "far from the noise," etc, m "because of the voice of"; 1 S 4 6, etc); hāmōn, "noise," "sound" (1 S 14 19); rōghez, "anger," "rage" (Job 37 2); rē, "outcry" (Job 36 33); shā'ōn, "desolation," "noise" (Isa 24 8; 25 5); t'shu'ōth, "cry," "crying" (Job 36 29); pācah, "to break forth" (Ps 98 4); shāmē, "to hear," etc (Josh 6 10; 1 Ch 15 28); phōnē, "sound," "voice," is tr'd "noise" (Rev 6 1, "I heard as it were the noise of thunder," RV "saying as with a voice of thunder"); rhoizēdōn, "with a hissing or rushing sound" (2 Pet 3 10, "with a great noise"); gīnetai phōnē (Acts 2 6, AV "when this was noised abroad," m "when this voice was made," RV "when this sound was heard"); akoiō, "to hear"; dialalēō, "to talk or speak" throughout, are also tr'd "noised" (Mk 2 1; Lk 1 65). So RV (cf Jth 10 18, "noised among the tents"). Otherwise in RV Apoc, thrōos, "confused noise" (Wisd 1 10); boē, "outcry" (Jth 14 19); ēchos, "sound" (Wisd 17 18; cf Sir 40 13); Lat vox, "voice" (2 Esd 5 7).

For "noise" (Ps 65 7 bis), RV has "roaring"; for "make a noise like the noise of the seas" (Isa 17 12), "the uproar [m "multitude"] of many peoples, that roar like the roaring of the seas"; for "a voice of noise from the city" (Isa 66 6), "a voice of tumult from the city"; for "noise" (Jer 10 22), "voice"; for "a noise" (1 Ch 15 28), "sounding aloud," "voice" (Ezk 43 2); for "every battle of the warrior is with confused noise" (Isa 9 5), "all the armor of the armed man in the tumult," m "every boot of the booted warrior"; for "make a noise," "moan" (Ps 55 2), "roar" (Isa 17 12); for "make a loud noise" (Ps 98 4), "break forth"; for "maketh a noise" (Jer 4 19), "is disquieted"; for "the noise of his tabernacle" (Job 36 29), "the thundrings of his pavilion"; for "make any noise with your voice" (Josh 6 10), "let your voice be heard"; "joyful noise," for "shouting" (Isa 16 10); for "The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea" (Ps 93 4), "Above the voices of many waters, the mighty breakers of the sea, Jeh on high is mighty."

NOISOME, noi'sum (נִי־שׁוֹם, hawwāh, נִי־שׁוֹם, ra'; κακός, kakós): "Noisome" from "annoy" (annoy-some) has in Bible Eng. the meaning of "evil," "hurtful," not of "offensive" or "loathsome." It is the tr of hawwāh, "mischievous," "calamity" (Ps 91 3, "noisome pestilence," RV "deadly"); of ra', a common word for "evil" (Ezk 14 15.21, "noisome beasts" (RV "evil")). It occurs also in Job 31 40 AVm as the tr of bo'shāh, "noisome weeds," AV and RV "cockle," m as AVm; of kakos, "evil," "bad" (Rev 16 2), "a noisome and grievous sore." "Noisome" also occurs in Apoc (2 Macc 9 9) as the tr of barúnō, "to make heavy," "oppress," where it seems to have the meaning of "loathsome."

W. L. WALKER

NON, non (נֹן, nōn): 1 Ch 7 27 AV and RVm. See NUN.

NOOMA, nō'-ma (Νοομά, Noomá, B, 'Οομά, Oomá; AV Ethma): 1 Esd 9 35 = "Nebo" of Ezr 10 43, of which it is a corruption.

NOON, nōon, NOONDAY, nōon'dā (צֶהְרֵי־יָמִים, ḥōhōrayim; μεσημβρία, mesēmbria): The word means light, splendor, brightness, and hence the brightest part of the day (Gen 43 16.25; Acts 22 6). See also MIDDAY; DAY AND NIGHT; TIME.

NOPH, nof (נֹפֶת, nōph; in Hos 9 6 mōph): A name for the Egyp city Memphis (so LXX), hence thus rendered in RV (Isa 19 13; Jer 2 16; 44 1; Ezk 30 13.16). See MEMPHIS.

NOPHAH, nō'fa (נֹפֶחַ, nōphāh; LXX does not transliterate): A city mentioned only in Nu 21 30 (see NOBAH). LXX reads καὶ ἡ γυναικὶς ἐπὶ προσεχέουσιν πῦρ ἐπὶ Μοάβ, "and the women besides [yet] kindled a fire at [against] Moab." The text has evidently suffered corruption.

NORTH, nōrth, NORTH COUNTRY (צִפְיֹן, ḥāphōn, from √ צָפַן, ḥāphan, "to hide," i.e. "the hidden," "the dark" [Ges.]; βορρᾶς, borrhás, βορέας, boréas [Jth 16 4]; septentrio [2 Esd 15 43]): In addition to the many places where "north" occurs merely as a point of the compass, there are several passages in Jer, Ezk and Zeph, where it refers to a particular country, usually Assyria or Babylonia: Jer 3 18, "They shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers"; Jer 46 6, "In the north by the river Euphrates have they stumbled and fallen"; Ezk 26 7, "I will bring upon Tyre Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, king of kings, from the north"; Zeph 2 13, "He will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation."

While the site of Nineveh was N.E. of Jerus, and that of Babylon almost due E., it was not unnatural for them to be referred to as "the north," because the direct desert routes were impracticable, and the roads led first into Northern Syria and then eastward (cf however Gen 29 1, "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the children of the east").

In Ezk 38 6, we have, "Gomer, and all his hordes; the house of Togarmah in the uttermost parts of the north." It is uncertain what country is here referred to. Some have supposed Armenia (cf Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6; Ezk 27 14).

The north border of the promised land, as outlined in Nu 34 7-9 and Ezk 47 15-17, cannot be determined with certainty, because some of the towns named cannot be identified, but it was approximately the latitude of Mt. Hermon, not including Lebanon or Damascus. For North (m'zārīm) see ASTRONOMY. ALFRED ELY DAY

NORTHEAST, SOUTHEAST: These words occur in Acts 27 12, "if by any means they could reach Phoenix, and winter there; which is a haven of Crete, looking north-east and south-east." RVm has, "Gr, down the south-west wind and down the north-west wind," which is a lit. tr of the Gr: eis Photnika . . . liména tēs Krētēs bléponta (looking katá liba (the southwest wind) kaí katá chōron (the northwest wind). Chōros does not appear to occur except here, but the corresponding Lat caurus or corus is found in Caesar, Vergil, and other classical authors. AV has "lieth toward the south west and north west." κατά, katá, with a wind or stream, means, "down the wind or stream," i.e. in the direction that it is blowing or flowing, and this interpretation would indicate a harbor open to the E. If λίψ, líps, and χῶπος, chōros, are used here as names of directions rather than of winds, we should expect a harbor open to the W. There is good reason for identifying Phoenix (AV "Phenice") with Loutro on the south shore of Crete (EB, s.v. "Phenice"), whose harbor is open to the E. See PHOENIX.

ALFRED ELY DAY

NOSE, nōz, NOSTRILS, nos'trilz (נָחַר, nāḥar, "nose," נְחִירִים, nēḥīrayim, dual of נָחַר, nāḥar, "nostrils"): The former expression (nāḥar from nāph*, like Arab. أنف, 'anf) is often tr^d "face" (which see s.v.) in EV. It is frequently referred to as the organ of breathing, in other words, as the receptacle of the breath or spirit of God: "Jeh . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen 2 7; cf 7 22); "My life is yet whole in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils" (Job 27 3). Therefore a life which depends on so slight a thing as a breath is considered as utterly frail and of no great consequence: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" (Isa 2 22; cf Wisd 2 2).

In poetical language such a breath of life is ascribed even to God, esp. with regard to the mighty storm which is thought to proceed from His nostrils (Ex 15 8; 2 S 22 9; Ps 18 8.15).

The phrase, "a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day" (Isa 65 5), is equivalent to a perpetual annoyance and cause of irritation. A cruel custom of war, in which the vanquished had their noses and ears cut off by their remorseless conquerors, is alluded to in Ezk 23 25. As a wild animal is held in check by having his nose pierced and a hook or ring inserted in it (Job 40 24; 41 2 [Heb 40 26]), so this expression is used to indicate the humbling and taming of an obstinate person (2 K 19 28; Isa 37 29; cf Ezk 29 4; 38 4). But men, and esp. women, had their noses pierced for the wearing of jewelry (Gen 24 47; Isa 3 21; Ezk 16 12). In one passage the meaning is not quite clear, viz. in the enumeration of blemishes which disable a "son of Aaron" from the execution of the priest's office (Lev 21 18), where EV translates "flat [m "slit"] nose." The Heb word is חֶרֶם, hārum, which is a hapax legomenon. It corresponds, however, to the Arab. حَرَمًا, ḥaram, ḥar- mān (kharam, kharmān), which means "to open," "to pierce the nose," esp. the bridge of the nose. We may accept this meaning as the one intended in the passage.

Another dark and much discussed passage must still be referred to: "And, lo, they put the branch to their nose" (Ezk 8 17). The usual explanation (whereof the context gives some valuable hints) is that a rite connected with the worship of Baal (the sun) is here alluded to (see Smend and A. B. Davidson's comms. on the passage). A similar custom is known from Pers sun-worship, where a bunch (bareçma) of dates, pomegranates or tamarisks was held to the nose by the worshipper, probably as an attempt to keep the Holy One (sun) from being contaminated by sinful breath (Spiegel, Iranische Altertümer, III, 571). Among modern Jews posies of myrtle and other fragrant herbs are held to the nose by the persons attending on the ceremony of circumcision, for the alleged reason of making the sight and smell of blood bearable. Another interpretation of the above passage would understand זְמֹרָה, z'mōrāh, in the sense of "male sexual member" (see Gesenius-Buhl, s.v.; Levy, Nhb. Wörterbuch, I, 544), and the whole passage as a reference to a sensuous Canaanite rite, such as is perhaps alluded to in Isa 57 8. In that case the אִפְּם, 'appām, "their nose," of the MT. would have to be considered as tikkūn šōph'rīm (a correction of the scribes) for אִפֵּי, 'appī, "my face." Or read "They cause their stench [z'mōrāhām] to come up to my face" (Kraetzschmar, ad loc.). See BRANCH.

NOSE-JEWELS, nōz-jū'elz, -jōō'elz (נֶזֶם, nezem [probably from נָזַם, nāzam, "muzzle"], a "nose-ring," or "nose-jewel," so rendered in Isa 3 21; "jewel in a swine's snout," Prov 11 22, AVm "ring"; "jewel on thy forehead," Ezk 16 12, "ring upon thy nose"); In Gen 24 22, AV rendered incorrectly "earring"; cf ver 47. Indeed, the word had also a more generic meaning of "ring" or "jewelry," whether worn in the nose or not. See Gen 35 4; Ex 32 2, where the ornament was worn in the ear. There are several cases without specification, uniformly rendered, without good reason, however, "earring" in AV (Ex 35 22; Jgs 8 24, 25; Job 42 11 ["ring"]; Prov 25 12; Hos 2 13 [15]).

The nose-jewel was made of gold or of silver, usually, and worn by many women of the East. It was a ring of from an inch to about three inches (in extreme cases) in diameter, and was passed through the right nostril. Usually there were pendant from the metal ring jewels, beads or coral. Such ornaments are still worn in some parts of the East. See also AMULET; JEWEL.

NOTABLE, nō'ta-b'l (נֹתָבִי, hāzūth; γνωστός, gnōstós): "Notable" is the tr of hāzūth, "conspicuous" (hāzāh, "to see"), e.g. Dnl 8 5, "a notable horn," i.e. "conspicuous," AVm "a horn of sight"; ver 8, "notable [horns]"; of gnōstos, "known," "knowledge" (Acts 4 16); of episēmos, "noted," "notable" (Mt 27 16; in Rom 16 7, "of note"); of epiphānēs, "very manifest," "illustrious" (cf "Antiochus Epiphanes"); Acts 2 20, "that great and notable day," quoted from Joel 2 31; LXX for yārē, "to be feared," AV and RV "terrible"

NOTE, nōt (נֹתָבִי, hākak, רָשָׁם, rāsham; σημείω, sēmeiōō, ἐπισημω, episēmos): "Note" (vb.) is the tr of hākak, "to grave," "to inscribe," etc (Isa 30 8, "note it in a book," RV "inscribe"); of rāsham, "to note down," etc (Dnl 10 21, RV "inscribed"); of sēmeiōō, "to put a sign on" (2 Thess 3 14, "note that man").

"Note" (noun) is the tr of episēmos, "marked upon," "distinguished" (Rom 16 7, "who are of note among the apostles").

"Notes" (musical) occurs in Wisd 19 18, "notes of a psaltery" (phthōggos). W. L. WALKER

NOTHING, nuth'ing (לֵּא מְאִימָה, lō' m'e'ūmah, etc; μηδεις, mēdeis, οὐδεις, oudeis): "Nothing" is represented by various words and phrases, often with lō', which is properly a subst. with the meaning of "nothing." Most frequently we have lō' m'e'ūmah, "not anything" (Gen 40 15; Jgs 14 6).

Other forms are lō' dhābhār, "not anything" (Gen 19 8); lō' khōl, "not any[thing]" (Gen 11 6; Prov 13 7); lō' [Aram.], "no," "nothing" (Dnl 4 35, "as nothing"; ephēs, "end," "cessation" (Isa 34 12); biltā, "without," "save," "not" (Isa 44 10; Am 3 4); 'ayin, "there is not" (Isa 41 24); once lō'hā, "emptiness" (Job 6 18); bal mäh, "not anything" (Prov 9 13); hinnām, "free," "gratis" (2 S 24 24); mā'at, "to make small," "bring to nothing" (Jer 10 24); raḥ, "only" (Gen 26 29); l'e'al, "for nothing" (Job 24 25).

In 2 Macc 7 12, we have "nothing," adverbially (en oudenī), "he nothing regarded the pains" (cf 1 K 15 21); 9 7 (oudamōs), RV "in no wise"; Wisd 2 11, "nothing worth" (āchrēstos), RV "of no service"; Bar 6 17, 26.

For "nothing" RV has "none" (Ex 23 26; Joel 2 3), "never" (Neh 5 8), "not wherewith" (Prov 22 27), "vanity and nought" (Isa 41 29); for "answered nothing" (Mk 15 5), "no more answered anything"; "answered nothing," in ver 3 is omitted; "anything" for "nothing" (1 Tim 6 7), "not anything" (Acts 20 20), "not" (1 Cor 8 2), "no word" (Lk 1 37), "not wherewith" (7 42); for "to nothing" (Job 6 18), "up into the waste"; for "it is nothing with" (2 Ch 14 11), "there is none besides," m "like"; for "lacked nothing" (1 K 4 27), "let nothing be lacking," for "nothing doubting" (Acts 11 12), "making no distinction"; for "hoping for nothing again" (Lk 6 35), "never despairing"; for "are nothing" (Acts 21 24), "no truth in"; for "nothing shall offend them" (Ps 119 165), "no occasion of stumbling"; for "bring to nothing" (1 Cor 1 19), ERV "reject," ARV "bring to nought"; "nothing better" for "no good" (Eccl 3 12), for "not" (Mt 13 34, different text), for "no man" (Acts 9 8), "for nothing," for "free" (Ex 21 11); "miss nothing" for "not sin" (Job 5 24, m "shalt not err"; "and shall have nothing" for "and not for himself" (Dnl 9 26, m "there shall be none belonging to him"). W. L. WALKER

NOUGHT, nōt (נֹתָבִי, hinnam; καταργέω, katargēō): "Nought" is to be distinguished from "naught" implying "badness" (see NAUGHT). "Nought" in the sense of "nothing," etc, is the tr of hinnām, "gratis" (Gen 29 15), and of various other words occurring once only, e.g. 'āven, "vanity" (Am 5 5); tōhū, "vacancy," "ruin" (Isa 49 4); 'epha, "nothing" (Isa 41 24); nā-bhāl, "to fade" (Job 14 18, m "fadeth away"); pūr, "to make void" (Ps 33 10); katargēō, "to make without effect" (1 Cor 1 28; 2 6); oudeis,

"not even one" (Acts 5 36); apelegmós, "refutation" (Acts 19 27, RV "come into disrepute"); dōreán, "without payment" (2 Thess 3 8, RV "for nought"); erēmōō, "to desolate" (Rev 18 17, RV "made desolate"); katahōō, "to loose down" (Acts 5 38, RV "be overthrown"). In Apoc we have "set at nought" and "come to nought," etc (1 Esd 1 56; 2 Esd 2 33; 8 59).

For "nought" RV has "perish" (Dt 28 63); for "come to nought" (Job 8 22), "be no more"; "nought" for "not ought" (Ex 5 11), for "no might" (Dt 28 32); for "brought to silence," bis (Isa 15 1), "brought to nought"; ARV "bring to nought" (1 Cor 1 19) for "bring to nothing" (ERV "reject"); "nought but terror" (Isa 23 19) for "a vexation only"; "brought to nought" (Isa 16 4) for "is at an end"; "come to nought" for "taken none effect" (Rom 9 6); "set at nought" for "despise" (Rom 14 3).

NOURISH, nur'ish (נָזַק, giddēl, נָזַק, hiyyāh, נָזַק, kūlāl, נָזַק, ribbāh; τρέφω, tréphō, ἀνατρέφω, anatrēphō, ἐκτρέφω, ektrēphō, ἐντρέφω, enttrēphō): While the word "nourish" was ordinarily an appropriate rendering in the time of the AV, the word has since become much less frequent, and some senses have largely passed out of ordinary use, so that the meaning would now in most cases be better expressed by some other word. Giddēl means "to bring up," "rear [children]" (Isa 1 2, m "made great"; 23 4; Dnl 1 5); "cause [a tree] to grow" (Isa 44 14). Hiyyāh means "to preserve alive" (with some implication of care) (2 S 12 3; Isa 7 21, ARV "keep alive"). Kūlāl means "to support," "maintain," "provide for" (esp. with food) (Gen 45 11; 47 12; 50 21). Ribbāh means "to bring up," "rear [whelps]," in a figurative use (Ezk 19 2). Tréphō means "to feed" (transitively) (Acts 12 20, RV "feed"; Rev 12 14); "to fatten" (Jas 5 5, the context indicating an unfavorable meaning). Anatrēphō is "to bring up," "rear," like giddēl (Acts 7 20, 21); ektrēphō is "to take care of" (Eph 5 29); enttrēphō means "to bring up in," "train in" (1 Tim 4 6).

NOVICE, nov'is (νεόφυτος, neōphutos, "newly planted"): In this sense it is found in LXX of Job 14 9 and Isa 5 7. In the NT it occurs once only (1 Tim 3 6), where it means a person newly planted in the Christian faith, a neophyte, a new convert, one who has recently become a Christian. This term occurs in the list which Paul gives of the qualifications which a Christian bishop must possess. The apostle instructs Timothy, that if any man desires the office of a bishop, he must not be a "novice," must not be newly converted, or recently brought to the faith of Christ "lest he be lifted up with pride, and fall into the condemnation of the devil."

This means that a recent convert runs the very serious risk of being wise in his own eyes, of despising those who are still on the level from which, by his conversion, he has been lifted; and so he becomes puffed up with high ideas of his own importance. He has not yet had time to discover his limitations, he is newly planted, he does not fully understand his true position in the Christian community, he overestimates himself. For these reasons he is peculiarly liable to instability, and to the other weaknesses and sins connected with an inflated opinion of his own powers. His pride is a sure indication of a coming fall. A novice, therefore, must on no account be appointed to the office in question, for he would be sure to bring disgrace upon it.

VI. GEMATRIA LITERATURE

I. Number and Arithmetic.—The system of counting followed by the Hebrews and the Semites generally was the decimal system, which seems to have been suggested by the use of the ten fingers. Heb had separate words only for the first nine units and for ten and its multiples. Of the sexagesimal system, which seems to have been introduced into Babylonia by the Sumerians and which, through its development there, has influenced the measurement of time and space in the western civilized world even to the present day, there is no direct trace in the Bible, although, as will be shown later, there are some possible echoes. The highest number in the Bible described by a single word is 10,000 (ribbō or ribbō', muriads). The Egyptians, on the other hand, had separate words for 100,000, 1,000,000, 10,000,000. The highest numbers referred to in any way in the Bible are: "a thousand thousand" (1 Ch 22 14; 2 Ch 14 9); "thousands of thousands" (Dnl 7 10; Rev 5 11); "thousands of ten thousands" (Gen 24 60); "ten thousand times ten thousand" (Dnl 7 10; Rev 5 11); and twice that figure (Rev 9 16). The excessively high numbers met with in some oriental systems (cf Lubbock, The Decimal System, 17 ff) have no parallels in Heb. Fractions were not unknown. We find $\frac{1}{2}$ (2 S 18 2, etc); $\frac{1}{3}$ (Ex 25 10, 17, etc); $\frac{1}{4}$ (1 S 9 8); $\frac{1}{5}$ (Gen 47 24); $\frac{1}{6}$ (Ezk 46 14); $\frac{1}{7}$ (Ex 16 36); $\frac{1}{8}$ (Lev 23 13); $\frac{1}{9}$ (Lev 14 10), and $\frac{1}{10}$ (Neh 5 11). Three other fractions are less definitely expressed: $\frac{2}{3}$ by "a double portion," lit. "a double mouthful" (Dt 21 17; 2 K 2 9; Zec 13 8); $\frac{3}{4}$ by "four parts" (Gen 47 24), and $\frac{9}{10}$ by "nine parts" (Neh 11 1). Only the simplest rules of arithmetic can be illustrated from the OT. There are examples of addition (Gen 5 3-31; Nu 1 20-46); subtraction (Gen 18 28 ff); multiplication (Lev 25 8; Nu 3 46 ff), and division (Nu 31 27 ff). In Lev 25 50 ff is what has been said to imply a kind of rule-of-three sum. The old Babylonians had tables of squares and cubes intended no doubt to facilitate the measurement of land (Sayce, Assyria, Its Princes, Priests and People, 118; Bezold, Ninive und Babylon, 90, 92); and it can scarcely be doubted that the same need led to similar results among the Israelites, but at present there is no evidence. Old Heb arithmetic and mathematics as known to us are of the most elementary kind (Nowack, HA, I, 298).

II. Notation of Numbers.—No special signs for the expression of numbers in writing can be proved to have been in use among the Hebrews before the exile. The Siloam Inscription, which is probably the oldest specimen of Heb writing extant (with the exception of the ostraca of Samaria, and perhaps a seal or two and the obscure Gezer tablet), has the numbers written in full. The words used there for 3,200, 1,000 are written as words without any abbreviation. The earlier text of the M S which practically illustrates Heb usage has the numbers 30, 40, 50, 100, 200, 7,000 written out in the same way.

After the exile some of the Jews at any rate employed signs such as were current among the Egyptians, the Aramaeans, and the Phoenicians—an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, three for 3, and so on, and special signs for 10, 20, 100. It had been conjectured that these or similar signs were known to the Jews, but actual proof was not forthcoming until the discovery of Jewish papyri at Assuan and Elephantine in 1904 and 1907. In these texts, ranging from 494 to c 400 BC, the dates are stated, not in words, but in figures of the kind described. We have therefore clear evidence that numerical signs were used by members of a Jewish colony in Upper Egypt in the 5th cent. BC. Now, as the existence of this colony can be traced before 525 BC, it is probable that they used this method of notation also in the preceding century. Conjecture indeed may go as far as its beginning, for it is known that there were Jews in Pathros, that is Upper Egypt, in the last days of Jeremiah (Jer 44 1.15). Some of the first Jewish settlers in Elephantine may have known the prophet and some of them may have come from Jerus, bringing these signs with them. At present, however, that is pure hypothesis.

In the notation of the chapters and verses of the Heb Bible and in the expression of dates in Heb books the consonants of the Heb alphabet are

3. By Letters employed for figures, i.e. the first ten for 1-10, combinations of these for 11-19, the following eight for 20-90, and the remainder for 100, 200, 300, 400. The letters of the Gr alphabet were used in the same way. The antiquity of this kind of numerical notation cannot at present be ascertained. It is found on Jewish coins which have been dated in the reign of the Maccabean Simon (143-135 BC), but some scholars refer them to a much later period. All students of the Talm are familiar with this way of numbering the pages, or rather the leaves, but its use there is no proof of early date. The numerical use of the Gr letters can be abundantly illustrated. It is met with in many Gr papyri, some of them from the 3d cent. BC (Hibeh Papyri, nos. 40-43, etc); on several coins of Herod the Great, and in some MSS of the NT, for instance, a papyrus fragment of Mt (Oxyrhynchus Pap., 2) where 14 is three times represented by iōta delta with a line above the letters, and some codices of Rev at 13 18 where 666 is given by the three letters chi xi vau (or digamma). It is possible that two of these methods may have been employed side by side in some cases, as in the Punic Sacrificial Tablet of Marseilles, where (l. 6) 150 is expressed first in words, and then by figures.

III. Numbers in OT History.—Students of the historical books of the OT have long been perplexed by the high numbers which are met with in many passages, for example, the number ascribed to the Israelites at the exodus (Ex 12 37; Nu 11 21), and on two occasions during the sojourn in the wilderness (Nu 1, 26)—more than 600,000 adult males, which means a total of two or three millions; the result of David's census 1,300,000 men (2 S 24 9) or 1,570,000 (1 Ch 21 5), and the slaughter of half a million in a battle between Judah and Israel (2 Ch 13 17). There are many other illustrations in the Books of Ch and elsewhere. That some of these high figures are incorrect is beyond reasonable doubt, and is not in the least surprising, for there is ample evidence that the numbers in ancient documents were exceptionally liable to corruption. One of the best known instances is the variation of 1,466 years between the Heb text and the LXX (text of B) as to the interval from the creation of Adam to the birth of Abram. Other striking cases are 1 S 6 19, where 50,070 ought probably to be 70 (Jos, Ant. VI, i, 4); 2 S 15 7, where 40 years ought to be 4 years; the confusion of 76 and 276 in the MSS of Acts 27 37, and of 616 and 666 in those of Rev 13 18. Heb MSS furnish some instructive variations. One of them, no. 109 of Kennicott, reads (Nu 1 23) 1,050 for 50,000;

50 for 50,000 (2 6), and 100 for 100,000 (ver 16). It is easy to see how mistakes may have originated in many cases. The Heb numerals for 30, etc, are the plurals of the units, so that the former, as written, differ from the latter only by the addition of the two letters yōdh and mēm composing the syllable -īm. Now as the mēm was often omitted, 3 and 30, 4 and 40, etc, could readily be confused. If signs or letters of the alphabet were made use of, instead of abbreviated words, there would be quite as much room for misunderstanding and error on the part of copyists. The high numbers above referred to as found in Ex and Nu have been ingeniously accounted for by Professor Flinders Petrie (Researches in Sinai) in a wholly different way. By understanding 'eleph not as "thousand," but as "family" or "tent," he reduces the number to 5,550 for the first census, and 5,730 for the second. This figure, however, seems too low, and the method of interpretation, though not impossible, is open to criticism. It is generally admitted that the number as usually read is too high, but the original number has not yet been certainly discovered. When, however, full allowance has been made for the intrusion of numerical errors into the Heb text, it is difficult to resist the belief that, in the Books of Ch, at any rate, there is a marked tendency to exaggeration in this respect. The huge armies again and again ascribed to the little kingdoms of Judah and Israel cannot be reconciled with some of the facts revealed by recent research; with the following, for instance: The army which met the Assyrians at Karkar in 854 BC and which represented 11 states and tribes inclusive of Israel and the kingdom of Damascus, cannot have numbered at the most more than about 75,000 or 80,000 men (HDB, 1909, 65b), and the Assyrian king who reports the battle reckons the whole levy of his country at only 102,000 (Der alte Orient, XI, i, 14, note). In view of these figures it is not conceivable that the armies of Israel or Judah could number a million, or even half a million. The contingent from the larger kingdom contributed on the occasion mentioned above consisted of only 10,000 men and 2,000 chariots (HDB, ib). The safest conclusion, therefore, seems to be that, while many of the questionable numbers in the present text of the OT are due to copyists, there is a residuum which cannot be so accounted for.

IV. Round Numbers.—The use of definite numerical expressions in an indefinite sense, that is, as round numbers, which is met with in many languages, seems to have been very prevalent in Western Asia from early times to the present day. Sir W. Ramsay (Thousand and One Churches, 6) remarks that the modern Turks have 4 typical numbers which are often used in proper names with little or no reference to their exact numerical force—3, 7, 40, 1,001. The Lycaonian district which gives the book its name is called Bin Bir Kilise, "The Thousand and One Churches," although the actual number in the valley is only 28. The modern Persians use 40 in just the same way. "Forty years" with them often means "many years" (Brugsch, cited by König, Stilistik, 55). This lax use of numbers, as we think, was probably very frequent among the Israelites and their neighbors. The inscription on the MS supplies a very instructive example. The Israelitish occupation of Medeba by Omri and his son for half the reign of the latter is there reckoned (ll. 7 f) at 40 years. As, according to 1 K 16 23.29, the period extended to only 23 years at the most, the number 40 must have been used very freely by Mesha's scribe as a round number. It is probably often used in that way in the Bible where it is remarkably frequent, esp. in reference to periods of days or years. The 40 days of the Flood (Gen 7 4.17), the arrangement of the life of Moses in three periods of 40 years each (Acts 7 23; Ex 7 7; Dt 34 7), the 40 years' rule or reign of Eli (1 S 4 18), of Saul (Acts 13 21; cf Jos, Ant, VI, xiv, 9), of David (1 K 2 11), of Solomon (1 K 11 42) and of Jehoash (2 K 12 1), the 40 or 80 years of rest (Jgs 3 11.30; 5 31; 8 28), the 40 years of Philist oppression (Jgs 13 1), the 40 days' challenge of Goliath (1 S 17 16), the 40 days' fast of Moses (Ex 34 28), Elijah (1 K 19 8), and Jesus (Mt 4 2 and ||), the 40 days before the destruction of Nineveh (Jon 3 4), and the 40 days before the Ascension (Acts 1 3), all suggest conventional use, or the influence of that use, for it can hardly be supposed that the number in each of these cases, and in others which might be mentioned, was exactly 40. How it came to be so used is not quite certain, but it may have originated, partly at any rate, in the idea that 40 years constituted a generation or the period at the end of which a man attains maturity, an idea common, it would seem, to the Greeks, the Israelites, and the Arabs. The period of 40 years in the wilderness in the course of which the old Israel died out and a new Israel took its place was a generation (Nu 32 13, etc.). The rabbis long afterward regarded 40 years as the age of understanding, the age when a man reaches his intellectual prime (Ab, v, addendum). In the Koran (Sura 46) a man is said to attain his strength when he attains to 40 years, and it was at that age, according to tradition, that Muhammad came forward as a prophet. In this way perhaps 40 came to be used as a round number for an indefinite period with a suggestion of completeness, and then was extended in course of time to things as well as seasons.

Other round numbers are: (1) some of the higher numbers; (2) several numerical phrases. Under (1) come the following numbers. One hundred, often of course to be understood literally, but evidently a round number in Gen 26 12; Lev 26 8; 2 S 24 3; Eccl 8 12; Mt 19 29 and ||. A thousand (thousands), very often a literal number, but in not a few cases indefinite, e.g. Ex 20 6 || Dt 5 10; 7 9; 1 S 18 7; Ps 50 10; 90 4; 105 8; Isa 60 22, etc. Ten thousand (Heb ribbō, ribbōth, ribhābhāh; Gr myriás, myrioi) is also used as a round number as in Lev 26 8; Dt 32 30; Cant 5 10; Mic 6 7. The yet higher figures, thousands of thousands, etc. are, in almost all cases, distinctly hyperbolic round numbers, the most remarkable examples occurring in the apocalyptic books (Dnl 7 10; Rev 5 11; 9 16; Ethiopic En 40 1). (2) The second group, numerical phrases, consists of a number of expressions in which numbers are used roundly, in some cases to express the idea of fewness. One or two, etc.: "a day or two" (Ex 21 21), "an heap, two heaps" (Jgs 15 16 RVm), "one of a city, and two of a family" (Jer 3 14), "not once, nor twice," that is "several times" (2 K 6 10). Two or three: "Two or three berries in the [topmost] bough" (Isa 17 6; cf Hos 6 2), "Where two or three are gathered together in my name," etc (Mt 18 20). König refers to Assy, Syr, and Arab. parallels. Three or four: the most noteworthy example is the formula which occurs 8 t in Am (1 3.6.9.11.13; 2 1.4.6), "for three transgressions . . . yea for four." That the numbers here are round numbers is evident from the fact that the sins enumerated are in most cases neither 3 nor 4. In Prov 30 15. 18.21.29, on the other hand, where we have the same rhetorical device, climax ad majus, 4 is followed by four statements and is therefore to be taken literally. Again, König (ib) points to classical and Arab. parallels. Four or five: "Four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree" (Isa 17 6). Five or six: "Thou shouldst have smitten [Syria] five or six times" (2 K 13 19), an idiom met with also in

Am Tab (König, ib). Six and seven: "He will deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee" (Job 5 19). Seven and eight: "Seven shepherds, and eight principal men" (Mic 5 5), that is, "enough and more than enough" (Cheyne); "Give a portion to seven, yea, even unto eight" (Eccl 11 2). In one remarkable phrase which occurs (with slight variations of form) 24 t in the OT, two Heb words, meaning respectively "yesterday" and "third," are mostly used so as together to express the idea of vague reference to the past. RV renders in a variety of ways: "beforetime" (Gen 31 2, etc), "aforetime" (Josh 4 18), "heretofore" (Ex 4 10, etc), "in time [or "times"] past" (Dt 19 4.6; 2 S 3 17, etc).

V. Significant Numbers.—Numerical symbolism, that is, the use of numbers not merely, if at all, with their literal numerical value, or as round numbers, but with symbolic significance, sacred or otherwise, was widespread in the ancient East, esp. in Babylonia and regions more or less influenced by Bab culture which, to a certain extent, included Canaan. It must also be remembered that the ancestors of the Israelites are said to have been of Bab origin and may therefore have transmitted to their descendants the germs at least of numerical symbolism as developed in Babylonia in the age of Hammurabi. Be that as it may, the presence of this use of numbers in the Bible, and that on a large scale, cannot reasonably be doubted, although some writers have gone too far in their speculations on the subject. The numbers which are unmistakably used with more or less symbolic meaning are 7 and its multiples, and 3, 4, 10 and 12.

By far the most prominent of these is the number 7, which is referred to in one way or another in nearly 600 passages in the Bible, as well as in many passages in the Apoc and the Pseudepigrapha, and later Jewish literature. Of course the number has its usual numerical force in many of these places, but even there not seldom with a glance at its symbolic significance. For the determination of the latter we are not assigned to conjecture. There is clear evidence in the cuneiform texts, which are our earliest authorities, that the Babylonians regarded 7 as the number of totality, of completeness. The Sumerians, from whom the Sem Babylonians seem to have borrowed the idea, equated 7 and "all." The 7-storied towers of Babylonia represented the universe. Seven was the expression of the highest power, the greatest conceivable fullness of force, and therefore was early pressed into the service of religion. It is found in reference to ritual in the age of Gudea, that is perhaps about the middle of the 3d millennium BC. "Seven gods" at the end of an enumeration meant "all the gods" (for these facts and the cuneiform evidence of Hehn, Siebenzahl und Sabbath bei den Babyloniern und im AT, 4 ff). How 7 came to be used in this way can only be glanced at here. The view connecting it with the gods of the 7 planets, which used to be in great favor and still has its advocates, seems to lack ancient proof. Hehn (op. cit., 44 ff) has shown that the number acquired its symbolic meaning long before the earliest time for which that reference can be demonstrated. As this sacred or symbolic use of 7 was not peculiar to the Babylonians and their teachers and neighbors, but was more or less known also in India and China, in classical lands, and among the Celts and the Germans, it probably originated in some fact of common observation, perhaps in the four lunar phases each of which comprises 7 days and a fraction. Conspicuous groups of stars may have helped to deepen the impression, and the fact that 7 is made up of two significant numbers, each, as will be shown, also suggestive of completeness—3 and 4—may have been early noticed and taken into account. The Bib. use of 7 may be conveniently considered under 4 heads: (1) ritual use; (2) historical use; (3) didactic or literary use; (4) apocalyptic use.

(1) Ritual use of seven.—The number 7 plays a conspicuous part in a multitude of passages giving rules for worship or purification, or recording ritual actions. The 7th day of the week was holy (see Sabbath). There were 7 days of unleavened bread (Ex 34 18, etc.), and 7 days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23 34). The 7th year was the sabbatical year (Ex 21 2, etc.). The Moabite Balak built Balaam on three occasions 7 altars and provided in each case 7 bullocks and 7 rams (Nu 23 1.14.29). The Mosaic law prescribed 7 he-lambs for several festal offerings (Nu 28 11.19.27, etc.). The 7-fold sprinkling of blood is enjoined in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 14.19), and elsewhere. Seven-fold sprinkling is also repeatedly mentioned in the rules for the purification of the leper and the leprous house (Lev 14 7.16.27.51). The leprous Naaman was ordered to bathe 7 times in the Jordan (2 K 5 10). In cases of real or suspected uncleanness through leprosy, or the presence of a corpse, or for other reasons, 7 days' seclusion was necessary (Lev 12 2, etc.). Circumcision took place after 7 days (Lev 12 3). An animal must be 7 days old before it could be offered in sacrifice (Ex 22 30). Three periods of 7 days each are mentioned in the rules for the consecration of priests (Ex 29 30.35.37). An oath seems to have been in the first instance by 7 holy things (Gen 21 29 ff) and the Heb word for 'swear'. The number 7 also entered into the structure of sacred objects, for instance the candlestick or lamp-stand in the tabernacle and the second temple each of which had 7 lights (Nu 8 2; Zec 4 2). Many other instances of the ritual use of 7 in the OT and many instructive parallels from Bab texts could be given.

(2) Historical use of seven.—The number 7 also figures prominently in a large number of passages which occur in historical narrative, in a way which reminds us of its symbolic significance. The following are some of the most remarkable: Jacob's 7 years' service for Rachel (Gen 29 20; cf vs 27 f), and his bowing down 7 times to Esau (Gen 33 3); the 7 years of plenty, and the 7 years of famine (Gen 41 53 f); Samson's 7 days' marriage feast (Jgs 14 12 ff; cf Gen 29 27); 7 locks of hair (Jgs 16 19), and the 7 witches with which he was bound (vs 7 f); the 7 daughters of Jethro (Ex 2 16), the 7 sons of Jesse (1 S 16 10), the 7 sons of Saul (2 S 21 6), and the 7 sons of Job (Job 1 2; cf 42 13); the 7 days' march of the 7 priests blowing 7 trumpets round the walls of Jericho, and the 7-fold march on the 7th day (Josh 6 8 ff); the 7 ascents of Elijah's servant to the top of Carmel (1 K 18 43 f); the 7 sneezes of the Shunammith woman's son (2 K 4 35); the heating of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace 7 times more than it was wont to be heated (Dnl 3 19), and the king's madness for 7 times or years (4 16.23.25.32); Anna's 7 years of wedded life (Lk 2 36); the 1½ loaves of the 4,000 (Mt 15 34–36 ||) and the 7 baskets full of fragments (Mt 15 37 ||); the 7 brothers in the conundrum of the Sadducees (Mt 22 25 ||); the 7 demons cast out of Mary Magdalene (Mk 16 9 || Lk 8 2); the 7 ministers in the church at Jerus (Acts 6 3 ff) and the 7 sons of Sceva (19 14, but the Western text represents them as only 2). The number must not be understood lit. in many of these passages, but even then its symbolic meaning is probably hinted at by the historian. When a man was said to have had 7 sons or daughters, or an action was reported as done or to be done 7 times, whether by design or accident, the number was noted, and its symbolic force remembered. It cannot indeed be regarded in all these cases as a sacred number, but its association with sacred matters which was kept alive among the Jews by the institution of the Sabbath, was seldom, if ever, entirely overlooked.

(3) Didactic or literary use of seven.—The symbolic use of 7 naturally led to its employment by poets and teachers for the vivid expression of multitude or intensity. This use is sometimes evident, and sometimes latent. (a) Evident examples are the 7-fold curse predicted for the murderer of Cain (Gen 4 15); fleeing 7 ways (Dt 28 7.25); deliverance from 7 troubles (Job 5 19); praise of God 7 times a day (Ps 119 164); 7 abominations (Prov 26 25; cf 6 16); silver purified 7 times, that is, thoroughly purified (Ps 12 6); 7-fold sin; 7-fold repentance, and 7-fold forgiveness (Lk 17 4; cf Mt 18 21); 7 evil spirits (Mt 12 45 || Lk 11 26). The last of these, as well as the previous reference to the 7 demons cast out of Mary Magdalene reminds us of the 7 spirits of Bellar (XII P. Reuben chs 2 and 3) and of the 7 evil spirits so often referred to in Bab exorcisms (cf Hehn, op. cit., 26 ff), but it is not safe to connect Our Lord's words with either. The Bab belief may indeed have influenced popular ideas to some extent, but there is no need to find a trace of it in the Gospels. The 7 demons of the latter are sufficiently accounted for by the common symbolic use of 7. For other passages which come under this head cf Dt 28 7.25; Ruth 4 15; 1 S 2 5; Ps 79 12. (b) Examples of latent use of the number 7, of what Zöckler (*RE*⁸, "Sieben") calls "latent heptads," are not infrequent. The 7-fold use of the expression "the voice of Jeh" in Ps 29, which has caused it to be named "The Psalm of the Seven Thunders," and the 7 epithets of the Divine Spirit in Isa 11 2, cannot be accidental. In both cases the number is intended to point at full-summed completeness. In the NT we have the 7 beatitudes of character (Mt 5 3–9); the 7 petitions of the Paternoster (Mt 6 9 f); the 7 parables of the Kingdom in Mt 13; the 7 woes pronounced on the Pharisees (Mt 23 13.15.16.23.25.27.29), perhaps the 7 sayings of Jesus, beginning with "I am," (egō eimi) in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 6 35; 8 12; 10 7.11; 11 25; 14 6; 15 1), and the 7 disciples at the Lake after the Resurrection (Jn 21 2). Several groups of 7 are found in the Epp. and in Rev: 7 forms of suffering (Rom 8 35); 7 gifts or charismata (12 6–9); 7 attributes of the wisdom that is from above (Jas 3 17); 7 graces to be added to faith (2 Pet 1 5 ff); two doxologies each containing 7 words of praise (Rev 5 12; 7 12), and 7 classes of men (6 15). Other supposed instances of 7-fold grouping in the Fourth Gospel are pointed out by E. A. Abbott (Johannine Grammar, 2624 ff), but are of uncertain value.

(4) Apocalyptic use of seven.—As might be expected, 7 figures greatly in apocalyptic lit., although it is singularly absent from the apocalyptic portion of Dnl. Later works of this kind, however—the writings bearing the name of Enoch, the Testaments of Reuben and Levi, 2 Esd, etc.—supply many illustrations. The doctrine of the 7 heavens which is developed in the Slavonic Enoch and elsewhere and may have been in the first instance of Bab origin is not directly alluded to in the Bible, but probably underlies the apostle's reference to the third heaven (2 Cor 12 2). In the one apocalyptic writing in the NT, 7 is employed with amazing frequency. We read of 7 churches (1 4, etc.); 7 golden candlesticks (1 12, etc.); 7 stars (1 16); 7 angels of the churches (1 20); 7 lamps of fire (4 5); 7 spirits of God (1 4; 3 1; 4 5); a book with 7 seals (5 1); a lamb with 7 horns and 7 eyes (5 6); 7 angels with 7 trumpets (8 2); 7 thunders (10 3); a dragon with 7 heads and 7 diadems (12 3); a beast with 7 heads (13 1); 7 angels having the 7 last plagues (15 1); and 7 golden bowls of the wrath of God (15 7) and a scarlet-colored beast with 7 heads (17 3) which are 7 mountains (ver 9) and 7 kings (ver 10). The writer, whoever he was, must have had his imagination saturated with the numerical symbolism which had been cultivated in Western Asia for millenniums. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that 7 for him expressed fullness, completeness. As this inquiry will have shown, the significance of the number is practically the same throughout the Bible. Although a little of it may have been rubbed off in the course of ages, the main idea suggested by 7 was never quite lost sight of in Bib. times, and the number is still used in the life and song of the Holy Land and Arabia with at least an echo of its ancient meaning.

The significance of 7 extends to its multiples. Fourteen, or twice 7, is possibly symbolic in some cases. The stress laid in the OT on the 14th of the month as the day of the Passover (Ex 12 6 and 16 other places), and the regulation that 14 lambs were to be offered on each of the 7 days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Nu 29 13.15) hint at design in the selection of the number, esp. in view of the fact that 7 and 7 occur repeatedly in cuneiform literature—in magical and liturgical texts, and in the formula so often used in the Am Tab: "7 and 7 times at the feet of the king my lord . . . I prostrate myself." The arrangement of the generations from Abraham to Christ in three groups of 14 each (Mt 1 17) is probably intentional, so far as the number in each group is concerned. It is doubtful whether the number has any symbolic force in Acts 27 27; 2 Cor 12 2; Gal 2 1. Of course it must be remembered that both the Heb and Gr words for 14 ('arbā'ah 'āsār; dekateśsares) suggest that it is made up of 10 and 4, but constant use of 7 in the sense above defined will have influenced the application of its double, at least in some cases.

Forty-nine, or 7×7, occurs in two regulations of the Law. The second of the three great festivals took place on the 50th day after one of the days of unleavened bread (Lev 23 15 ff), that is, after an interval of 7×7 days; and two years of Jubilee were separated by 7×7 years (Lev 25 8 ff). The combination is met with also in one of the so-called Penitential Psalms of Babylonia: "Although my sins are 7 times 7, forgive me my sins."

Seven multiplied by ten, or 70, was a very strong expression of multitude which is met with in a large number of passages in the OT. It occurs of persons: the 70 descendants of Jacob (Ex 1 5; Dt 10 22); the 70 elders of Israel (Ex 24 1.9; Nu 11 16.24 f.); the 70 kings ill treated by Adonibezek (Jgs 1 7); the 70 sons of Gideon (Jgs 8 30; 9 2); the 70 descendants of Abdon who rode on 70 asscolts (Jgs 12 14); the 70 sons of Ahab (2 K 10 1.6 f.); and the 70 idolatrous elders seen by Ezekiel (Ezk 8 11). It is also used of periods: 70 days of Egypt mourning for Jacob (Gen 50 3); 70 years of trial (Isa 23 15.17; Jer 25 11 f.; Dnl 9 2; Zec 1 12; 7 5); the 70 weeks of Daniel (Dnl 9 24); and the 70 years of human life (Ps 90 10). Other noticeable uses of 70 are the 70 palm trees of Elim (Ex 15 27 || Nu 33 9); the offering of 70 bullocks in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 32), and the offering by the heads of the tribes of 12 silver bowls each of 70 shekels (Nu 7 13 ff.). In the NT we have the 70 apostles (Lk 10 1.17), but the number is uncertain B, D and some VSS reading 72, which is the product, not of 7 and 10, but of 6 and 12. Significant seventies are also met with outside of the Bible. The most noteworthy are the Jewish belief that there were 70 nations outside Israel, with 70 languages, under the care of 70 angels, based perhaps on the list in Gen 10; the Sanhedrin of about 70 members; the tr of the Pent into Gr by LXX (more exactly 72), and the 70 members of a family in one of the Aram. texts of Sendschirli. This abundant use of 70 must have been largely due to the fact that it was regarded as an intensified 7.

Seventy and seven, or 77, a combination found in the words of Lamech (Gen 4 24); the number of the princes and elders of Succoth (Jgs 8 14); and the number of lambs in a memorable sacrifice (Ezr 8 35), would appeal in the same way to the oriental fancy.

The product of seven and seventy (Gr hebdomēkontákis heptá) is met with once in the NT (Mt 18 22), and in the LXX of the above-quoted Gen 4 24. Moulton, however (Gram. of Gr NT Prolegomena, 98), renders in both passages 70+7; contra, Allen, "Mt," ICC, 199. The number is clearly a forceful equivalent of "always."

Seven thousand in 1 K 19 18 || Rom 11 4 may be a round number chosen on account of its embodiment of the number 7. In the MS the number of Israelites slain at the capture of the city of Nebo by the Moabites is reckoned at 7,000.

The half of seven seems sometimes to have been regarded as significant. In Dnl 7 25; 9 27; 12 7; Lk 4 25 || Jas 5 17; Rev 11 2; 13 5 a period of distress is calculated at 3½ years, that is, half the period of sacred completeness.

The number three seems early to have attracted attention as the number in which beginning, middle and end are most distinctly marked, and to have been therefore regarded as symbolic of a complete and ordered whole. Abundant illustration of its use in this way in Bab theology, ritual and magic is given from the cuneiform texts by Hehn (op. cit., 63 ff.), and the hundreds of passages in the Bible in which the number occurs include many where this special significance either lies on the surface or not far beneath it. This is owing in some degree perhaps to Bab influence, but will have been largely due to independent observation of common phenomena—the arithmetical fact mentioned above and familiar trios, such as heaven, earth, and sea (or "the abyss"); morning, noon and night; right, middle, and left, etc. In other words, 3 readily suggested completeness, and was often used with a glance at that meaning in daily life and daily speech. Only a selection from the great mass of Bib. examples can be given here. (1) Three is often found of persons and things sacred or secular, e.g. Noah's 3 sons (Gen 6 10); Job's 3 daughters (Job 1 2; 42 13) and 3 friends (Job 2 11); Abraham's 3 guests (Gen 18 2); and Sarah's 3 measures of meal (ver 6; cf Mt 13 33); 3 in military tactics (Jgs 7 16.20; 9 43; 1 S 11 11; 13 17; Job 1 17); 3 great feasts (Ex 23 14); the 3 daily prayers (Ps 55 17; Dnl 6 10.13); the 3 night watches (Jgs 7 19); God's 3-fold call of Samuel (1 S 3 8); the 3 keepers of the temple threshold (Jer 52 24); the 3 presidents appointed by Darius (Dnl 6 2); the 3 temptations (Mt 4 3.5 f.8 f.); the 3 prayers in Gethsemane (Mt 26 39.42.44 ||); Peter's 3 denials (Mt 26 34.75 ||); the Lord's 3-fold question and 3-fold charge (Jn 21 15 ff.); and the 3-fold vision of the sheet (Acts 10 16). (2) In a very large number of passages 3 is used of periods of time: 3 days; 3 weeks; 3 months and 3 years. So in Gen 40 12.13.18; Ex 2 2; 10 22 f.; 2 S 24 13; Isa 20 3; Jon 1 17; Mt 15 32; Lk 2 46; 13 7; Acts 9 9; 2 Cor 12 8. The frequent reference to the resurrection "on the 3d day" or "after 3 days" (Mt 16 21; 27 63, etc) may at the same time have glanced at the symbolic use of the number and at the belief common perhaps to the Jews and the Zoroastrians that a corpse was not recognizable after 3 days (for Jewish testimony cf Jn 11 39; Ybhāmōth, xvi.3; Midr. Gen., ch c; S'māhōth, viii; for Pers ideas cf Expos T, XVIII, 536). (3) The number 3 is also used in a literary way, sometimes appearing only in the structure. Note as examples the 3-fold benediction of Israel (Nu 6 24 ff.); the Thrice Holy of the seraphim (Isa 6 3); the 3-fold overturn (Ezk 21 27 [Heb 32]); the 3-fold refrain of Pss 42, 43 regarded as one psalm (Ps 42 5.11; 43 5); the 3 names of God (the Mighty One, God, Jehovah, Josh 22 22; cf Ps 50 1); the 3 graces of 1 Cor 13; the 3 witnesses (1 Jn 5 8); the frequent use of 3 and 3d in Rev; the description of God as "who is and who was and who is to come" (Rev 1 4); and 'the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit' (Mt 28 19). In some of these cases 3-fold repetition is a mode of expressing the superlative, and others remind us of the remarkable association of 3 with deity alluded to by Plato and Philo, and illustrated by the triads of Egypt and Babylonia and the Far East. It cannot, however, be proved, or even made probable, that there is any direct connection between any of these triads and the Christian Trinity. All that can be said is, that the same numerical symbolism may have been operative in both cases.

The 4 points of the compass and the 4 phases of the moon will have been early noticed, and the former at any rate will have suggested

3. The Number Four before Bib. times the use of 4 as a symbol of completeness of range, of comprehensive extent. As early as the middle of the 3d millennium BC Bab rulers (followed long afterward by the Assyrians) assumed the title "king of the 4 quarters," meaning that their rule reached in all directions, and an early conqueror claimed to have subdued the 4 quarters. There are not a few illustrations of the use of 4 in some such way in the Bible. The 4 winds (referred to also in the cuneiform texts and the Book of the Dead) are mentioned again and again (Jer 49 36; Ezk 37 9), and the 4 quarters or corners (Isa 11 12; Ezk 7 2; Rev 20 8). We read also of the 4 heads of the river of Eden (Gen 2 10 ff.), of 4 horns, 4 smiths, 4 chariots, and horses of 4 colors in the visions of Zechariah (1 8 LXX, 18 ff; 6 1 ff), the chariots being directly connected with the 4 winds; 4 punishments (Jer 15 3; Ezk 14 21, the latter with a remarkable Assyrian parallel), the 4 kingdoms in Nebuchadnezzar's dream as interpreted (Dnl 2 37 ff) and Daniel's vision (7 3 ff); the 4 living creatures in Ezk (1 5 ff; cf 10), each with 4 faces and 4 wings, and the 4 modeled after them (Rev 4 6, etc). In most of these cases 4 is clearly symbolical, as in a number of passages in Apoc and Pseudepigrapha. Whether the frequent use of it in the structure of the tabernacle, Solomon's temple, and Ezekiel's temple has anything to do with the symbolic meaning is not clear, but the latter can probably be traced in proverbial and prophetic speech (Prov 30 15.18.21.24.29; Am 1 3.6, etc). The 4 transgressions of the latter represent full-summed iniquity, and the 4-fold grouping in the former suggested the wide sweep of the classification. Perhaps it is not fanciful to find the idea in the 4 sets of hearers of the gospel in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13 19-23 ||). The rabbis almost certainly had it in mind in their 4-fold grouping of characters in six successive paragraphs (Ab, v.16-21) which, however, is of considerably later date.

As the basis of the decimal system, which probably originated in counting with the fingers, 10 has been a significant number in all historical ages. The 10 antediluvian patriarchs (Gen 5; cf the 10 Bab kings of Berossus, and 10 in early Iranian and far-Eastern myths); the 10 righteous men who would have saved Sodom (Gen 18 32); the 10 plagues of Egypt; the 10 commandments (Ex 20 2-17 || Dt 5 6-21); the 10 commandments found by some in Ex 34 14-26 are not clearly made out; the 10 servants of Gideon (Jgs 6 27); the 10 elders who accompanied Boaz (Ruth 4 2); the 10 virgins of the parable (Mt 25 1); the 10 pieces of silver (Lk 15 8); the 10 servants entrusted with 10 pounds (Lk 19 13 ff), the most capable of whom was placed over 10 cities (ver 17); the 10 days' tribulation predicted for the church of Smyrna (Rev 2 10); the use of "10 times" in the sense of "many times" (Gen 31 7; Neh 4 12; Dnl 1 20, etc, an idiom met with repeatedly in Am Tab); and the use of 10 in sacred measurements and in the widely diffused custom of tithe, and many other examples show plainly that 10 was a favorite symbolic number suggestive of a rounded total, large or small, according to circumstances. The number played a prominent part in later Jewish life and thought. Ten times was the Tetragrammaton uttered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement; 10 persons must be present at a nuptial benediction; 10 constituted a congregation in the synagogue; 10 was the usual number of a company at the paschal meal, and of a row of comforters of the bereaved. The world was created, said the rabbis, by ten words, and Abraham was visited with 10 temptations (Ab, v.1 and 4; several other illustrations are found in the context).

The 12 months and the 12 signs of the zodiac probably suggested to the old Babylonians the use of 12 as a symbolic or semi-sacred number, but its frequent employment by the Israelites with special meaning cannot at present be proved to have originated in that way, although the idea was favored by both Jos and Philo. So far as we know, Israelitish predilection for 12 was entirely due to the traditional belief that the nation consisted of 12 tribes, a belief, it is true, entertained also by the Arabs or some of them, but with much less intensity and persistence. In Israel the belief was universal and ineradicable. Hence the 12 pillars set up by Moses (Ex 24 4); the 12 jewels in the high priest's breast-plate (Ex 28 21); the 12 cakes of shewbread (Lev 24 5); the 12 rods (Nu 17 2); the 12 spies (Nu 13); the 12 stones placed by Joshua in the bed of Jordan (Josh 4 9);

5. The Number Twelve

the 12 officers of Solomon (1 K 4 7); the 12 stones of Elijah's altar (1 K 18 31); the 12 disciples or apostles (26 t), and several details of apocalyptic imagery (Rev 7 5 ff; 12 1; 21 12.14.16.21; 22 2; cf also Mt 14 20 || 19 28 || 26 53; Acts 26 7). The number pointed in the first instance at unity and completeness which had been sanctioned by Divine election, and it retained this significance when applied to the spiritual Israel. Philo indeed calls it a perfect number. Its double in Rev 4 4, etc, is probably also significant.

Five came readily into the mind as the half of 10. Hence perhaps its use in the parable of the Virgins (Mt 25 2). It was often employed in literary division, e.g. in the Pent, the Pss, the part of the Hagiographa known as the Meghilloth, the Ethiopic Enoch and Mt (7 28; 11 1; 13 53; 19 1; 26 1; cf Sir J. Hawkins, *Horae Synopticae*², 163 ff).

It seems to have been occasionally suggestive of relative smallness, as in Lev 26 8, the 5 loaves (Mt 14 17 ||), 1 Cor 14 19, and perhaps in Am Tab. It has been remarked (Skinner, "Gen," ICC, 483) that the number occurs repeatedly in reference to matters Egypt (Gen 41 34; 45 22; 47 2; Isa 19 18), but there seems to be no satisfactory explanation. Sixty. Although, as was before observed, there is no direct trace in the Bible of the numerical system based on 60, there are a few passages where there may be a distant echo. The 60 cities of Argob (Dt 3 4; Josh 13 30; 1 K 4 13); the 60 mighty men and the 60 queens of Cant 3 7; 6 8, the double use of 60 of Rehoboam's harem and family (2 Ch 11 21), the 3 sacrifices of 60 victims each (Nu 7 88), and the length of Solomon's temple, 60 cubits (1 K 6 2 || 2 Ch 3 3), may perhaps have a remote connection with the Bab use. It must be remembered that the latter was current in Israel and the neighboring regions in the division of the talent into 60 minas. A few passages in the Pseudepigrapha may be similarly interpreted, and the Bab Talm contains, as might be expected, many clear allusions. In the Bible, however, the special use of the number is relatively rare and indirect. One hundred and ten, the age attained by Joseph (Gen 50 22), is significant as the Egypt ideal of longevity (Smith, *DB*², 1804 f; Skinner, "Gen," ICC, 539 f). One hundred and fifty-three: The Gr poet Oppian (c 171 AD) and others are said to have reckoned the number of fishes in the world at this figure (cf Jerome on Ezk 47), and some scholars find a reference to that belief in Jn 21 11 in which case the number would be symbolic of comprehensiveness. That is not quite impossible, but the suggestion cannot be safely pressed. Throughout this discussion of significant numbers it must be borne in mind that writers and teachers may often have been influenced by the desire to aid the memory of those they addressed, and may to that end have arranged thoughts and facts in groups of 3, or 4, or 7, or 10, and so on (Sir John Hawkins, *Horae Synopticae*², 166 f). They will at the same time have remembered the symbolic force of these numbers, and in some cases, at least, will have used them as round numbers. There are many places in which the round and the symbolic uses of a number cannot be sharply distinguished.

VI. Gematria (gēmatrīyā).—A peculiar application of numbers which was in great favor with the later Jews and some of the early Christians and is not absolutely unknown to the Bible, is Gematria, that is the use of the letters of a word so as by means of their combined numerical value to express a name, or a witty association of ideas. The term is usually explained as an adaptation of the Gr word geōmetria, that is, "geometry," but Dalman (Wörterbuch, s.v.) connects it in this application of it with grammatēia. There is only one clear example in Scripture, the number of the beast which is the number of a man, six hundred sixty and six (Rev 13 18). If, as most scholars are inclined to believe, a name is intended, the numerical value of the letters composing which adds up to 666, and if it is assumed that the writer thought in Heb or Aram. Nero Caesar written with the consonants nūn=50, rēsh=200, wāw=6, nūn=50, kōph=100, sāmekh=60, rēsh=200: total=666, seems to be the best solution. Perhaps the idea suggested by Dr. Milligan that the 3-fold use of 6 which just falls short of 7, the number of sacred completeness, and is therefore a note of imperfection, may have been also in the writer's mind. Some modern scholars find a second instance in Gen 14 14 and 15 2. As the numerical value of the consonants which compose Eliezer in Heb add up to 318, it has been maintained that the number is not historical, but has been fancifully constructed by means of gematria out of the name. This strange idea is not new, for it is found in the Midrash on Gen (ch 43) in the name of a rabbi who lived c 200 AD, but its antiquity is its greatest merit.

LITERATURE

1. Title and Contents.—Styled in the Heb Bible כְּמִדְבָּר, bamidhbar, "in the wilderness," from the 5th word in 1 1, probably because of 1. Title recording the fortunes of Israel in the Sinaitic desert. The 4th book of the Pent (or of the Hex, according to criticism) was designated Ἀριθμοί, Árithmoi, in LXX and Numeri in the Vulg, and from this last received its name "Numbers" in the AV, in all 3 evidently because of its reporting the 2 censuses which were taken, the one at Sinai at the beginning and the other on the plains of Moab at the close of the wanderings.

Of the contents the following arrangement will be sufficiently detailed:

- (1) Before leaving Sinai, 1 1–10 10 (a period of 19 days, from the 1st to the 20th of the 2d month after the exodus), describing:

 - (b) The rebellion of Korah, ch 16.
 - (c) The budding of Aaron's rod, ch 17.
 - (d) The duties and revenues of the priests and Levites, ch 18.

II. Literary Structure.—According to modern criticism, the text of Nu, like that of the other books of the Pent (or Hex), instead of being regarded as substantially the work of one writer (whatever may have been his sources of information and whoever may have been its first or latest editor), should be distributed—not always in solid blocks of composition, but frequently in fragments, in sentences, clauses or words, so mysteriously put together that they cannot now with certainty be separated—among three writers, J, E and P with another D (at least in one part)—these writers, individuals and not schools (Gunkel), belonging, respectively: J to the 9th cent. BC (c 830), E to the 8th cent. BC (c 750), P to the 5th cent. BC (c 444), and D to the 7th cent. BC (c 621).

The grounds upon which this distribution is made are principally these: (1) the supposed preferential use of the Divine names, of

1. Alleged Jeh (Lord) by J, and of Elohim (God) Grounds of by E and P—a theory, however, which Distribution hopelessly breaks down in its application, as Orr (POT, ch vii), Eerdmans (St, 33 ff) and Wiener (EPC, I) have conclusively shown, and as will afterward appear; (2) distinctions in style of composition, which are not always obvious and which, even if they were, would not necessarily imply diversity of authorship unless every author's writing must be uniform and monotonous, whatever his subject may be; and (3) perhaps chiefly a preconceived theory of religious development in Israel, according to which the people in pre-Mosaic times were animists, totemists and polytheists; in Mosaic times and after, henotheists or worshippers of one God, while recognizing the existence of other gods; and latterly, in exile and post-exile times, monotheists or worshippers of the one living and true God—which theory, in order to vindicate its plausibility, required the reconstruction of Israel's religious documents in the way above described, but which is now rejected by archaeologists (Delitzsch and A. Jeremias) and by theologians (Orr, Baentsch [though accepting the analysis on other grounds] and König) as not supported by facts.

Without denying that the text-analysis of criticism is on the first blush of it both plausible and attractive and has brought to light valuable information relative to Scripture, or without overlooking the fact that it has behind it the names of eminent scholars and is supported by not a few considerations of weight, one may fairly urge against it the following objections.

(1) Hypothesis unproved.—At the best, the theory is an unproved and largely imaginary hypothesis, or series of hypotheses—"hypothesis built on hypothesis" (Orr); and nothing more strikingly reveals this than (a) the frequency with which in the text-analysis conjecture ("perhaps" and "probably") takes the place of reasoned proof; (b) the arbitrary manner in which the supposed documents are constructed by the critics who, without reason given, and often in violation of their own rules and principles, lift out of J (for instance) every word or clause they consider should belong to E or P, and vice versa every word or clause out of E or P that might suggest that the passage should be assigned to J, at the same time explaining the presence of the inconvenient word or clause in a document to which it did not belong by the careless or deliberate action of a redactor; and (c) the failure even thus to construct the documents successfully, most critics admitting that J and E cannot with confidence be separated from each other—Kuenen himself saying that "the attempt to make out a Jehovistic and an Elohist writer or school of writers by means of the Divine names has led criticism on a wrong way"; and some even denying that P ever existed as a separate document at all, Eerdmans (St. 33, 82), in particular, maintaining, as the result of elaborate exegesis, that P could not have been constructed in either exilic or post-exilic times "as an introduction to a legal work."

(2) Written record not impossible.—It is impossible to demonstrate that the story of Israel's "wanderings" was not committed to writing by Moses, who certainly was not unacquainted with the art of writing, who had the ability, if any man had, to prepare such a writing, whose interest it was, as the leader of his people, to see that such writing, whether done by himself or by others under his supervision, was accurate, and who besides had been commanded by God to write the journeyings of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt and Babylon; and that what was then fixed in written characters was only the tradition that had floated down for 5 cents. from mouth to mouth, is simply to say that little or no dependence can be placed upon the narrative, that while there may be at the bottom of it some grains of fact, the main body of it is fiction. This conclusion will not be readily admitted.

(3) No book constructed in this way.—No reliable evidence exists that any book either ancient or modern was ever constructed as, according to criticism, the Pent, and in particular Nu, was. Volumes have indeed been composed by two or more authors, acting in concert, but their contributions have never been intermixed as those of J, E, D and P are declared to have been; nor, when joint authorship has been acknowledged on the title-page, has it been possible for readers confidently to assign to each author his own contribution. And yet, modern criticism, dealing with documents more than 2,000 years old and in a language foreign to the critics—which documents, moreover, exist only in MSS not older than the 10th cent. AD (Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT, 28), and the text of which has been fixed not infallibly either as to consonant or vowel—claims that it can tell exactly (or nearly so) what parts, whether paragraphs, sentences, clauses or words, were supplied by J, E, P and D respectively. Credat Judaeus Apella!

(4) Inherent difficulties of analysis.—The critical theory, besides making of the text of Nu, as of the other books of the Pent, such a patchwork as is unthinkable in any document with ordinary pretension to historical veracity, is burdened with inherent difficulties which make it hard to credit, as the following examples, taken from Nu, will show.

(a) The story of the spies: Chs 13 and 14 are thus distributed by Cornill, Driver, Strack and EB: JE, 13 17b-20.22-24.26b-31.32b.33; 14 3.4.8.9.11-25.39-45.

P, 13 1-17a.21.25.26a (to Paran).32a; 14 1.2 (in the main). 5-7.10.26-38 (in the main).

Kautzsch generally agrees; and Hartford-Battersby in HDB professes ability to divide between J and E.

(i) According to this analysis, however, up to the middle of the 5th cent. BC, either JE began at 13 17b, in which case it wanted both the instruction to search the land and the names of the searchers, both of which were subsequently added from P (assuming it to have been a separate document, which is doubtful); or, if JE contained both the instruction and the names, these were supplanted by 1-17a from P. As the former of these alternatives is hardly likely, one naturally asks why the opening verses of JE were removed and those of P substituted? And if they were removed, what has become of them? Does not the occurrence of Jeh in 1-17a, on the critical principles of some, suggest that this section is the missing paragraph of JE?

(ii) If the JE passages furnish a nearly complete narrative (Driver), why should the late compiler or editor have deemed it necessary to insert two whole verses, 21 and 25, and two halves, 26a and 32a, if not because without these the original JE narrative would have been incomplete? Ver 21 states in general terms that the spies searched the whole land, proceeding as far N. as Hamath, after which ver 22 mentions that they entered the country from the S. and went up to Hebron and Eshcol, without at all stating an incongruity (Gray) or implying (Driver) that they travelled no farther N.—the reason for specifying the visit to Eshcol being the interesting fact that there the extraordinary cluster of grapes was obtained. Vs 25.26a relate quite naturally that the spies returned to Kadesh after 40 days and reported what they had found to Moses and Aaron as well as to all the congregation. Without these verses the narrative would have stated neither how long the land had been searched nor whether Moses and Aaron had received any report from their messengers, although ver 26b implies that a report was given to some person or persons unnamed. That Moses and Aaron should not have been named in JE is exceedingly improbable. Ver 32a is in no way inconsistent with vs 26b-31, which state that the land was flowing with milk and honey. What ver 32a adds is an expression of the exaggerated fears of the spies, whose language could not mean that the land was so barren that they would die of starvation, a statement which would have expressly contradicted ver 27 (JE)—in which case why should it have been inserted?—but that, notwithstanding its fruitfulness, the population was continually being wasted by internecine wars and the incursions of surrounding tribes. The starvation theory, moreover, is not supported by the texts (Lev 26 38; Ezk 36 13) usually quoted in its behalf.

(iii) To argue (Driver) for two documents because Joshua is not always mentioned along with

Caleb is not strikingly convincing; while if Joshua is not included among the spies in JE, that is obviously because the passages containing his name have been assigned beforehand to P. But if Joshua's name did not occur in JE, why would it have been inserted in the story by a post-exilic writer, when even in Dt 1 36 Joshua is not expressly named as one of the spies, though again the language in Dt 1 38 tacitly suggests that both Caleb and Joshua were among the searchers of the land, and that any partition of the text which conveys the impression that Joshua was not among the spies is wrong?

(iv) If the text-analysis is as the critics arrange, how comes it that in JE the name Jeh does not once occur, while all the verses containing it are allocated to P?

(b) The rebellion of Korah: Chs 16 and 17 are supposed to be the work of "two, if not three," contributors (Driver, Kautzsch)—the whole story being assigned to P (enlarged by additions about which the text analysts are not unanimous), with the exception of 16 1b.2a.12-15.25.26.27b-34, which are given to JE, though variations here also are not unknown.

It is admitted that the JE verses, if read continuously, make out a story of Dathan and Abiram as distinguished from Korah and his company; that the motives of Dathan and Abiram probably differed from those of Korah and his company, and that Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by an earthquake, while the 250 incense-offers were destroyed by fire. To conclude from this, however, that three or even two narratives have been intermixed is traveling beyond the premises.

(i) If JE contained more about the conspiracy of the Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram, than has been preserved in the verses assigned to it, what has become of the excised verses, if they are not those ascribed to P; and, if they are not, what evidence exists that P's verses are better than the lost verses of JE? And how comes it that in P the Divine name used throughout, with one exception, ver 22, is Jeh, while in JE it occurs only 6 t?

(ii) If JE contained only the parts assigned to it and nothing more happened than the Reubenite émeute, why should the Korahite rebellion have been added to it 4 cents. later, if that rebellion never happened? (iii) If the Korahite conspiracy did happen, why should it have been omitted in JE, and nothing whispered about it till after the exile? (iv) If the two conspiracies, ecclesiastical (among the princes) and civil (among the laymen), arose contemporaneously, and the conspirators made common cause with one another in that there was nothing unusual or contrary to experience. (v) If Moses addressed himself now to Korah and again to Dathan and Abiram, why should not the same document say so? (vi) If Dathan and Abiram were engulfed by an earthquake, and the 250 princes were consumed by fire from the tabernacle, even that does not necessitate two documents, since both events might have occurred together. (vii) It is not certain that P (vs 35-43) represents Korah as having been consumed by fire, while JE (vs 31-33) declares he was swallowed up by the earth. At least P (26 10) distinctly states that Korah was swallowed up by the earth, and that only the 250 were consumed by fire.

Wherefore, in the face of these considerations, it is not too much to say that the evidence for more documents than one in this story is not convincing.

(c) The story of Balaam: Chs 22-24 fare more leniently at the hands of analysis, being all left with JE, except 22 1, which is generously handed over to P. Uncertainty, however, exists as to how to partition ch 22 between J and E. Whether all should be given to E because of the almost uniform use of Elohîm rather than of Jeh, with the exception of vs 22-35a, which are the property of J because of the use of Jeh (Driver, Kautzsch); or whether some additional verses should not be assigned to J (Cornill, HDB), critics are not agreed. As to chs 23 and 24, authorities hesitate whether to give both to J or to E, or ch 23 to E and ch 24 to J, or both to a late redactor who had access to the two sources—surely an unsatisfactory demonstration in this case at least of the documentary hypothesis. Comment on the use of the Divine names in this story is reserved till later.

Yet, while declining to accept this hypothesis as proved, it is not contended that the materials in Nu are always arranged in chronological order, or that the style of composition is throughout the same, or that the book as it stands has never been revised or edited, but is in every jot and tittle the same as when first constructed. In ch 7, e.g., the narrative goes back to the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year, and in ch 9 to the 1st month of the 2d year, though ch 1 begins with the 1st day of the 2d month of the 2d year. There are also legislative passages interspersed among the historical, and poetical among the prosaic, but diversity of authorship, as already suggested, cannot be inferred from either of these facts unless it is impossible for a writer to be sometimes disorderly in the arrangement of his materials; and for a lawgiver to be also a historian, and for a prose writer occasionally to burst into song. Assertions like these, however, cannot be entertained. Hence any argument for plurality of documents founded on them must be set aside. Nor is it a fair conclusion against the literary unity of the book that its contents are varied in substance and form and have been subjected, as is probable, to revision and even to interpolations, provided always these revisions and interpolations have not changed the meaning of the book. Whether, therefore, the Book of Nu has or has not been compiled from preëxisting documents, it cannot be justly maintained that the text-analysis suggested by the critics has been established, or that the literary unity of Nu has been disproved.

III. Historical Credibility.—Were the narrative in this book written down immediately or soon after the events it records, no reason would exist for challenging its authenticity, unless it could be shown either from the narrative itself or from extraneous sources that the events chronicled were internally improbable, incredible or falsified. Even should it be proved that the text consists of two or more preëxisting documents interwoven with one another, this would not necessarily invalidate its truthfulness, if these documents were practically contemporaneous with the incidents they report, and were not combined in such a way as to distort and misrepresent the occurrences they related. If, however, these preëxisting documents were prepared 500 (JE) or 1,000 (P) years after the incidents they narrate, and were merely a fixing in written characters of traditions previously handed down (JE), or of legislation newly invented and largely imaginary (P), it will not be easy to establish their historical validity. The credibility of this portion of the Pent has been assailed on the alleged ground that it contains chronological inaccuracies, statistical errors and physical impossibilities.

(1) The second Passover (9 1-5)—The critical argument is that a contemporary historian would naturally have placed this paragraph before 1 1. The answer is that possibly he would have done so had his object been to observe strict chronological order, which it manifestly was not (see chs 7 and 9), and had he when commencing the book deemed it necessary to state that the Israelites had celebrated a second Passover on the legally appointed day, the 14th of the 1st month of the 2d year. This, however, he possibly at first assumed would be understood, and only afterward, when giving the reason for the supplementary Passover, realized that in after years readers might erroneously conclude that this was all the Passover that had been kept in the 2d year. So to obviate any such mistaken inference, he prefixed to his account of the Little Passover, as it is sometimes called, a statement to the effect that the statutory ordinance, the Great Passover, had been observed at the usual time, in the usual way, and that, too, in obedience to the express commandment of Jeh.

(2) The thirty-seven years' chasm.—Whether 20 1 be considered the beginning of the 3d or of the 40th year, in either case a period of 37 years is passed over—in the one case in almost unbroken silence; in the other with scarcely anything of moment recorded save Korah's rebellion and the publication of a few laws concerning offerings to be made when the people reached the land of their habitation. To pronounce the whole book unhistorical because of this long interval of absolute or comparative silence (Bleek) is unreasonable. Most histories on this principle would be cast into the wastebasket. Besides, a historian might have as good reason for passing over as for recording the incidents of any particular period. And this might have been the case with the author of Nu. From the moment sentence of death was passed upon the old generation at Kadesh, till the hour when the new generation started out for Canaan, he may have counted that Israel had practically ceased to be the people of Jeh, or at least that their fortunes formed no part of the history of Jeh's kingdom; and it is noticeable that scarcely had the tribes reassembled at Kadesh in preparation for their onward march than Miriam and Aaron, probably the last of the doomed generation, died. Accordingly, from this point on, the narrative is occupied with the fortunes of the new generation. Whether correct or not, this solution of the 37 years' silence (Kurtz) is preferable to that which suggests (Ewald) that the late compiler, having found it impossible to locate all the traditions he had collected into the closing years of the wanderings, placed the rest of them in the first 2 years, and left the interval a blank—a solution which has not even the merit of being clever and explains nothing. It does not explain why, if the narrator was not writing history, there should have been an interval at all. A romancer would not have missed so splendid an opportunity for exercising his art, would not have left a gap of 37 years unfilled, but like the writers of the apocryphal Gospels would have crowded it with manufactured tales.

On the better theory, not only is the silence explained, but the items inserted are accounted for as well. Though the unbelieving generation had ceased to be the people of Jeh, Aaron had not yet been sentenced to exclusion from the promised land. He was still one of the representatives of the kingdom of Jeh, and Korah's rebellion practically struck a blow at that kingdom. As such it was punished, and the story of its breaking out and suppression was recorded, as a matter that vitally concerned the stability of the kingdom. For a like reason, the legislative sections were included in the narrative. They were Jeh's acts and not the people's. They were statutes and ordinances for the new generation in the new land.

(3) The fortieth year.—The events recorded as having taken place between the 1st of the 5th month (the date of Aaron's death) and the 1st of the 11th month (the date of Moses' address) are so numerous and important as to render it impossible, it is said, to maintain the credibility of this portion of the narrative. But (a) it is not certain that all the events in this section were finished before Moses began his oration; neither (b) is it necessary to hold that they all occurred in succession, while (c) until the rapidity with which events followed one another is ascertained, it will not be possible to decide whether or not they could all have been begun and finished within the space of 6 months.

(1) Number of the fighting men.—This, which may be set down roughly at 600,000, has been challenged on two grounds: (a) that the

2. So-called number is too large, and (b) that the Statistical censuses at Sinai and in Moab are Errors too nearly equal.

The first of these objections will be considered in the following section when treating of the size of the congregation. The second will not appear formidable if it be remembered (a) that it is neither impossible nor unusual for the population of a country to remain stationary for a long series of years; (b) that there was a special fitness in Israel's case that the doomed generation should be replaced by one as nearly as possible equal to that which had perished; (c) that had the narrative been invented, it is more than likely that the numbers would have been made either exactly equal or more widely divergent; and (d) that so many variations occurring in the strength of the tribes as numbered at Sinai and again in Moab, while the totals so nearly correspond, constitutes a watermark of truthfulness which should not be overlooked.

(2) The size of the congregation.—Taking the fighting men at 600,000 and the whole community at $4\frac{1}{2}$ times that number, or about $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions, several difficulties emerge which have led to the suggestion (Eerdmans, Conder, Wiener) that the 600,000 should be reduced (to, say, 60,000), and the entire population to less than 30,000. The following alleged impossibilities are believed to justify this reduction: (a) that of 70 families increasing to $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions between the descent into, and the departure from, Egypt; (b) that of $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions being led out of Egypt in one day; (c) that of obtaining support for so large a multitude with their flocks in the Sinaitic desert; (d) that of finding room for them either before the Mount at Sinai, or in the limited territory of Pal; and (e) that of the long time it took to conquer Pal if the army was 600,000 strong.

(a) Multiplication of people: As to the possibility of 70 souls multiplying in the course of 215 years or 7 generations (to take the shorter interval rather than the longer of 430 years) into $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of persons giving 600,000 fighting men, that need not be regarded as incredible till the rate of increase in each family is exactly known. Allowing to each of Jacob's grandsons who were married (say 51 out of 53), 4 male descendants (Colenso allows $4\frac{1}{2}$), these would in 7 generations—not in 4 (Colenso)—amount to 835,584, and with surviving fathers and grandfathers added might well reach 900,000, of whom 600,000 might be above 20 years of age. But in point of fact, without definite data about the number of generations, the rates of birth and of mortality in each generation, all calculations are at the best problematical. The most that can be done is to consider whether the narrative mentions any circumstances fitted to explain this large number of fighting men and the great size of the congregation, and then whether the customary objections to the Bib. statement can be satisfactorily set aside.

As for confirmatory circumstances, the Bible expressly states that during the years of the oppression the Hebrews were extraordinarily fruitful, and that this was the reason why Pharaoh became alarmed and issued his edict for the destruction of the male children. The fruitfulness of the Hebrews, however, has been challenged (Eerdmans, Vorgeschichte Israels, 78) on the ground that were the births so numerous as this presupposes, two midwives (Ex 1 15) would not have sufficed for the necessary offices. But if the two to whom Pharaoh spake were the superintendents of the midwives throughout Goshen, to whom the king would hardly address himself individually, or if they were the two officiating in Heliopolis, the statement in Ex 1 15 will appear natural enough, and not opposed to the statement in Ex 1 10 that Pharaoh was alarmed at the multiplication of the Hebrews in his land. And, indeed, if the Hebrews were only 30,000 strong, it is not easy to see why the whole might of Egypt could not have kept them in subjection. Then as to the congregation being $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions if the fighting men were 600,000, that corresponds with the proportion which existed among the Helvetii, who had 92,000 men capable of bearing arms out of a population, including children, old men and women, of 368,000 souls (Caesar, BG, i, 20). This seems to answer the objection (Eerdmans, Vorgeschichte Israels, 78) that the unschooled Oriental is commonly addicted to exaggeration where numbers are concerned.

(b) Exodus in one day: The second difficulty would be serious were it necessary to suppose that the Israelites had never heard about their projected journey till the 14th of the 1st month. But the idea of going forth from Egypt must have been before them since the day Moses went to Pharaoh to demand their liberation; and at least 4 days before the 14th they had begun to prepare for departure. In circumstances such as these, with a people thirsting for liberty and only waiting the signal to move, aware also of the hour at which that signal would be given, viz. at midnight, it does not appear so formidable a task as is imagined to get them all assembled in one day at a fore-appointed rendezvous, more esp. as they were not likely to delay or linger in their movements. But how could there have been $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of fugitives, it is asked (Eerdmans, Wiener), if Pharaoh deemed 600 chariots sufficient for pursuit? The answer is that Pharaoh did not reckon 600 chariots sufficient, but in addition to these, which were "chosen chariots," he took all the chariots of Egypt, his horsemen and his army (Ex 14 7.9), which were surely adequate to overcome a weaponless crowd, however big it might be. And that it was big, a vast horde indeed, Pharaoh's host implies.

(c) Support in wilderness: The supposed difficulty of obtaining support for $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of people with the flocks and herds in the Sinaitic desert takes for granted that the desert was then as barren a region as it is now, which cannot be proved, and is as little likely to be correct as it would be to argue that Egypt, which was then the granary of the world, was no more fertile than it was 10 years ago, or that the regions in which Babylon and Assyria were situated were as desolate then as they are now. This supposition disregards the fact that Moses fed the flocks of Jethro for 40 years in that same region of Sinai; that when the Israelites passed through it, it was inhabited by several powerful tribes. It overlooks, too, the fact that the flocks and herds of Israel were not necessarily all cooped up in one spot, but were most likely spread abroad in districts where water and vegetation could be found. And it ignores the statement in the narrative that the Israelites were not supplied exclusively by the produce of the desert, but had manna from heaven from the 1st day of the 2d month after leaving Egypt till they reached Canaan. Rationalistic expositors may relegate this statement to the limbo of fable, but unless the supernatural is to be eliminated altogether from the story, this statement must be accorded its full weight. So must the two miraculous supplies of water at Horeb (Ex 17) and at Kadesh (Nu 20) be treated. It is sometimes argued that these supplies were quite insufficient for $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of people with their flocks and herds; and that therefore the congregation could not have been so large. But the narrative in Nu states, and presumably it was the same in Ex, that the smitten rock poured forth its water so copiously and so continuously that 'the people drank abundantly with their flocks.' Wherefore no conclusion can be drawn from this against the reported size of the congregation.

(d) Room at Mt. Sinai: As to the impossibility of finding room for $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions of people either before the Mount at Sinai or within the land of Canaan (Conder), few will regard this as self-evident. If the site of their encampment was the Er-Rahab plain (Robinson, Stanley)—though the plain of Sebayeh, admittedly not so roomy, has been mentioned (Ritter, Kurtz, Knobel)—estimates differ as to the sufficiency of accommodation to be found there. Conder gives the dimensions of the plain as 4 sq. miles, which he deems insufficient, forgetting, perhaps, that "its extent is farther increased by lateral valleys receding from the plain itself" (Forty Days in the Desert, 73; cf Keil on Ex 19 1.2). Kalisch, though putting the size of the plain at a smaller figure, adds that "it thus furnished ample tenting ground for the hosts of Israel"—a conclusion accepted by Ebers, Riehm and others. In any case it seems driving literal interpretation to extreme lengths to hold that camping before the Mount necessarily meant that every member of the host required to be in full view of Sinai. As to not finding room in Canaan, it is doubtful if, after the conquest, the remnants of both peoples at any time numbered as many persons as dwelt in Pal during the most flourishing years of the kingdom. It may well be that the whole population of Pal today amounts to only about 600,000 souls; but Pal today under Turkish rule is no proper gauge for judging of Pal under David or even under Joshua.

(e) Slow conquest of Canaan: The long time it took to conquer Pal (Eerdmans, Vorgeschichte Israels, 78) is no solid argument to prove the unreliable character of the statement about the size of the army, and therefore of the congregation. Every person knows that in actual warfare, victory does not always go with the big battalions; and in this instance the desert-trained warriors allowed themselves to be seduced by the idolatries and immoralities of the Canaanites and forgot to execute the commission with which they had been intrusted, viz. to drive out the Canaanites from the land which had been promised to their fathers. Had they been faithful to Jeh, they would not have taken so long completely to possess the land (Ps 81 13.14). But if instead of having 600,000 stalwart soldiers they had only possessed 6,000, it is not difficult to see how they could not drive out the Canaanites. The difficulty is to perceive how they could have achieved as much as they did.

(3) The number of the firstborn.—That the 22,273 firstborn males from 1 month old and upward (3 43) is out of all proportion to the 603,550 men of 20 years old and upward, being much too few, has frequently (Bleek, Bohlen, Colenso and others) been felt as a difficulty, since it practically involves the conclusion that for every firstborn there must have been 40 or 45 males in each family. Various solutions of this difficulty have been offered. The prevalence of polygamy has been suggested (Michaëlis, Hävernicks). The exclusion of firstborn sons who were married, the inclusion only of the mother's firstborn, and the great fruitfulness of Heb mothers have been called in to surmount the difficulty (Kurtz). But perhaps the best explanation is that only those were counted who were born after the Law was given on the night of the departure from Egypt (Ex 13 2; Nu 3 13; 8 17) (Keil, Delitzsch, Gerlach). It may be urged, of course, that this would require an exceptionally large number of births in the 13 months; but in the exceptionally joyous circumstances of the emancipation this might not have been impossible. In any case, it does not seem reasonable on account of this difficulty, which might vanish were all the facts known, to impeach the historical accuracy of the narrative, even in this particular.

(Note.—In Scotland, with a population of nearly double that of the Israelites, viz. 4,877,648, the marriages in 1909 were 30,092, the lowest on record for 55 years. At this rate the births in Israel during the first 12 months after the exodus might have been 15,046, assuming each marriage to have had issue. As this marriage rate, however, is excessively low for Scotland in normal years, the number of marriages and therefore of births in Israel in the first year after the exodus may well have been twice, if not 3 times, 15,046, i.e. 30,092, or 45,138. Reckoning the half of these as males, viz. 15,046 or 22,569, it does not appear as if the number of the firstborn in the text were quite impossible, on the supposition made.)

(1) The duties of the priests.—These are supposed to have been so onerous that Aaron and his sons could not possibly have performed them. But (a) the Levitical laws, though published in the desert, were not necessarily intended to receive full and minute observance there, but only in Canaan. (b) In point of fact, as Moses afterward testified (Dt 12 8), the Levitical laws were not scrupulously kept in the wilderness. (c) There is no reason to suppose that the Passover of the 2d year was celebrated otherwise than it had been in Egypt before the exodus, the slaughtering of the lambs being performed by the heads of families. And (d) as the Levites were set apart to minister to the tabernacle (Nu 1 50), they would be able in many ways to assist the priests.

(2) The assembling of the congregation.—The assembling of the congregation at the door of the tabernacle (10 3.4) has been adduced as another physical impossibility; and no doubt it was if every man, woman and child, or even only every man was expected to be there; but not if the congregation was ordinarily represented by its "renowned" or "called" men, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands of Israel (1 16). To suppose that anything else was meant is surely not required. When Moses called all Israel and spake unto them (Dt 5 1; 29 2), no intelligent person understands that he personally addressed every individual, or spoke so as to be heard by every individual, though what he said was intended for all. An additional difficulty in the way of assembling the congregation, and by implication an argument against the size of the congregation, has been discovered in the two silver trumpets which, it is contended, were too few for summoning so vast a host as 2½ millions of people. But it is not stated in the narrative either (a) that it was absolutely necessary that every individual in the camp should hear the sound of the trumpets any more than it was indispensable that Balaam's curse should reach to the utmost bounds of Israel (Nu 23 13), or that a public proclamation by a modern state, though prefaced by means of an "Oyez," should be heard by all within the state or even within its capital; or (b) if it was necessary that everyone should hear, that the trumpeters could not move about through the camp but must remain stationary at the tabernacle door; or (c) that in the clear air of the desert the sound of the trumpets would not travel farther than in the noisy and murky atmosphere of modern cities; or (d) that should occasion arise for more trumpets than two, Moses and his successors were forbidden to make them.

(3) The marching of the host.—The marching of the host in four main divisions of about half a million each (2; 10 14-20) has also been pronounced a stumbling-block (Colenso, Eerdmans, Doughty), inasmuch as the procession formed (i.e. if no division began to fall into line till its predecessor had completed its evolutions) would require the whole day for its completion, and would make a column of unprecedented length—of 22 miles (Colenso), of 600 miles (Doughty)—and would even on the most favorable hypothesis travel only a few miles, when the whole line would again need to reconstruct the camp. The simple statement of this shows its absurdity as an explanation of what actually took place on the march, and indirectly suggests that the narrative may be historical after all, as no romancer of a late age would have risked his reputation by laying down such directions for the march, if they were susceptible of no other explanation than the above. How precisely the march was conducted may be difficult or even impossible to describe in such a way as to obviate all objections. But some considerations may be advanced to show that the march through the desert was neither impossible nor incredible. (a) The deploying of the four main divisions into line may have gone on simultaneously, as they were widely apart from each other, on the E. (Judah), on the S. (Reuben), on the W. (Ephraim) and on the N. (Dan). (b) There is no ground for thinking that the march would be conducted, at least at first, with the precision of a modern army, or that each division would extend itself to the length of 22 miles. It is more than likely that they would follow their standards as best they could or with such order as could be arranged by their captains. (c) If the camps of Judah and Reuben started their preparations together, say at 6 o'clock in the morning (which might be possible), and occupied 4 hours in completing these, they might begin to advance at 10 o'clock and cover 10 miles in another 4 hours, thus bringing them on to 2 P.M., after which 4 hours more would enable them to encamp themselves for the night, if that was necessary. The other two divisions falling into line, say at 2 o'clock, would arrive at 6 P.M., and by 10 P.M. would be settled for the night. (d) It does not seem certain that every night upon the march they would arrange themselves into a regularly constructed camp; rather it is reasonable to conclude that this would be done only when they had reached a spot where a halt was to be made for some time. (e) In any case, in the absence of more details as to how the march was conducted, arithmetical calculations are of little value and are not entitled to discredit the truthfulness of the narrative.

(4) The victory over Midian.—This has been objected to on moral grounds which are not now referred to. It is the supposed impossibility of 12,000 Israelites slaying all the male Midianites, capturing all their women and children, including 32,000 virgins, seizing all their cattle and flocks, with all their goods, and burning all their cities and castles without the loss of a single man (31 49), which occasions perplexity. Yet Scripture relates several victories of a similar description, as e.g. that of Abraham over the kings of the East (Gen 14 15), in which, so far as the record goes, no loss was incurred by the patriarch's army; that of Gideon's 300 over the Midianites at a later date (Jgs 7 22); that of Samson single-handed over 1,000 Philistines (Jgs 15 15); and that of Jehoshaphat at the battle of Tekoa (2 Ch 20 24), which was won without a blow—all more or less miraculous, no doubt. But in profane history, Tacitus (Ann. xiii.39) relates an instance in which the Romans slaughtered all their foes without losing a single man; and Strabo (xvi. 1128) mentions a battle in which 1,000 Arabs were slain by only 2 Romans; while the life of Saladin contains a like statement concerning the issue of a battle (Hävernick, Intro. 330). Hence Israel's victory over Midian does not afford sufficient ground for challenging its historic credibility.

IV. Authorship.—Restricting attention to evidence from Nu itself, it may be remarked in a general way that the question of authorship is practically settled by what has been advanced on its literary structure and historical credibility. For, if the materials of the book were substantially the work of one pen (whoever may have been their first collector or last redactor), and if these materials are upon the whole trustworthy, there will be little room to doubt that the original pen was in the hand of a contemporary and eyewitness of the incidents narrated, and that the contemporary and eyewitness was Moses, who need not, however, have set down everything with his own hand, all that is necessary to justify the ascription of the writing to him being that it should have been composed by his authority and under his supervision. In this sense it is believed that indications are not wanting in the book both against and for the Mosaic authorship; and these may now be considered.

(1) The alternating use of Divine names.—This usage, after forming so characteristic a feature in Gen and largely disappearing in Ex and Lev, reasserts itself in Nu, and the Mosaic more particularly in the story of Authorship Balaam. If chs 23 and 24 can be explained only as late documents pieced together, because of the use of "God" in ch 23 and of "Lord" in ch 24, then Moses was not their author. But if the varying use of the Divine names is susceptible of explanation on the assumption that the two chapters originally formed one document, then most distinctly the claim of Moses to authorship is not debarred. Now whether Balaam was a false or a true prophet, it is clear that he could hope to please Balak only by cursing Israel in the name of Jeh, the Elohim of Israel; and so it is always Jeh he consults or pretends to consult before replying to the messengers of Balak. Four times he did so (22 8.19; 23 3,15); and 3 t it was Elohim who met him (22 9.20; 23 14), while every time it was Jeh who put the word in his mouth. Can any conclusion be fairer than that the historian regarded Elohim and Jeh as the same Divine Being, and represented this as it were by a double emphasis, which showed (a) that the Jeh whom Balaam consulted was Elohim or the supreme God, and (b) that the God who met Balaam and supplied him with oracles was Israel's Lord? Thus explained, the alternate use of the Divine names does not require the hypothesis of two single documents rolled into one; and indeed the argument from the use of the Divine names is now generally abandoned.

(2) Traces of late authorship.—Traces of late authorship are believed to exist in several passages: (a) 15 32-36 seems to imply that the writer was no longer in the wilderness, which may well have been the case, if already he was in the land of Moab. (b) 20 5 suggests, it is said, that the people were then in Canaan. But the language rather conveys the impression that they were not yet come to Canaan; and in point of fact the people were at Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin. (c) In 21 14.15. 17.18.27-30, certain archaic songs are cited as if the people were familiar with them, and the Arnon is mentioned as the border of Moab long before Israel reached the river. But that poets were among the people at the time of the exodus and probably long before, the song of Moses (Ex 15) shows, and that a Book of the Wars of the Lord was begun to be composed soon after the defeat of Amalek is not an unreasonable hypothesis (Ex 17 14). As for the statement that "Arnon leaneth upon the borders of Moab," that may have been superfluous as a matter of information to the contemporaries of Moses when they were about to cross the stream (Strack, Eintl. 25), but it was quite in place in an old prophetic song, as showing that their present position had been long before anticipated and foretold. (d) 24 7, according to criticism, could not have been composed before the rise of the monarchy; and certainly it could not, if prediction of future events is impossible. But if reference to a coming king in Israel was put into Balaam's mouth by the Spirit of God, as the narrator says, then it could easily have been made before the monarchy; and so could (e) 24 17.18 have been written before the reign of David, though the conquest of the Edomites only then began (2 S 8 14; 1 K 11 1; 1 Ch 18 12.13).

Examples such as these show that many, if not most, of the like objections against the Mosaic authorship of this book are capable of at least possible solution; and that Kuenen's caution should not be forgotten: "He who relies upon the impression made by the whole, without interrogation of the parts one by one, repudiates the first principles of all scientific research, and pays homage to superficiality" (Rel. of Israel, I, 11).

(1) Certain passages have the appearance of having been written by Moses.—These are: (a) those which bear evidence of having been

2. For the intended for a people not settled in Mosaic cities but dwelling in tents and camps, Authorship as e.g. chs 1-4, describing the arrangements for the census and the formation of the camp; 6 24-26, the high-priestly benediction; 10 35.36, the orders for the marching and the halting of the host; 10 1-9, the directions about the silver trumpets; ch 19, the legislation which obviously presupposes the wilderness as the place for its observance (vs 3.7.9.14). If criticism allows that these and other passages have descended from the Mosaic age, why should it be necessary to seek another author for them than Moses? And if Moses could have composed these passages, a presumption at least is created that the whole book has proceeded from his pen. (b) The patriotic songs taken from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (ch 21), which some critics (Cornill, Kautzsch and others) hold cannot be later than 750 BC, are by equally competent scholars (Bleek, De Wette, E. Meyer, König and others) recognized as parts of Israel's inheritance from the Mosaic age, whosoever they were incorporated in Nu. (c) The list of camping stations (ch 33) is expressly assigned to him. Whether "by the commandment of the Lord" should be connected with the "journeys" (König) or the "writing" makes no difference as to the authorship of this chapter, at least in the sense that it is based on a Mosaic document (Strack). It is true that even if this chapter as it stands was prepared by Moses, that does not amount to conclusive evidence of the Mosaic authorship of the whole book. Yet it creates a presumption in its favor (Drechsler, Keil, Zahn). For why should Moses have been specially enjoined to write so comparatively uninteresting and unprofitable a document as a list of names, many of which are now incapable of identification, if that was all? But if Moses was already writing up a journal or history of the wanderings, whether by his own hand or by means of amanuenses, and whether by express command or without it (not an unreasonable supposition), there was no particular need to record that this was so. If, however, Moses was not thinking of preserving an itinerary, and God for reasons of His own desired that he should do so, then there was need for a special commandment to be given; and need that it should be recorded to explain why Moses incorporated in his book a list of names that in most people's judgment might have been omitted without imperiling the value of the book. Looked at in this way, the order to prepare this itinerary rather strengthens the idea of the Mosaic authorship of the whole book.

(2) Acquaintance on the part of the author with Egyptian manners and customs.—This points in the direction of Moses. (a) The trial by jealousy (5 11-31) may be compared with the tale of Set-nau, belonging probably to the 3d cent. BC, but relating to the times of Rameses II, in which Ptah-nefer-ka, having found the book which the god Thoth wrote with his own hand, copied it on a piece of papyrus, dissolved the copy in water and drank the solution, with the result that he knew all the book contained (RP, IV, 138). (b) The consecration of the Levites (8 7) resembled the ablutions of the Egypt priests who shaved their heads and bodies every 3d day, bathed twice during the day and twice during the night, and performed a grand ceremony of purification, preparatory to their seasons of fasting, which sometimes lasted from 7 to 40 days and even more (WAE, I, 181). (c) Uncleanness from contact with the dead (19 11) was not unknown to the Egyptians, who required their priests to avoid graves, funerals and funeral feasts (Porphry, De Abst. ii.50, quoted in Speaker's Comm.). (d) The fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions and garlic referred to in 11 5 were articles of diet in Egypt (Herod. ii.93). (e) The antiquarian statement about Hebron (13 22) fits in well with a writer in Mosaic times. "A later writer could have had no authority for making the statement and no possible reason for inventing it" (Pulpit Comm. on Nu). On a candid review of all the arguments pro and con, it is not too much to say that the preponderance of evidence lies on the side of the substantial Mosaicity of the Book of Numbers.

T. WHITELAW

NUMENIUS, nū-mē-ni-us (Νουμήνιος, Noumēnios): The son of Antiochus, and Antipater were the two ambassadors whom Jonathan sent to the Romans, "to the Spartans, and to other places," after his victory in the plain of Hazor (Galilee) over the princes of Demetrius (1 Macc 12 1 ff) about 144 BC. Their mission was to confirm and renew the friendship and treaty which had existed from the days of Judas (8 17 ff). They were well received and successful, both at Rome (12 3 f) and at Sparta (12 19 ff; 14 22 f). After the death of Jonathan, the victories of Simon and the establishment of peace, Simon sent Numenius on a second embassy to Rome (14 24), again to confirm the treaty and present a golden shield weighing 1,000 minae—apparently just before the popular decree by which Simon was created high priest, leader and captain "for ever" (1 Macc 14 27 ff), September, 141 BC. The embassy returned in 139 BC, bearing letters from the senate to the kings of Egypt, Syria and "all the countries," confirming the integrity of Jewish territory, and forbidding these kings to disturb the Jews, and requiring them also to surrender any deserters (14 15 ff). See also LUCIUS; Schürer, Gesch. des jüdischen Volkes (3d and 4th edd), I, 236, 250 f. S. ANGUS

NŪN, nōon (נ, ן): The 14th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as n. It came also to be used for the number 50. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

NUN, nun (נ, ן), nūn, "fish," derivative meaning "fecundity": Father of Joshua (referred to thus 29 t) (Ex 33 11; Nu 11 28, etc; 1 Ch 7 27, m "Non"; Sir 46 1, m "Nave").

NURSE, nŭrs, NURSING, nŭrs'ing: "Nurse" in AV represents two different Heb words: In 8 passages (Gen 24 59; 35 8; Ex 2 7 bis.9; 2 K 11 2; 2 Ch 22 11; Isa 49 23) the word—noun or vb.—renders some form of the vb. נָשָׂא, yānaś, "to suck." The fem. causative part. of this vb. is commonly used to denote nurse or foster-mother. According to Ex 2 7 Moses' mother—"a nurse of the Heb women"—became, at Pharaoh's daughter's request, the foster-mother of the foundling. Joash, the son of Ahaziah, was in charge of a nurse until he was 7 years old (2 K 11 2; 2 Ch 22 11). But it is obvious that the term was used in a more general way, e.g. of a lady's maid or tire-woman. Rebekah was accompanied by her nurse when she left home to be married (Gen 24 59; 35 8). In 5 passages (Nu 11 12; Ruth 4 16; 2 S 4 4; Isa 49 23; 60 4 AV) "nurse" represents the Heb word, נָשָׂא, āman, "to support," "be faithful," "nourish." The part. of this vb. denoted a person who had charge of young children—a guardian or governess. Naomi took charge of Ruth's child "and became nurse unto it" (Ruth 4 16). In Nu 11 12 Moses asks whether he has to take charge of the Israelites "as a nursing-father carrieth the sucking child." The same word is found in 2 K 10 15 (AV "them that brought up," i.e. guardians of the sons of Ahab) and in Est 2 7 (AV "and he brought up," i.e. he [Mordecai] adopted, his niece). Deutero-Isa uses both terms together (49 23) to describe the exalted position of Israel in the future when foreign kings and queens will offer their services and wait upon the chosen people.

In the solitary passage in the NT where "nurse" occurs, it renders the Gr word τροφός, trophós. In this case the word does not mean a hired nurse, but a mother who nurses her own children (1 Thess 2 7). T. LEWIS NURTURE, nŭr'tŭr: The word occurs in AV in Eph 6 4 as the tr of παιδεία, paideía, but RV changes to "chastening," and uses "nurture" (vb.) for AV "bring up" (ἐκτρέφω, ektréphō) in the first part of the verse. Paideía has the idea of training and correction; in RV 2 Esd 8 12 for Lat erudio; and cf AV Wisd 3 11; Sir 18 13 (paideiō), etc.

NUTS, nuts:

(1) (תַּגְּלִי, 'ēghōz; καρία, karía; Arab. jauz, "the walnut" [Cant 6 11]): This is certainly the walnut tree, Juglans regia, a native of Persia and the Himalayas which flourishes under favorable conditions in all parts of Pal; particularly in the mountains. In such situations it attains the height of from 60 to 90 ft. A grove of such trees affords the most delightful shade.

(2) (תַּבְּנִי, bolnim; τερέβινθοι, terébinthoi [Gen 43 11, m "pistachio nuts"]): The Heb is perhaps allied to the Arab. butm, the "terebinth," which is closely allied to the Pistacia vera, N.O. Anacardiaceae, which produces pistachio nuts. These nuts, known in Arab. as fistūk, are prime favorites with the people of Pal. They are oblong, $\frac{3}{4}$ in. long, with green, oily cotyledons. They are eaten raw and are also made into various sweets and confectionery. They are a product of Pal, very likely to be sent as a present to Egypt (Gen 43 11).

NYMPHAS, nim'fas (Νυμφᾱς, Nymphās; Lachmann, Tregelles [m], WH read Νύμφα, Númpha, the name of a woman [Col 4 15]): A Christian resident in Laodicea, to whom Paul sends salutations in the ep. which he wrote from Rome to the church in Colossae, the latter city being only a very few miles distant from Laodicea. Indeed, so near were they, that Paul directs that the Ep. to the Col be read also in Laodicea. Nymphas—or if Nymphas be read, then it is a Christian lady who is meant—was a person of outstanding worth and importance in the church of Laodicea, for he had granted the use of his dwelling-house for the ordinary weekly meetings of the church. The apostle's salutation is a 3-fold one—to the brethren that are in Laodicea, that is to the whole of the Christian community in that city, and to Nymphas, and to the church in his house.

1. A Christian in Laodicea

This fact, that the church met there, also shows that Nymphas was a person of some means, for a very small house could not have accommodated the Christian men and women who gathered together on the first day of every week for the purposes of Christian worship. The church in Laodicea—judging not only from the Ep. to the Eph, which is really Paul's Ep. to the Laodiceans, and which indicates that the church in Laodicea had a numerous membership, but also from what is said of it in Rev 3 17 AV—must have been large and influential: "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." The house of Nymphas, therefore, must have possessed a large room or saloon sufficiently commodious to allow the meeting of a numerous company. Nymphas would be a person both of Christian character and of generous feeling, and of some amount of wealth. Nothing more is known regarding him, as this is the only passage in which he is named.

OABDIUS, ð-ab'di-us (A, 'Oαβδῖος, Ōabdīos, B, -eios, eios, Fritzsche, 'Iωαβδῖος, Iōabdīos, om. in AV): One of the sons of Ela who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 27) = "Abdi" of Ezr 10 26.

OAK, òk: Several Heb words are so tr^d, but there has always been great doubt as to which words should be tr^d "oak" and which "terebinth." This uncertainty appears in the LXX and all through EV; in recent revisions "terebinth" has been increasingly added in the m. All the Heb words are closely allied and may originally have had simply the meaning of "tree," but it is clear that, when the OT was written, they indicated some special kind of tree.

The words and references are as follows:

(1) אֵילָה, 'ēlāh (in LXX usually τερέβινθος, terēbinthos, in Vulg terebinthus, or, more commonly, quercus) (Gen 35 4; Jgs 6 11.19; 2 S 18 9.10.14; 1 K 13 14; 1 Ch 10 12; Isa 1 30; Ezk 6 13—in all these m "terebinth"). In Isa 6 13 (AV "tell tree") and Hos 4 13 (AV "elms") the tr is "terebinth" because of the juxtaposition of 'allōn, tr^d "oaks." "Vale of Elah" (m "the Terebinth") is found in 1 S 17 2.19; 21 9. The expression in Isa 1 30, "whose leaf fadeth," is more appropriate to the terebinth than the oak (see below).

(2) אֵילָה, 'allāh (terebinthos, quercus [Vulg]), apparently a slight variant for 'ēlāh; only in Josh 24 26; Gen 35 4 ('ēlāh) and in Jgs 9 6 ('ēlōn).

(3) אֵילִים or אֵילֵי, 'ēlīm, perhaps pl. of 'ēlāh, occurs in Isa 1 29 (m "terebinth"); 57 5, m "with idols," AV "idols," m "oaks"; 61 3, "trees"; Ezk 31 14 (text very doubtful), "height," AVm "upon themselves"; אֵיל, 'ēl, in El-paran (LXX terebinthos) (Gen 14 6), probably means the "tree" or "terebinth" of Paran. Celsius (Hierob. 1.34 ff) argues at length that the above words apply well to the TEREBINTH (q.v.) in all the passages in which they occur.

(4) אֵילָן, 'ēlōn (usually δρῦς, drūs, "oak"), in Gen 12 6; 13 18; 14 13; 18 1; Dt 11 30; Josh 19 33; Jgs 4 11; 9 6.37; 1 S 10 3 (AV "plain"); in all these references m has "terebinth" or "terebinth." In Gen 12 6; Dt 11 30 we have "oak" or "oaks" "of the teacher" (Moreh); "oak in Zaanannim" in Jgs 4 11; Josh 19 33; the "oak of Meonenim," m "the augurs' oak (or, terebinth)" in Jgs 9 37.

(5) אֵילָן, 'allōn (commonly δρῦς, drūs, or βάλανος, bálanos), in Gen 35 8 (cf ver 4); Hos 4 13; Isa 6 13, is contrasted with 'ēlāh, showing that 'allōn and 'ēlāh cannot be identical, so no marginal references occur; also in Isa 44 14; Am 2 9, but in all other passages, m "terebinth" or "terebinth" occurs. "Oaks of Bashan" occurs in Isa 2 13; Ezk 27 6; Zec 11 2.

If (1) (2) (3) refer esp. to the terebinth, then (4) and (5) are probably correctly tr^d "oak." If we may judge at all by present conditions, "oaks" of Bashan is far more correct than "terebinth" of Bashan.

There are, according to Post (Flora of Palestine, 737–41), no less than 9 species of oak (N.O. Cupuliferae) in Syria, and he adds to these 2. Varieties 12 sub-varieties. Many of these have of Oak no interest except to the botanist. The following species are widespread and distinctive: (1) The "Turkey oak," Quercus cerris, known in Arab. as Ballāt, as its name implies, abounds all over European Turkey and Greece and is common in Pal. Under favorable conditions it attains to great size, reaching as much as 60 ft. in height. It is distinguished by its large sessile acorns with hemispherical cups covered with long, narrow, almost bristly, scales, giving them a mossy aspect. The wood is hard and of fine grain. Galls are common upon its branches.

(2) Quercus lusitanica (or Ballota), also known in Arab. as Ballāt, like the last is frequently found dwarfed to a bush, but, when protected, attains a height of 30 ft. or more. The leaves are dentate or crenate and last late into the winter, but are shed before the new twigs are developed. The acorns are solitary or few in cluster, and the cupules are more or less smooth. Galls are common, and a variety of this species is often known as Q. infectoria, on account of its liability to infection with galls.

(3) The Valonica oak (Q. aegolops), known in Arab. as Mellāt, has large oblong or ovate deciduous leaves, with deep serrations terminating in a bristle-like point, and very large acorns, globular, thick cupules covered with long reflexed scales. The cupules, known commercially as valonica, furnish one of the richest of tanning materials.

(4) The Evergreen oak is often classed under the general name "Ilex oak" or Holm (i.e. holly-like) oak. Several varieties are described as occurring in Pal. Q. ilex usually has rather a shrublike growth, with abundant glossy, dark-green leaves, oval in shape and more or less prickly at the margins, though sometimes entire. The cupules of the acorns are woolly. It shows a marked predilection for the neighborhood of the sea. The Q. coccifera (with var. Q. pseudococcifera) is known in Arab. as Sindiān. The leaves, like the last, usually are prickly. The acorns are solitary or twin, and the hemispherical cupules are more or less velvety. On the Q. coccifera are found the insects which make the well-known Kermes dye. These evergreen oaks are the common trees at sacred tombs, and the once magnificent, but now dying, "Abraham's oak" at Hebron is one of this species.

"Joshua's Oak"—a Terebinth (Near Abord in Ephraim. Supposed to Be the Largest Tree in Palestine).

Oaks occur in all parts of Pal, in spite of the steady ruthless destruction which has been going on for centuries. All over Carmel, Tabor,

3. Oaks in around Banias and in the hills to the Modern W. of Nazareth, to mention well-known localities, there are forests of oak; great tracts of country, esp. in Galilee and E. of the Jordan, are covered by a stunted brushwood which, were it not for the wood-cutter, would grow into noble trees. Solitary oaks of magnificent proportions occur in many parts of the land, esp. upon hilltops; such trees are saved from destruction because of their "sacred" character. To bury beneath such a tree has ever been a favorite custom (cf Gen 35 8; 1 Ch 10 12). Large trees like these, seen often from great distances, are frequently landmarks (Josh 19 33) or places of meeting (cf "Oak of Tabor," 1 S 10 3). The custom of heathen worship beneath oaks or terebinths (Hos 4 13; Ezk 6 13, etc) finds its modern counterpart in the cult of the Wely in Pal. The oak is sometimes connected with some historical event, as e.g. Abraham's oak of Mamre now shown at Hebron, and "the oak of weeping," Allon bacuth, of Gen 35 8. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

OAK OF TABOR (אֵלֹן תָּבוֹר, 'ēlōn tābhōr): Thus RV in 1 S 10 3 for AV "plain of Tabor" (RVm "terebinth"). Tabor was famous for its groves of oak, but what "oak" is meant here is not known. Ewald thinks that "Tabor" is a different pronunciation for "Deborah," and connects with Gen 35 8; but this is not likely. See OAK, 3.

OAR, ṓr. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3).

OATH, ṓth (שְׁבִיעָה, sh'bhū'āh, probably from shebha', "seven," the sacred number, which occurs frequently in the ritual of an oath; ὅρκος, hórkos; and the stronger word אָלָה, 'ālāh, by which a curse is actually invoked upon the oath-breaker [LXX ἁρά, arā): In Mt 26 70-74 Peter first denies his Lord simply, then with an oath (sh'bhū'āh), then invokes a curse ('ālāh), thus passing through every stage of asseveration.

The oath is the invoking of a curse upon one's self if one has not spoken the truth (Mt 26 74), or if one fails to keep a promise (1 S 19 6; 20 17; 2 S 15 21; 19 23). It played a very important part, not only in lawsuits (Ex 22 11; Lev 6 3.5) and state affairs (Ant, XV, x, 4), but also in the dealings of everyday life (Gen 24 37; 50 5; Jgs 21 5; 1 K 18 10; Ezr 10 5). The Mosaic laws concerning oaths were not meant to limit the widespread custom of making oaths, so much as to impress upon the people the sacredness of an oath, forbidding on the one hand swearing falsely (Ex 20 7; Lev 19 12; Zec 8 17, etc), and on the other swearing by false gods, which latter was considered to be a very dark sin (Jer 12 16; Am 8 14). In the Law only two kinds of false swearing are mentioned: false swearing of a witness, and false asseveration upon oath regarding a thing found or received (Lev 5 1; 6 2 ff; cf Prov 29 24). Both required a sin offering (Lev 5 1 ff). The Talm gives additional rules, and lays down certain punishments for false swearing; in the case of a thing found it states what the false swearer must pay (Makkōth 2 3; Sh'bhū'ōth 8 3). The Jewish interpretation of the 3d commandment is that it is not concerned with oaths, but rather forbids the use of the name of Jeh in ordinary cases (so Dalman).

Swearing in the name of the Lord (Gen 14 22; Dt 6 13; Jgs 21 7; Ruth 1 17, etc) was a sign of loyalty to Him (Dt 10 20; Isa

2. Forms 48 11; Jer 12 16). We know from of Swearing Scripture (see above) that swearing by false gods was frequent, and we learn also from the newly discovered Elephantine papyrus that the people not only swore by Jahu (=Jeh) or by the Lord of Heaven, but also among a certain class of other gods, e.g. by Herem-Bethel, and by Isum. In ordinary intercourse it was customary to swear by the life of the person addressed (1 S 1 26; 20 3; 2 K 2 2); by the life of the king (1 S 17 55; 25 26; 2 S 11 11); by one's own head (Mt 5 36); by the earth (Mt 5 35); by the heaven (Mt 5 34; 23 22); by the angels (BJ, II, xvi, 4); by the temple (Mt 23 16), and by different parts of it (Mt 23 16); by Jerus (Mt 5 35; cf Kethūbhōth 2 9). The oath "by heaven" (Mt 5 34; 23 22) is counted by Jesus as the oath in which God's name is invoked. Jesus does not mean that God and heaven are identical, but He desires to rebuke those who paltered with an oath by avoiding a direct mention of a name of God. He teaches that such an oath is a real oath and must be considered as sacredly binding.

Not much is told us as to the ceremonies observed in taking an oath. In patriarchal times he who took the oath put his hand under the thigh of him to whom the oath was taken (Gen 24 2; 47 29). The most usual form was to hold up the hand to heaven (Gen 14 22; Ex 6 8; Dt 32 40; Ezk 20 5). The wife suspected of unfaithfulness, when brought before the priest, had to answer "Amen, Amen" to his adjuration, and this was considered to be an oath on her part (Nu 5 22). The usual formula of an oath was either: "God is witness betwixt me and thee" (Gen 31 50), or more commonly: "As Jeh [or God] liveth" (Jgs 8 19; Ruth 3 13; 2 S 2 27; Jer 38 16), or "Jeh be a true and faithful witness amongst us" (Jer 42 5). Usually the penalty invoked by the oath was only suggested: "Jeh [or God] do so to me" (Ruth 1 17; 2 S 3 9. 35; 1 K 2 23; 2 K 6 31); in some cases the punishment was expressly mentioned (Jer 29 22). Nowack suggests that in general the punishment was not expressly mentioned because of a superstitious fear that the person swearing, although speaking the truth, might draw upon himself some of the punishment by merely mentioning it.

Philo expresses the desire (ii.194) that the practice of swearing should be discontinued, and the Essenes used no oaths (BJ, II, viii, 6; Ant, XV, x, 4).

That oaths are permissible to Christians is shown by the example of Our Lord (Mt 26 63 f), and of Paul (2 Cor 1 23; Gal 1 20) and even of God Himself (He 6 13-18). Consequently when Christ said, "Swear not at all" (Mt 5 34), He was laying down the principle that the Christian must not have two standards of truth, but that his ordinary speech must be as sacredly true as his oath. In the kingdom of God, where that principle holds sway, oaths become unnecessary.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF: Obadiah is the shortest book in the OT. The theme of the book is the destruction of Edom. Consequent upon the overthrow of Edom is the enlargement of the borders of Judah and the establishment of the kingship of Jeh. Thus far all scholars are agreed; but on questions of authorship and date there is wide divergence of opinion.

(1) Jeh summons the nations to the overthrow of proud Edom. The men of Esau will be brought down from their lofty strongholds; their hidden treasures will be rifled; their confederates will turn against them; nor will the wise and the mighty men in Edom be able to avert the crushing calamity (vs 1-9). (2) The overthrow of Edom is due to the violence and cruelty shown toward his brother Jacob. The prophet describes the cruelty and shameless gloating over a brother's calamity, in the form of earnest appeals to Edom not to do the selfish and heartless deeds of which he had been guilty when Jerus was sacked by foreign foes (vs 10-14). (3) The day of the display of Jeh's retributive righteousness upon the nations is near. Edom shall be completely destroyed by the people whom he has tried to uproot, while Israel's captives shall return to take possession of their own land and also to seize and rule the mount of Esau. Thus the kingship of Jeh shall be established (vs 15-21).

The unity of Ob was first challenged by Eichhorn in 1824, vs 17-21 being regarded by him as an appendix attached to the original exilic prophecy in the time of Alexander Jannaeus (104-78 BC). Ewald thought that an exilic prophet, to whom he ascribed vs 11-14 and 19-21, had made use of an older prophecy by Obadiah in vs 1-10, and in vs 15-18 of material from another older prophet who was contemporary, like Obadiah, with Isaiah. As the years went on, the material assigned to the older oracle was limited by some to vs 1-9 and by others to vs 1-6. Wellhausen assigned to Obadiah vs 1-5.7.10.11.13.14.15b, while all else was regarded as a later appendix. Barton's theory of the composition of Ob is thus summed up by Bewer: "Vs 1-6 are a preilic oracle of Ob, which was quoted by Jeremiah, and readapted with additions (vs 7-15) by another Obadiah in the early post-exilic days; vs 16-21 form an appendix, probably from Maccabean times" (ICC, 5). Bewer's own view is closely akin to Barton's. He thinks that Obadiah, writing in the 5th cent. BC, "quoted vs 1-4 almost, though not quite, literally; that he commented on the older oracle in vs 5-7, partly in the words of the older prophet, partly in his own words, in order to show that it had been fulfilled in his own day; and that in vs 8.9 he quoted once more from the older oracle without any show of literalness." He ascribes to Obadiah vs 10-14 and 15b. The appendix consists of two sections, vs 15a.16-18 and vs 19-21, possibly by different authors, ver 18 being a quotation from some older prophecy. To the average Bible student all this minute analysis of a brief prophecy must seem hypercritical. He will prefer to read the book as a unity; and in doing so will get the essence of the message it has for the present day.

(1) Relation of Ob and Jer 49.

3. Date of the Book (a) Did Obadiah quote from Jer? Pusey thus sets forth the impossibility of such a solution: "Out of 16 verses of which the prophecy of Jeremiah against Edom consists, four are identical with those of Obadiah; a fifth embodies a verse of Obadiah's; of the eleven which remain, ten have some turns of expression or idioms, more or fewer, which recur in Jer, either in these prophecies against foreign nations, or in his prophecies generally. Now it would be wholly improbable that a prophet, selecting verses out of the prophecy of Jeremiah, should have selected precisely those which contain none of Jeremiah's characteristic expressions; whereas it perfectly fits in with the supposition that Jeremiah interwove verses of Obadiah with his own prophecy, that in verses so interwoven there is not one expression which occurs elsewhere in Jer" (Minor Prophets, I, 347). (b) Did Jeremiah quote from Ob? It is almost incredible that the vigorous and well-articulated prophecy in Ob could have been made by piecing together detached quotations from Jer; but Jeremiah may well have taken from Ob many expressions that fell in with his general purpose. There are difficulties in applying this view to one or two verses, but it has not been disproved by the arguments from meter advanced by Bewer and others. (c) Did both Obadiah and Jeremiah quote from an older oracle? This is the favorite solution among recent scholars, most of whom think that Obadiah preserves the vigor of the original, while Jeremiah quotes with more freedom; but Bewer in ICC, after a detailed comparison, thus sums up: "Our conclusion is that Obadiah quoted in vs 1-9 an older oracle, the original of which is better preserved in Jer 49." The student will do well to get his own first-hand impression from a careful comparison of the two passages. With Ob vs 1-4 cf Jer 49 14-16; with Ob vs 5,6 cf Jer 49 9,10a; with Ob ver 8 cf Jer 49 7; with Ob ver 9a cf Jer 49 22b. On the whole, the view that Jeremiah, who often quotes from earlier prophets, draws directly from Ob, with free working over of the older prophets, seems still tenable.

(2) Relation of Ob and Joel.—There seems to be in Joel 2 32 (Heb 3 5) a direct allusion to Ob ver 17. If Joel prophesied during the minority of the boy king Joash (c 830 BC), Obadiah would be, on this hypothesis, the earliest of the writing prophets.

(3) What capture of Jerus is described in Ob vs 10-14?—The disaster seems to have been great enough to be called "destruction" (Ob ver 12). Hence most scholars identify the calamity described by Ob with the capture and destruction of Jerus by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC. But it is remarkable, on this hypothesis, that no allusion is made either in Ob or Jer 49 7-22 to the Chaldaeans or to the destruction of the temple or to the wholesale transportation of the inhabitants of Jerus to Babylonia. We know, however, from Ezk 35 1-15 and Ps 137 7 that Edom rejoiced over the final destruction of Jerus by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC, and that they encouraged the destroyers to blot out the holy city. Certain it is that the events of 587 accord remarkably with the language of Ob vs 10-14. Pusey indeed argues from the use of the form of the direct prohibition in Ob vs 12-14 that Edom had not yet committed the sins against which the prophet warns him, and so Jerus was not yet destroyed, when Obadiah wrote. But almost all modern scholars interpret the language of vs 12-14 as referring to what was already past; the prophet "speaks of what the Edomites had actually done as of what they ought not to do." The scholars who regard Obadiah as the first of the writing prophets locate his ministry in Judah during the reign of Jehoram (c 845 BC). Both 2 K and 2 Ch tell of the war of rebellion in the days of Jehoram when Edom, after a fierce struggle, threw off the yoke of Judah (2 K 8 20-22; 2 Ch 21 8-10). Shortly after the revolt of Edom, according to 2 Ch 21 16 f, the Philis and Arabians broke into Judah, "and carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and his sons also, and his wives; so that there was never a son left him, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons." Evidently the capital city fell into the hands of the invaders. It was a calamity of no mean proportions.

The advocates of a late date call attention to three points that weaken the case for an early date for Ob: (a) The silence of 2 K as to the invasion of the Philis and Arabians. But what motive could the author of Ch have had for inventing the story? (b) The absence of any mention of the destruction of the city by the Philis and Arabians. It must be acknowledged that the events of 587 BC accord more fully with the description in Ob vs 10-14, though the disaster in the days of Jehoram must have been terrible. (c) The silence as to Edom in 2 Ch 21 16 f. But so also are the historic books silent as to the part that Edom took in the destruction of Jerus in 587. It is true that exilic and post-exilic prophets and psalmists speak in bitter denunciation of the unbrotherly conduct of Edom (Lam 4 21,22; Ezk 25 12-14; 35 1-15; Ps 137 7; Mal 1 1-5; cf also Isa 34 and 63 1-6); but it is also true that the earliest Heb literature bears witness to the keen rivalry between Esau and Jacob (Gen 25 22 f; 27 41; Nu 20 14-21), and one of the earliest of the writing prophets denounces Edom for unnatural cruelty toward his brother (Am 1 11 f; cf Joel 3 19 [Heb 4 19]).

(4) The style of Ob.—Most early critics praise the style. Some of the more recent critics argue for different authors on the basis of a marked difference in style within the compass of the twenty-one verses in the little roll. Thus Selbie writes in HDB: "There is a difference in style between the two halves of the book, the first being terse, animated, and full of striking figures, while the second is diffuse and marked by poverty of ideas and trite figures." The criticism of the latter part of the book is somewhat exaggerated, though it may be freely granted that the first half is more original and vigorous. The Heb of the book is classic, with scarcely any admixture of Aram. words or constructions. The author may well have lived in the golden age of the Heb language and literature.

(5) Geographical and historical allusions.—The references to the different sections and cities in the land of Israel and in the land of Edom are quite intelligible. As to Sepharad (ver 20) there is considerable difference of opinion. Schrader and some others identify it with a Shaparda in Media, mentioned in the annals of Sargon (722-705 BC). Many think of Asia Minor, or a region in Asia Minor mentioned in Pers inscriptions, perhaps Bithynia or Galatia (Sayce). Some think that the mention of "the captives of this host of the children of Israel" and "the captives of Jerus" (ver 20) proves that both the Assyri captivity and the Bab exile were already past. This argument has considerable force; but it is well to remember that Amos, in the first half of the 8th cent., describes wholesale deportations from the land of Israel by men engaged in the slave trade (Am 1 6-10). The problem of the date of Ob has not been solved to the satisfaction of Bib. students. Our choice must be between a very early date (c 845) and a date shortly after 587, with the scales almost evenly balanced.

4. Interpretation of the Book. Ob is to be interpreted as prediction rather than history. In vs 11-14 there are elements of historic description, but vs 1-10 and 15-21 are predictive.

OBAL, ʾōbal. See EBAL, 1.

OBDIA, ob-di'a (A, 'Oβδία, Obdia, B, 'Oββεία, Hobbeia): One of the families of usurping priests (1 Esd 5 38) = "Habaiah" of Ezr 2 61; "Hobaiah" of Neh 7 63.

OBED, ʿōbed (עֹבֵד, עֹבֵד; ʿōbhēdh, "worshipper"; in the NT Ὠβέδ, Iōbēd):

(1) Son of Boaz and Ruth and grandfather of David (Ruth 4 17.21.22; 1 Ch 2 12; Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32).

(2) Son of Ephlal and descendant of Sheshan, the Jerahmeelite, through his daughter who was married to Jarha, an Egypt servant of her father's (1 Ch 2 37.38).

(3) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 47).

(4) A Korahite doorkeeper, son of Shemaiah, and grandson of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 7).

(5) Father of Azariah, one of the centurions who took part with Jehoiada in deposing Queen Athaliah and crowning Joash (2 Ch 23 1; cf 2 K 11 1-16).

OBED-EDOM, ʿōbed-ʿedom (עֹבֵד-אֶדוֹם) [2 Ch 25 24], but elsewhere without hyphen, ʿōbhēdh-ʿēdhōm, "servant of [god] Edom"; so W. R. Smith, Religion of Semites, 42, and H. P. Smith, Samuel, 294 f, though others explain it as "servant of man": In 2 S 6 10.11.12; 1 Ch 13 13.14 a Philistine of Gath and servant of David, who received the Ark of Jeh into his house when David brought it into Jerus from Kiriath-jearim. Because of the sudden death of Uzzah, David was unwilling to proceed with the Ark to his citadel, and it remained three months in the house of Obed-edom, "and Jeh blessed Obed-edom, and all his house" (2 S 6 11). According to 1 Ch 13 14 the Ark had a special "house" of its own while there. He is probably the same as the Levite of 1 Ch 15 25. In 1 Ch 15 16-21 Obed-edom is a "singer," and in 1 Ch 15 24 a "doorkeeper," while according to 1 Ch 26 4-8.15 he is a Korahite doorkeeper, to whose house fell the overseership of the storehouse (ver 15), while 1 Ch 16 5.38 names him as a "minister before the ark," a member of the house or perhaps guild of Jeduthun (see 2 Ch 25 24).

Obed-edom is an illustration of the service rendered to Heb religion by foreigners, reminding one of the Simon of Cyrene who bore the cross of Jesus (Mt 27 32, etc). The Chronicler naturally desired to think that only Levites could discharge such duties as Obed-edom performed, and hence the references to him as a Levite.

OBEDIENCE, ʾō-bē'di-ens, OBEY, ʾō-bā' (שָׁמַע, shāma'; ὑπακού, hupakoē): In its simpler OT meaning the word signifies "to hear," "to

1. Meaning listen." It carries with it, however, of Terms the ethical significance of hearing with reverence and obedient assent. In the NT a different origin is suggestive of "hearing under" or of subordinating one's self to the person or thing heard, hence, "to obey." There is another NT usage, however, indicating persuasion from, πειθομαι, peithomai.

The relation expressed is twofold: first, human, as between master and servant, and particularly between parents and children. "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, that will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and, though they chasten him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place" (Dt 21 18.19; cf Prov 15 20); or between sovereign and subjects, "The foreigners shall submit themselves unto me: as soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me" (2 S 22 45; 1 Ch 29 23).

The highest significance of its usage, however, is that of the relation of man to God. Obedience is the supreme test of faith in God and reverence for Him. The OT conception of obedience was vital.

It was the one important relationship which must not be broken. While sometimes this relation may have been formal and cold, it nevertheless

2. The OT less was the one strong tie which held the people close to God. The significant spiritual relation is expressed by Samuel when he asks the question, "Hath Jeh as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of Jeh? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 S 15 22). It was the condition without which no right relation might be sustained to Jeh. This is most clearly stated in the relation between Abraham and Jeh when he is assured "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice" (Gen 22 18).

In prophetic utterances, future blessing and prosperity were conditioned upon obedience: "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land" (Isa 1 19). After surveying the glories of the Messianic kingdom, the prophet assures the people that "this shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of Jeh your God" (Zec 6 15). On the other hand misfortune, calamity, distress and famine are due to their disobedience and distrust of Jeh. See DISOBEDIENCE.

This obedience or disobedience was usually related to the specific commands of Jeh as contained in the law, yet they conceived of God as giving commands by other means. Note esp. the rebuke of Samuel to Saul: "Because thou obeyedst not the voice of Jeh, . . . therefore hath Jeh done this thing unto thee this day" (1 S 28 18).

In the NT a higher spiritual and moral relation is sustained than in the OT. The importance of obedience is just as greatly emphasized. Christ Himself is its one great illustration of obedience. He "humiliated himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8). By obedience to Him we are through Him made partakers of His salvation (He 5 9). This act is a supreme test of faith in Christ. Indeed, it is so vitally related that they are in some cases almost synonymous. "Obedience of faith" is a combination used by Paul to express this idea (Rom 1 5). Peter designates believers in Christ as "children of obedience" (1 Pet 1 14). Thus it is seen that the test of fellowship with Jeh in the OT is obedience. The bond of union with Christ in the NT is obedience through faith, by which they become identified and the believer becomes a disciple.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST: The "obedience" (ὑπακού, hupakoē) of Christ is directly mentioned but 3 t in the NT, although many other passages describe or allude to it: "Through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous" (Rom 5 19); "He humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8); "Though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered" (He 5 8). In 2 Cor 10 5, the phrase signifies an attitude toward Christ: "every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ."

His subjection to His parents (Lk 2 51) was a necessary manifestation of His loving and sinless character, and of His disposition and power to do the right in any situation. 1. As an His obedience to the moral law in every particular is asserted by the NT writers: "without sin" (He 4 15); Element of "who knew no sin" (2 Cor 5 21); Conduct "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 7 26), etc; and is affirmed by Himself: "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" (Jn 8 46); and implicitly conceded by His enemies, since no shadow of accusation against His character appears. Of His ready, loving, joyful, exact and eager obedience to the Father, mention will be made later, but it was His central and most outstanding characteristic, the filial at its highest reach, limitless, "unto death." His usually submissive and law-abiding attitude toward the authorities and the great movements and religious requirements of His day was a part of His loyalty to God, and of the strategy of His campaign, the action of the one who would set an example and wield an influence, as at His baptism: "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness" (Mt 3 15); the synagogue worship (Lk 4 16, "as his custom was"); the incident of the tribute money: "Therefore the sons are free. But, lest we cause them to stumble," etc (Mt 17 24-27). Early, however, the necessities of His mission as Son of God and institutor of the new dispensation obliged Him frequently to display a judicial antagonism to current prescription and an authoritative superiority to the rulers, and even to important details of the Law, that would in most eyes mark Him as insurgent, and did culminate in the cross, but was the sublimest obedience to the Father, whose authority alone He, as full-grown man, and Son of man, could recognize.

Two Scriptural statements raise an important question as to the inner experience of Jesus. He

5 8 states that "though he was a Son, yet learned [he] obedience by the things which he suffered" (émathen aph' hōn épáthēn tēn hupakoēn); Phil 2 6, 8: "Existing in the form of God . . . he humbled himself, becoming obedient, even unto death." As Son of God, His will was never out of accord with the Father's will. How then was it necessary to, or could He, learn obedience, or become obedient? The same question in another form arises from another part of the passage in He 5 9: "And having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author [cause] of eternal salvation"; also He 2 10: "It became him [God] . . . to make the author [captain] of their salvation perfect through sufferings." How and why should the perfect be made perfect? Gethsemane, with which, indeed, He 5 8 is directly related, presents the same problem. It finds its solution in the conditions of the Redeemer's work and life on earth in the light of His true humanity. Both in His eternal essence and in His human existence, obedience to His Father was His dominant principle, so declared through the prophet-psalmist before His birth: He 10 7 (Ps 40 7), "Lo, I am come (in the roll of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." It was His law of life: "I do always the things that are pleasing to him. I do nothing of myself, but as the Father taught me, I speak these things" (Jn 8 29, 28); "I can of myself do nothing. . . . I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (5 30). It was the indispensable process of His activity as the "image of the invisible God," the expression of the Deity in terms of the phenomenal and the human. He could be a perfect revelation only by the perfect correspondence in every detail, of will, word and work with the Father's will (Jn 5 19). Obedience was also His life nourishment and satisfaction (Jn 4 34). It was the guiding principle which directed the details of His work: "I have power to lay it [life] down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father" (Jn 10 18); "The Father that sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (Jn 12 49; cf 14 31, etc). But in the Incarnation this essential and filial obedience must find expression in human forms according to human demands and processes of development. As true man, obedient disposition on His part must meet the test of voluntary choice under all representative conditions, culminating in that which was supremely hard, and at the limit which should reveal its perfection of extent and strength. It must become hardened, as it were, and confirmed, through a definite obedient act, into obedient human character. The patriot must become the veteran. The Son, obedient on the throne, must exercise the practical virtue of obedience on earth. Gethsemane was the culmination of this process, when in full view of the awful, shameful, horrifying meaning of Calvary, the obedient disposition was crowned, and the obedient Divine-human life reached its highest manifestation, in the great ratification: "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." But just as Jesus' growth in knowledge was not from error to truth, but from partial knowledge to complete, so His "learning obedience" led Him not from disobedience or debate to submission, but from obedience at the present stage to an obedience at ever deeper and deeper cost. The process was necessary for His complete humanity, in which sense He was "made perfect," complete, by suffering. It was also necessary for His perfection as example and sympathetic High Priest. He must fight the human battles under the human conditions. Having translated obedient aspiration and disposition into obedient action in the face of, and in suffering unto, death, even the death of the cross, He is able to lead the procession of obedient sons of God through every possible trial and surrender. Without this testing of His obedience He could have had the sympathy of clear and accurate knowledge, for He "knew what was in man," but He would have lacked the sympathy of a kindred experience. Lacking this, He would have been for us, and perhaps also in Himself, but an imperfect "captain of our salvation," certainly no "file leader" going before us in the very paths we have to tread, and tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. It may be worth noting that He "learned obedience" and was "made perfect" by suffering, not the results of His own sins, as we do largely, but altogether the results of the sins of others.

In Rom 5 19, in the series of contrasts between sin and salvation ("Not as the trespass, so also is the free gift"), we are told: "For as

3. In Its through the one man's disobedience Soterio- the many were made sinners, even so logical through the obedience of the one shall Bearings the many be made righteous." Interpreters and theologians, esp. the latter, differ as to whether "obedience" here refers to the specific and supreme act of obedience on the cross, or to the sum total of Christ's incarnate obedience through His whole life; and they have made the distinction between His "passive obedience," yielded on the cross, and His "active obedience," in carrying out without a flaw the Father's will at all times. This distinction is hardly tenable, as the whole Scriptural representation, esp. His own, is that He was never more intensely active than in His death: "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished" (Lk 12 50); "I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again" (Jn 10 17, 18). "Who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God" (He 9 14), indicates the active obedience of one who was both priest and sacrifice. As to the question whether it was the total obedience of Christ, or His death on the cross, that constituted the atonement, and the kindred question whether it was not the spirit of obedience in the act of death, rather than the act itself, that furnished the value of His redemptive work, it might conceivably, though improbably, be said that "the one act of righteousness" through which "the free gift came" was His whole life considered as one act. But these ideas are out of line with the unmistakable trend of Scripture, which everywhere lays principal stress on the death of Christ itself; it is the center and soul of the two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's Supper; it holds first place in the Gospels, not as obedience, but as redemptive suffering and death; it is unmistakably put forth in this light by Christ Himself in His few references to His death: "ransom," "my blood," etc. Paul's teaching everywhere emphasizes the death, and in but two places the obedience; Peter indeed speaks of Christ as an ensample, but leaves as his characteristic thought that Christ "suffered for sins once . . . put to death in the flesh" (1 Pet 3 18). In He the center and significance of Christ's whole work is that He "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (9 26); while John in many places emphasizes the death as atonement: "Unto him that . . . loosed us from our sins by his blood" (Rev 1 5), and elsewhere. The Scripture teaching is that "God set [him] forth to be a propitiation, through faith, in his blood" (Rom 3 25). His lifelong obedience enters in chiefly as making and marking Him the "Lamb without blemish and without spot," who alone could be the atoning sacrifice. If it enters further, it is as the preparation and anticipation of that death, His life so dominated and suffused with the consciousness of the coming sacrifice that it becomes really a part of the death. His obedience at the time of His death could not have been atonement, for it had always existed and had not atoned; but it was the obedience that turned the possibility of atonement into the fact of atonement. He obediently offered up, not His obedience, but Himself. He is set forth as propitiation, not in His obedience, but in His blood, His death, borne as the penalty of sin, in His own body on the tree. The distinction is not one of mere academic theological interest. It involves the whole question of the substitutionary and propitiatory in Christ's redemptive work, which is central, vital and formative, shaping the entire conception of Christianity. The blessed and helpful part which Our Lord's complete and loving obedience plays in the working out of Christian character, by His example and inspiration, must not be underestimated, nor its meaning as indicating the quality of the life which is imparted to the soul which accepts for itself His mediatorial death. These bring the consummation and crown of salvation; they are not its channel, or instrument, or price. See also ATONEMENT.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

OBEISANCE, ֹבִישָׁן: Is used 9 t in AV in the phrase "made [or did] obeisance" as a rendering of the reflexive form of שָׁחָה (shāhāh), and denotes the bow or curtsy indicative of deference and respect. The same form of the vb. is sometimes tr^d "to bow one's self" when it expresses the deferential attitude of one person to another (Gen 33 6.7, etc). Occasionally the vow of homage or fealty to a king on the part of a subject is suggested. In Joseph's dream his brother's sheaves made obeisance to his sheaf (Gen 43 28; cf also 2 S 15 5; 2 Ch 24 17). But in a large number of instances the vb. denotes the prostrate posture of the worshipper in the presence of Deity, and is generally rendered, "to worship" in AV. In all probability this was the original significance of the word (Gen 24 26, etc). Obeisance (=obedience) originally signified the vow of obedience made by a vassal to his lord or a slave to his master, but in time denoted the act of bowing as a token of respect. T. LEWIS

OBELISK, ob'ē-lisk, ob'el-isk: A sacred stone or maççēbhāh. For maççēbhāh RV has used "pillar" in the text, with "obelisk" in the m in many instances (Ex 23 24; Lev 26 1; Dt 12 3; 1 K 14 23; Hos 3 4; 10 1.2, etc), but not consistently (e.g. Gen 28 18). See PILLAR.

OBETH, ֹבֶתֶת (Ὀβέθη, B. Οὐβήν, Oubēn): One of those who went up with Ezra (1 Esd 8 32) = "Ebed" of Ezr 8 6.

OBI, ֹבִי (אֹבִי, 'ōbhīl, "camel driver"): An Ishmaelite who was "over the camels" in David's palace (1 Ch 27 30).

OBJECT, ob-jekt': Now used only in the sense "to make opposition," but formerly in a variety of meanings derived from the literal sense "to throw against." So with the meaning "to charge with" in Wisd 2 12, AV "He objecteth to our infamy the transgressing of our education" (RV "layeth to our charge sins against our discipline"), or "to make charges against" in Acts 24 19, AV "who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me" (RV "and to make accusation").

OBLATION, ob-lā'shun: In Lev and Nu, AV occasionally uses "oblation," but generally "offering," as a rendering of קֹרְבָן, qorbān—a general term for all kinds of offering, but used only in Ezk, Lev and Nu. RV renders consistently "oblation." In Ezk (also Isa 40 20), "oblation" renders תְּרומָה, terūmah, generally tr^d "heave offering." In some cases (e.g. Isa 1 13; Dnl 9 21) "oblation" in AV corresponds to מִנְחָה, minhāh, the ordinary word for "gift," in P "grain offering." See SACRIFICE.

OBOTH, ֹבֹתִים (Ὀβόθη, 'ōbhōth, "water-bags"): A desert camp of the Israelites, the 3d after leaving Mt. Hor and close to the borders of Moab (Nu 21 10.11; 33 43.44). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

OBSCURITY, ob-skū'ri-ti: In modern Eng. generally denotes a state of very faint but still perceptible illumination, and only when preceded by some such adj. as "total" does it imply the absence of all light. In Bib. Eng., however, only the latter meaning is found. So in Isa 29 18 (אֶפְסֵל, 'ōphēl, "darkness"); 58 10; 59 9 (חֹשֶׁךְ, hōshekh, "darkness"); Ad Est 11 8 (γνόφος, gnóphos, "darkness"). Cf Prov 20 20, AV "in obscure darkness," ERV "in the blackest darkness," ARV "in blackness of darkness."

OBSERVE, ob-zûrv' (representing various words, but chiefly שָׁמַר, shāmar, "to keep," "to watch," etc): Properly means "to take heed to," as in Isa 42 20, "Thou seest many things, but thou observest not," and from this sense all the usages of the word in EV can be understood. Most of them, indeed, are quite good modern usage (as "observe a feast," Ex 12 17, etc; "observe a law," Lev 19 37, etc), but a few are archaic. So Gen 37 11, AV "His father observed the saying" (RV "kept the saying in mind"); Hos 13 7, "As a leopard . . . will I observe them" (RV "watch"); Jon 2 8, "observe lying vanities" (RV "regard," but "give heed to" would be clearer; cf Ps 107 43). Still farther from modern usage is Hos 14 8, "I have heard him, and observed him" (RV "will regard"; the meaning is "care for"); and Mk 6 20, "For Herod feared John . . . and observed him" (RV "kept him safe"). In the last case, the AV editors seem to have used "to observe" as meaning "to give reverence to."

OBSERVATION is found in Lk 17 20, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation" (μετὰ παρατηρήσεως, metá paratērēseōs). The meaning of the Eng. is, "so that it can be observed," but the exact force of the underlying Gr ("visibly"? "so that it can be computed in advance"? is a matter of extraordinary dispute at the present time. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OBSERVER, ob-zûr'vēr, OF TIMES. See DIVINATION.

OBSTINACY, ob'sti-na-si. See HARDENING.

OCCASION, o-kā'zhun: The uses in EV are all modern, but in Jer 2 24 "occasion" is employed (both in Heb and Eng.) as a euphemism for "time of conception of offspring."

OCCUPY, ok'û-pi: Is in AV the tr of 7 different words: (1) נָתַן, nāthan; (2) שָׁחַר, śāhar; (3) עָרַב, 'ārabb; (4) עָשָׂה, 'āsāh, either with or without the added word, מְלָאכָה, m'lā'khāh; (5) ἀναπλήρου, anaplēroun; (6) περιπατεῖν, peripatein; (7) πραγματεύειν, pragmateúein. In almost every case the meanings of "to occupy" as used in AV in harmony with the common usage of the time have become obsolete. (1) In Ezk 27 16,19,22, nāthan meant "to trade," and RV reads "traded." (2) From śāhar, "to go about," was derived a designation of "merchants" (RV) (Ezk 27 21). (3) 'Ārabb (Ezk 27 9) signifies "to exchange" (ERV and ARV_m, but ARV "deal in"). (4) 'āsāh (Ex 38 24) means simply "to use" (RV), and the same word in Jgs 16 11, with m'lā'khāh ("work") added, signifies that work had been done (RV). (5) In 1 Cor 14 16, "occupy" the AV rendering of anaplēroun, would still be as intelligible to most as RV "fill." (6) "Occupy" in He 13 9, in the sense of "being taken up with a thing," is the tr (both AV and RV) of peripatein, lit. "to walk." Finally (7) pragmateúein (Lk 19 13) is rendered in AV "occupy" in its obsolete sense of "trade" (RV).

DAVID FOSTER ESTES

OCCURRENT, o-kur'ent (AV, ERV, 1 K 5 4): An obsolete form of "occurrence" (so ARV).

OCHIELUS, ô-ki-ē'lus (Ὀχίηλος, Ochiēlos, B, Ὀζιήλος, Oziēlos; AV Ochiel): One of the "captains over thousands" who furnished the Levites with much cattle for Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 9) = "Jeiel" of 2 Ch 35 9.

OCHRAN, ok'ran (עֲכָרָן, 'okhrān, from 'ākhar, "trouble"; AV Ocran): The father of Pagiel, the prince of the tribe of Asher (Nu 1 13; 2 27; 7 72, 77; 10 26).

OCHRE, ô'kēr, RED (Isa 44 13, "He marketh it out with a pencil," m "red ochre," AV "line"; עֲרֵד, seredh, a word found only here, and of unknown etymology): Designates the implement used by the carpenter to mark the wood after measuring and before cutting. "Red ochre" supposes this to have been a crayon (as does "pencil"), but a scratch-awl is quite as likely. Ochre is a clay colored by an iron compound.

OCIDELUS, os-i-dē'lus, ok-i-dē'lus (A, Ὀκεῖδης-λος, Ōkeidēlos, B and Swete, Ὀκαῖδης-λος, Ōkailēdos, Fritzsche, Ὀκόδης-λος, Ōkōdēlos; AV and Fritzsche Oodelus): One of the priests who had married a "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 22); it stands in the place of "Jozabad" in Ezr 10 22 of which it is probably a corruption.

OCINA, ô-sī'na, os'ī-na, ok'ī-na (Ὀκεῖνά, Okeinā): A town on the Phoen coast S. of Tyre, mentioned only in Jth 2 28, in the account of the campaign of Holofernes in Syria. The site is unknown, but from the mention of Sidon and Tyre immediately preceding and Jemnaan, Azotus and Ascalon following, it must have been S. of Tyre. One might conjecture that it was Sandalium (Is-kanderuna) or Umm ul-'Awamīd, but there is nothing in the name to suggest such an identification.

OCRAN, ok'ran. See OCHRAN.

ODED, ô'ded (עֲדֵד [2 Ch 15], עֲדָר [elsewhere], 'ôdhēdh, "restorer"):

(1) According to 2 Ch 15 1, he was the father of Azariah who prophesied in the reign of Asa of Judah (c 918-877), but ver 8 makes Oded himself the prophet. The two verses should agree, so we should probably read in ver 8, "the prophecy of Azariah, the son of Oded, the prophet," or else "the prophecy of Azariah the prophet." See AZARIAH.

(2) A prophet of Samaria (2 Ch 28 9) who lived in the reigns of Pekah, king of the Northern Kingdom, and Ahaz, king of Judah. According to 2 Ch 28, Oded protested against the enslavement of the captives which Pekah had brought from Judah and Jerus on his return from the Syro-Ephraimitic attack on the Southern Kingdom (735 BC). In this protest he was joined by some of the chiefs of Ephraim, and the captives were well treated. After those who were naked (i.e. those who had scanty clothing; of the meaning of the word "naked" in Mk 14 51) had been supplied with clothing from the spoil, and the bruised anointed with oil, the prisoners were escorted to Jericho.

The narrative of ch 28 as a whole does not agree with that of 2 K 15 37; 16 5f, where the allied armies of Rezin of Damascus and Pekah besieged Jerus, but failed to capture it (cf Isa 7 1-17; 8 5-8a). As Curtis points out (Chron, 459, where he compares Ex 21 2ff; Lev 25 29-43; Dt 16 12-18), wholesale enslavement of their fellow-countrymen was not allowed to the Hebrews, and this fact the passage illustrates. It seems to be a fulfilment in spirit of Isa 61 1-2, a portion which Our Lord read in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4 16-20).

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

ODES, ôdz, OF SOLOMON. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ODOLLAM, ô-dol'am (Ὀδολλάμ, Odollām): The Gr form of ADULLAM (q.v.), found only in 2 Macc 12 38.

ODOMERA, od-ô-mē'ra (Ὀδομηρά, Odomērā, B, Ὀδοαρχής, Odoarrēs, Itala Odaren; AV Odonarkes, m Odomarra): It is not certain whether Odomera was an independent Bedouin chief, perhaps an ally of the Syrians, or an officer of Bacchides. He was defeated by Jonathan in his campaign against Bacchides (1 Macc 9 66) in 156 BC.

ODOR, ô'dēr: In the OT the rendering of בִּשְׂמִי, besem, "fragrance" (2 Ch 16 14; Est 2 12; in Jer 34 5, RV "burnings"), and of one or two other words; in the NT of οσμή, osmē (Jn 12 3; Phil 4 18; Eph 5 2 RV); in Rev 5 8; 18 13, of θυμίαμα, thumíama, where RV (with AVm in former passage) has "incense." See also SAVOR.

OF, ov: (1) In Anglo-Saxon, had the meaning "from," "away from" (as the strengthened form "of" has still), and was not used for genitive or possessive relations, these being expressed by special case-forms. In the Norman period, however, "of" was taken to represent the French de (a use well developed by the time of Chaucer), and in the Elizabethan period both senses of "of" were in common use. But after about 1600 the later force of the word became predominant, and in the earlier sense (which is now practically obsolete) it was replaced by other prepositions. In consequence AV (and in some cases RV) contains many uses of "of" that are no longer familiar—most of them, to be sure, causing no difficulty, but there still being a few responsible for real obscurities. (2) Of the uses where "of" signifies "from," the most common obscure passages are those where "of" follows a vb. of hearing. In modern Eng. "hear of" signifies "to gain information about," as it does frequently in AV (Mk 7 25; Rom 10 14, etc.). But more commonly this use of "of" in AV denotes the source from which the information is derived. So Jn 15 15, "all things that I have heard of my Father"; Acts 10 22, "to hear words of thee"; 28 22, "We desire to hear of thee"; cf 1 Thess 2 13; 2 Tim 1 13; 2 2, etc. (similarly Mt 11 29, "and learn of me"; cf Jn 6 45). All of these are ambiguous and in modern Eng. give a wrong meaning, so that in most cases (but not Mt 11 29 or Acts 28 22) RV substitutes "from." A different example of the same use of "of" is 2 Cor 5 1, "a building of God" (RV "from"). So Mk 9 21, "of a child," means "from childhood" ("from a child," RV, is dubious Eng.). A still more obscure passage is Mt 23 25, "full of extortion and excess." "Full of" elsewhere in AV (and even in the immediate context, Mt 23 27, 28) refers to the contents, but here the "of" represents the Gr ἐκ, ek, "out of," and denotes the source—"The contents of your cup and platter have been purchased from the gains of extortion and excess." RV again substitutes "from," with rather awkward results, but the Gr itself is unduly compressed. In Mk 11 8, one of the changes made after AV was printed has relieved an obscurity, for where the ed of 1611 read "cut down branches of the trees," the modern edd have "off" (RV "from"). For clear examples of this use of "of," without the obscurities, cf Jth 2 21, "they went forth of Nineveh"; 2 Macc 4 34, "forth of the sanctuary"; and, esp., Mt 21 25, "The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men?" Here "from" and "of" represent exactly the same Gr prep., and the change in Eng. is arbitrary (RV writes "from" in both cases). (3) In a weakened sense this use of "of" as "from" was employed rather loosely to connect an act with its source or motive. Such uses are generally clear enough, but the Eng. today seems sometimes rather curious: Mt 18 13, "rejoiceth more of that sheep" (RV "over"); Ps 99 8, "vengeance of their inventions" (so AV); 1 Cor 7 4, "hath not power of her own body" (RV "over"), etc. (4) A very common use of "of" in AV is to designate the agent—a use complicated by the fact that "by" is also employed for the same purpose and the two interchanged freely. So in Lk 9 7, "all that was done by him . . . it was said of some . . .," the two words are used side by side for the same Gr prep. (RV replaces "of" by "by," but follows a different text in the first part of the verse). Again, most of the examples are clear enough, but there are some obscurities.

So in Mt 19 12, "which were made eunuchs of men," the "of men" is at first sight possessive (RV "by men"). Similarly, 2 Esd 16 30, "There are left some clusters of them that diligently seek through the vineyard" (RV "by them"). So 1 Cor 14 24, "He is convinced of all, he is judged of all," is quite misleading (RV "by all" in both cases). Phil 3 12, AV "I am apprehended of Christ Jesus," seems almost meaningless (RV "by"). (5) In some cases the usage of the older Eng. is not sufficient to explain "of" in AV. So Mt 18 23, "take account of his servants," is a very poor rendition of "make a reckoning with his servants" (so RV). In Acts 27 5, the "sea of Cilicia" may have been felt to be the "sea which is off Cilicia" (cf RV), but there are no other instances of this use. In 2 Cor 2 12, "A door was opened unto me of the Lord" should be "in the Lord" (so RV). 2 S 21 4, "We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house," is very loose, and RV rewrites the verse entirely. In all these cases, AV seems to have looked solely for smooth Eng., without caring much for exactness. In 1 Pet 1 11, however, "sufferings of Christ" probably yields a correct sense for a difficult phrase in the Gr (so RV, with "unto" in the m), but a paraphrase is needed to give the precise meaning. And, finally, in He 11 18, the Gr itself is ambiguous and there is no way of deciding whether the prep. employed (πρός, prós) means "to" (so RV) or "of" (so AV, RVm; cf He 1 7, where "of" is necessary).

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OFFENCE, o-fens', OFFEND, o-fend' מִקְשָׁל, mikhshāl, מִקְשָׁל, 'āsham, מִקְשָׁל, hātā; σκάνδαλον, skándalon, σκανδαλίζω, skandalizō: "Offend" is either trans or intrans. As trans it is primarily "to strike against," hence "to displease," "to make angry," "to do harm to," "to affront," in Scripture, "to cause to sin"; intrans it is "to sin," "to cause anger," in Scripture, "to be caused to sin." "Offence" is either the cause of anger, displeasure, etc., or a sin. In Scripture we have the special significance of a stumbling-block, or cause of falling, sin, etc.

In the OT it is frequently the tr of 'āsham, "to be guilty," "to transgress": Jer 2 3, RV "shall be held guilty"; 50 7, RV "not guilty"; Ezk 25 12, "hath greatly offended"; Hos 4 15, RVm "become guilty"; 5 15, "till they acknowledge their offence," RVm "have borne their guilt"; 13 1, "He offended in Baal," RVm "became guilty"; Hab 1 11, "He shall pass over, and offend, [imputing] this his power unto his god," RV "Then shall he sweep by [as] a wind, and shall pass over [m "transgress"], and be guilty, [even] he whose might is his god."

In 2 Ch 28 13, we have 'ashmath 'al, lit. "the offence against," RV "a trespass [m "or guilt"] against Jeh"; we have also hātā, "to miss the mark," "to sin," "to err" (Gen 20 9, RV "sinned against thee"; 40 1, "offended their lord"; 2 K 18 14; Jer 37 18, RV "sinned against thee"); bāghadh, "to deal treacherously" (Ps 73 15, "offend against the generation of thy children," RV "dealt treacherously with"); hābhal, "to act wickedly" (Job 34 31); mikhshāl, "a stumbling block" (Lev 19 12; trd in Isa 8 14, "a rock of offence"; cf Ezk 14 3; 1 S 25 31; Ps 119 165, "nothing shall offend," RV "no occasion of stumbling"; cf Isa 57 14; Jer 6 21, etc.); pāsha, "to be fractious," "to transgress" (Prov 18 19, "a brother offended," RVm "injured"). "Offence" is mikhshāl (see above, 1 S 25 31; Isa 8 14); hātā, "sin," etc. (Eccl 10 4, "Yielding pacifieth great offences," ARV "Gentleness [ERV "yielding"] allayeth," ARVm "Calmness [ERV "gentleness"] leaveth great sins undone"). "Offender" is hātā (1 K 1 21, m "Heb sinners"; Isa 29 21, "that make a man an offender for a word," ARV "that make a man an offender in his cause," m "make men to offend by [their] words," or, "for a word," ERV "in a cause," m "make men to offend by [their] words").

The NT usage of these words deserves special attention. The word most frequently trd "offend" in AV is skandalizō (skandalon, "offence"), very frequent in the Gospels (Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye offend thee"; 5 30; 11 6; 18 6, "whoso shall offend one of these little ones"; 13 41, "all things that offend"; Lk 17 1, "It is impossible but that offences will come," etc.; Rom 14 21; 16 17, "Mark them which cause . . . offences"; 1 Cor 8 13 bis, "if meat make my brother to offend," etc). Skandalon is primarily "a trap-stick," "a bent-stick on which the bait is fastened which the animal strikes against and so springs the trap," hence it came to denote a "snare," or anything which one strikes against injuriously (it is LXX for mōkēsh, a "noose" or "snare," Josh 23 13; 1 S 18 21); "a stumbling-block" (LXX for mikhshōl [see above], Lev 19 14). For skandalizō, skandalon, tr^d in AV, "offend" "offence," RV gives "cause to stumble," "stumbling-block" etc; thus, Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye causeth thee to stumble," i.e. "is an occasion for thy falling into sin"; Mt 16 23, "Thou art a stumbling-block unto me," an occasion of turning aside from the right path; in Mt 26 31.33 bis, "offended" is retained, m 33 bis. "Gr caused to stumble" (same word in ver 31); Mk 9 42, "who-soever shall cause one of these little ones that believe on me to stumble," to fall away from the faith, or fall into sin; Lk 17 1, "It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come; but woe unto him, through whom they come"; in Rom 14 21; 16 17; in 1 Cor 8, Paul's language has the same meaning, and we see how truly he had laid to heart the Saviour's earnest admonitions—"weak brethren" with him answering to the master's "little ones who believe"; Rom 14 21, "It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth," i.e. "is led by your example to do that which he cannot do with a good conscience"; ver 20, "It is evil for that man who eateth with offence [did' proskōmmatos]," so as to place a stumbling-block before his brother, or, rather, "without the confidence that he is doing right"; cf ver 23, "He that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; and whatsoever is not of faith is sin"; so 1 Cor 8 13; Rom 16 17, "Mark them that are causing the divisions and occasions of stumbling, contrary to the doctrine, [m "teaching"] which ye learned" (Is not the "teaching" of Christ Himself implied here?). Everything that would embolden another to do that which would be wrong for him, or that would turn anyone away from the faith, must be carefully avoided, seeking to please, not ourselves, but to care for our brother, "for whom Christ died," "giving no occasion of stumbling [proskopē] in anything" (2 Cor 6 3).

Aprōskopos, "not causing to stumble," is tr^d "void of offence" (Acts 24 16, "a conscience void of offence"; 1 Cor 10 32, RV "occasion of stumbling"; Phil 1 10, "void of offence"); hamartānō, "to miss the mark," "to sin," "to err," is tr^d "offended" (Acts 25 8, RV "sinned"); hamartia, "sin," "error" (2 Cor 11 7, RV "Did I commit a sin?"); plātō, "to stumble," "fall" (Jas 2 10; 3 2 bis, "offend," RV "stumble," "stumbleth"); paraptōma, "a falling aside or away," is tr^d "offence" (Rom 4 25; 5 15*bis*.16.17.18.20, in each case RV "trespass"); adikēō, "to be unrighteous" (Acts 25 11, RV "wrong-doer," AV "offender").

In Apoc we have "offence" (skandalon, Jth 12 2). RV "I will not eat thereof, lest there be an occasion of stumbling"; "offend" (hamartanō, Eccles 7 7), RV "sin"; "greatly offended" (prosochthizō, 25 2); "offended" (skandalizō, 32 15). RV "stumble."

OFFER, of'ēr, OFFERING, of'ēr-ing. See SACRIFICE.

OFFICE, of'is: In the OT the word is often used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. "minister . . . in the priest's office," lit. act as priest (Ex 28 1, etc); "do the office of a midwife," lit. cause or help to give birth (Ex 1 16). But the word is also used as a rendering of different Heb words, e.g. כֶּנֶס, kēn, "pedestal," "place" (Gen 40 13, AV "place"; 41 13); עֲבָדָה, ʾabhōdāh, "labor," "work" (1 Ch 6 32); פְּקָדָה, p'kuddāh, "oversight," "charge" (Ps 109 8); מַעֲמָד, ma'āmādh, lit. "standing," e.g. waiting at table (1 Ch 23 28); מִשְׁמָר, mish-mār, "charge," observance or service of the temple (Neh 13 14 AV).

Similarly in the NT the word is used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. priest's office (Lk 1 8.9); office of a deacon (diakonia, diakonía, 1 Tim 3 10); office of a bishop (ἐπισκοπή, episkopē, 1 Tim 3 1). RV uses other renderings, e.g. "ministry" (Rom 11 13); "serve as deacons" (1 Tim 3 10). In Acts 1 20, RV has "office" (m "overseership") for AV "bishoprick."

T. LEWIS

OFFICER, of'i-sēr: In AV the term is employed to render different words denoting various officials, domestic, civil and military, such as שָׂרִיס, šārīs, "eunuch," "minister of state" (Gen 37 36); פָּקִיד, pāqīdh, "person in charge," "overseer" (Gen 41 34); נָצִיב, n'cīb, "stationed," "garrison," "prefect" (1 K 4 19); שֹׁטֵר, shōtēr, "scribe" or "secretary" (perhaps arranger or organizer), then any official or overseer. In Est 9 3 for AV "officers of the king" RV has (more literal) "they that did the king's business."

In the NT "officer" generally corresponds to the Gr word ὑπὲρθετης, hupērtēs, "servant," or any person in the employ of another. In Mt 5 25 the term evidently means "bailiff" or exactor of the fine imposed by the magistrate, and corresponds to πράκτωρ, praktōr, used in Lk 12 58. T. LEWIS

OFFICES OF CHRIST. See CHRIST, OFFICES OF.

OFFSCOURING, of'skour-ing: This strong and expressive word occurs only once in the OT and once in the NT. The weeping prophet uses it as he looks upon his erstwhile fair and holy city, despoiled, defiled, derided by the profane, the enemies of God and of His people (Lam 3 45, שְׁחִי, sh'hi). The favored people, whose city lies in heaps and is patrolled by the heathen, are hailed and held up as the scrapings, the offscouring, the offal of the earth. They are humbled to earth, crushed into the dust, carried away to be the slaves of licentious idolaters. The haughty, cruel, cutting boastfulness of the victors covered Israel with contumely.

In 1 Cor 4 13 the greatest of the apostles reminds the prosperous and self-satisfied Corinthians that they, the apostles, were "made as the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things." In such contempt were they held by the unbelieving world and by false apostles. The strange, strong word (περίψημα, perīpsēma) should remind us what it cost in former times to be a true servant of Christ.

OFFSPRING, of'spring. See CHILDREN.

OFTEN, of'n (πυκνός, puknós, "thick," "close"): An archaic usage for "frequent": "Thine often infirmities" (1 Tim 5 23); cf "by often rumination" (Shakespeare, As You Like It, IV, i, 18); "The often round" (Ben Jonson, The Forest, III); "Of wrench'd or broken limb—an often chance" (Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette).

OG (עֹג, ōgh; "Ωγ, Ōg): King of Bashan, whose territory, embracing 60 cities, was conquered by Moses and the Israelites immediately after the conquest of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Nu 21

33-35; Dt 3 1-12). The defeat took place at Edrei, one of the chief of these cities (Nu 21 33; Josh 12 4), and Og and his people were "utterly destroyed" (Dt 3 6). Og is described as the last of the REPHAIM (q.v.), or giant-race of that district, and his giant stature is borne out by what is told in Dt 3 11 of the dimensions of his "bedstead of iron" ('eres barzel), 9 cubits long and 4 broad (13½ ft. by 6 ft.), said to be still preserved at Rabbath of Ammon when the verse describing it was written. It is not, of course, necessary to conclude that Og's own height, though immense, was as great as this. Some, however, prefer to suppose that what is intended is "a sarcophagus of black basalt," which iron-like substance abounds in the Hauran. The conquered territory was subsequently bestowed on the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (Nu 32 33; Dt 3 12.13). Other references to Og are Dt 1 4; 4 47; 31 4; Josh 2 10; 9 10; 13 12.30). The memory of this great conquest lingered all through the national history (Ps 135 11; 136 20). On the conquest, cf Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, I, 185-87, and see ARGOB; BASHAN. JAMES ORR

OHAD, ʾohad (אֹהַד, 'ohadh, meaning unknown): A son of Simeon, mentioned as third in order (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15). The name is not found in the list of Nu 26 12-14.

OHEL, ʾohel (אֹהֶל, 'ohel, "tent"): A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20).

OHOLAH, ʾohōlāh (אֹהֶלָה, 'ohōlāh; AV Aholah): The exact meaning is a matter of dispute. As written, it seems to mean a tent-woman, or the woman living in a tent. With a mappik in the last consonant it could mean "her tent." The term is used symbolically by Ezekiel to designate Samaria or the kingdom of Israel (Ezk 23 4.5.36.44). See OHOLIBAH.

OHOLIAB, ʾohōlī'ābh (אֹהֶלִיָּאֵב, 'ohōlī'ābh, "father's tent"; AV Aholiab): A Danite artificer, who assisted Bezalel in the construction of the tabernacle and its furniture (Ex 31 6; 35 34; 36 1 f; 38 23).

OHOLIBAH, ʾohōlī'bāh (אֹהֶלִיבָה, 'ohōlī'bāh, "tent in her," or "my tent is in her"): An opprobrious and symbolical name given by Ezekiel to Jerus, representing the kingdom of Judah, because of her intrigues and base alliances with Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, just as the name OHOLAH (q.v.) was given to Samaria or the Northern Kingdom, because of her alliances with Egypt and Assyria. There is a play upon the words in the Heb which cannot be reproduced in Eng. Both Oholah and Oholibah, or Samaria and Jerus, are the daughters of one mother, and wives of Jeh, and both are guilty of religious and political alliance with heathen nations. Idolatry is constantly compared by the Heb prophets to marital unfaithfulness or adultery. W. W. DAVIES

OHOLIBAMAH, ʾohōlī'bāmāh (אֹהֶלִיבָמָה, 'ohōlī'bāmāh, "tent of the high place"):

(1) One of Esau's wives, and a daughter of Anah the Hivite (Gen 36 2.5). It is strange that she is not named along with Esau's other wives in either Gen 28 9 or 26 30. Various explanations have been given, but none of them is satisfactory. There is probably some error in the text.

(2) An Edomite chief (Gen 36 41; 1 Ch 1 52).

Shemen, lit. "fat," corresponds to the common Arab. senin of similar meaning, although now applied to boiled butter fat. Another

1. Terms Heb word, zayith (zēth), "olive," occurs with shemen in several passages (Ex 27 20; 30 24; Lev 24 2). The corresponding Arab. zeit, a contraction of zeitun, which is the name for the olive tree as well as the fruit, is now applied to oils in general, to distinguish them from solid fats. Zeit usually means olive oil, unless some qualifying name indicates another oil. A corresponding use was made of shemen, and the oil referred to so many times in the Bible was olive oil (except Est 2 12). Compare this with the Gr ἔλαιον, élaion, "oil," a neuter noun from ἐλαία, elaiá, "olive," the origin of the Eng. word "oil." גִּישָׁר, gīshār, lit. "glistening," which occurs less frequently, is used possibly because of the light-giving quality of olive oil, or it may have been used to indicate fresh oil, as the clean, newly pressed oil is bright. מֶשֶׁה, m'shah, a Chald word, occurs twice: Ezr 6 9; 7 22. ἔλαιον, élaion, is the NT term.

Olive oil has been obtained, from the earliest times, by pressing the fruit in such a way as to filter out the oil and other liquids from the residue. The Scriptural references correspond so nearly to the methods practised in Syria up to the present time, and the presses uncovered by excavators at such sites as Gezer substantiate so well the similarity of these methods, that a description of the oil presses and modes of expression still being employed in Syria will be equally true of those in use in early Israelitish times.

The olives to yield the greatest amount of oil are allowed to ripen, although some oil is expressed from the green fruit. As the olive ripens it turns black. The fruit begins to fall from the trees in September, but the main crop is gathered after the first rains in November. The olives which have not fallen naturally or have not been blown off by the storms are beaten from the trees with long poles (cf Dt 24 20). The fruit is gathered from the ground into baskets and carried on the heads of the women, or on donkeys to the houses or oil presses. Those carried to the houses are preserved for eating. Those carried to the presses are piled in heaps until fermentation begins. This breaks down the oil cells and causes a more abundant flow of oil. The fruit thus softened may be trod out with the feet (Mic 6 15)—which is now seldom practised—or crushed in a handmill. Such a mill was uncovered at Gezer beside an oil press. Stone mortars with wooden pestles are also used. Any of these methods crushes the fruit, leaving only the stone unbroken, and yields a purer oil (Ex 27 20). The method now generally practised of crushing the fruit and kernels with an edgerunner mill probably dates from Rom times. These mills are of crude construction. The stones are cut from native limestone and are turned by horses or mules. Remains of huge stones of this type are found near the old Rom presses in Mt. Lebanon and other districts.

The second step in the preparation of the oil is the expression. In districts where the olives are plentiful and there is no commercial demand for the oil, the householders crush the fruit in a mortar, mix the crushed mass with water, and after the solid portions have had time to settle, the pure sweet oil is skimmed from the surface of the water.

Ancient Oil Presses (Land and the Book).

This method gives a delicious oil, but is wasteful. This is no doubt the beaten oil referred to in connection with religious ceremonials (Ex 27 20). Usually the crushed fruit is spread in portions on mats of reeds or goats' hair, the corners of which are folded over the mass, and the packets thus formed are piled one upon another between upright supports. These supports were formerly two stone columns or the two sections of a split stone cylinder hollowed out within to receive the mats. Large hollow tree trunks are still similarly used in Syria. A flat stone is next placed on top, and then a heavy log is placed on the pile in such a manner that one end can be fitted into a socket made in a wall or rock in close proximity to the pile. This socket becomes the fulcrum of a large lever of the second class. The lever is worked in the same manner as that used in the wine presses (see WINE PRESS). These presses are now being almost wholly superseded by hydraulic presses. The juice which runs from the press, consisting of oil, extractive matter and water, is conducted to vats or run into jars and allowed to stand until the oil separates. The oil is then drawn off from the surface, or the watery fluid and sediment is drawn away through a hole near the bottom of the jar, leaving the oil in the container. (For the construction of the ancient oil presses, see The Excavations of Gezer, by Macalister.) The oil, after standing for some time to allow further sediment to settle, is stored either in huge earthenware jars holding 100 to 200 gallons, or in underground cisterns (cf 1 Ch 27 28) holding a much larger quantity. Some of these cisterns in Beirut hold several tons of oil each (2 Ch 11 11; 32 28; Neh 13 5.12; Prov 21 20). In the homes the oil is kept in small earthen jars of various shapes, usually having spouts by which the oil can be easily poured (1 K 17 12; 2 K 4 2). In 1 S 16 13; 1 K 1 39, horns of oil are mentioned.

(1) As a commodity of exchange.—Olive oil when properly made and stored will keep sweet for years, hence was a good form of merchandise to hold. Oil is still sometimes given in payment (1 K 5 11; Ezk 27 17; Hos 12 1; Lk 16 6; Rev 18 13).

(2) As a cosmetic.—From earliest times oil was used as a cosmetic, esp. for oiling the limbs and head. Oil used in this way was usually scented (see OINTMENT). Oil is still used in this manner by the Arabs, principally to keep the skin and scalp soft when traveling in dry desert regions where there is no opportunity to bathe. Sesamé oil has replaced olive oil to some extent for this purpose. Homer, Pliny and other early writers mention its use for external application. Pliny claimed it was used to protect the body against the cold. Many Bib. references indicate the use of oil as a cosmetic (Ex 25 6; Dt 28 40; Ruth 3 3; 2 S 12 20; 14 2; Est 2 12; Ps 23 5; 92 10; 104 15; 141 5; Ezk 16 9; Mic 6 15; Lk 7 46).

(3) As a medicine.—From early Egypt literature down to late Arab. medical works, oil is mentioned as a valuable remedy. Many queer prescriptions contain olive oil as one of their ingredients. The good Samaritan used oil mingled with wine to dress the wounds of the man who fell among robbers (Mk 6 13; Lk 10 34.)

(4) As a food.—Olive oil replaces butter to a large extent in the diet of the people of the Mediterranean countries. In Bible lands food is fried in it, it is added to stews, and is poured over boiled vegetables, such as beans, peas and lentils, and over salads, sour milk, cheese and other foods as a dressing. A cake is prepared from ordinary bread dough which is smeared with oil and sprinkled with herbs before baking (Lev 2 4). At times of fasting oriental Christians use only vegetable oils, usually olive oil, for cooking. For Bib. references to the use of oil as food see Nu 11 8; Dt 7 13; 14 23; 32 13; 1 K 17 12.14.16; 2 K 4 2.6.7; 1 Ch 12 40; 2 Ch 2 10.15; Ezr 3 7; Prov 21 17; Ezk 16 13.18; Hos 2 5.8.22; Hag 2 12; Rev 6 6.

(5) As an illuminant.—Olive oil until recent years was universally used for lighting purposes (see LAMP). In Pal are many homes where a most primitive form of lamp similar to those employed by the Israelites is still in use. The prejudice in favor of the exclusive use of olive oil for lighting holy places is disappearing. Formerly any other illuminant was forbidden (cf Ex 25 6; 27 20; 35 8.14.28; 39 37; Mt 25 3.4.8).

(6) In religious rites.—(a) Consecration of officials or sacred things (Gen 28 18; 35 14; Ex 29 7.21 ff; Lev 2 1 ff; Nu 4 9 ff; 1 S 10 1; 16 1.13; 2 S 1 21; 1 K 1 39; 2 K 9 1.3.6; Ps 89 20): This was adopted by the early Christians in their ceremonies (Jas 5 14), and is still used in the consecration of crowned rulers and church dignitaries. (b) Offerings, votive and otherwise: The custom of making offerings of oil to holy places still survives in oriental religions. One may see burning before the shrines along a Syrian roadside or in the churches, small lamps whose supply of oil is kept renewed by pious adherents. In Israelitish times oil was used in the meal offering, in the consecration offerings, offerings of purification from leprosy, etc (Ex 29 2; 40 9 ff; Lev 2 2 ff; Nu 4 9 ff; Dt 18 4; 1 Ch 9 29; 2 Ch 31 5; Neh 10 37.39; 13 5.12; Ezk 16 18.19; 45; 46; Mic 6 7). (c) In connection with the burial of the dead: Egypt papyri mention this use. In the OT no direct mention is made of the custom. Jesus referred to it in connection with His own burial (Mt 26 12; Mk 14 3-8; Lk 23 56; Jn 12 3-8; 19 40).

Abundant oil was a figure of general prosperity (Dt 32 13; 33 24; 2 K 18 32; Job 29 6; Joel 2 19.24). Languishing of the oil indicated general famine (Joel 1 10; Hag 1 11). Joy is described as the oil of joy (Isa 61 3), or the oil of gladness (Ps 45 7; He 1 9). Ezekiel prophesies that the rivers shall run like oil, i.e. become viscous (Ezk 32 14). Words of deceit are softer than oil (Ps 55 21; Prov 5 3). Cursing becomes a habit with the wicked as readily as oil soaks into bones (Ps 109 18). Excessive use of oil indicates wastefulness (Prov 21 17), while the saving of it is a characteristic of the wise (Prov 21 20). Oil was carried into Egypt, i.e. a treaty was made with that country (Hos 12 1).

OIL, ANOINTING (שֶׁמֶן הַמִּשְׁחָה, shemen ha-mishhah): This holy oil, the composition of which is described in Ex 30 22-33, was designed for use in the anointing of the tabernacle, its furniture and vessels, the altar and laver, and the priest, that being thus consecrated, they might be "most holy." It was to be "a holy anointing oil" unto Jeh throughout all generations (ver 31). On its uses, cf Ex 37 29; Lev 8 12; 10 7; 21 10. The care of this holy oil was subsequently entrusted to Eleazar (Nu 4 16); in later times it seems to have been prepared by the sons of the priests (1 Ch 9 30). There is a figurative allusion to the oil on Aaron's head in Ps 133 2. See OIL; ANOINTING.

It is a pretty shrub with sweet-smelling white flowers and silver-grey-green leaves. It is difficult to see how all the three references can apply to this tree; it will suit the first two, but this small shrub would never supply wood for carpentry work such as that mentioned in 1 K, hence the tr "olive wood." On the other hand, in the reference in Neh 8 15, olive branches are mentioned just before, so the tr "wild olive" (the difference being too slight) is improbable. Post suggests the tr of 'ēš shemen by PINE (q.v.), which if accepted would suit all the requirements.

OINTMENT, oint'ment: The present use of the word "ointment" is to designate a thick unguent of buttery or tallow-like consistency. AV in frequent instances translates shemen or m'shah (see Ex 30 25) "ointment" where a perfumed oil seemed to be indicated. ARV has consequently substituted the word "oil" in most of the passages. Merḳāhah is rendered "ointment" once in the OT (Job 41 31 [Heb 41 23]). The well-known power of oils and fats to absorb odors was made use of by the ancient perfumers. The composition of the holy anointing oil used in the tabernacle worship is mentioned in Ex 30 23-25. Olive oil formed the base. This was scented with "flowing myrrh . . . sweet cinnamon . . . sweet calamus . . . and . . . cassia." The oil was probably mixed with the above ingredients added in a powdered form and heated until the oil had absorbed their odors and then allowed to stand until the insoluble matter settled, when the oil could be decanted. Olive oil, being a non-drying oil which does not thicken readily, yielded an ointment of oily consistency. This is indicated by Ps 133 2, where it says that the precious oil ran down on Aaron's beard and on the collar of his outer garment. Anyone attempting to make the holy anointing oil would be cut off from his people (Ex 30 33). The scented oils or ointments were kept in jars or vials (not boxes) made of alabaster. These jars are frequently found as part of the equipment of ancient tombs.

The word tr^d "ointment" in the NT is μύρον, muron, "myrrh." This would indicate that myrrh, an aromatic gum resin, was the substance commonly added to the oil to give it odor. In Lk 7 46 both kinds of oil are mentioned, and the verse might be paraphrased thus: My head with common oil thou didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with costly scented oil.

OLD MAN (παλαιός, palaiós, "old," "ancient"): A term thrice used by Paul (Rom 6 6; Eph 4 22; Col 3 9) to signify the unrenewed man, the natural man in the corruption of sin, i.e. sinful human nature before conversion and regeneration. It is theologically synonymous with "flesh" (Rom 8 3-9), which stands, not for bodily organism, but for the whole nature of man (body and soul) turned away from God and devoted to self and earthly things.

The old man is "in the flesh"; the new man "in the Spirit." In the former "the works of the flesh" (Gal 5 19-21) are manifest; in the latter "the fruit of the Spirit" (vs 22.23). One is "corrupt according to the deceitful lusts"; the other "created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph 4 22-24 AV). See also MAN, NATURAL; MAN, NEW.

OLD PROPHET, THE (נָבִיא זָקֵן, nābhī' e'ēdh zākēn, "an old prophet" [1 K 13 11], נָבִיא זָקֵן, ha-nābhī' ha-zākēn, "the old prophet" [ver 29]):

1. The Narrative 1 K 13 11-32, in which the old prophet is mentioned, is part of a larger account telling of a visit paid to Bethel by "a man of God" from Judah. The Judean prophet uttered a curse upon the altar erected there by Jeroboam I. When the king attempted to use force against him, the prophet was saved by Divine intervention; the king then invited him to receive royal hospitality, but he refused because of a command of God to him not to eat or drink there. The Judean then departed (vs 1-10). An old prophet who lived in Bethel heard of the stranger's words, and went after him and offered him hospitality. This offer too was refused. But when the old prophet resorted to falsehood and pleaded a Divine command on the subject, the Judean returned with him. While at table the old prophet is given a message to declare that death will follow the southerner's disobedience to the first command. A lion kills him on his way home. The old prophet hears of the death and explains it as due to disobedience to God; he then buries the dead body in his own grave and expresses a wish that he also at death should be buried in the same sepulcher.

There are several difficulties in the text. In ver 11, AV reads "his sons came" instead of "one of his sons came," and tr ver 12b: "And his sons shewed the way the man of God went." There is a gap in the MT after the word "table" in ver 20; and ver 23 should be tr^d, "And it came to pass after he had eaten bread and drunk water; that he saddled for himself the ass, and departed again" (following LXX, B with W. B. Stevenson, HDB, III, 594a, n.).

Benzinger ("Die Bücher der Könige," Kurz. Hand-Komm. zum AT, 91) holds that we have here an example of a midrash, i.e. according to LOT, 529, "an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, esp. a didactic or homiletic exposition or an edifying religious story." 2 Ch 24 27 refers to a "midhrāsh of the book of the kings," and 2 Ch 13 22 to a "midhrāsh of the prophet Iddo." In 2 Ch 9 29 we have a reference to "the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat." Jos names the Judean prophet Jadon (Ant, VIII, viii, 5), and so some would trace this narrative to the midrash of Iddo, which would be a late Jewish work. There is a trace of late Heb in ver 3, and evidence in several places of a later editing of the original narrative. Kittel and Benzinger think it possible that the section may be based on a historical incident. If the narrative is historical in the main, the mention of Josiah by name in ver 2 may be a later insertion; if not historical, the prophecy there is ex eventu, and the whole section a midrash on 2 K 23 15-20.

(1) Several questions are suggested by the narrative, but in putting as well as in answering these questions, it must be remembered that

3. Central Truths the old prophet himself, as has been pointed out, is not the chief character of the piece. Hence it is a little pointless to ask what became of the old prophet, or whether he was not punished for his falsehood. The passage should be studied, like the parables of Jesus, with an eye on the great central truth, which is, here, that God punishes disobedience even in "a man of God." It is not inconsistent with this to regard the old prophet as an example of "Satan fashioning himself into an angel of light" (2 Cor 11 14), or of the beast which "had two horns like unto a lamb" (Rev 13 11).

(2) It must also be remembered that the false prophets of the OT are called prophets in spite of their false prophecies. So here the old prophet in spite of his former lie is given a Divine message to declare that death will follow the other's disobedience.

(3) One other question suggests itself, and demands an answer. Why did the old prophet make the request that at death he should be buried in the same grave as the Judean (ver 31)? The answer is implied in ver 32, and is more fully given in 2 K 23 15-20, where King Josiah defiles the graves of the prophets at Bethel. On seeing a "monument" or grave-stone by one of the graves, he inquires what it is, and is told that it marks the grave of the prophet from Judah. Thereupon he orders that his bones be not disturbed. With these the bones of the old prophet escape. Perhaps no clearer instance of a certain kind of meanness exists in the OT. The very man who has been the cause of another's downfall and ruin is base enough to plan his own escape under cover of the virtues of his victim. And the parallels in modern life are many.

OLIVE TREE, ol'iv trē (עֵץ זַיִת, zayith, a word occurring also in Aram., Ethiopic and Arab.; in the last it means "olive oil," and zaitūn, "the olive tree"; elaia, elaia): The olive tree has all through history been one of the most characteristic, most valued and most useful of trees in Pal.

1. The Olive Tree It is only right that it is the first named "king" of the trees (Jgs 9 8.9). When the children of Israel came to the land they acquired olive trees which they planted not (Dt 6 11; cf Josh 24 13). The cultivation of the olive goes back to the earliest times in Canaan. The frequent references in the Bible, the evidences (see 4 below) from archaeology and the important place the product of this tree has held in the economy of the inhabitants of Syria make it highly probable that this land is the actual home of the cultivated olive. The wild olive is indigenous there. The most fruitful trees are the product of bare and rocky ground (cf Dt 32 13) situated preferably at no great distance from the sea. The terraced hills of Pal, where the earth lies never many inches above the limestone rocks, the long rainless summer of unbroken sunshine, and the heavy "dews" of the autumn afford conditions which are extraordinarily favorable to at least the indigenous olive.

The olive, Olea Europaea (N.O. Oleaceae), is a slow-growing tree, requiring years of patient labor before reaching full fruitfulness. Its growth implies a certain degree of settlement and peace, for a hostile army can in a few days destroy the patient work of two generations. Possibly this may have something to do with its being the emblem of peace. Enemies of a village or of an individual often today carry out revenge by cutting away a ring of bark from the trunks of the olives, thus killing the trees in a few months. The beauty of this tree is referred to in Jer 11 16; Hos 14 6, and its fruitfulness in Ps 128 3. The characteristic olive-green of its foliage, frosted silver below and the twisted and gnarled trunks—often hollow in the center—are some of the most picturesque and constant signs of settled habitations. In some parts of the land large plantations occur: the famous olive grove near Beirūt is 5 miles square; there are also fine, ancient trees in great numbers near Bethlehem.

In starting an oliveyard the fellah not infrequently plants young wild olive trees which grow plentifully over many parts of the land, or he may grow from cuttings. When the young trees are 3 years old they are grafted from a choice stock and after another three or four years they may commence to bear fruit, but they take quite a decade more before reaching full fruition. Much attention is, however, required. The soil around the trees must be frequently plowed and broken up; water must be conducted to the roots from the earliest rain, and the soil must be freely enriched with a kind of marl known in Arab. as ḥuwwārāh. If neglected, the older trees soon send up a great many shoots from the roots all around the parent stem (perhaps the idea in Ps 128 3); these must be pruned away, although, should the parent stem decay, some of these may be capable of taking its place. Being, however, from the root, below the original point of grafting, they are of the wild olive type—with smaller, stiffer leaves and prickly stem—and need grafting before they are of use. The olive tree furnishes a wood valuable for many forms of carpentry, and in modern Pal is extensively burnt as fuel.

The olive is in flower about May; it produces clusters of small white flowers, springing from the axils of the leaves, which fall as showers to the ground (Job 15 33).

2. The Fruit

The first olives mature as early as September in some places, but, in the mountain districts, the olive harvest is not till November or even December. Much of the earliest fruit falls to the ground and is left by the owner ungathered until the harvest. The trees are beaten with long sticks (Dt 24 20), the young folks often climbing into the branches to reach the highest fruit, while the women and older girls gather up the fruit from the ground. The immature fruit left after such an ingathering is described graphically in Isa 17 6: "There shall be left therein gleanings, as the shaking [m "beating"] of an olive-tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree." Such gleanings belonged to the poor (Dt

Olive (Olea Europaea).

24 20), as is the case today. Modern villages in Pal allow the poor of even neighboring villages to glean the olives. The yield of an olive tree is very uncertain; a year of great fruitfulness may be followed by a very scanty crop or by a succession of such.

The olive is an important article of diet in Pal. Some are gathered green and pickled in brine, after slight bruising, and others, the "black" olives, are gathered quite ripe and are either packed in salt or in brine. In both cases the salt modifies the bitter taste. They are eaten with bread.

More important commercially is the oil. This is sometimes extracted in a primitive way by crushing a few berries by hand in the hollow of a stone (cf Ex 27 20), from which a shallow channel runs for the oil. It is an old custom to tread them by foot (Mic 6 15). Oil is obtained

3. Olive Oil on a larger scale in one of the many varieties of oil mills. The berries are carried in baskets, by donkeys, to the mill, and they are crushed by heavy weights. A better class of oil can be obtained by collecting the first oil to come off separately, but not much attention is given to this in Pal, and usually the berries are crushed, stones and all, by a circular millstone revolving upright round a central pivot. A plenteous harvest of oil was looked upon as one of God's blessings (Joel 2 24; 3 13). That the "labor of the olive" should fail was one of the trials to faith in Jeh (Hab 3 17). Olive oil is extensively used as food, morsels of bread being dipped into it in eating; also medicinally (Lk 10 34; Jas 5 14). In ancient times it was greatly used for anointing the person (Ps 23 5; Mt 6 17). In Rome's days of luxury it was a common maxim that a long and pleasant life depended upon two fluids—"wine within and oil without." In modern times this use of oil for the person is replaced by the employment of soap, which in Pal is made from olive oil. In all ages this oil has been used for illumination (Mt 25 3).

Comparatively plentiful as olive trees are today in Pal, there is abundant evidence that the cultivation was once much more extensive. 4. Greater "The countless rock-cut oil- and wine-Plenty of presses, both within and without the Olive Trees walls of the city [of Gezer], show that in Ancient the cultivation of the olive and vine Times was of much greater importance than it is anywhere in Pal today. . . .

Excessive taxation has made olive culture unprofitable" ("Gezer Mem," PEF, II, 23). A further evidence of this is seen today in many now deserted sites which are covered with wild olive trees, descendants of large plantations of the cultivated tree which have quite disappeared. Many of these spring from the old roots; others are from the fallen drupes. Isolated trees scattered over many parts of the land, esp. in Galilee, are sown by the birds. As a rule the wild olive is but a shrub, with small leaves, a stem more or less prickly, and a small, hard drupe with but little or no oil. That a wild olive branch should be grafted into a fruitful tree would be a proceeding useless and contrary to Nature (Rom 11 17, 24). On the mention of "branches of wild olive" in Neh 8 15, see OLIVE TREE.

Olivet comes to us through the Vulg Olivetum, "an oliveyard."

Jos frequently uses the expression "Mount of Olives" (e.g. Ant., VII, ix, 2; XX, viii, 6; BJ, V, ii, 3; xii, 2), but later Jewish

1. Names writings give the name הַר הַמִּשְׁחָה, har ha-mishhāh, "Mount of Oil"; this occurs in some MSS in 2 K 23 13, and the common reading הַר הַמַּשְׁחִית, har ha-mashhith, "Mount of Corruption," m "destruction," may possibly be a deliberate alteration (see below). In later ages the Mount was termed "the mountain of lights," because here there used to be kindled at one time the first beacon light to announce throughout Jewry the appearance of the new moon.

To the natives of Pal today it is usually known as Jebel et Tār ("mountain of the elevation," or "tower"), or, less commonly, as Jebel Tār ez zait ("mountain of the elevation of oil"). The name Jebel ez-zaitān ("Mount of Olives") is also well known. Early Arab. writers use the term Tār Zait, "Mount of Oil."

The mountain ridge which lies E. of Jerus leaves the central range near the valley of Sha'phat and runs for about 2 miles due S. After

2. Situation culminating in the mountain mass on and Extent which lies the "Church of the Ascension," it may be considered as giving off two branches: one lower one, which runs S.S.W., forming the southern side of the Kidron valley, terminating at the Wādy en Nār, and another, higher one, which slopes eastward and terminates a little beyond el-'Azarēyeh (modern Bethany). The main ridge is considerably higher than the site of ancient Jerus, and still retains a thick cap of the soft chalky limestone, mixed with flint, known variously as Nārī and Ka'kūlī, which has been entirely denuded over the Jerus site (see JERUSALEM, II, 1). The flints were the cause of a large settlement of paleolithic man which occurred in prehistoric times on the northern end of the ridge, while the soft chalky stone breaks down to form a soil valuable for the cultivation of olives and other trees and shrubs. The one drawback to arboriculture upon this ridge is the strong northwest wind which permanently bends most trees toward the S.E., but affects the sturdy, slow-growing olive less than the quicker-growing pine. The eastern slopes are more sheltered. In respect of wind the Mount of Olives is far more exposed than the site of old Jerus.

The lofty ridge of Olivet is visible from far, a fact now emphasized by the high Russian tower which can be seen for many scores of miles on the E. of the Jordan. The range presents, from such a point of view particularly, a succession of summits. Taking as the northern limit the dip which is crossed by the ancient Anathoth (anātā) road, the most northerly summit is that now crowned by the house and garden of Sir John Gray Hill, 2,690 ft. above sea-level. This is sometimes incorrectly pointed out as Scopus, which lay farther to the N.W. A second sharp dip in the ridge separates this northern summit from the next, a broad plateau now occupied by the great Kaiserin Augusta Victoria Stiftung and grounds. The road makes a sharp descent into a valley which is traversed from W. to E. by an important and ancient road from Jerus, which runs eastward along the Wādy er Rawābeh. S. of this dip lies the main mass of the mountain, that known characteristically as the Olivet of ecclesiastical tradition. This mass consists of two principal summits and two subsidiary spurs. The northern of the two main summits is that known as Karem es Sayyād, "the vineyard of the hunter," and also as "Galilee," or, more correctly, as Viri Galilaei (see below, 7). It reaches a height of 2,723 ft. above the Mediterranean and is separated from the southern summit by a narrow neck traversed today by the carriage road. The southern summit, of practically the same elevation, is the traditional "Mount of the Ascension," and for several years has been distinguished by a lofty, though somewhat inartistic, tower erected by the Russians. The two subsidiary spurs referred to above are: (1) a somewhat isolated ridge running S.E., upon which lies the squalid village of el 'Azarēyeh—Bethany; (2) a small spur running S., covered with grass, which is known as "the Prophets," on account of a remarkable 4th-cent. Christian tomb found there, which is known as "the tomb of the Prophets"—a spot much venerated by modern Jews.

A further extension of the ridge as Baṭn el Hawa, "the belly of the wind," or traditionally as "the Mount of Offence" (cf 1 K 11 7; 2 K 23 13), is usually included in the Mount of Olives, but its lower altitude—it is on a level with the temple-platform—and its position S. of the city mark it off as practically a distinct hill. Upon its lower slopes are clustered the houses of Silwān (Siloam).

The notices of the Mount of Olives in the OT are, considering its nearness to Jerus, remarkably scanty.

(1) David fleeing before his rebellious son Absalom (2 S 15 16) crossed the Kidron and "went up by the ascent of the mount of

3. OT Olives, and wept as he went up; and Associations he had his head covered, and went barefoot: and all the people that were with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went [ver 30]. . . . And it came to pass, that, when David was come to the top of the ascent, where he was wont to worship God, [m], behold, Hushai the Archite came to meet him with his coat rent, and earth upon his head [ver 32]. And when David was a little past the top of the ascent, behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and a hundred of summer fruits, and a bottle of wine" (16 1).

It is highly probable that David's route to the wilderness was neither by the much-trodden Anathoth road nor over the summit of the mountain, but by the path running N.E. from the city, which runs between the Viri Galilaei hill and that supporting the German Sanatorium and descends into the wilderness by Wādy er Rawābi. See BAHURIM.

(2) Ezekiel in a vision (11 23) saw the glory of Jeh go up from the midst of the city and stand "upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city" (cf 43 2). In connection with this the Rabbi Janna records the tradition that the shkkināh stood 3½ years upon Olivet, and preached, saying, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near"—a strange story to come from a Jewish source, suggesting some overt reference to Christ.

(3) In Zec 14 4 the prophet sees Jeh in that day stand upon the Mount of Olives, "and the Mount of Olives shall be cleft in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south."

In addition to these direct references, Jewish tradition associates with this mount—this "mount of Corruption"—the rite of the red heifer (Nu 19); and many authorities consider that this is also the mount referred to in Neh 8 15, whence the people are directed to fetch olive branches, branches of wild olive, myrtle branches, palm branches and branches of thick trees to make their booths.

It is hardly possible that a spot with such a wide outlook—esp. the marvelous view over the Jordan valley and Dead Sea to the lands of Ammon and Moab—should have been neglected in the days when Sem religion crowned such spots with their sanctuaries. There is OT evidence that there was a “high place” here. In the account of David’s flight mention is made of the spot on the summit “where he was wont to worship God” (2 S 15 32 m). This is certainly a reference to a sanctuary, and there are strong reasons for believing that this place may have been Nob (q.v.) (see 1 S 21 1; 22 9.11.19; Neh 11 32; but esp. Isa 10 32). This last reference seems to imply a site more commanding in its outlook over the ancient city than Ras el Mushārīf proposed by Driver, one at least as far S. as the Anathoth road, or even that from Wādī er Rawābi. But besides this we have the definite statement (1 K 11 7): “Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, in the mount that is before [i.e. E. of] Jerus, and for Molech the abomination of the children of Ammon,” and the further account that the “high places that were before [E. of] Jerus, which were on the right hand [S.] of the mount of corruption [m “destruction”], which Solomon the king of Israel had builded for Ashtoreth the abomination of the Sidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king [Josiah] defile” (2 K 23 13). That these high places were somewhere upon what is generally recognized as the Mount of Olives, seems clear, and the most probable site is the main mass where are today the Christian sanctuaries, though Graetz and Dean Stanley favor the summit known as Viri Galilaei. It is the recognition of this which has kept alive the Jewish name “Mount of Corruption” for this mount to this day. The term Mons offensionis, given to the southeastern extension, S. of the city, is merely an ecclesiastical tradition going back to Quaresmius in the 17th cent., which is repeated by Burckhardt (1823 AD).

More important to us are the NT associations of this sacred spot. In those days the mountain must have been far different from its condition today. Titus in his siege of and Jesus Jerus destroyed all the timber here as elsewhere in the environs, but before this the hillsides must have been clothed with verdure—oliveyards, fig orchards and palm groves, with myrtle and other shrubs. Here in the fresh breezes and among the thick foliage, Jesus, the country-bred Galilean, must gladly have taken Himself from the noise and closeness of the overcrowded city. It is to the Passion Week, with the exception of Jn 8 1, that all the incidents belong which are expressly mentioned as occurring on the Mount of Olives; while there would be a special reason at this time in the densely packed city, it is probable that on other occasions also Our Lord preferred to stay outside the walls. Bethany would indeed appear to have been His home in Judaea, as Capernaum was in Galilee. Here we read of Him as staying with Mary and Martha (Lk 10 38–42); again He comes to Bethany from the wilderness road from Jericho for the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11), and later He is at a feast, six days before the Passover (Jn 12 1), at the house of Simon (Mt 26 6–12; Mk 14 3–9; Jn 12 1–9). The Mount of Olives is expressly mentioned in many of the events of the Passion Week. He approached Jerus, “unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount of Olives” (Mk 11 1; Mt 21 1; Lk 19 29); over a shoulder of this mount—very probably by the route of the present Jericho carriage road—He made His triumphal entry to the city (Mt 21; Mk 11; Lk 19), and on this road, when probably the full sight of the city first burst into view, He wept over Jerus (Lk 19 41). During all that week “every day he was teaching in the temple; and every night he went out, and lodged in the mount that is called Olivet” (Lk 21 37)—the special part of the mount being Bethany (Mt 21 17; Mk 11 11). It was on the road from Bethany that He gave the sign of the withering of the fruitless fig tree (Mt 21 17–19; Mk 11 12–14.20–24), and “as he sat on the mount of Olives” (Mt 24 3 f; Mk 13 3 f) Jesus gave His memorable sermon with the doomed city lying below Him.

On the lower slopes of Olivet, in the GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE (q.v.), Jesus endured His agony, the betrayal and arrest, while upon one of its higher points—not, as tradition has it, on the inhabited highest summit, but on the secluded eastern slopes “over against Bethany” (Lk 24 50–52)—He took leave of His disciples (cf Acts 1 12).

The view of Jerus from the Mount of Olives must ever be one of the most striking impressions which any visitor to Jerus carries away with him. It has been described countless times. It is today a view but of ruin from Olivet and departed glory compared with that over which Jesus wept. A modern writer with historic imagination has thus graphically sketched the salient features of that sight:

“We are standing on the road from Bethany as it breaks round the Mount of Olives and on looking north-west this is what we see. . . . There spreads a vast stone stage, almost rectangular, some 400 yds. N. and S. by 300 E. and W., held up above Ophel and the Kidron valley by a high and massive wall, from 50 to 150 ft. and more in height, according to the levels of the rock from which it rises. Deep cloisters surround this platform on the inside of the walls. . . . Every gate has its watch and other guards patrol the courts. The crowds, which pour through the south gates upon the platform for the most part keep to the right; the exceptions, turning westward, are excommunicated or in mourning. But the crowd are not all Israelites. Numbers of Gentiles mingle with them; there are costumes and colors from all lands. In the cloisters sit teachers with groups of disciples about them. On the open pavement stand the booths of hucksters and money changers; and from the N. sheep and bullocks are being driven toward the Inner Sanctuary. This lies not in the center of the great platform, but in the northwest corner. It is a separately fortified, oblong enclosure; its high walls with their 9 gates rising from a narrow terrace at a slight elevation above the platform and the terrace encompassed by a fence within which none but Israelites may pass. . . . Upon its higher western end rises a house 'like a lion broad in front and narrow behind.' . . . From the open porch of this house stone steps descend to a great block of an altar perpetually smoking with sacrifices. . . . Off the N.W. of the Outer Sanctuary a castle (the Antonia) dominates the whole with its 4 lofty towers. Beyond . . . the Upper City rises in curved tiers like a theater, while all the lower slopes to the S. are a crowded mass of houses, girded by the eastern wall of the city. Against that crowded background the sanctuary with its high house gleams white and fresh. But the front of the house, glittering with gold plates, is obscured by a column of smoke rising from the altar; and the Priests' Court about the latter is colored by the slaughterers and sacrifices—a splash of red, as our imagination takes it, in the center of the prevailing white. At intervals there are bursts of music; the singing of psalms, the clash of cymbals and a great blare of trumpets, at which the people in their court in the Inner Sanctuary fall down and worship" (extracts from G. A. Smith's Jerusalem, II, 518–20).

To the Bible student the NT is the best guide to Olivet; tradition and "sites" only bewilder him.

Once the main hilltop was a mass of churches. There was the "Church of the Ascension" to mark the spot where tradition (contrary to the direct statement of Luke) states that the Ascension occurred; now the site is marked by a small octagonal chapel, built in 1834, which is in the hands of the Moslems. There a "footprint of Christ" is shown in the rock. A large basilica of Helena was built over the place where it was said that Christ taught His disciples. In 1869 the Princess de Latour d'Auvergne, learning that there was a Moslem tradition that this site was at a spot called el Battaniyeh south of the summit, here erected a beautiful church known as the Church of the Pater Noster and around the courtyard she had the Lord's Prayer inscribed in 32 languages. When the church was in course of erection certain fragments of old walls and mosaics were found, but, in 1911, as a result of a careful excavation of the site, the foundations of a more extensive mass of old buildings, with some beautiful mosaic in the baptistry, were revealed in the neighborhood; there is little doubt but that these foundations belonged to the actual Basilica of Helena. It is proposed to rebuild the church.

Mention has been made of the name Viri Galilaei or Galilee as given to the northern summit of the main mass of Olivet. The name "Mount Galilee" appears to have been first given to this hill early in the 4th cent. and in 1573 AD Rauwolf explains the name by the statement that here was anciently a khan where the Galileans lodged who came up to Jerus. In 1620 Quaresmius applies the names "Galilee" and Viri Galilaei to this site and thinks the latter name may be due to its having been the spot where the two angels appeared and addressed the disciples as "Ye men of Galilee" (Acts 1 11). Attempts have been made, without much success, to maintain that this "Galilee" was the spot which Our Lord intended (Mt 28 10.16) to indicate to His disciples as the place of meeting.

The Russian inclosure includes a chapel, a lofty tower—from which a magnificent view is obtainable—a hospice and a pleasant pine grove. Between the Russian buildings to the N. and the Church of the Ascension lies the squalid village of et Târ, inhabited by a peculiarly turbulent and rapacious crowd of Moslems, who prey upon the passing pilgrims and do much to spoil the sentiment of a visit to this sacred spot. It is possible it may be the original site of BETHPHAGE (q.v.).

OLIVET, ol'i-vet. See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

OLYMPAS, ð-lim'pas (Ὀλυμπᾶς, Olumpās): The name of a Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). Olympas is an abbreviated form of Olympiadorus. The joining in one salutation of the Christians mentioned in ver 15 suggests that they formed by themselves a small community in the earliest Rom church.

OLYMPIUS, ð-lim'pi-us (Ὀλύμπιος, Olímpios): An epithet of JUPITER or ZEUS (q.v.) from Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, where the gods held court presided over by Zeus. Antiochus Epiphanes, "who on God's altars danced," insulted the Jewish religion by dedicating the temple of Jerus to Jupiter Olympius, 168 BC (2 Macc 6 2; 1 Macc 1 54 ff.).

OMAEUS, om-a-ē'rus: AV=RV "Ismaerus" (1 Esd 9 34).

OMAR, ð'mar (أُمّار, 'omār, connected perhaps with 'amar, "speak"; LXX Ὠμάν, Omán, or Ὠμάρ, Omár): Grandson of Esau and son of Eliphaz in Gen 36 11; 1 Ch 1 36; given the title "duke" or "chief" in Gen 36 15.

OMEGA, ð'me-ga, ð-mē'ga, ð-meg'a. See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

OMENS, ð'menz. See AUGURY; DIVINATION.

OMER, ð'mēr (עֹמֶר, 'omer): A dry measure, the tenth of an ephah, equal to about 7½ pints. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

OMNIPOTENCE, om-nip'ð-tens: The noun "omnipotence" is not found in the Eng. Bible, nor any noun exactly corresponding to it in the original Heb or Gr.

1. Terms and Usage The adj. "omnipotent" occurs in Rev 19 6 AV; the Gr for this, παντοκράτωρ, pan-tokrátōr, occurs also in 2 Cor 6 18; Rev 1 8; 4 8; 11 17; 15 3; 16 7.14; 19 15; 21 22 (in all of which AV and RV render "almighty"). It is also found frequently in LXX, esp. in the rendering of the Divine names Jeh cēbhā'ōth and 'El Shadday. In pan-tokrátōr, the element of "authority," "sovereignty," side by side with that of "power," makes itself more distinctly felt than it does to the modern ear in "omnipotent," although it is meant to be included in the latter also. Cf further ð dūnatos, ho dūnatos, in Lk 1 49.

The formal conception of omnipotence as worked out in theology does not occur in the OT. The substance of the idea is conveyed in

2. Inherent various indirect ways. The notion of "strength" is inherent in the OT conception of God from the beginning, God being already represented in one of the two Divine names inherited by Israel from ancient Sem religion, the name 'El. According to one etymology it is also inherent in the other, the name 'Elohim, and in this case the pl. form, by bringing out the fulness of power in God, would mark an approach to the idea of omnipotence. See GOD, NAMES OF.

In the patriarchal religion the conception of "might" occupies a prominent place, as is indicated by the name characteristic of this period, 'El Shadday; cf Gen 17 1; 28 3; 35 11; 43 14; 48 3; 49 24.25; Ex 6 3. This name, however, designates the Divine power as standing in the service of His covenant-relation to the patriarchs, as transcending Nature and overpowering it in the interests of redemption.

Another Divine name which signalizes this attribute is Jeh cēbhā'ōth, Jeh of Hosts. This name, characteristic of the prophetic period, describes God as the King surrounded and followed by the angelic hosts, and since the might of an oriental king is measured by the splendor of his retinue, as of great, incomparable power, the King Omnipotent (Ps 24 10; Isa 2 12; 6 3.5; 8 13; Jer 46 18; Mal 1 14).

Still another name expressive of the same idea is Abhâr, "Strong One," compounded with Jacob or Israel (Gen 49 24; Ps 132 2.5; Isa 1 24; 49 26; 60 16). Further, El Gibbôr, "God-Hero" (Isa 9 6 [of the Messiah]; cf for the adj. gibbôr, Jer 20 11); and the figurative designation of God as Çûr, "Rock," occurring esp. in the address to God in the Psalter (Isa 30 29, AV "Mighty One"). The specific energy with which the Divine nature operates finds expression also in the name El Hay, "Living God," which God bears over against the impotent idols (1 S 17 26.36; 2 K 19 4.16; Ps 18 46; Jer 23 36; Dnl 6 20.26 f). An anthropomorphic description of the power of God is in the figures of His "hand," His "arm," His "finger." See God.

Some of the attributes of Jeh have an intimate connection with His omnipotence. Under this head esp. God's nature as Spirit and

3. Other Modes of Expression His holiness come under consideration. The representation of God as Spirit in the OT does not primarily refer to the incorporeality of the Divine nature, but to its inherent energy. The physical element underlying the conception of Spirit is that of air in motion, and in this at first not the invisibility but the force forms the point of comparison. The opposite of "Spirit" in this sense is "flesh," which expresses the weakness and impotence of the creature over against God (Isa 2 22; 31 3).

The holiness of God in its earliest and widest sense (not restricted to the ethical sphere) describes the majestic, specifically Divine character of His being, that which evokes in man religious awe. It is not a single attribute coordinated with others, but a peculiar aspect under which all the attributes can be viewed, that which renders them distinct from anything analogous in the creature (1 S 2 2; Hos 11 9). In this way holiness becomes closely associated with the power of God, indeed sometimes becomes synonymous with Divine power = omnipotence (Ex 15 11; Nu 20 12), and esp. in Ezk, where God's "holy name" is often equivalent to His renown for power, hence interchangeable with His "great name" (Ezk 36 20-24). The objective Spirit as a distinct hypostasis and the executive of the Godhead on its one side also represents the Divine power (Isa 32 15; Mt 12 28; Lk 1 35; 4 14; Acts 10 38; Rom 15 19; 1 Cor 2 4).

In all these forms of expression a great and specifically Divine power is predicated of God. Statements in which the absolutely un-

4. Unlimited Extent of the Divine Power limited extent of this power is explicitly affirmed are rare. The reason, however, lies not in any actual restriction placed on this power, but in the concrete practical form of religious thinking which prevents abstract formulation of the principle. The point to be noticed is that no statement is anywhere made exempting aught from the reach of Divine power. Nearest to a general formula come such statements as nothing is "too hard for Jeh" (Gen 18 14; Jer 32 17); or "I know that thou canst do everything," or "God . . . hath done whatever he pleased" (Ps 115 3; 135 6), or, negatively, no one "can hinder" God in carrying out His purpose (Isa 43 13), or God's hand is not "waxed short" (Nu 11 23); in the NT: "With God all things are possible" (Mt 19 26; Mk 10 27; Lk 18 27); "Nothing is impossible with God" (RV "No word from God shall be void of power," Lk 1 37). Indirectly the omnipotence of God is implied in the effect ascribed to faith (Mt 17 20: "Nothing shall be impossible unto you"; Mk 9 23: "All things are possible to him that believeth"), because faith puts the Divine power at the disposal of the believer. On its subjective side the principle of inexhaustible power finds expression in Isa 40 28: God is not subject to weariness. Because God is conscious of the unlimited extent of His resources nothing is marvelous in His eyes (Zec 8 6).

It is chiefly through its forms of manifestation that the distinctive quality of the Divine power which renders it omnipotent becomes

5. Forms of Manifestation apparent. The Divine power operates not merely in single concrete acts, but is comprehensively related to the world as such. Both in Nature and history, in creation and in redemption, it produces and controls and directs everything that comes to pass. Nothing in the realm of actual or conceivable things is withdrawn from it (Am 9 2.3; Dnl 4 35); even to the minutest and most recondite sequences of cause and effect it extends and masters all details of reality (Mt 10 30; Lk 12 7). There is no accident (1 S 6 9; cf with ver 12; Prov 16 33). It need not operate through second causes; it itself underlies all second causes and makes them what they are.

It is creative power producing its effect through a mere word (Gen 1 3 ff; Dt 8 3; Ps 33 9; Rom 4 17; He 1 3; 11 30). Among the prophets, esp. Isaiah emphasizes this manner of the working of the Divine power in its immediateness and suddenness (Isa 9 8; 17 13; 18 4-6; 29 5). All the processes of Nature are ascribed to the causation of Jeh (Job 5 9 ff; 9 5 ff; chs 38 and 39; Isa 40 12 ff; Am 4 13; 5 8.9; 9 5.6); esp. God's control of the sea is named as illustrative of this (Ps 65 7; 104 9; Isa 50 2; Jer 5 22; 31 35). The OT seldom says "it rains" (Am 4 7), but usually God causes it to rain (Lev 26 4; Dt 11 17; 1 S 12 17; Job 36 27; Pss 29 and 65; Mt 5 45; Acts 14 17).

The same is true of the processes of history. God sovereignly disposes, not merely of Israel, but of all other nations, even of the most powerful, e.g. the Assyrians, as His instruments for the accomplishment of His purpose (Am 1-2 3; 9 7; Isa 10 5.15; 28 2; 45 1; Jer 25 9; 27 6; 43 10). The prophets ascribe to Jeh not merely relatively greater power than to the gods of the nations, but His power extends into the sphere of the nations, and the heathen gods are ignored in the estimate put upon His might (Isa 31 3).

Even more than the sphere of Nature and history, that of redemption reveals the Divine omnipotence, from the point of view of the supernatural and miraculous. Thus Ex 15 celebrates the power of Jeh in the wonders of the exodus. It is God's exclusive prerogative to do wonders (Job 5 9; 9 10; Ps 72 18); He alone can make "a new thing" (Nu 16 30; Isa 43 19; Jer 31 22). In the NT the great embodiment of this redemptive omnipotence is the resurrection of believers (Mt 22 29; Mk 12 24) and specifically the resurrection of Christ (Rom 4 17.21.24; Eph 1 19 ff); but it is evidenced in the whole process of redemption (Mt 19 26; Mk 10 27; Rom 8 31; Eph 3 7.20; 1 Pet 1 5; Rev 11 17).

The significance of the idea may be traced along two distinct lines. On the one hand the Divine omnipotence appears as a support of faith. On the other hand it is productive of that specifically religious state of consciousness which Scripture calls "the fear of Jeh." Omnipotence in God is that to which human faith addresses itself. In it lies the ground for assurance that He is able to save, as in His love that He is willing to save (Ps 65 5.6; 72 18; 118 14-16; Eph 3 20).

As to the other aspect of its significance, the Divine omnipotence in itself, and not merely for soteriological reasons, evokes a specific religious response. This is true, not only of the OT, where the element of the fear of God stands comparatively in the foreground, but remains true also of the NT. Even in Our Lord's teaching the prominence given to the fatherhood and love of God does not preclude that the transcendent majesty of the Divine nature, including omnipotence, is kept in full view and made a potent factor in the cultivation of the religious mind (Mt 6 9). The beauty of Jesus' teaching on the nature of God consists in this, that He keeps the exaltation of God above every creature and His loving condescension toward the creature in perfect equilibrium and makes them mutually fructified by each other. Religion is more than the inclusion of God in the general altruistic movement of the human mind; it is a devotion at every point colored by the consciousness of that Divine uniqueness in which God's omnipotence occupies a foremost place.

GEERHARDUS VOS

in Scripture, but the idea that God is everywhere present is throughout presupposed and sometimes explicitly formulated. God's omnipresence is in Scripture closely related to His omnipotence and omniscience: that He is everywhere enables Him to act everywhere and to know all things, and, conversely, through omnipotent action and omniscient knowledge He has access to all places and all secrets (cf Ps 139). Thus conceived, the attribute is but the correlate of the monotheistic conception of God as the Infinite Creator, Preserver and Governor of the universe, immanent in His works as well as transcendent above them.

The philosophical idea of omnipresence is that of exemption from the limitations of space, subjectively as well as objectively; subjectively, in so far as space, which is a necessary form of all created consciousness in the sphere of sense-perception, and Popular Ideas of Omnipresence is not thus constitutionally inherent in the mind of God; objectively, in so far as the actuality of space-relations in the created world imposes no limit upon the presence and operation of God. This metaphysical conception of transcendence above all space is, of course, foreign to the Bible, which in regard to this, as in regard to the other transcendent attributes, clothes the truth of revelation in popular language, and speaks of exemption from the limitations of space in terms and figures derived from space itself. Thus the very term "omnipresence" in its two component parts "everywhere" and "present" contains a double inadequacy of expression, both the notion of "everywhere" and that of "presence" being spacial concepts. Another point, in regard to which the popular nature of the Scriptural teaching on this subject must be kept in mind, concerns the mode of the Divine omnipresence. In treating the concept philosophically, it is of importance to distinguish between its application to the essence, to the activity, and to the knowledge of God. The Bible does not draw these distinctions in the abstract. Although sometimes it speaks of God's omnipresence with reference to the pervasive immanence of His being, it frequently contents itself with affirming the universal extent of God's power and knowledge (Dt 4 39; 10 14; Ps 139 6-16; Prov 15 3; Jer 23 23,24; Am 9 2).

This observation has given rise to the theories of a mere omnipresence of power or omnipresence by an act of will, as distinct from an omnipresence of being. But it is plain that in this antithetical form such a distinction is foreign to the intent of the Bib. statements in question. The writers in these passages content themselves with describing the practical effects of the attribute without reflecting upon the difference between this and its ontological aspect; the latter is neither affirmed nor denied. That no denial of the omnipresence of being is intended may be seen from Jer 23 24, where in the former half of the verse the omnipresence of ver 23 is expressed in terms of omniscience, while in the latter half the idea finds ontological expression. Similarly, in Ps 139, cf ver 2 with vs 7 ff, and vs 13 ff. As here, so in other passages the presence of God with His being in all space is explicitly affirmed (1 K 8 27; 2 Ch 2 6; Isa 66 1; Acts 17 28).

Omnipresence being the correlate of monotheism, the presence of the idea in the earlier parts of the OT is denied by all those who assign the development of monotheism in the OT religion to the prophetic period from the 8th cent. onward. It is undoubtedly true that the earliest narratives speak very anthropomorphically of God's relation to space; they describe Him as coming and going in language such as might be used of a human person. But it does not follow from this that the writers who do so conceive of God's being as circumscribed by space. Where such forms of statement occur, not the presence of God in general, but His visible presence in theophany is referred to. If from the local element entering into the description God's subjection to the limitations of space were inferred, then one might with equal warrant, on the basis of the physical, sensual elements entering into the representation, impute to the writers the view that the Divine nature is corporeal.

The theophanic form of appearance does not disclose what God is ontologically in Himself, but merely how He condescends to appear and work for the redemption of His people. It establishes a redemptive and revelatory presence in definite localities, which does not, in the mind of the writer, detract from the Divine omnipresence. Hence, it is not confined to one place; the altars built in recognition of it are in patriarchal history erected in several places and coexist as each and all offering access to the special Divine presence. It is significant that already during the patriarchal period these theophanies and the altars connected with them are confined to the Holy Land. This shows that the idea embodied in them has nothing to do with a crude conception of the Deity as locally circumscribed, but marks the beginning of that gradual restoration of the gracious presence of God to fallen humanity, the completion of which forms the goal of redemption. Thus God is said to dwell in the ark, in the tabernacle, on Mt. Zion (Nu 10 35; 2 S 6 2; 2 K 19 15; Ps 3 4; 99 1); in the temple (1 K 8; Ps 20 2; 26 8; 46 5; 48 2; Isa 8 18; Joel 3 16,21; Am 1 2); in the Holy Land (1 S 26 19; Hos 9 3); in Christ (Jn 1 14; 2 19; Col 2 9); in the church (Jn 14 23; Rom 8 9,11; 1 Cor 3 16; 6 19; Eph 2 21,22; 3 11; 2 Tim 3 15; He 10 21; 1 Pet 2 5); in the eschatological assembly of His people (Rev 21 3). In the light of the same principle must be interpreted the presence of God in heaven. This also is not to be understood as an ontological presence, but as a presence of specific theocratic manifestation (1 K 8 27; Ps 2 4; 11 4; 33 13 ff; 104 3; Isa 6 1 ff; 63 15; 66 1; Hab 2 20; Mt 5 34; 6 9; Acts 7 48; 17 28; Eph 1 20; He 1 3). How little this is meant to exclude the presence of God elsewhere may be seen from the fact that the two representations, that of God's self-manifestation in heaven and in the earthly sanctuary, occur side by side (1 K 8 26-53; Ps 20 2-6; Am 9 6). It has been alleged that the idea of God's dwelling in heaven marks a comparatively late attainment in the religion of Israel, of which in the pre-prophetic period no trace can as yet be discovered (so Stade, Bibl. Theol. des AT, I, 103, 104). There are, however, a number of passages in the Pent bearing witness to the early existence of this belief (Gen 11 1-9; 19 24; 21 17; 22 11; 28 12). Jeh comes, according to the belief of the earliest period, with the clouds (Ex 14 19,20; 19 9,18; 24 15; Nu 11 25; 12 5). That even in the opinion of the people Jeh's local presence in an earthly sanctuary need not have excluded Him from heaven follows also from the unhesitating belief in His simultaneous presence in a plurality of sanctuaries. If it was not a question of locally circumscribed presence as between sanctuary and sanctuary, it need not have been as between earth and heaven (cf Gunkel, Gen, 157).

Both from a generally religious and from a specifically soteriological point of view the omnipresence of God is of great practical importance

6. Religious Significance for the religious life. In the former respect it contains the guaranty that the actual nearness of God and a real communion with Him may be enjoyed everywhere, even apart from the places hallowed for such purpose by a specific gracious self-manifestation (Ps 139 5-10). In the other respect the Divine omnipresence assures the believer that God is at hand to save in every place where from any danger or foe His people need salvation (Isa 43 2).

OMNISCIENCE, om-nish'ens: The term does not occur in Scripture, either in its nominal or in its adjectival form.

In the OT it is expressed in connection with such words as יָדָעַת, da'ath, בִּינָה, bināh, תְּבוּנָה, tebbūnāh, הַכְּמָה, hokhmāh; also "seeing" and "hearing,"

1. Words and Usage "the eye" and "the ear" occur as figures for the knowledge of God, as "arm," "hand," "finger" serve to express His power. In the NT are found γινώσκειν, gínōskein, γνώσις, gnōsis, εἰδέναι, eidenai, σοφία, sophia, in the same connections.

Scripture everywhere teaches the absolute universality of the Divine knowledge. In the historical books, although there is no abstract formula, and occasional an-Assumption thropomorphic references to God's and Explicit taking knowledge of things occur (Gen Affirmation 11 5; 18 21; Dt 8 3), none the less the principle is everywhere presupposed in what is related about God's cognizance of the doings of man, about the hearing of prayer, the disclosing of the future (1 S 16 7; 23 9-12; 1 K 8 39; 2 Ch 16 9). Explicit affirmation of the principle is made in the Psalter, the Prophets, the hokhmāh literature and in the NT. This is due to the increased internalizing of religion, by which its hidden side, to which the Divine omniscience corresponds, receives greater emphasis (Job 26 6; 28 24; 34 22; Ps 139 12; 147 4; Prov 15 3, 11; Isa 40 26; Acts 1 24; He 4 13; Rev 2 23).

This absolute universality is affirmed with reference to the various categories that comprise within themselves all that is possible or actual. It extends to God's own being, as well as to what exists outside of Him in the created world. God has perfect possession in consciousness of His own being. The unconscious finds no place in Him (Acts 15 18; 1 Jn 1 5). Next to Himself God knows the world in its totality. This knowledge extends to small as well as to great affairs (Mt 6 8, 32; 10 30); to the hidden heart and mind of man as well as to that which is open and manifest (Job 11 11; 34 21, 23; Ps 14 2; 17 2 ff; 33 13-18; 102 19 f; 139 1-4; Prov 5 21; 15 3; Isa 29 15; Jer 17 10; Am 4 13; Lk 16 15; Acts 1 24; 1 Thess 2 4; He 4 13; Rev 2 23). It extends to all the divisions of time, the past, present and future alike (Job 14 17; Ps 56 8; Isa 41 22-24; 44 6-8; Jer 1 5; Hos 13 12; Mal 3 16). It embraces that which is contingent from the human viewpoint as well as that which is certain (1 S 23 9-12; Mt 11 22, 23).

Scripture brings God's knowledge into connection with His omnipresence. Ps 139 is the clearest expression of this. Omniscience is the omnipresence of cognition (Jer 23 23 ff). It is also closely related to Knowledge God's eternity, for the latter makes Him in His knowledge independent of the limitations of time (Isa 43 8-12). God's creative relation to all that exists is represented as underlying His omniscience (Ps 33 15; 97 9; 139 13; Isa 29 15). His all-comprehensive purpose forms the basis of His knowledge of all events and developments (Isa 41 22-27; Am 3 7).

This, however, does not mean that God's knowledge of things is identical with His creation of them, as has been suggested by Augustine and others. The act of creation, while necessarily connected with the knowledge of that which is to be actual, is not identical with such knowledge or with the purpose on which such knowledge rests, for in God, as well as in man, the intellect and the will are distinct faculties. In the last analysis, God's knowledge of the world has its source in His self-knowledge. The world is a revelation of God. All that is actual or possible in it therefore is a reflection in created form of what exists uncreated in God, and thus the knowledge of the one becomes a reproduction of the knowledge of the other (Acts 17 27; Rom 1 20). The Divine knowledge of the world also partakes of the quality of the Divine self-knowledge in this respect, that it is never dormant. God does not depend for embracing the multitude and complexity of the existing world on such mental processes as abstraction and generalization.

The Bible nowhere represents Him as attaining to knowledge by reasoning, but everywhere as simply knowing. From what has been said about the immanent sources of the Divine knowledge, it follows that the latter is not a posteriori derived from its objects, as all human knowledge based on experience is, but is exercised without receptivity or dependence. In knowing, as well as in all other activities of His nature, God is sovereign and self-sufficient. In cognizing the reality of all things He needs not wait upon the things, but draws His knowledge directly from the basis of reality as it lies in Himself. While the two are thus closely connected it is nevertheless of importance to distinguish between God's knowledge of Himself and God's knowledge of the world, and also between His knowledge of the actual and His knowledge of the possible. These distinctions mark off the theistic conception of omniscience from the pantheistic idea regarding it. God is not bound up in His life with the world in such a sense as to have no scope of activity beyond it.

Since Scripture includes in the objects of the Divine knowledge also the issue of the exercise of freewill on the part of man, the problem arises, how the contingent character of such decisions and the certainty of the Divine knowledge can coexist. It is true that the knowledge of God and the purposing will of God are distinct, and that not the former but the latter determines the certainty of the outcome. Consequently the Divine omniscience in such cases adds or detracts nothing in regard to the certainty of the event. God's omniscience does not produce but presupposes the certainty by which the problem is raised. At the same time, precisely because omniscience presupposes certainty, it appears to exclude every conception of contingency in the free acts of man, such as would render the latter in their very essence undetermined. The knowledge of the issue must have a fixed point of certainty to terminate upon, if it is to be knowledge at all. Those who make the essence of freedom absolute indeterminateness must, therefore, exempt this class of events from the scope of the Divine omniscience. But this is contrary to all the testimony of Scripture, which distinctly makes God's absolute knowledge extend to such acts (Acts 2 23). It has been attempted to construe a peculiar form of the Divine knowledge, which would relate to this class of acts specifically, the so-called scientia media, to be distinguished from the scientia necessaria, which has for its object God Himself, and the scientia libera which terminates upon the certainties of the world outside of God, as determined by His freewill. This scientia media would then be based on God's foresight of the outcome of the free choice of man. It would involve a knowledge of receptivity, a contribution to the sum total of what God knows derived from observation on His part of the world-process. That is to say, it would be knowledge a posteriori in essence, although not in point of time. It is, however, difficult to see how such a knowledge can be possible in God, when the outcome is psychologically undetermined and undeterminable. The knowledge could originate no sooner than the determination originates through the free decision of man. It would, therefore, necessarily become an a posteriori knowledge in time as well as in essence. The appeal to God's eternity as bringing Him equally near to the future as to the present and enabling Him to see the future decisions of man's free will as though they were present cannot remove this difficulty, for when once the observation and knowledge of God are made dependent on any temporal issue, the Divine eternity itself is thereby virtually denied. Nothing remains but to recognize that God's eternal knowledge of the outcome of the freewill choices of man implies that there enters into these choices, notwithstanding their free character, an element of predetermination, to which the knowledge of God can attach itself.

The Divine omniscience is most important for the religious life. The very essence of religion as communion with God depends on His

6. Religious all-comprehensive cognizance of the Importance life of man at every moment. Hence it is characteristic of the irreligious to deny the omniscience of God (Ps 10 11.12; 94 7-9; Isa 29 15; Jer 23 23; Ezk 8 12; 9 9). Esp. along three lines this fundamental religious importance reveals itself: (a) it lends support and comfort when the pious suffer from the misunderstanding and misrepresentation of men; (b) it acts as a deterrent to those tempted by sin, esp. secret sin, and becomes a judging principle to all hypocrisy and false security; (c) it furnishes the source from which man's desire for self-knowledge can obtain satisfaction (Ps 19 12; 51 6; 139 23.24).

OMRI, om'ri (עֲמֹרִי, 'omri; LXX Ἀμῶρι, Ambri; Assyri "Humri" and "Humria"):

(1) The 6th king of Northern Israel, and founder of the IIIrd Dynasty which reigned for nearly 50 years. Omri reigned 12 years, c 887-876 BC. The historical sources of his reign are contained in 1 K 16 15-28; 20 34, the M S, Assyri inscriptions, and in the published accounts of recent excavations in Samaria. In spite of the brief passage given to Omri in the OT, he was one of the most important of the military kings of Northern Israel.

O. is first mentioned as an officer in the army of Elah, which was engaged in the siege of the Philist town of Gibbethon. While O. was

1. His Accession thus engaged, Zimri, another officer of Elah's army, conspired against the king, whom he assassinated in a drunken debauch, exterminating at the same time the remnant of the house of Baasha. The conspiracy evidently lacked the support of the people, for the report that Zimri had usurped the throne no sooner reached the army at Gibbethon, than the people proclaimed O., the more powerful military leader, king over Israel. O. lost not a moment, but leaving Gibbethon in the hands of the Philis, he marched to Tirzah, which he besieged and captured, while Zimri perished in the flames of the palace to which he had set fire with his own hands (1 K 16 18). O., however, had still another opponent in Tibni the son of Ginath, who laid claim to the throne, and who was supported in his claims by his brother Joram (1 K 16 22 LXX) and by a large number of the people. Civil war followed this rivalry for the throne, which seems to have lasted for a period of four years (cf 1 K 16 15, with vs 23 and 29) before O. gained full control.

O.'s military ability is seen from his choice of Samaria as the royal residence and capital of the Northern Kingdom. This step may have been suggested to O. by his own easy conquest of Tirzah, the former capital. Accordingly, he purchased the hill Shomeron of Shemer for two talents of silver, about $4,352.00 in American money. The conical hill, which rose from the surrounding plain to the height of 400 ft., and on the top of which there was room for a large city, was capable of easy defence.

The superior strategic importance of Samaria is evidenced by the sieges it endured repeatedly by the Syrians and Assyrians. It

Palace of Omri and Ahab at Samaria.

Recent excavations in Samaria under the direction of Harvard University throw new light upon the ancient capital of Israel. The first results were the uncovering of massive foundation walls of a large building, including a stairway 80 ft. wide. This building, which is Roman in architecture, is supposed to have been a temple, the work of Herod. Under this Roman building was recovered a part of a massive Hebrew structure, believed to be the palace of O. and Ahab. During the year 1910 the explorations revealed a building covering 1½ acres of ground. Four periods of construction were recognized, which, on archaeological grounds, were tentatively assigned to the reigns of O., Ahab, Jehu, and Jeroboam II. See SAMARIA and articles by David G. Lyon in Harvard Theological Review, IV, 1911; JBL, V, xxx, Part I, 1911; PEFS, 1911, 79-83.

Concerning O.'s foreign policy the OT is silent beyond a single hint contained in 1 K 20 34.

Here we learn that he had to bow before the stronger power of Syria. It is probable that Ben-hadad I besieged Samaria shortly after it was built, for he forced O. to make "streets" in

3. His Foreign Policy the city for the Syrians. It is probable, too, that at this time Ramoth-gilead was lost to the Syrians. Evidently O. was weakened in his foreign policy at the beginning of his reign by the civil conflict engendered by his accession. However, he showed strength of character in his dealings with foreign powers. At least he regained control over the northern part of Moab, as we learn from the M S. Lines 4-8 tell us that "Omri was king of Israel and afflicted Moab many days because Chemosh was angry with his land. . . . Omri obtained possession of the land of Medeba and dwelt therein during his days and half the days of his son, forty years."

O. was the first king of Israel to pay tribute to the Assyrians under their king Asurnacirpal III, in 876 BC. From the days of Shalmaneser II (860 BC) down to the time of Sargon (722 BC), Northern Israel was known to the Assyrians as "the land of the house of Omri." On Shalmaneser's black obelisk, Jehu, who overthrew the dynasty of O., is called Ja'ua abal Humri, "Jehu son of Omri."

O. entered into an alliance with the Phoenicians by the marriage of his son Ahab to Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians. This may have been done as protection against the powers from the East, and as such would have seemed to be a wise political move, but it was one fraught with evil for Israel.

Although O. laid the foundation of a strong kingdom, he failed to impart to it the vitalizing and rejuvenating force of a healthy spiritual religion. The testimony of 4. His Religious Influence and Death 1 K 16 25,26, that he "dealt wickedly above all that were before him," coupled with the reference to "the statutes of Omri" in Mic 6 16, indicates that he may have had a share in substituting foreign religions for the worship of Jeh, and therefore the unfavorable light in which he is regarded is justified. Upon his death, O. was succeeded upon the throne by his son Ahab, to whom was left the task of shaking off the Syrian yoke, and who went beyond his father in making the Phoen influence along with Baalism of prime importance in Israel, thus leading the nation into the paths that hastened its downfall.

ON, on (אֹן, 'ōn; Egypt Ān, Ānt, Ānnū, probably pronounced Ān only, as this is often all that is written, a "stone" or "stone pillars"): Later called Heliopolis. The name On occurs only in Gen 41 45, 50; 46 20. It occurs in one other place in LXX (Ex 1 11), where On is mentioned with Pithom and Raamses as strong cities which the Israelites built. Heb slaves may have worked upon fortifications here, but certainly did not build the city. On is possibly referred to as עִיר הָהָרִים, 'ir ha-heres, in Isa 19 18 (see IR-HA-HERES). On may also be mentioned by Jeremiah (43 13) under the name Beth-shemesh. Ezekiel speaks of an Aven (אָוֶן, 'āven) (Ezk 30 17), where it is mentioned with Pibeseth (Bubastis). Aven in this passage is almost certainly the same as On in Gen 41 45; 46 20, as the letters of both words are the same in the Heb. Only the placing of the vowel-points makes any difference. If there is a mistake, it is a mistake of the Massoretes, not of the Heb writer.

There were two Ons in Egypt: one in Upper Egypt, An-res (Hermionthis); the other in Lower Egypt, An-Meheet (Brugsch, Geogr.

1. Location and Description Inscr., 254, 255, nos. 1217, a, b, 1218, 8708, 1225). The latter is the On referred to in the Bible. It lay about 20 miles N. of the site of old Memphis, about 10 miles N.E. of the location of modern Cairo. It has left until this time about 4 sq. miles of ruins within the old walls. Little or nothing remains outside the walls.

On was built at the edge of the desert, which has now retreated some 3 or 4 miles eastward, the result of the rising of the bed of the Nile by sediment from the inundation, and the broadening of the area of infiltration which now carries the water of the Nile that much to the E. The land around On has risen about 10 ft., and the waters of infiltration at the time of lowest Nile are now about 1½ ft. above the floor-level of the temple.

The history of On is very obscure, yet its very great importance is in no doubt. No clear description of the ancient city or sanctuary has come down to us, but there are so many incidental references, and so much is implied in ancient records, that it stands out as of the very first importance, both as capital and sanctuary. The city comes from the 1st Dynasty, when it was the seat of government, and indeed must have been founded by the 1st Dynasty or have come down to it from pre-historic time. From the IIIrd to the VIth Dynasty the seat of government was shifted from On to Memphis, and in the XIIth Dynasty to Diospolis. Throughout these changes On retained its religious importance. It had been the great sanctuary in the time of the Pyramid Texts, the oldest religious texts of Egypt, and judging from the evident great development of the temple of On at the time of the writing of the texts, the city must have antedated them by considerable time (Budge, Hist of Egypt, II, 83, 84, 108; Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, chs i, ii). The myth of Osiris makes even the charge against Set for the murder of Osiris to have been preferred at Heliopolis (Breasted, op. cit., 34). This certainly implies a very great age for the sanctuary at On. It contained a temple of the sun under the name Ra, the sun, and also Atum, the setting sun, or the sun of the Underworld. There was also a Phoenix Hall and a sacred object called a ben, probably a stone, and the origin of the name An, a "stone" or "pillar" (cf Breasted, op. cit., 76, 11, and 71). Though the XIIth Dynasty removed the capital to Diospolis, Usertsen I (Senwesret) of that Dynasty erected a great obelisk at On in front of the entrance to the temple. The situation of this obelisk in the temple-area indicates that the great temple was already more than a half-mile in length as early as the XIIth Dynasty. The mate of this obelisk on the opposite side of the entrance seems not to have been erected until the XVIIIth Dynasty. Its foundations were discovered in 1912 by Petrie. Some scraps of the granite of the obelisk bear inscriptions of Thothmes III. A great Hyksos wall, also discovered by Petrie in 1912, exactly similar to that of the fortified camp at Tel el Yehudiyeh, 4 miles N., makes it quite certain that these usurpers between the Old Empire and the New fortified On as the capital once more. The manifest subserviency of the priests of On in the story of Joseph makes it most probable that the old capital at On had already been subjugated in Joseph's time, and that within this old fortification still existing Joseph ruled as prime minister of Egypt. Merenptah in his 5th year began to fortify On. Sheshonk III called himself "divine prince of Annu," and seems to have made On one of the greatest sanctuaries of his long reign. On still figured in Egypt history in the rebellion against Ashurbanipal. The city has been deserted since the Pers invasion of 525 BC. Tradition makes the dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary with the child Jesus, while in Egypt, to have been near Heliopolis.

The exploration of On was attempted by Schiaparelli, but was not carried out, and his work has not been published. In 1912 Petrie began a systematic work of excavation which, it is expected, will continue until the whole city has been examined. The only great discovery of the first season was the Hyksos wall of fortification. Its full import can only be determined by the continuance of the exploration. M. G. KYLE

ON (אֹנִי, 'ōn; אֲנִי, 'ān): A Reubenite, son of Peleth, who took part with Dathan and Abiram in their revolt against Moses (Nu 16 1).

ONAM, ō'nam (אֹנָם, 'ōnām, "vigorous"; cf ONAN):

(1) "Son" of Shobal "son" of Seir the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40).

(2) "Son" of Jerahmeel by Atarah; perhaps the name is connected with Onan son of Judah (1 Ch 2 26, 28).

ONAN, ō'nan (אֹנָן, 'ōnān, "vigorous"; cf ONAM): A "son" of Judah (Gen 38 4, 8-10; 46 12; Nu 26 19; 1 Ch 2 3). "The story of the untimely death of Er and Onan implies that two of the ancient clans of Judah early disappeared" (Curtis, Chron, 84). See Skinner, Gen, 452, where it is pointed out that in Gen 38 11 Judah plainly attributes the death of his sons in some way to Tamar herself. The name is allied to Onam.

ONESIMUS, ō-nes'i-mus (Ὀνήσιμος, Onēsimos, lit. "profitable," "helpful" [Col 4 9; Philem ver 10]):

Onesimus was a slave (Philem ver 16) belonging to Philemon who was a wealthy citizen of Colossae, and a prominent member of the church there. O. was still a heathen when he defrauded his master and ran off from Colossae. He found his way to Rome, where evil men tended to flock as to a common center, as Tacitus tells us they did at that period. In Rome he came into contact with Paul, who was then in his own hired house, in military custody.

What brought him into contact with Paul we do not know. It may have been hunger; it may have been the pangs of conscience. He could not forget that his master's house in Colossae was the place where the Christians met in their weekly assemblies for the worship of Christ. Neither could he forget how Philemon had many a time spoken of Paul, to whom he owed his conversion. Now that O. was in Rome—what a strange coincidence—Paul also was in Rome.

The result of their meeting was that O. was converted to Christ, through the instrumentality of the apostle ("my child, whom I have begotten in my bonds," Philem ver 10). His services had been very acceptable to Paul, who would gladly have kept O. with him; but as he could not do this without the knowledge and consent of Philemon, he sent O. back to Colossae, to his master there.

At the same time Paul wrote to the church in Colossae on other matters, and he intrusted the

2. Paul's Epistles to Colossae and to Philemon Ep. to the Col to the joint care of Tychicus and O. The apostle recommends O. to the brethren in Colossae, as a "faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you," and he goes on to say that Tychicus and O. will make known to them all things that have happened to Paul in Rome. Such a commendation would greatly facilitate O.'s return to Colossae.

But Paul does more. He furnishes O. with a letter written by himself to Philemon. Returning to a city where it was well known that he had been neither a Christian nor even an honest man, he needed someone to vouch for the reality of the change which had taken place in his life. And Paul does this for him both in the Ep. to the Col and in that to Philemon.

With what exquisite delicacy is O. introduced! "Receive him," says the apostle, "for he is my own very heart" (Philem ver 12). "The man whom the Colossians had only known hitherto, if they knew him at all, as a worthless runaway slave, is thus commended to them, as no more a slave but a brother, no more dishonest and faithless but trustworthy; no more an object of contempt but of love" (Lightfoot's Comm. on Col, 235).

(1) Onesimus profitable.—The apostle accordingly begs Philemon to give O. the same reception as he would rejoice to give to himself. The past history of O. had been such as to belie the meaning of his name. He had not been "profitable"—far from it. But already his consistent conduct in Rome and his willing service to Paul there have changed all that; he has been profitable to Paul, and he will be profitable to Philemon too.

(2) Paul guarantees.—O. had evidently stolen his master's goods before leaving Colossae, but in regard to that the apostle writes that if he has defrauded Philemon in anything, he becomes his surety. Philemon can regard Paul's handwriting as a bond guaranteeing payment: "Put that to mine account," are his words, "I will repay it." Had Philemon not been a Christian, and had Paul not written this most beautiful letter, O. might well have been afraid to return. In the Rom empire slaves were constantly crucified for smaller offences than those of which he had been guilty. A thief and a runaway had nothing but torture or death to expect.

(3) The change which Christ makes.—But now under the sway of Christ all is changed. The master who has been defrauded now owns allegiance to Jesus. The letter, which is delivered to him by his slave, is written by a bound "prisoner of Jesus Christ." The slave too is now a brother in Christ, beloved by Paul: surely he will be beloved by Philemon also. Then Paul intimates that he hopes soon to be set free, and then he will come and visit them in Colossae. Will Philemon receive him into his house as his guest?

(4) The result.—It cannot be imagined that this appeal in behalf of O. was in vain. Philemon would do more than Paul asked; and on the apostle's visit to Colossae he would find the warmest welcome, both from Philemon and from Onesimus.

ONESIPHORUS, ō-nē-sif'ō-rus (Ὀνησιφόρος, Onēsiphoros, lit. "profit bringer" [2 Tim 1 16; 4 19]): Onesiphorus was a friend of

1. The the apostle Paul, who mentions him Friend of twice when writing to Timothy. In Paul the former of the two passages where his name occurs, his conduct is contrasted with that of Phygellus and Hermogenes and others—all of whom, like O. himself, were of the province of Asia—from whom Paul might well have expected to receive sympathy and help. These persons had "turned away" from him. O. acted in a different way, for "he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but, when he was in Rome, he sought me diligently, and found me."

O. was one of the Christians of the church in Ephesus; and the second passage, where his name is found, merely sends a message of greeting from Paul, which Timothy in Ephesus is requested to deliver to "the household of O." (AV).

O. then had come from Ephesus to Rome. It was to Paul that the church at Ephesus owed its origin, and it was to him therefore that
2. Visits O. and the Christians there were in-
Paul in debted for all that they knew of Christ.
Rome O. gratefully remembered these facts, and having arrived in Rome, and learned that Paul was in prison, he "very diligently" sought for the apostle. But to do this, though it was only his duty, involved much personal danger at that particular time. For the persecution, inaugurated by Nero against the Christians, had raged bitterly; its fury was not yet abated, and this made the profession of the Christian name a matter which involved very great risk of persecution and of death.

Paul was not the man to think lightly of what his Ephesian friend had done. He remembered too, "in how many things he ministered at Ephesus." And, writing to Timothy, he reminded him that O.'s kindly ministrations at Ephesus were already well known to him, from his residence in Ephesus, and from his position, as minister of the church there.

It should be observed that the ministration of O. at Ephesus was not, as AV gives it, "to me," that is, to Paul himself. "To me" is omitted in RV. What O. had done there was a wide Christian ministry of kindly action; it embraced "many things," which were too well known—for such is the force of the word—to Timothy to require repetition.

The visits which O. paid to Paul in his Rom prison were intensely "refreshing." And it was not once or twice that he thus visited the chained prisoner, but he did so oftentimes.

Though O. had come to Rome, his household had remained in Ephesus; and a last salutation is sent to them by Paul. He could not write

3. His again, as he was now ready to be offered,
Household and his execution could not long be delayed. But as he writes, he entertains the kindest feelings toward O. and his household, and he prays that the Lord will give mercy to the household of O.

He also uses these words in regard to O. himself: "The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day." It is not clear whether O. was living, or whether he had died, before Paul wrote this ep. Different opinions have been held on the subject.

The way in which Paul refers twice to "the household [RV 'house'] of Onesiphorus," makes it possible that O. himself had died. If this is so—but certainty is impossible—the apostle's words in regard to him would be a pious wish, which has nothing in common with the abuses which have gathered round the subject of prayers for the dead, a practice which has no foundation in Scripture.

ONIARES, ō-nī'a-rēz, ō-nī-ā-rēz: 1 Macc 12 19 AV=RV ARIUS (q.v.).

ONIAS, ō-nī'as (Ὀνίας, Onias): There were 3 high priests of the name of Onias, and a 4th Onias who did not become a high priest but was known as the builder of the temple of Leontopolis (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 1-3). Only two persons of the name are mentioned in the Apoc—Onias I and Onias III.

(1) Onias I, according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 7), the son of Jaddua and father of Simon the Just (ib, XII, ii, 5; Sir 50), and, according to 1 Macc 12 7,20, a contemporary of Areus (Arius), king of Sparta, who reigned 309-265 BC (Diod. xx.29). This Onias was the recipient of a friendly letter from Areus of Sparta (1 Macc 12 7; see MSS readings here, and 12 20). Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10) represents this letter as written to Onias III, which is an error, for only two Areuses are known, and Areus II reigned about 255 BC and died a child of 8 years (Paus. iii.6.6). The letter—if genuine—exists in two copies (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10, and 1 Macc 12 20 ff) (see Schürer, Hist of the Jewish People, 4th ed, I, 182 and 237).

(2) Onias III, son of Simon II (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10), whom he succeeded, and a contemporary of Seleucus IV and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 3 1; 4 7) and father of Onias IV. He was known for his godliness and zeal for the law, yet was on such friendly terms with the Seleucids that Seleucus IV Philopator defrayed the cost of the "services of the sacrifices." He quarreled with Simon the Benjamite, guardian of the temple, about the market buildings (Gr aedileship). Being unable to get the better of Onias and thirsting for revenge, Simon went to Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and informed him of the "untold sums of money" lodged in the treasury of the temple. The governor told the king, and Seleucus dispatched his chancellor, Heliodorus, to remove the money. Onias remonstrated in vain, pleading for the "deposits of widows and orphans." Heliodorus persisted in the object of his mission. The high priest and the people were in the greatest distress. But when Heliodorus had already entered the temple, "the Sovereign of spirits, and of all authority caused a great apparition," a horse with a terrible rider accompanied by two strong and beautiful young men who scourged and wounded Heliodorus. At the intercession of Onias, his life was spared. Heliodorus advised the king to send on the same errand any enemy or conspirator whom he wished punished. Simon then slandered Onias, and the jealousy having caused bloodshed between their followers, Onias decided to repair in person to the king to intercede for his country. Apparently before a decision was given, Seleucus was assassinated and Epiphanes succeeded (175 BC). Jason, the brother of Onias, having offered the new king larger revenue, secured the priesthood, which he held until he himself was similarly supplanted by Menelaus, Simon's brother (2 Macc 4 23; Jos, Ant, XII, v, 1, says Jason's brother). Menelaus, having stolen golden vessels belonging to the temple to meet his promises made to the king, was sharply reproved by Onias. Menelaus took revenge by persuading Andronicus, the king's deputy, to entice Onias by false promises of friendship from his sanctuary at Daphne and treacherously slay him—an act which caused indignation among both the Jews and the Greeks (2 Macc 4 34 ff). Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1) says that "on the death of Onias the high priest, Antiochus gave the high-priesthood to his brother Jesus [Jason]," but the account of 2 Macc given above is the more probable. Some see in Dnl 9 26; 11 22 reference to Onias III (Schürer, 4th ed., I, 194 ff; III, 144). S. ANGUS

ONIONS, un'yunz (בצלים, b'cālīm; κρόμμυον, krómmyon): One of the delicacies of Egypt for which the children of Israel pined in the wilderness (Nu 11 5). The onion, allium cepa (N.O. Liliaceae), is known in Arab. as būṣal and is cultivated all over Syria and Egypt; it appears to be as much a favorite in the Orient today as ever.

ONLY BEGOTTEN, ōn'li bē-got'n (μονογενής, monogenēs): Although the Eng. words are found only 6 t in the NT, the Gr word appears 9 t, and often in the LXX. It is used literally of an only child: "the only son of his mother" (Lk 7 12); "an only daughter" (8 42); "mine only child" (9 38); "Isaac . . . his only begotten" (He 11 17). In all other places in the NT it refers to Jesus Christ as "the only begotten Son of God" (Jn 1 14.18; 3 16.18; 1 Jn 4 9). In these passages, too, it might be tr'd as "the only son of God"; for the emphasis seems to be on His uniqueness, rather than on His sonship, though both ideas are certainly present. He is the son of God in a sense in which no others are. "Monogenēs describes the absolutely unique relation of the Son to the Father in His Divine nature; prōtōtokos describes the relation of the Risen Christ in His glorified humanity to man" (Westcott on He 1 6). Christ's uniqueness as it appears in the above passages consists of two things: (a) He reveals the Father: "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him" (Jn 1 18). Men therefore behold His glory, "glory as of the only begotten from the Father" (1 14). (b) He is the mediator of salvation: "God hath sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him" (1 Jn 4 9; Jn 3 16); "He that believeth not [on him] hath been judged already" (Jn 3 18). Other elements in His uniqueness may be gathered from other passages, as His sinlessness, His authority to forgive sins, His unbroken communion with the Father, and His unique knowledge of Him. To say that it is a uniqueness of nature or essence carries thought no farther, for these terms still need definition, and they can be defined only in terms of His moral consciousness, of His revelation of God, and esp. of His intimate union as Son with the Father (see also BEGOTTEN; PERSON OF CHRIST; SON OF GOD).

The reading "God only begotten" in Jn 1 18 RVm, though it has strong textual support, is improbable, and can well be explained as due to orthodox zeal, in opposition to adoptionism. See Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon; Westcott, ad loc.

ONO, ō'nō (אֲוֹנָה, 'ōnō; B, Ὠνά, Ōnā, Ὠνά, Ōnā, and other forms): A town mentioned along with Lod as fortified by certain Benjamites (1 Ch 8 12). The Mish (ʿArākhin, ix.6) says that Joshua fortified it, but there is no such early notice of it in Scripture. It was occupied by Benjamites after the return from exile (Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37; 11 35). In one of the villages in the plain of Ono, Sanballat and his friends vainly tried to inveigle Nehemiah into a conference (6 2). It is represented by the modern Kefr 'Anā, which lies to the N.W. of Lydda. In 1 Esd 5 22, the name appears as "Onus." T. REES

ONUS, ō'nus. See ONO.

ONYCHA, on'i-ka (שֹׁהַלֵּת, sh'hēlēth; cf Arab. سُهْلَات, suḥlāt, "filings," "husks"): "Onycha" is a transliteration of the LXX ὄνυχα, ónucha, acc. of ὄνυξ, ónux, which means "nail," "claw," "hoof," and also "onyx," a precious stone. The form "onycha" was perhaps chosen to avoid confusion with "onyx," the stone. The Heb sh'hēlēth occurs only in Ex 30 34 as an ingredient of the sacred incense. It is supposed to denote the horny operculum found in certain species of marine gasteropod molluscs. The operculum is a disk attached to the upper side of the hinder part of the "foot" of the mollusc. When the animal draws itself into its shell, the hinder part of the foot comes last, and the operculum closes the mouth of the shell. The operculum, which may be horny or stony, is absent in some species. The horny opercula when burned emit a peculiar odor, and are still used in combination with other perfumes by the Arab women of Upper Egypt and Nubia. (See Sir S. Baker, The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, cited by EB, s.v. "Onycha.") ALFRED ELY DAY

ONYX, on'iks, ō'niks. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

OPEN, ō'p'n: In the OT represents chiefly פָּתַח, pāthah, but also other words, as גָּלַח, gālāh, "to uncover"; of the opening of the eyes in vision, etc. (thus Balaam, Nu 22 31; 24 4; cf Job 33 16; 36 10; Ps 119 18; Jer 32 11.14). In the NT the usual word is ἀνοίγω, anoigō (of opening of mouth, eyes, heavens, doors, etc.). A peculiar word, τραχηλίζομαι, trachēlīzomai (lit. to have the neck bent back, to be laid bare), is used for "laid open" before God in He 4 13.

OPEN PLACE: (1) The "open place" of Gen 38 14 AV, in which Tamar sat, has come from a misunderstanding of the Heb, the translators having taken בִּפְתֵּיחָהּ b'pethahā to mean "in an opening publicly," instead of "in an opening [i.e. a gate] of Enaim" (cf Prov 1 21 in the Heb). RV has corrected; see ENAIM. (2) In 1 K 22 10 || 2 Ch 18 9 RV relates that Ahab and Jehoshaphat sat "each on his throne, arrayed in their robes, in an open place [m "Heb a threshing-floor," AV "a void place"] at the entrance of the gate of Samaria." The Heb here is awkward, and neither the LXX nor the Syr seems to have read the present text in 1 K 22 10, the former having "in arms, at the gate of Samaria," and the latter "in many-colored garments." Consequently various attempts have been made to emend the text, of which the simplest is the omission of בִּגְדֵיהֶם, "in an open place." If, however, the text is right—as is not impossible—the open place is a threshing-floor close to the gate. See the commentaries.

OPERATION, op-ēr-ā'shun (עֲשֵׂיָהּ, ma'āseh, "work"; ἐνέργεια, enérgeia, ἐνέργημα, enérgeima, "energy"): Twice used in the OT of God's creative work (Ps 28 4.5; Isa 5 12). The Holy Spirit's inworking and power are manifest in the bestowal of spiritual gifts on individuals and on the church (1 Cor 12 6 AV), and in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, through which energy or operation of God those dead in sins are, through faith, raised to newness of life (Col 2 12 AV).

OPHEL, ō'fel (הֶעֱפֵל, ha-ōphēl [2 Ch 27 3; 33 14; Neh 3 26 f; 11 21; and without article, Isa 32 14 and Mic 4 8; also 2 K 5 24]):

There has been considerable divergence of opinion with regard to the meaning of this name. Thus in all the references given above with the art., RV has simply "Ophel," but AV adds in m "the tower"; in Isa 32 14, "the hill" of Name with m "Ophel," but AV "the forts," m "cliffs"; Mic 4 8, "the hill," m "Heb Ophel," but AV "the stronghold"; 2 K 5 24, "the hill,"

m "Heb Ophel," but AV "the tower," m "secret place." It is true that the other occurrences of the word in 1 S 5 9.12; 6 5 f, where it is tr^d "tumors," and Hab 2 4, where a verbal form is tr^d "puffed up," seem to imply that one meaning assigned to the root may be that of "swelling." Recently Dr. Burney (PEF, January, 1911) has produced strong arguments in favor of Ophel, when used as the name of a locality, meaning "fortress."

Three places are known to have received this name: (1) A certain place on the east hill of Jerus, S. of the temple; to this all the passages quoted above—except one—refer. (2) The "Ophel," tr^d "hill," situated apparently in Samaria (cf 2 K 5 3), where Gehazi took his ill-gotten presents from the hands of the servants of Naaman the Syrian. The tr "tower" would suit the sense at least as well. It was some point probably in the wall of Samaria, perhaps the citadel itself. (3) The third reference is not Bib., but on the M S, an inscription of Mesha, king of Moab, contemporary with Omri. He says: "I built KRHH [? Karhah], the wall of y^rārīm, and the wall of 'Ophel and I built its gates and I built its towers." In comparing the references to (1) and (3), it is evident that if Ophel means a "hill," it certainly was a fortified hill, and it seems highly probable that it meant some "artificial swelling in a fortification, e.g. a bulging or rounded keep or enceinte" (Burney, loc. cit.). Isa 32 14 reads, "The palace shall be forsaken; the populous city shall be deserted; the hill [Ophel] and the watch-tower shall be for dens for ever." Here we have palace, city and watch-tower, all the handiwork of the builder. Does it not seem probable that the Ophel belongs to the same category?

The situation of the Ophel of Jerus is very definitely described. It was clearly, from the references (Neh 3 26.27; 2 Ch 27 3; 33 14), on the east hill S. of the temple. 3. The Ophel of Jerusalem Jos states (BJ, V, iv, 2) that the eastern wall of the city ran from Siloam "and reaches as far as a certain place which they called Ophas when it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple." In BJ, V, vi, 1, it states that "John held the temple and the parts thereto adjoining, for a great way, as also 'Ophla,' and the Valley called the 'Valley of the Cedron.'" It is noticeable that this is not identical with the "Acra" and "Lower City" which was held by Simon. There is not the slightest ground for applying the name Ophel, as has been so commonly done, to the whole southeastern hill. In the days of Jos, it was a part of the hill immediately S. of the temple walls, but the OT references suit a locality nearer the middle of the southeastern hill. In the art. ZION (q.v.) it is pointed out that that name does not occur (except in reference to the Jebusite city) in the works of the Chronicler, but that "the Ophel," which occurs almost alone in these works, is apparently used for it. Mic 4 8 m seems to confirm this view: "O tower of the flock, the Ophel of the daughter of Zion." Here the "tower of the flock" may well refer to the shepherd David's stronghold, and the second name appears to be a synonym for the same place.

Ophel then was probably the fortified site which in earlier days had been known as "Zion" or "the City of David." King Jotham "built much" "on the wall of Ophel" (2 Ch 27 3). King Manasseh "built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate; and he compassed Ophel about with it, and raised it up to a very great height" (2 Ch 33 14). It was clearly a fortified place of great importance, and its situation must have been so near that of the ancient "Zion" that scarcely any other theory is possible except that it occupied the site of that ancient fortress.

OPHIR, ʾōfēr, ʾōfīr (אֹפִיר) [Gen 10 29], אֹפִיר [1 K 10 11], אֹפִיר, ʾōphīr): The 11th in order of the sons of Joktan (Gen 10 29=1 Ch 1 23). There is a clear reference also to a tribe Ophir (Gen 10 30). Ophir is the name of a land or city somewhere to the S. or S.E. of Pal for which Solomon's ships along with Phoen vessels set out from Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, returning with great stores of gold, precious stones and "almug"-wood (1 K 9 28; 10 11; 2 Ch 9 10; 1 K 22 48; 2 Ch 8 18). We get a fuller list of the wares and also the time taken by the voyage if we assume that the same vessels are referred to in 1 K 10 22, "Once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks." The other products may not have been native to the land of Ophir, but it is certain that the gold at least was produced there. This gold was proverbial for its purity, as is witnessed by many references in the OT (Ps 45 9; Job 28 16; Isa 13 12; 1 Ch 29 4), and, in Job 22 24, Ophir is used for fine gold itself. In addition to these notices of Ophir, it is urged that the name occurs also in two passages under the form "Uphaz" (Jer 10 9; Dnl 10 5).

At all times the geographical position of Ophir has been a subject of dispute, the claims of three different regions being principally advanced, namely (1) India and the Far East, (2) Africa, (3) Arabia.

2. Geographical Position (1) India and the Far East.—All the wares mentioned are more or less appropriate to India, even including the fuller list of 1 K 10 22. "Almug"-wood is conjectured to be the Indian sandal-wood. Another argument is based on the resemblance between the LXX form of the word (Sōphērā) and the Coptic name for India (Sophir). A closer identification is sought with Abhira, a people dwelling at the mouths of the Indus. Supara, an ancient city on the west coast of India near the modern Goa, is also suggested. Again, according to Wildman, the name denotes a vague extension eastward, perhaps as far as China.

(2) Africa.—This country is the greatest gold-producing region of the three. Sofala, a seaport near Mozambique on the east coast of Africa, has been advanced as the site of Ophir, both on linguistic grounds and from the nature of its products, for there all the articles of 1 K 10 22 could be procured. But Gesenius shows that Sofala is merely the Arab. form of the Heb sh'phēlāh. Interest in this region as the land of Ophir was renewed, however, by Mauch's discovery at Zimbabue of great ruins and signs of old Phoen civilization and worked-out gold mines. According to Bruce (I, 440), a voyage from Sofala to Ezion-geber would have occupied quite three years owing to the monsoons.

(3) Arabia.—The claim of Southeastern Arabia as the land of Ophir has on the whole more to support it than that of India or of Africa. The Ophir of Gen 10 29 beyond doubt belonged to this region, and the search for Ophir in more distant lands can be made only on the precarious assumption that the Ophir of K is not the same as the Ophir of Gen. Of the various products mentioned, the only one which from the OT notices can be regarded as clearly native to Ophir is the gold, and according to Pliny and Strabo the region of Southeastern Arabia bordering on the Persian Gulf was a famous gold-producing country. The other wares were not necessarily produced in Ophir, but were probably brought there from more distant lands, and thence conveyed by Solomon's merchantmen to Ezion-geber. If the duration of the voyage (3 years) be used as evidence, it favors this location of Ophir as much as that on the east coast of Africa. It seems therefore the least assailable view that Ophir was a district on the Persian Gulf in South-eastern Arabia and served in old time as an emporium of trade between the East and West.

OPHNI, of'nî (אֹפְנִי, hā-'ophnî; Ἀφνή, Aphnē): A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 24). The modern Jifneh, in a fine vale W. of the road to Nāblus and 2½ miles N.W. of Bethel, might suit as to position; but the change in the initial letter from ain to jim is not easy. This is the Gophna of the rabbis (cf Jos, BJ, III, iii, 5).

OPHRAH, of'ra (אֹפְרָה, 'ophrāh; Β, Ἀφρά, Aphrá, Α, Ἰεφραθά, Iephraṭhā, etc):

(1) A town in the territory allotted to Benjamin named between Parah and Chephar-ammoni (Josh 18 23). It is mentioned again in 1 S 13 17. The Philis who were encamped at Michmash sent out marauding bands, one of which went westward, another eastward, down "the valley of Zeboim toward the wilderness"; the third "turned unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual." This must have been northward, as Saul commanded the passage to the S. Onom places it 5 Rom miles E. of Bethel. A site which comes near to fulfilling these conditions is et-Taiyebah, which stands on a conical hill some 5 miles N.E. of Beitān. This is possibly identical with "Ephron" (2 Ch 13 19), and "Ephraim" (Jn 11 54).

(2) A city in the tribal lot of Manasseh W. of Jordan. It is mentioned only in connection with Gideon, whose native place it was, and with his son Abimelech (Jgs 6 11, etc). It was, indeed, family property, belonging to Joash the Abiezrite, the father of Gideon. It was apparently not far from the plain of Esdraelon (vs 33 f), so that Gideon and his kinsmen smarted under the near presence of the oppressing Midianites. Manasseh, of course, as bordering on the southern edge of the plain, was in close touch with the invaders. At Ophrah, Gideon reared his altar to Jeh, and made thorough cleansing of the instruments of idolatry. After his great victory, he set up here the golden ephod made from the spoils of the enemy, which proved a snare to himself and to his house (8 27). Here he was finally laid to rest. It was at Ophrah that Abimelech, aspiring to the kingdom, put to death upon one stone three score and ten of his brethren, es possible rivals, Jotham alone escaping alive (9 5). Apparently the mother of Abimelech belonged to Shechem; this established a relationship with that town, his connection with which does not therefore mean that Ophrah was near it.

No quite satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Conder (PEFS, 1876, 197) quotes the Samaritan Chronicle as identifying Ferata, which is 6 miles W. of Nāblus, with an ancient Ophra, "and the one that suggests itself as most probably identical is Ophrah of the Abiezrite." But this seems too far to the S.

(3) A man of the tribe of Judah, son of Meonothai (1 Ch 4 14).

W. EWING

OPINION, ô-pin'yun (אֵינִי, dē'; אֵינִי, sē'ippim): "Opinion" occurs only 5 t, thrice in Job (32 6.10. 17) as the tr of dē', "knowledge," "opinion" (in the address of Elihu), and once of sē'ippim, from sā'aph, "to divide or branch out," hence division or party, unsettled opinion (in the memorable appeal of Elijah, "How long halt ye between two opinions?"

1 K 18 21, ARV "How long go ye limping between the two sides?"). In Ecclus 3 24, we have, "For many are deceived by their own vain opinion" (hupolépsis, "a taking up," "a hasty judgment"), RV "The conceit of many hath led them astray."

OPOBALSAMUM, op-o-bal'sa-mum: RVm in Ex 30 34. See STACTE.

OPPRESSION, o-presh'un: Used in AV to translate a variety of Heb words, all of which, however, agree in the general sense of wrong done by violence to others. There are a few cases where the reference is to the oppression of Israel by foreigners, as by their Egypt masters (Ex 3 9; Dt 26 7), or by Syria (2 K 13 4), or by an unmentioned nation (Isa 30 20 AVm). In all these cases the Heb original is לָחַץ, lahaq. But in the vast number of cases the reference is to social oppression of one kind or another within Israel's own body. It is frequently the theme of psalmist and prophet and wise man. The poor and weak must have suffered greatly at the hands of the stronger and more fortunate. The word lahaq, various forms of the לָחַץ, 'ashak, and other words are used by the writers as they express their sorrow and indignation over the wrongs of their afflicted brethren. In his own sorrow, Job remembers the suffering of the oppressed (Job 35 9; 36 15); it is a frequent subject of song in the Ps (Ps 12 5; 42 9; 43 2; 44 24; 55 3; 119 134); the preacher observes and reflects upon its prevalence (Eccl 4 1; 5 8; 7 7 AV); the prophets Amos (3 9), Isaiah (5 7; 59 13), Jeremiah (6 6; 22 17) and Ezekiel (22 7.29) thundered against it. It was exercised toward strangers and also toward the Israelites themselves, and was never wholly overcome. In Jas 2 6, "oppress" is the rendering of καταδυναστεύω, kata dunasteiō, "to exercise harsh control over one," "to use one's power against one."

WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN

OR, ôr: The word is used once for either (1 S 26 10), and is still in poetic use in this sense; as in, "Without or wave or wind" (Coleridge); "Or the bakke or some bone he breketh in his zouthé" (Piers Plowman [B], VII, 93; cf Merchant of Venice, III, ii, 65). It is also used with "ever" for before (Ps 90 2; Ecclus 18 19), which ARV substitutes in Eccl 12 6 (cf vs 1.2); Cant 6 12; Dnl 6 24.

ORACLE, or'a-k'l: (1) A Divine utterance delivered to man, usually in answer to a request for guidance. So in 2 S 16 23 for דָּבָר, dābhar ("word," as in RVm). The use in this passage seems to indicate that at an early period oracular utterances were sought from Jeh by the Israelites, but the practice certainly fell into disuse at the rise of prophecy, and there are no illustrations of the means employed (1 S 14 18.19.36-42, etc, belong rather to DIVINATION [q.v.]). In RVm of such passages as Isa 13 1, "oracle" is used in the titles of certain special prophecies as a substitute for BURDEN (q.v.) (מַסָּעָה, massā'), with considerable advantage (esp. in Lam 2 14). (2) In heathen temples "oracle" was used for the chamber in which the utterances were delivered (naturally a most sacred part of the structure). This usage, coupled with a mistake in Heb philology (connecting דָּבָר, dābhar, "hinder part," with דִּבְּרָה, dibbēr, "speak"), caused EV to give the title "oracle" to the Most Holy Place of the Temple, in 1 K 6 5, etc, following the example of Aquila, Symmachus and Vulg. But the title is very unfortunate, as the Most Holy Place had nothing to do with the delivery of oracles, and RV should have corrected (cf Ps 28 2m).

(3) In the NT EV employs "oracle" as the tr of λόγιον, lógon, "saying," in four places. In all, Divine utterances are meant, specialized in Acts 7 38 as the Mosaic Law ("living oracles" = "commandments enforced by the living God"), in Rom 3 2 as the OT in general, and in He 5 12 as the revelations of Christianity (6 2.3). In 1 Pet 4 11 the meaning is debated, but probably the command is addressed to those favored by a supernatural "gift of speech." Such men must keep their own personality in the background, adding nothing of their own to the inspired message as it comes to them.

ORACLES, SIBYLLINE, sib'i-lin, -lin. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, V.

ORATOR, or'a-tēr, ORATION, ô-rā'shun: The word "orator" occurs twice: (1) As AV rendering of רֹחֵם, lahash; only Isa 3 3, "the eloquent orator," AVm "skilful of speech," where RV rightly substitutes "the skilful enchanter." The word lahash is probably a mimetic word meaning "a hiss," "a whisper," and is used in the sense of "incantation," "charm." Hence n'bhōn lahash means "skilful in incantation," "expert in magic." See DIVINATION; ENCHANTMENT. (2) As the rendering of ῥητορ, rhētōr, the title applied to Tertullus, who appeared as the advocate of the Jewish accusers of Paul before Felix (Acts 24 1). The proceedings, as was generally the case in the provincial Rom courts, would probably be conducted in Lat, and under Rom modes of procedure, in which the parties would not be well versed; hence the need of a professional advocate. Rhētōr is here the equivalent of the older Gr sunēgoros, "the prosecuting counsel," as opposed to the sūndikos, "the defendant's advocate."

Oration occurs only in Acts 12 21: "Herod . . . made an oration unto them" (ἐδημηγόρει πρὸς αὐτοὺς, edēmēgōrei prós autoús). The vb. dēmēgōréō, "to speak in an assembly" (from dēmos, "people," agoreiō, "to harangue"), is often found in classical Gr, generally in a bad sense (Lat concionari); here only in the NT.

ORCHARD, ôr'chêrd: (1) ὄρεος, pardēs, from Old Pers, "a walled-in inclosure"; παράδεισος, pardēisos, a word in classical Gr applied to the garden of Babylon (Diodorus Siculus xi.10) and to a game park (Xen. Anab. i.2, 7). See Neh 2 8, "forest," m "park"; Cant 4 13, "orchard," m "paradise" (of pomegranates); Eccl 2 5, "parks," AV "orchards"; see PARADISE. (2) κῆπος, kēpos, "garden" or "orchard": "a white thorn in an orchard" (Bar 6 71).

ORDAIN, or-dān', ORDINATION, ôr-di-nā'-shun (Lat ordinare, "to set in order," "to arrange"; in post-Augustan Lat "to appoint to office"; from ordo, gen. ordinis, "order," "arrangement"): In AV the vb. "to ordain" renders as many as 35 different words (11 Heb words in the OT, 21 Gr words in Apoc and the NT, and 3 Lat words in Apoc). This is due to the fact that the Eng. word has many shades of meaning (esp. as used in the time AV was made), of which the following are the chief: (1) To set in order, arrange, prepare:

"All things that we ordainéd festival, Turn from their office to black funeral."

—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, IV, v, 84.

This meaning is now obsolete. It is found in AV of Ps 132 17; Isa 30 33; He 9 6 (in each of which cases RV or m substitutes "prepare"); 1 Ch 17 9 (RV "appoint"); Ps 7 13 (RV "maketh"); Hab 1 12 (also RV). (2) To establish, institute, bring into being: "When first this order [i.e. the Garter] was ordained, my Lord" (Shakespeare). So in 1 K 12 32, "Jeroboam ordained a feast in the 8th month" (ver 33); Nu 28 6; Ps 8 2.3; Isa 26 12; 2 Esd 6 49 AV (RV "preserve"); Sir 7 15; Gal 3 19. (3) To decree, give orders, prescribe:

"And doth the power that man adores Ordain their doom?"

—Byron.

So Est 9 27, "The Jews ordained . . . that they would keep these two days according to the writing thereof"; 1 Esd 6 34; 2 Esd 7 17; 8 14 AV; Tob 1 6; 8 7 AV (RV "command"); Ad Est 14 9; 1 Macc 4 59; 7 49; Acts 16 4; Rom 7 10 AV; 1 Cor 2 7; 7 17; 9 14; Eph 2 10 AV. (4) To set apart for an office or duty, appoint, destine: "Being ordained his special governor" (Shakespeare). Frequent in EV. When AV has "ordain" in this sense, RV generally substitutes "appoint"; e.g. "He [Jesus] appointed [AV "ordained"] twelve, that they might be with him" (Mk 3 14). So 2 Ch 11 15; Jer 1 5; Dnl 2 24; 1 Esd 8 49; 1 Macc 3 55; 10 20; Jn 15 16; Acts 14 23; 1 Tim 2 7; Tit 1 5; He 5 1; 8 3. RV substitutes "formedst" in Wisd 9 2, "recorded" in Sir 48 10, "become" in Acts 1 22, "written of" (m "set forth") in Jude ver 4, but retains "ordain" in the sense of "appoint," "set apart," in 2 K 23 5; 1 Ch 9 22; 1 Esd 8 23; Ad Est 13 6; Acts 10 42; 13 48; 17 31; Rom 13 1. (5) To appoint ceremonially to the ministerial or priestly office, to confer holy orders on. This later technical or ecclesiastical sense is never found in EV. The nearest approach is (4) above, but the idea of formal or ceremonial setting-apart to office (prominent in its modern usage) is never implied in the word.

Ordination: The act of arranging in regular order, esp. the act of investing with ministerial or sacerdotal rank (ordo), the setting-apart for an office in the Christian ministry. The word does not occur in EV. The NT throws but little light on the origin of the later ecclesiastical rite of ordination. The 12 disciples were not set apart by any formal act on the part of Jesus. In Mk 3 14; Jn 15 16, the AV rendering "ordain" is, in view of its modern usage, misleading; nothing more is implied than an appointment or election. In Jn 20 21-23, we have indeed a symbolic act of consecration ("He breathed on them"), but "the act is described as one and not repeated. The gift was once for all, not to individuals but to the abiding body" (Westcott, ad loc.). In the Apostolic age there is no trace of the doctrine of an outward rite conferring inward grace, though we have instances of the formal appointment or recognition of those who had already given proof of their spiritual qualification. (1) The Seven were chosen by the brethren as men already "full of the Spirit and of wisdom," and were then "appointed" by the Twelve, who prayed and laid their hands upon them (Acts 6 1-6). (2) The call of Barnabas and Saul came direct from God (Acts 13 2, "the work whereunto I have called them"; ver 4, they were "sent forth by the Holy Spirit"). Yet certain prophets and teachers were instructed by the Holy Spirit to "separate" them (i.e. publicly) for their work, which they did by fasting and praying and laying on of hands (ver 3). But it was utterly foreign to Paul's point of view to regard the church's act as constituting him an apostle (cf Gal 1 1). (3) Barnabas and Paul are said to have "ordained," RV "appointed" (χειροτονήσαντες, cheirotōnēsantes, "elect," "appoint," without indicating the particular mode of appointment), elders or presbyters in every city with prayers and fasting (Acts 14 23). So Titus was instructed by Paul to "appoint elders in every city" in Crete (Tit 1 5). (4) The gift of Timothy for evangelistic work seems to have been formally recognized in two ways: (a) by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery (1 Tim 4 14), (b) by the laying on of the hands of Paul himself (2 Tim 1 6). The words "Lay hands hastily on no man" (1 Tim 5 22) do not refer to an act of ordination, but probably to the restoration of the penitent. The reference in He 6 2 is not exclusively to ordination, but to all occasions of laying on of hands (see HANDS, IMPOSITION OF). From the few instances mentioned above (the only ones found in the NT), we infer that it was regarded as advisable that persons holding high office in the church should be publicly recognized in some way, as by laying on of hands, fasting, and public prayer. But no great emphasis was laid on this rite, hence "it can hardly be likely that any essential principle was held to be involved in it" (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 216). It was regarded as an outward act of approval, a symbolic offering of intercessory prayer, and an emblem of the solidarity of the Christian community, rather than an indispensable channel of grace for the work of the ministry. (For the later ecclesiastical doctrine and rite see Edwin Hatch's valuable art. on "Ordination" in the Dict. Christian Antiq.) D. MIALL EDWARDS

ORDER, ôr'dêr (אֶרֶךְ, 'arakh, "to arrange"; τάσσειν, tássein [> diatássein, táxis, tágma): "Order" in Bib. phrases may indicate (1) arrangement in rows, (2) sequence in time, (3) classification and organization, (4) likeness or manner, (5) regulation, direction or command, or (6) the declaring of a will. In many passages it is difficult if not impossible to determine from the Eng. text alone in which of these senses the word is used.

The fundamental idea suggested by the Heb, Gr and Eng. words is that of arrangement in rows. Thus "order" is used in the Bible of arrange-

1. Arrange- ing wood for an altar (Lev 1 7; 1 K ment in 18 33; cf Heb Gen 22 9; Isa 30 33);
Rows of laying out flax-stalks for drying (Josh 2 6); of preparing offerings (Lev 1 8.12; cf 6 5; Jgs 6 26); of arranging lamps (Ex 27 21; 39 37; Lev 24 3.4; cf Ps 132 17); of placing the shewbread on the table (Ex 40 4.23; Lev 6 12; 24 8; 2 Ch 13 11); of drawing up the battle array (1 Ch 12 38 [Heb 39, 'adhar]); and of arranging weapons in order for battle (Jer 46 3, ARV "prepare"). As a vb. "to order" in the older VSS usually has the obsolete sense "to arrange" and not the more usual Eng. meanings, "to demand" or "to direct." Thus: "In the tent of meeting shall Aaron order it" (Lev 24 4, ARV "keep in order"); "Order ye the buckler and shield" (Jer 46 3; cf Ps 119 133; Job 23 4, ARV "set in order"; Jth 2 16; Wisd 8 1; 15 1; Eccles 2 6). The Heb pa'am (lit. "hoof-beat," "occurrence," "repetition") in the plural conveys the idea of an architectural plan (Ezk 41 6). Another word, shālahh, lit. "to join," in connection with the tabernacle, has in some VSS been tr^d as including the idea of orderly arrangement (Ex 26 17). The word "order" standing by itself may mean orderly or proper arrangement (1 Esd 1 10; Wisd 7 29; 1 Macc 6 40; Col 2 5). Akin to the idea of arranging things in a row is that of arranging words (Job 33 5; 37 19; Ps 5 3), of recounting things in order (Isa 44 7; Lk 1 1 AV [diatássein]; Lk 1 3; Acts 11 4 [kathexēs]), of setting forth a legal case (Job 23 4; 13 18; cf Ps 50 21). From the idea of ranging in order for the purpose of comparison the Heb 'arakh acquires the meaning "to compare" (Isa 40 18; Ps 89 7). This is clearly the meaning of 'en 'ārōkh 'ēlekhā (Ps 40 5 [Heb 6]), where "They cannot be set in order unto thee" must be interpreted to mean "There is nothing that can be compared unto thee."

As the fundamental meaning of 'arakh is arrangement in space, that of šādhār is order or sequence in time. In later Heb šēdher was used
2. Sequence in the sense of "program." In Job in Time 10 22 lō' š'dhārīm, absence of regularity, in the description of the uncertain period that follows death probably means "confusion in time." (The LXX [φύγρος, phéggos] suggests, in the place of š'dhārīm, a word for "light," possibly šohōrayīm.) In the NT we find "order" used of time in connection with the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15 23 [tagma]) and of a succession of places visited (Acts 18 23 [kathexēs]). The phrase "in order unto" (Ps 119 38) expresses causal sequence and hence purpose.

The idea of classification is present in the Heb tākan, tr^d "set in order," with reference to a collection of proverbs (Ecc 12 9). The same stem is used with reference to the arranging of singers before the altar (Heb Ecc 47 9). The classification of priests according to their service is spoken of as "ordering" (1 Ch 24 3.19, Heb pākadh). Next to the high priests ranked priests of the second order (mishneh, 2 K 23 4; cf 25 18 || Jer 52 24). The related concept of organization is present where the Heb kūn (lit. "to establish") is tr^d "order" (Isa 9 7 AV, "to establish" ARV; Ps 119 133; 2 Ch 29 35; cf 1 Macc 16 14). A similar use of the term "order" is found in the NT in connection with the organization of the affairs of the church (1 Cor 16 1 [diatássein]; Tit 1 5 [epidiorthōō]; 1 Cor 11 34).

"Order," in the sense of likeness or manner, is used in the phrase "after the order of Melchisedek" to translate the Heb 'al dibh'rāth, or rather
4. Likeness the archaic form 'al dibh'rāthī (Ps 110 or Manner 4), which in other passages is tr^d "because of" (cf Ecc 3 18; 7 14; 8 2). This well-known phrase is rendered in LXX katá tēn táxin, a tr adopted in He 5 6.10; 6 20; 7 11.17, where the passage from Ps is made the basis of an extended argument, in the course of which "order" is taken in the sense of "likeness" (He 7 16).

In the sense of regulation, we find "order" as a tr of mishpāt (which is lit. "the ruling of a šōphēṭ," whether as a judicial decree or legis-

5. Regula- tive act) in connection with the con-
Direct- duct of priests (1 Ch 6 32 [Heb tion, Com- 17]; 2 Ch 30 16; cf Lk 1 8; 1 mand Esd 1 6), and with reference to the Nazirite regulations in the story of Samson (Jgs 13 12, RV "manner"), church services (1 Cor 14 40) and, in the older Eng. VSS, with reference to other ritual matters (1 Ch 15 13; 23 31; 2 Ch 8 14, ARV "ordinance"). The phrase 'al yadh, lit. "according to the hand of," tr^d in Ezr 3 10; 1 Ch 25 2b.3.6 bis in various ways, means "under the direction of," or "under the order of," as tr^d in the last instance. The modern sense of "command" is suggested here and in several other instances (1 Esd 8 10; 1 Macc 9 55). He "that ordereth his conversation aright" (sām derekh, Ps 50 23) is probably one who chooses the right path and directs his steps along it. "Who shall order the battle?" (1 K 20 14) is corrected in ARV: "Who shall begin the battle?" (cf 2 Ch 13 3, Heb 'āšar, lit. "to bind," hence "to join" or "begin"; cf proelium committere).

The phrase "to set one's house in order" (Isa 38 1 || 2 K 20 1; 2 S 17 23), used of Hezekiah and Ahithophel, in contemplation of death, means to give final instructions to one's household or to make one's will. The Heb šāwāh used in this phrase is the stem found in the later Heb ḡawwā'āh, "a verbal will" (Bābhā' Bathrā' 147a, 151b; BDB). Great moral weight was attached in Bib. times to the charges laid upon a household by a deceased father or remoter ancestor, not only as to the disposition of property but also as to personal conduct. (Cf the case of the Rechabites, where the same Heb expression is used, ḡawwāh 'ālēnū, Jer 35 6.) NATHAN ISAACS

ORDINANCE, ôr'di-nans: This word generally represents חֻקִּים, hukḡāh, something prescribed, enactment, usually with reference to matters of ritual. In AV the same word is frequently tr^d by "statute" or "statutes," which is also the rendering of a similar Heb word, viz. חֻק, hōk. RV generally retains "ordinance," but sometimes substitutes "statute" (e.g. Ex 18 20; Ps 99 7). In one instance RV renders "set portion" (Ezk 45 14). The word generally has a religious or ceremonial significance. It is used for instance in connection with the Passover (Ex 12 43; Nu 9 14). According to Ex 12 14, the Passover was "an ordinance for ever," i.e. a permanent institution. In the pl. the word is often employed, along with such terms as commandments, laws, etc., with reference to the different prescriptions of the Deuteronomic and Priestly codes (Dt 6 1.2; Lev 18 4).

1. OT Use In 11 passages (Ex 15 25; Josh 24 25; 1 S 30 25; 2 K 17 34.37; 2 Ch 33 8; 35 13; Ps 119 91; Isa 58 2 bis; Ezk 11 20) "ordinance" is the rendering of מִשְׁפָּט, mishpāt, judgment, decision or sentence by a judge or ruler. In the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 22–23 33) the term "judgments" denotes civil, as contrasted with ritual, enactments. In 2 K 17 34 AV employs "manners" and "ordinances" as renderings of this word. In 3 passages (Lev 18 30; 22 9; Mal 3 14) "ordinance" is the tr of מִשְׁמֶרֶת, mishmereth, "charge," which RV restores. In one instance (Neh 10 32) ordinance renders מִצְוָה, miḡwāh, "commandment," while in Ezr 3 10 AV the phrase "after the ordinance of David" represents a Heb phrase which lit. means "upon the hands of David," i.e. under the guidance or direction of David.

In the NT, "ordinance" renders different Gr words, viz. (1) δικαίωμα, dikaíōma, in Lk 1 6 and He 9 1.10. The word means lit. "anything declared right"; but in these passages ceremonial and religious regulation; (2) δόγμα, dōgma, in Eph 2 15; Col 2 14. In the NT this word always means a decree or edict (Acts 17 7); (3) παράδοσις, parádosis, in 1 Cor 11 2 AV, RV substitutes "traditions"; (4) κτίσις, ktisis, "setting up," "institution," in 1 Pet 2 13. The term is used exclusively of the action of God. Peter implies that institutions, apparently human, such as the family and the state, are of Divine origin. The same doctrine is found in Rom 13 1.

ORDINATION, ôr-di-nā'shun. See ORDAIN, ORDINATION.

OREB, ô'reb (עֹרֵב, עֶרֶב, ô'rebh, "raven," esp. "crow"), and ZEEB, zē'eb, zēb (זֵאֵב, z'ēbh, "wolf") (Jgs 7 25; 8 3; Ps 83 11, and Isa 10 26 [Oreb only]): Two Midianite chieftains captured and beheaded by the Ephraimites, who brought their heads to Gideon.

As to the meaning of the two names, both words are found in Arabic. Robertson Smith, Kinship, etc (190 ff, 218 ff), says that the use of the names of animals as names of persons is a relic of totemism.

But Nöldeke (ZDMG, XL, 160 ff) and others hold that such a use shows a desire that those so named should be as disagreeable to their enemies as the plant or animal which the name denoted. Some again (e.g. Stade, Geschichte, 189 ff) maintain that the two names here are borrowed from localities and not vice versa, as Jgs 7 25 implies. If so, we must take the names to be originally two places, apparently in Ephraim, for the words "beyond Jordan" in 7 25 contradict 8 4, where it is said that Gideon came to the Jordan and passed over. Moore (Jgs, 214) suggests that the two localities were near the junction with the Jordan of the stream that comes from Wādī Far'ah. The construction of the Heb allows of a tr "the rock [called] Oreb," and "the winepress [called] Zeeb."

The account of a battle here is corroborated by Isa 10 26, a verse which mentions the "rock of Oreb," and suggests that the great defeat of the Midianites took place there (cf Isa 9 4). The passage in Isa 10 24–26 is prose, however, and is said to be late editing (see G. H. Box, Isa, 65).

2. The Battle of Oreb In Ps 83 11 (Heb 12) there is a prayer that God would make the "nobles" among the Psalmist's enemies as Oreb and Zeeb.

OREB: In 2 Esd 2 33 AV for Mt. HOREB (q.v.; so RV).

OREN, ô'ren (רֶנַּן, 'ôren; Ἀράμ, Arām, Alex. Aran): A son of Jerahmeel, the firstborn of Hezron (1 Ch 2 25).

ORGAN, ôr'gan. See MUSIC.

ORION, ô-rī'on: A brilliant constellation dedicated to Nimrod or Merodach. See ASTRONOMY, II, 11.

ORNAMENT, ôr'na-ment (עֲדָנִים, 'ādḡhī, "adornment"): In common with all the Orientals, the Hebrews were very fond of wearing ornaments, and their tendency to extravagance of this kind often met with stern prophetic rebuke (Isa 3 16–24; Ezk 13 18–20). On this subject, little is said in the NT apart from Jesus' (Lk 7 25; 12 23) and James's (2 2) invectives against meretricious estimates of moral character. Yet the employment of attractive attire receives sanction in the Divine example of Ezk 16 10–14.

Ornaments in general would include finely embroidered or decorated fabrics, such as the priest's dress or the high-priestly attire, and the richly wrought veil, girdle and turban used by the wealthier class. But the term may be limited here to the various rings, bracelets and chains made of precious metals and more or less jeweled (cf Jer 2 32).

These latter, described in detail under their own titles, may be summarized here as finger-rings, particularly prized as seal-rings (Gen 38 18.25; Jer 22 24); arm-rings or bracelets (Gen 24 22; 2 S 1 10); earrings (Gen 35 4; Ex 32 2); nose-rings (Gen 24 47; Ezk 16 12); anklets or ankle-chains (Isa 3 16.18); head-bands or fillets or caul (referred to in Isa 3 18 only), and necklaces or neck-chains (Gen 41 42; Ezk 16 11).

Figurative: The universal devotion to ornament among the Orientals is the occasion for frequent Bib. allusions to the beauty and splendor of fine jewelry and attire. But everywhere, in Divine injunctions, the emphasis of value is placed upon the beauty of holiness as an inward grace rather than on the attractions of outward ornament (Job 40 10; Ps 110 3; Joel 2 13; 1 Tim 2 9, 10; 1 Pet 3 4). In grievous sorrow, all ornament was to be laid aside in token of mourning (Ex 33 4-6).

ORNAN, ʾôr-nan (1 Ch 21 15). See ARAUNAH.

ORPAH, ʾôr-pā (עֲרַפָּה, 'orpāh; for meaning see below): A Moabitess, wife of Mahlon, son of Elimelech and Naomi. Unlike her sister Ruth she returned to her own people after escorting Naomi on her way to Judah (Ruth 1 4ff). Her name is supposed to be derived from the Heb word for "neck" (עֲרַפָּה, 'ēreph), and so to mean "stiff-necked" because of her turning back from following her mother-in-law; others take it to mean "gazelle."

ORPHAN, ʾôr-fan: This word occurs once only in the OT (Lam 5 3, where it stands for יָתוֹם, yāthôm, elsewhere rendered "fatherless," and in LXX always ὀρφανός, orphanós); in the Apoc it occurs 3 t (2 Esd 2 20; Tob 1 8; 2 Macc 8 28). There is no clear case where it means the loss of both parents. The Scriptures devote considerable attention to the widow and orphan, and the idea is that the child is fatherless. It is not found in AV of the NT; but the Gr word orphanos occurs twice, Jn 14 18 (AV "comfortless," RV "desolate," m "orphans") and Jas 1 27 ("fatherless"). See FATHERLESS.

D. MIAL EDWARDS

ORTHOSIA, ʾôr-thō-sī'a (Ὀρθώσιας, Orthōsias; AV Orthosias): The city to which Tryphon fled when he escaped from Dora, where he was besieged by Antiochus Sidetes (1 Macc 15 37). According to Pliny (NH, v. 17) it lay S. of the river Eleutherus, and N. of the city of Tripolis. The Peutinger Tables place it 12 Rom miles N. of Tripolis and 30 miles S. of Antaratudus on the Phoen coast. Porter would place it on the southern bank of Nahr el-Bārid.

OSAIAS, ʾō-zā'yas, ʾō-sā'yas (Ὠσαίας, Ōsaías; B omits): In 1 Esd 8 48 a corruption of Jeshaiiah (cf Ezr 8 19).

OSEA, ʾō-zē'a, ʾō-sē'a: In 2 Esd 13 40 = HOSHEA, king of Israel (q.v.).

OSEAS, ʾō-zē'as, ʾō-sē'as: "Osee" in 2 Esd 1 39; the prophet Hosea.

OSEE, ʾō'zē, ʾō'sē (Ὠσηέ, Hōsēē): AV in Rom 9 25; the prophet Hosea (thus RV).

OSHEA, ʾō-shē'a, ʾō'shē-a (RV "Hoshea" [Nu 13 8, 16]): The original name of Joshua, the son of Nun, changed by Moses (ver 16) from Hoshea (hōshēa, "help") to Joshua (yēhōshūa, "help of Jeh"). See JOSHUA.

OSNAPPAR, os-nap'ar (Ezr 4 10). See ASHURBANIPAL.

OSPRAY, os'prā (עֲרַפָּה, 'oznīyāh; ἀλιέτος, haliéetos; Lat Pandion haliaetus): A large hawk preferring a diet of fish. The word is found in the list of abominations only. See Lev 11 13; Dt 14 12. The ospray was quite similar in appearance to some of the smaller eagles, and by some it is thought that the short-toed eagle is intended. But the eagle and the gier-eagle had been specified, and on account of the ospray plunging into water for food and having feet bare to the lower leg-joint and plumage of brighter and more distinctive marking, it seems very probable that it was recognized as a distinctive species, and so named separately.

Moreover, the ospray was not numerous as were other hawks and eagles. It was a bird that lived almost wholly on fish, and these were not plentiful in the waters of Pal. This would tend to make it a marked bird, so no doubt the tr is correct as it stands, as any hawk that lived on fish would have been barred as an article of diet (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, 182; also Studers, Birds of North America, p. and pl. 16).

OSSIFRAGE, os'i-frāj (סָפָר, pereš; γύψ, gyps; Lat Ossifraga): The great bearded vulture known as the lammer-geier (Lev 11 13; Dt 14 12 AV, RV "gier-eagle"). The Heb name pereš means "to break." Lat ossis, "bone," and frangere, "to break," indicate the most noticeable habit of the bird. It is the largest of the vulture family, being 3½ ft. in length and 10 in sweep. It has a white head, black beard on the chin, and the part of the eye commonly called the "white" in most animals, which is visible in but few birds, in this family is pronounced and of a deep angry red, thus giving the bird a formidable appearance. The back is grayish black, the feathers finely penciled, the shaft being white, the median line tawny. The under parts are tawny white and the feet and talons powerful. It differs from the vulture in that it is not a consistent carrion feeder, but prefers to take prey of the size captured by some of the largest eagles. It took its name from the fact that after smaller vultures and eagles had stripped a carcass to the last shred of muscle, the lammer-geier then carried the skeleton aloft and dropped it repeatedly until the marrow from the broken bones could be eaten. It is also very fond of tortoise, the meat of which it secures in the same manner. As this bird frequents Southern Europe, it is thought to be the one that mistook the bald head of Aeschylus, the poet, for a stone and let fall on it the tortoise that caused his death. This bird also attacks living prey of the size of lambs, kids and hares. It is not numerous and does not flock, but pairs live in deep gorges and rocky crevices. It builds an enormous nest, deposits one pinkish or yellowish egg, and the young is black. It requires two years to develop the red eyes, finely penciled plumage and white head of the adult bird. It was included among the abominations because of its diet of carrion.

OSTRACA, os'tra-ka: The word ostrakon ("potsherd," Heb heres) occurs in Job 2 8 (LXX, καὶ ἔλαβεν ὀστράκον, kaí elaben óstrakon, "and he took him a potsherd." Earthen vessels were in universal use in antiquity (they are twice mentioned in the NT: σκεύη ὀστράκινα, skeuē ostrákina [2 Cor 4 7; 2 Tim 2 20]), and the broken fragments of them, which could be picked up almost anywhere, were made to serve various purposes. Upon the smoothest of these pieces of unglazed pottery the poorest might write in ink his memoranda, receipts, letters or texts.

A fortunate discovery at Samaria (1910), made among the ruins of Ahab's palace, has brought to light 75 Heb ostraca inscribed with ink, 1. Hebrew in the Phoen character, with accounts Ostraca and memoranda relating to private matters and dating probably from the time of Ahab. Their historical contribution, aside from the mention of many names of persons and places, is slender, but for ancient Heb writing and to a less extent for Heb words and forms they are of value, while the fact that in them we possess documents actually penned in Israel in the 9th cent. BC gives them extraordinary interest. The nature of ostraca tends to their preservation under conditions which would quickly destroy parchment, skin or papyrus, and this discovery in Pal encourages the hope of further and more significant finds.

Gr ostraca in large quantities have been found in Egypt, preserving documents of many kinds, chiefly tax receipts. The texts of some 2,000 of these have been published, principally by Wilcken (Griechische Ostraka, 2 vols, 1899), and serve to illustrate in unexpected ways the everyday Gr speech of the common people of Egypt through the Ptolemaic, Rom and Byzantine periods. Like the papyri, they help to throw light on NT syntax and lexicography, as well as on ancient life in general.

It is said that Cleanthes the Stoic, being too poor to buy papyrus, used to write on ostraca, but no remains of classical lit. have been found on the ostraca thus far dis-

3. New Testament covered. In some instances, however, Ostraca Christian literary texts are preserved upon ostraca. Some years ago Bou-riant bought in Upper Egypt 20 ostraca, probably of the 7th cent., inscribed with the Gr text of parts of the Gospels. The ostraca are of different sizes, and preserve among others one long continuous passage (Lk 22 40-71), which runs over 10 of the pieces. The ostraca contain from 2 to 9 verses each, and cover Mt 27 31,32; Mk 5 40,41 (9 3); 9 17,18,22; 15 21; Lk 12 13-16; 22 40-71; Jn 1 1-9; 1 14-17; 18 19-25; 19 15-17. The texts are in 3 different hands, and attest the interest of the poor in the gospel in the century of the Arab conquest. Another late ostrakon has a rough drawing labeled "St. Peter the evangelist," perhaps in allusion to the Gospel of Peter.

Coptic ostraca, too, are numerous, esp. from the Byzantine period, and of even more interest for Christian history than the Greek. A

4. Coptic Ostraca Sa'idic ostrakon preserves the pericope on the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7 53-8 11), which is otherwise unattested in the Sa'idic NT. A Christian hymn to Mary, akin to the canticles of Luke, and some Christian letters have been found. The work of W. E. Crum on the Coptic ostraca is of especial importance. OSTRICH, os'trich (עֶזְרָא, ya'ânâh; στρουθός, strouthós; Lat Struthio camelus): The largest bird now living. The Heb words ya'ânâh, which means "greediness," and bath ha-ya'ânâh, "daughter of greediness," are made to refer to the indiscriminate diet of the ostrich, to which bird they apply; and again to the owl, with no applicability. The owl at times has a struggle to swallow whole prey it has taken, but the mere fact that it is a night hunter forever shuts it from the class of greedy and promiscuous feeders. The bodies of owls are proverbially lean like eagles. Neither did the owl frequent several places where older versions of Jer and Isa place it; so the tr^s are now correctly rendered "ostrich." These birds came into the Bible because of their desert life, the companions they lived among there, and because of their night cries that were guttural, terrifying groans, like the roaring of lions. The birds were brought into many pictures of desolation, because people dreaded their fearful voices. They homed on the trackless deserts that were dreaded by travelers, and when they came feeding on the fringe of the wilderness, they fell into company with vulture, eagle, lion, jackal and adder, and joined their voices with the night hawks and owls. For these reasons no birds were more suitable for drawing strong comparisons from.

They attained a height ranging from 6 to 8 ft., and weighed from 200 to 300 lbs. The head was small with large eyes having powerful

1. Physical vision, and protected by lashes. The Peculiarities neck was long, covered with down, and the windpipe showed, while large bites could be seen to slide down the gullet. The legs were bare, long, and the muscles like steel from the long distances covered in desert travel. The foot was much like the cloven hoof of a beast. The inner toe was 7 in. long, with a clawlike hoof, the outer, smaller with no claw. With its length and strength of leg and the weight of foot it could strike a blow that saved it from attack by beasts smaller than a leopard. The wings were small, the muscles soft and flabby. They would not bear the weight of the bird, but the habit of lifting and beating them proved that this assisted in attaining speed in running (cf Xen. Anab. i.5.2,3). The body was covered with soft flexible feathers, the wings and tail growing long plumes, for which the bird has been pursued since the beginning of time. These exquisite feathers were first used to decorate the headdress and shields of desert chieftains, then as decorations for royalty, and later for hat and hair ornaments. The badge of the Prince of Wales is three white ostrich plumes. The females are smaller, the colors gray and white, the males a glossy black, the wing and tail plumes white. The ostrich has three physical peculiarities that stagger scientists. It has eyelashes, developed no doubt to protect the eyes from the dust and sand of desert life. On the wings are two plumeless shafts like large porcupine quills. These may be used in resisting attack. It also has a bladder like a mammal, that collects uric acid, the rarest organ ever developed in a feathered creature.

2. Eggs and Care of Young warmed them in the sand. That they were not hard baked was due to the fact that they were covered for protection during the day and brooded through the cooler nights. The eggs average 3 lbs. weight. They have been used for food in the haunts of the ostrich since the records of history began, and their stout shells for drinking-vessels. It is the custom of natives on finding a nest to take a long stick and draw out an egg. If incubation has advanced enough to spoil the eggs for use, the nest is carefully covered and left; if fresh, they are eaten, one egg being sufficient for a small family. No doubt these were the eggs to which Job referred as being tasteless without salt (Job 6 6). The number of eggs in the nest was due to the fact that the birds were polygamous, one male leading from 2 to 7 females, all of which deposited their eggs in a common nest. When several females wanted to use the nest at the same time, the first one to reach it deposited her egg in it, and the others on the sand close beside. This accounts for the careless habits of the ostrich as to her young. In this communal nest, containing from 2 to 3 dozen eggs, it is impossible for the mother bird to know which of the young is hers. So all of them united in laying the eggs and allowing the father to look after the nest and the young. The bird first appears among the abominations in Lev 11 16 RV, AV "owl"; Dt 14 16, RV "little owl," AV "owl." This must have referred to the toughness of grown specimens, since there was nothing offensive in the bird's diet to taint its flesh and the young tender ones were delicious meat. In his agony, Job felt so much an outcast that he cried:

"I am a brother to jackals,
And a companion to ostriches" (Job 30 29).

Again he records that the Almighty discoursed to him of the ostrich in the following manner:

"The wings of the ostrich wave proudly;
But are they the pinions and plumage of love?" etc (39 13-18).

The ostrich history previously given explains all this passage save the last two verses, the first of

3. OT References which is a reference to the fact that the Arabs thought the ostrich a stupid bird, because, when it had traveled to exhaustion, it hid its head and thought its body safe, and because some of its eggs were found outside the nest. The second was due to a well-known fact that, given a straight course, the ostrich could outrun a horse. The birds could attain and keep up a speed of 60 miles an hour for the greater part of half a day and even longer, hence it was possible to take them only by a system of relay riders (Xen., op. cit.). When Isaiah predicted the fall of Babylon, he used these words: "But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and ostriches shall dwell there, and wild goats shall dance there" (Isa 13 21). Because this was to be the destruction of a great city, located on the Euphrates River and built by the fertility and prosperity of the country surrounding it, and the ruins those of homes, the bird indicated by every natural condition would be the owl. The wild goats clambering over the ruins would be natural companions and the sneaking wolves—but not the big bird of daytime travel, desert habitation, accustomed to constant pursuit for its plumage. Exactly the same argument applies to the next reference by the same writer

(34 13). "And the wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the wolves, and the wild goat shall cry to his fellow; yea, the night monster shall settle there, and shall find her a place of rest" (34 14). "The beasts of the field shall honor me, the jackals and the ostriches; because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen" (43 20). Here we find the ostrich in its natural location, surrounded by creatures that were its daily companions. The next reference also places the bird at home and in customary company: "Therefore the wild beasts of the desert with the wolves shall dwell there, and the ostriches [AV "owls"] shall dwell therein: and it shall be no more inhabited forever; neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation" (Jer 50 39).

"Even the jackals draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones:

The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness" (Lam 4 3).

This reference is made to the supposed cruelty of the ostrich in not raising its young.

OTHNI, oth'ni (תִּנִּי, 'othnī, meaning unknown):

A son of Shemaiah, a Korahite Levite (1 Ch 26 7).

OTHNIEL, oth'ni-el (תִּנְיָאֵל, 'othnī'ēl): A hero in Israel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. He conquered Kiriath-sepher, later known as Debir, in the territory of Judah in the days of Joshua, and was given the daughter of Caleb, Achsah, to wife as a reward (Josh 15 17 || Jgs 1 13). He later smote Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, whom the children of Israel had served 8 years, and thus not only saved the Israelites, but by reviving national sentiment among them (cf Ant, V, iv, 3), and reestablishing government, became the first of those hero-rulers known as "judges." The effects of his victory lasted an entire generation (40 years, Jgs 3 9-11). He had a son named Hathath (1 Ch 4 13) and probably another named Meonothai (cf recensio Luciana of LXX, ad loc.). In the days of David we find a family bearing the name of Othniel, from which came Heldai the Metophathite, captain of the twelfth month (1 Ch 27 15).

NATHAN ISAACS

OTHONIAS, oth-ō-nī'as (Ὀθωνίας, Othonias): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 28) = "Mattaniah" of Ezr 10 27.

OUCHES, ouch'ez, -iz (מִשְׁבְּצֹת, mishb'cōth [Ex 28 11.13.14.25; 39 6.13.16.18]; ARV "settings," but in Ex 39 13, "inclosings"): The secondary meaning of this now archaic word is the gold or silver setting of a precious stone. In Ex, where it occurs 8 t, it is clear that the gold settings of the engraved stones forming the breast-plate of the high priest are intended; the onyx stones forming the fibula or brooch for holding together the two sides of the breast-plate being said to be "inclosed in ouches [settings] of gold" (Ex 39 6). Not only were these two onyx or beryl stones so set, but the 12 stones forming the front of the breast-plate were "inclosed in gold in their settings" (Ex 28 20). The same word occurs in Ps 45 13, where the king's daughter is said to have her clothing "inwrought with gold," i.e. embroidered with gold thread or wire. Ex 39 3 tells us how this wire was produced. From this fact it may be inferred that the settings of the breast-plate were not solid pieces of gold, but were formed of woven wire wreathed round the stones, in a sort of filigree. See also STONES, PRECIOUS.

OUTCAST, out'kast: Represents some form of הִתְחַל, dāhāh, or נִתְחַל, nādhah, both meaning "thrust out." In Jer 30 17 "outcast" means "thrust out of society," "degraded person"; elsewhere it means "exile" (Ps 147 2; Isa 16 3 f; Jer 49 36).

OUTER, out'ēr: This adj. is used 12 t by Ezekiel of the outside court of the temple. In Mt we find it 3 t (8 12; 22 13; 25 30) in "outer darkness" (τὸ σκότος τὸ ἔξωτερον, tó skótos tó exōteron), which typifies the utter darkness of the doom of the lost.

OUTGOING, out'gō-ing: In Ps 65 8, "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice," the Heb is מוֹצֵא, mōcā'. The word (from yācā', "to go forth") refers to the "going forth" of the sun, and so means "east" (as in Ps 75 6). The connection of mōcā' with "evening" is therefore zeugmatic, but the meaning is clear and there are extra-Bib. parallels (cf "the two Orients"). In Josh 17 18, AV uses "outgoings" for the Heb מוֹצֵאֹת, tōcā'ōth (also from yācā'), where the meaning is "extremity" (RV "goings out," as in Nu 34 5, etc). "Outwent" occurs in Mk 6 33.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OUTLANDISH, out-land'ish (Neh 13 26, AV "Him did outlandish women cause to sin"): "Outlandish" in modern Eng. is colloquial only and with the sense "utterly extraordinary," but AV uses it in the lit. meaning "out of the land," "foreign," ERV "strange women," ARV "foreign women," Heb נִכְרִי, nokhrī, "foreign."

OUTRAGE, out'rāj, OUTRAGEOUS, out-rāj'us: The noun (from the Fr. outrage, "that which goes beyond") only in the heading to Ps 10 AV; the adj. in Prov 27 4, AV and ERV, for שֶׁתֶּפַּח, sheteph, "flood," "Anger is overwhelming" (ARV), is much better.

OUTROADS, out'rōdz (ἐξοδεύω, exoderūō, "to go forth," "to make a military expedition"; AV and RV in 1 Macc 15 41, "horsemen . . . that they might make outroads upon the ways of Judah"; 1 Esd 4 23, RV "goeth forth to make outroads"; "Outroads" is obsolete, but its opposite, "inroads," is still good Eng.

OUTWARD, out'wērd, MAN (ἐξω, éxō, "outside," "without," "out of doors"): The body, subject to decay and death, in distinction from the inner man, the imperishable spiritual life which "is renewed day by day" (2 Cor 4 16); also the body as the object of worldly thought and pride in external dress and adornment (1 Pet 3 3). See MAN, NATURAL; MAN, NEW.

OVEN, uv'n. See BREAD; FURNACE.

OVERCHARGE, ō-vēr-chārj': Lk 21 34, "lest haply your hearts be overcharged with drunkenness" (βαρύνω, barúnō, "burden," here with the force "be occupied with"); 2 Cor 2 5, AV "that I may not overcharge you" (ἐπιβαρύνω, epibaráō, "overload"), RV "that I press not too heavily." See CHARGES.

OVERPASS, ō-vēr-pas': A special tr of the very common vb. עָבַר, ābhar, "to pass over," found in EV of Ps 57 1 and Isa 26 20 in the sense "to pass by," and in Jer 5 28 with the meaning "to overflow."

OVERPLUS, ō-vēr-plus: Lev 25 27, for עָרֶה, ādhaph, "excess."

OVERSEER, ō-vēr-sē'ēr, or -sēr': One who overlooks, inspects; in the OT from נָצַח, nācāh (2 Ch 2 18; in 2 Ch 34 13 RV changes to "set forward"), and פָּקַד, pākadh (Gen 39 4.5; 2 Ch 34 12.17; RV has this word for AV "officers" in Gen 41 34, and for "rulers" in 1 Ch 26 32); in the NT once for ἐπίσκοπος, episkopos, in Acts 20 28, where RV has "bishops" (m "overseers"; cf 1 Pet 5 2). See BISHOP.

OWL, owl (בַּת הַיַּעֲנָן, bath ha-ya'ānāh; Lat Uhlula): The name of every nocturnal bird of prey of the N.O. Striges. These birds range from the great horned owl of 2 ft. in length, through many subdivisions to the little screech-owl of 5 in. All are characterized by very large heads, many have ear tufts, all have large eyes surrounded by a disk of tiny, stiff, radiating feathers. The remainder of the plumage has no aftershaft. So these birds make the softest flight of any creature traveling on wing. A volume could be written on the eye of the owl, perhaps its most wonderful feature being in the power of the bird to enlarge the iris if it wishes more distinct vision. There is material for another on the prominent and peculiar auditory parts. With almost all owls the feet are so arranged that two toes can be turned forward and two back, thus reinforcing the grip of the bird by an extra toe and giving it unusual strength of foot. All are night-hunters, taking prey to be found at that time, of size according to the strength. The owl was very numerous in the caves, ruined temples and cities, and even in the fertile valleys of Pal. It is given place in the Bible because it was considered unfit for food and because people dreaded the cries of every branch of the numerous family. It appeared often, as most birds, in the early VSS of the Bible; later translators seem to feel that it was used in several places where the ostrich really was intended (see OSTRICH). It would appear to a natural historian that the right bird could be selected by the location, where the text is confusing. The ostrich had a voice that was even more terrifying, when raised in the night, than that of the owl. But it was a bird of the desert, of wide range and traveled only by day. This would confine its habitat to the desert and the greenery where it joined fertile land, but would not bring it in very close touch with civilization. The owl is a bird of ruins, that lay mostly in the heart of rich farming lands, where prosperous cities had been built and then destroyed by enemies. Near these locations the ostrich would be pursued for its plumage, and its nesting conditions did not prevail. The location was strictly the owl's chosen haunt, and it had the voice to fit all the requirements of the text. In the lists of abominations, the original Heb yanshūph, derived from a root meaning twilight, is tr^d "great owl" (see Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16). It is probable that this was a bird about 2 ft. in length, called the eagle-owl. In the same lists the word kōs (νυκτικόραξ, nuktikórax) refers to ruins, and the bird indicated is specified as the "little owl," that is, smaller than the great owl—about the size of our barn owl. This bird is referred to as the "mother of ruins," and the tr^s that place it in deserted temples and cities are beyond all doubt correct. Kippōz (ἐχίνος, echinos) occurs once (Isa 34 15), and is tr^d "great owl" in former versions; lately (in ARV) it is changed to "dart-snake" (ERV "arrowsnake"). In this same description lilith (ὄνοκένταυρος, onokéntauros), "a specter of night," was formerly screech-owl, now it reads "night monster," which is more confusing and less suggestive. The owls in the lists of abominations (Lev 11 17.18; Dt 14 16) are the little owl, the great owl and the horned owl. The only other owl of all those that produced such impressions of desolation in the Books of Isa, Jer, Job and Mic is referred to in Ps 102 6:

"I am like a pelican of the wilderness;
I am become as an owl of the waste places."

Here it would appear that the bird habitual to the wilderness and the waste places, that certainly would be desert, would be the ostrich—while in any quotation referring to ruins, the owl would be the bird indicated by natural conditions.

OWL, GREAT (יָנֶשֶׁף, yanshūph; LXX εἰβίς, ibis, or εἰβίς, eibis): A member of the Pal species of the family Strigidae. The great owl mentioned in the Bible was no doubt their largest specimen of the family, a bird fully 2 ft. in length, full feathered, with unusually large head and long ear tufts. It was a formidable and noble-appearing bird, with resounding voice. It was abundant among the ruins of temples, the tombs of Carmel, the caves of Gennesaret, and among the ruined cities of Southern Judah. It is included in the abomination lists of Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16. See OWL.

OWL, LITTLE (כֹּס, kōs; νυκτικόραξ, nuktikórax; Lat Athene meridionalis): A night bird of prey distinguished by a round head, and extremely large eyes. The little owl is left in RV only in the lists of abominations (see Lev 11 17; Dt 14 16). See OWL.

OWL, SCREECH. See NIGHT MONSTER.

OWNER, ὄν'ἑρ. See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2.

OX. See ANTELOPE; CATTLE; WILD OX.

OX, oks ("Ὠξ, Ὠξ"): One of the ancestors of Judith (Jth 8 1). The name is not Heb. Perhaps the Itala Ozi and the Syr Uz point to the Heb Uzzi.

OX-GOAD, oks'gōd. See GOAD.

OZEM, ō'zem (Ὠזם, 'ōzem, meaning unknown):

(1) The 6th son of David (1 Ch 2 15). LXX ("Ἄσομ, Āsom) and Vulg suggest that the name should be pointed Ἄζωμ, 'āzōm.

(2) A "son" of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 25).

OZIAS, ō-zī'as:

(1) ('Οζίας, Ozeías, 'Οζίας, Ozias, B a b): The son of Micah, a Simeonite, one of the 3 rulers of Bethulia in the days of Judith (Jth 6 15.16; 7 23; 8 9 ff; 10 6).

(2) ('Οζίας, Ozeías, B and Swete; AV Ezias [1 Esd 8 2], following A, 'Εζίας, Ezias): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2; 2 Esd 1 2) = "Uzzi" of Ezr 7 4; 1 Ch 6 51.

(3) Head of a family of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31) = "Uzza" of Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51.

(4) Gr form of UZZIAH (q.v.) in Mt 1 8.9 AV. A king of Judah. S. ANGUS

OZIEL, ō'zi-el ('Οζιήλ, Ozeiēl): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1); another form of the OT name "Uzziel."

OZNI, ōz'nī (׳׳זני, 'oznī, "my hearing," or "my ear"): A "son" of Gad (Nu 26 16) = "Ezbon" of Gen 46 16 (cf 1 Ch 7 7).

OZNITES, ōz'nīts (with the art. ׳׳זני, hā'oznī [collective], "the Ozonites"): Of the clan of Ozni (Nu 26 16). See OZNI.

PAARAI, pā'a-rī (פַּעְרַי, pa'āray, "devotee of Peor"): One of David's 37 valiant men (2 S 23 35). Doubtless the "Naarai" of 1 Ch 11 37.

PACATIANA, pā-ka-ti-ā'na, pak-a-tī'a-na (Πακατιανή, Pakatianē): About 295 AD, when the province of Asia was broken up, two new provinces were formed, Phrygia Prima (Pacatiana), of which Laodicea was "the chiefest city" (subscription to 1 Tim AV), and Phrygia Secunda (Salutaris). See PHRYGIA, and HDB, III, 865.

PACE, pās (פַּעַד, ṣa'adh): A step in 2 S 6 13, hence about one yard.

PACHON, pā'kon (Παχών, Pachōn): The name of a month mentioned in 3 Macc 6 38.

PADDAN, pad'an (Gen 48 7; AV Padan, pā-dan). See next article.

PADDAN-ARAM, pad'an-ā'ram or p.-ār'am (פַּדְאן אֲרָם, paddan 'ārām; LXX Μεσοποταμία τῆς Συρίας, Mesopotamia tēs Suriās; AV Padan-aram): In Gen 48 7, Paddan stands alone, but as the LXX, Sam, and Pesh read "Aram" also, it must in this verse have dropped out of the MT. In the time of Abraham, padanu occurs on the Bab contract-tablets as a land measure, to which we may compare the Arab. feddān or "ox-gang." In the Assyrian libraries it is the equivalent of iklu, "a field," so that Paddan-aram would mean "the field of Aram," and with this we may compare Hos 12 12 (Heb 12 13) and the use of the Heb sādeh in connection with Moab and Edom (Jgs 5 4; Ruth 1 6).

Furthermore, padanu and harranu are given as synonyms with the meaning of "road."

PADDAN-ARAM occurs only in the PC, but it corresponds to the "Haran" of the older documents. The versions agree in translating both as Mesopotamia, and identify with the home of the patriarchs and the scene of Jacob's exile the district of Haran to the E. of the Upper Euphrates valley. More in harmony with the length of Jacob's flight, as indicated by the time given (Gen 31 22,23), is Haran-el-'Awamid, an ancient site 10 miles to the E. of Damascus, which satisfies all the demands of history. See ARAM. W. M. CHRISTIE

PADDLE, pad¹l (יָהֹד, yāthēdh): Dt 23 13 (Heb 14), RVm "shovel."

PADON, pā'don (פָּדוֹן, pādhōn, "redemption"): One of the Nethinim (see NETHINIM) who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47); the "Phaleas" of 1 Esd 5 29 (m "Padon").

PAGIEL, pā'gi-el, pā'ji-el, pa-gi'el (פַּגְיֵ'ֵל, pagh'i'ēl, "God's intervention"): Son of Ocran, of the tribe of Asher, among those enrolled by Moses at the numbering of Israel (Nu 1 13; 2 27). When the tabernacle was set up, the heads of the families of Israel "brought their offerings" in rotation, and Pagiel, as prince of his tribe, came on the 11th day (Nu 7 72). Nu 7 72-77 describes his offering. In the journeyings of Israel he was "over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher" (Nu 10 26), and possibly standard-bearer (cf Nu 10 14,22,25). HENRY WALLACE

PAHATH-MOAB, pā'hath-mō'ab (פַּהַת־מֹאָב, pahath mō'ābh, "sheik of Moab"); in 1 Esd 5 11; 8 31, "Phaath Moab": A Jewish clan probably named after an ancestor of the above title. Part of the clan returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 6; cf Neh 7 11) under two family names, Jeshua and Joab; and a part came back with Ezra (Ezr 8 4). Hashub, a "son of Pahath-moab," is named among the repairers of both the wall and the "tower of the furnaces" at Jerus (Neh 3 11). It is the name of one of the signatories "sealing" the "sure covenant" of Neh 9 38 (Neh 10 14). Some of the sons of this name had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10 30). HENRY WALLACE

PAI, pā'i (פַּי, pā'i; Φογώρ, Phogōr): The royal city of Hadad or Hadar, king of Edom (1 Ch 1 50). The name is given as "Pau" (פַּי, pā'ū) in Gen 36 39. There is no indication of its position. It is not identified.

PAIN, pān (חַיִּל, hūl, חַיִּל, hūl, חַבֵּל, hēbhēl, חָלָה, hālāh, חֲלָהָה, halhālāh, כָּאֵב, kā'ēbh, כָּאֵב, kā'ēbh, מֵצָר, mēṣar, מִכָּאֵב, makh'ēbh, עָמַל, āmāl, צָר, ṣār; βασανίζω, basanizō, πόνος, pónos, ὥδιν, ōdīn): These words signifying various forms of bodily or mental suffering are generally tr^d "pain"; 28 out of the 34 passages in which the word is used are in the poetical or prophetic books and refer to conditions of mental disquiet or dismay due to the punishment of personal or national sin. In one instance only is the word used as a historic record of personal physical pain: the case of the wife of Phinehas (1 S 4 19), but the same word ṣār is used figuratively in Isa 13 8; 21 3; Dnl 10 16, and tr^d "pangs" or "sorrows." In other passages where we have the same comparison of consternation in the presence of God's judgments to the pangs of childbirth, the word used is hēbhēl, as in Isa 66 7; Jer 13 21; 22 23; 49 24. In some of these and similar passages several synonyms are used in the one verse to intensify the impression, and are tr^d "pain," "pangs," and "sorrows," as in Isa 13 8.

The word most commonly used by the prophets is some form of hūl or hūl, sometimes with the addition "as of a woman in travail," as in Ps 48 6; Isa 26 18; Jer 6 24; 22 23; Mic 4 10. This pain is referred to the heart (Ps 55 4) or to the head (Jer 30 23; cf vs 5,6). In Ezk 30 4, it is the penal affliction of Ethiopia, and in ver 16, AV "Sin [Tanis] shall have great pain" (RV "anguish"); in Isa 23 5 Egypt is sorely pained at the news of the fall of Tyre. Before the invading host of locusts the people are much pained (Joel 2 6 AV). Pain in the sense of toil and trouble in Jer 12 13 is the tr of hālāh, a word more frequently rendered grieving or sickness, as in 1 K 14 1; Prov 23 35; Cant 2 5; Jer 5 3. The reduplicated form halhālāh is esp. used of a twisting pain usually referred to the loins (Isa 21 3; Ezk 30 4,9; Nah 2 10).

Pain in the original meaning of the word (as it has come down to us through the Old Fr. from the Lat poena) as a penalty inflicted for personal sin is expressed by the words kā'ēbh or kā'ābh in Job 14 22; 15 20, and in the questioning complaint of the prophet (Jer 15 18). As a judgment on personal sin pain is also expressed by makh'ēbh in Job 33 19; Jer 51 8, but this word is used in the sense of afflictions in Isa 53 3 in the expression "man of sorrows." The Psalmist (Ps 25 18) praying for deliverance from the afflictions which weighed heavily on him in turn uses the word āmāl, and this word which primarily means "toil" or "labor," as in Eccl 1 3, or "travail," as in Isa 53 11, is tr^d "painful" in Ps 73 16, as expressing Asaph's disquiet due to his misunderstanding of the ways of Providence. The "pains of hell" (Ps 116 3 AV), which got hold of the Psalmist in his sickness, is the rendering of the word mēṣar; the same word is tr^d "distress" in Ps 118 5. Most of these words have a primary physical meaning of twisting, rubbing or constricting.

In the NT ōdīn is tr^d "pain" (of death, RV "pang") in Acts 2 24. This word is used to express any severe pain, such as that of travail, or (as in Aeschylus, Chœphori, 211) the pain of intense apprehension. The vb. from this, ōdunōmai, is used by the Rich Man in the parable to describe his torment (RV "anguish") (Lk 16 24). The related vb. sunōdīnō is used in Rom 8 22 and is tr^d "travailing in pain together." In much the same sense the word is used by Euripides (Helena, 727).

In Rev 12 2 the woman clothed with the sun (basanizomēnē) was in pain to be delivered; the vb. (basanizō) which means "to torture" is used both in Mt 8 6 in the account of the grievously tormented centurion's servant, and in the description of the laboring of the apostles' boat on the stormy Sea of Galilee (Mt 14 24). The former of these seems to have been a case of spinal meningitis. This vb. occurs in Thucydides vii.86 (viii.92), where it means "being put to torture." In the two passages in Rev where pain is mentioned the word is ponos, the pain which affected those on whom the fifth vial was poured (16 10), and in the description of the City of God where there is no more pain (21 4). The primary meaning of this word seems to be "toil," as in Iliad xxi.525, but it is used by Hippocrates to express disease (Aphorisma iv.44).

PAINFULNESS, pān'fōol-nes (μᾶχος, mōchthos): In the summary of his missionary labors in 2 Cor 11 27 AV, St. Paul uses this word. RV renders it "travail," which probably now expresses its meaning more closely, as in modern usage "painfulness" is usually restricted to the condition of actual soreness or suffering, although we still use "painstaking" in the sense of careful labor. The Gr word is used for toil or excessive anxiety, as in Euripides (Medea, 126), where it refers to that care for her children which she had lost in her madness. Tindale uses "painfulness" in 1 Jn 4 18 as the tr of kólasis, kólasis, which AV renders "torment" and RV "punishment."

PAINT, pānt (from Old Fr. peindre, frequentative of peindre, Lat pingo, "to paint"): (1) From Heb vb. מָשַׁח, māshah, "to smear," "to anoint," "to paint," describing the painting of interiors with vermillion, perhaps resembling lacquer: "ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermillion" (Jer 22 14). The shields of the Ninevite soldiers were red, presumably painted (Nah 2 3). (2) From noun פָּחַךְ, pūkh, "paint," "antimony," "stibium," "black mineral powder," used as a cosmetic, to lend artificial size and fancied beauty to the eye, always spoken of as a meretricious device, indicating light or unworthy character. Jezebel "painted her eyes, and attired her head" (2 K 9 30, lit. "put pūkh into her eyes"). To the harlot city Jerus, Jeremiah (4 30) says, "deekest thee . . . , en-largest thine eyes with paint" (pūkh). AV renders "rentest thy face," as if the stain were a cut, or the enlarging done by violence. (3) From vb. כָּהַל, kāhal, "to smear," "to paint." Ezekiel says to Oholah-Oholibah (Judah-Israel), "didst wash thyself, paint [kāhal] thine eyes," as the adulteress prepares herself for her paramour (Ezk 23 40). The antimony, in an extremely fine powder (Arab. kūhl, from kāhal), is placed in the eye by means of a very fine rod, bodkin, or probe, drawn between the edges of the eyelids. This distends the eye, and also increases its apparent size, the effect being increased by a line of stain drawn from the corner, and by a similar line prolonging the eyebrow. See EYEPAINT; COLOR. PAINTING, pān'ting. See CRAFTS, II, 12.

PAIR, pār: The m of Cant 4 2 (but not of the || 6 6) reads, "which are all of them in pairs," while the text has, "whereof every one hath twins." The Heb מִתְאִימֹת, math'imōth, is from a √ tā'am, "be double," and is perhaps susceptible of either meaning. But the description is of sheep, and the m gives no comprehensible figure, while the text points to the exceedingly sleek and healthy appearance. "Pairs" seems to result from confusing the figure with the thing figured—the teeth, where each upper is paired with the corresponding lower.

PALACE, pal'ās: In Heb chiefly אֶרְמוֹן, 'armōn, in RV text trd "castle" in 1 K 16 18; 2 K 15 25; בֵּירָה, bīrah, הֶחָל, hēkhāl, the same word often rendered "temple"; in Gr αὐλή, aulē, in RV trd "court" (Mt 26 3.58.69; Mk 14 54.66; Lk 11 21; Jn 18 15). On the other hand, "palace" takes the place in RV of AV "common hall" or "judgment hall" (praitōrion, Mt 27 27; Jn 18 28. 33; 19 9; Acts 23 35). See JUDGMENT, HALL OF. A description of Solomon's palace is given in 1 K 7 1-12 (see TEMPLE). Archaeology has brought to light the remains of great palaces in Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria (Sargon, Sennacherib, Assurbanipal, etc), Susa, etc. See HOUSE.

PALAL, pā'lal (פָּלַל, pālāl, "judge"): Son of Uzai, and one of the repairers of the wall (Neh 3 25).

PALANQUIN, pal-an-kēn': In Cant 3 9 occurs אֶפְרָיִם, 'appiryōn, a word that has no Sem cognates and is of dubious meaning. In form, however, it resembles the Sanskrit paryāṇka, and still more closely the Gr φορεῖον, phoreion, both of which mean "litter bed." Hence RV "palanquin" (ultimately derived from paryāṇka). The m "car of state" and AV "chariot" are mere guesses.

PALESTINA, pal-es-tī'na (פְּלִשְׁתִּין, p'lesheth): Ex 15 14; Isa 14 29.31 AV; changed in RV to PHILISTIA (q.v.).

PALESTINE, pal'es-tīn (פְּלִשְׁתִּין, p'lesheth; Φυλιστινίμ, Phulistiēīm, Ἀλλόφυλοι, Allóphuloi; AV Joel 3 4 [RV "Philistia"], "Palestina"; AV Ex 15 14; Isa 14 29.31; cf Ps 60 8; 83 7; 87 4; 108 9):

LITERATURE

The word properly means "Philistia," but appears to be first used in the extended sense, as meaning all the "Land of Israel" or "Holy Land" (Zec 2 12), by Philo and by Ovid and later Rom authors (Reland, Pal Illustr., I, 38-42).

I. Physical Conditions.—The Bible in general may be said to breathe the air of Pal; and it is here intended to show how important for sound criticism is the consideration of its geography, and of the numerous incidental allusions to the natural features, fauna, flora, cultivation, and climate of the land in which most of the Bible books were written. With the later history and topography of Pal, after 70 AD, we are not here concerned, but a short account of its present physical and geological conditions is needed for our purpose.

Pal W. of the Jordan, between Dan and Beersheba, has an area of about 6,000 sq. miles, the length from Hermon southward being nearly 150 miles, and the width gradually increasing from 20 miles on the N. to 60 miles on the S. It is thus about the size of Wales, and the height of the Palestinian mountains is about the same as that of the Welsh. E. of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 sq. miles was included in the land of Israel. The general geographical features are familiar to all.

(1) The land is divided by the deep chasm of the Jordan valley—an ancient geological fault continuing in the Dead Sea, where its depth (at the bottom of the lake) is 2,600 ft. below the Mediterranean.

(2) W. of the valley the mountain ridge, which is a continuation of Lebanon, has very steep slopes on the E. and long spurs on the W., on which side the foothills (Heb sh'phēlāh or "lowland") form a distinct district, widening gradually southward, while between this region and the sea the plains of Sharon and Philistia stretch to the sandhills and low cliffs of a harborless coast.

(3) In Upper Galilee, on the N., the mountain ridge rises to 4,000 ft. above the Mediterranean. Lower Galilee, to the S., includes rounded hills less than 1,000 ft. above the sea, and the triangular plain of Esdraelon drained by the River Kishon between the Gilboa watershed on the E. and the long spur of Carmel on the W.

(4) In Samaria the mountains are extremely rugged, but a small plain near Dothan adjoins that of Esdraelon, and another stretches E. of Shechem, 2,500 ft. above the level of the Jordan valley. In Judaea the main ridge rises toward Hebron and then sinks to the level of the Beersheba plains about 1,000 ft. above the sea. The desert of Judah forms a plateau (500 ft. above sea-level), between this ridge and the Dead Sea, and is throughout barren and waterless; but the mountains—which average about 3,000 ft. above the sea—are full of good springs and suitable for the cultivation of the vine, fig and olive. The richest lands are found in the sh'phēlāh region—esp. in Judaea—and in the corn plains of Esdraelon, Sharon, and Philistia.

(5) E. of the Jordan the plateau of Bashan (averaging 1,500 ft. above the sea) is also a fine corn country. S. of this, Gilead presents a mountain region rising to 3,600 ft. above sea-level at Jebel Osha', and sloping gently on the E. to the desert. The steep western slopes are watered by the Jabbok River, and by many perennial brooks. In North Gilead esp. the wooded hills present some of the most picturesque scenery of the Holy Land. S. of Gilead, the Moab plateau (about 2,700 ft. above sea-level) is now a desert, but is fitted for corn culture, and in places for the vine. A lower shelf or plateau (about 500 to 1,000 ft. above sea-level) intervenes between the main plateau and the Dead Sea cliffs, and answers to the Desert of Judah W. of the lake.

2. Water-Supply Jordan runs into the Dead Sea, which has no outlet and which maintains its level solely by evaporation, being consequently very salt; the surface is nearly 1,300 ft. below the Mediterranean, whereas the Sea of Galilee (680 ft. below sea-level) is sweet and full of fish. The Jordan is fed, not only by the snows of Hermon, but by many affluent streams from both sides. There are several streams also in Sharon, including the Crocodile River under Carmel. In the mountains, where the hard dolomite limestone is on the surface, perennial springs are numerous. In the lower hills, where this limestone is covered by a softer chalky stone, the supply depends on wells and cisterns. In the Beersheba plains the water, running under the surface, is reached by scooping shallow pits—esp. those near Gerar, to be noticed later.

The fertility and cultivation of any country depends mainly on its geological conditions. These are comparatively simple in Pal, and have undergone no change since the age when man first appeared, or since the days of the Heb patriarchs. The country was first upheaved from the ocean in the Eocene age; and, in the subsequent Miocene age, the great crack in the earth's surface occurred, which formed a narrow gulf stretching from that of the 'Akabab on the

S. almost to the foot of Hermon. Further upheaval, accompanied by volcanic outbreaks which covered the plateaus of Golan, Bashan, and Lower Galilee with lava, cut off the Jordan valley from the Red Sea, and formed a long lake, the bottom of which continued to sink on the S. to its present level during the Pleiocene and Pluvial periods, after which—its peculiar fauna having developed meanwhile—the lake gradually dried up, till it was represented only, as it now is, by the swampy Haleh, the pear-shaped Sea of Galilee, and the Dead Sea. These changes all occurred long ages before the appearance of man. The beds upheaved include: (1) the Nubian Sandstone (of the Greensand period), which was sheared along the line of the Jordan fault E. of the river, and which only appears on the western slopes of Hermon, Gilead, and Moab; (2) the limestones of the Cretaceous age, including the hard dolomite, and softer beds full of characteristic fossils; (3) the soft Eocene limestone, which appears chiefly on the western spurs and in the foothills, the angle of upheaval being less steep than that of the older main formation. On the shores of the Mediterranean a yet later sandy limestone forms the low cliffs of Sharon. See GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE.

As regards fauna, flora and cultivation, it is sufficient here to say that they are still practically the same as described throughout the

4. Fauna and Flora Bible. The lion and the wild bull (Bos primigenius) were exterminated within historic times, but have left their bones in the Jordan gravels, and in caves. The bear has gradually retreated to Hermon and Lebanon. The buffalo has been introduced since the Moslem conquest. Among trees the apple has fallen out of cultivation since the Middle Ages, and the cactus has been introduced; but Pal is still a land of corn, wine and oil, and famous for its fruits. Its trees, shrubs and plants are those noticed in the Bible. Its woods have been thinned in Lower Galilee and Northern Sharon, but on the other hand the copse has often grown over the site of former vineyards and villages, and there is no reason to think that any general desiccation has occurred within the last 40 centuries, such as would affect the rainfall.

The climate of Pal is similar to that of other Mediterranean lands, such as Cyprus, Sicily or Southern Italy; and, in spite of the

5. Climate fevers of mosquito districts in the plains, it is much better than that of the Delta in Egypt, or of Mesopotamia. The summer heat is oppressive only for a few days at a time, when (esp. in May) the dry wind—deficient in ozone—blows from the eastern desert. For most of the season a moisture-laden sea breeze, rising about 10 AM, blows till the evening, and fertilizes all the western slopes of the mountains. In the bare deserts the difference between 90° F. by day and 40° F. by night gives a refreshing cold. With the east wind the temperature rises to 105° F., and the nights are oppressive. In the Jordan valley, in autumn, the shade temperature reaches 120° F. In this season mists cover the mountains and swell the grapes. In winter the snow sometimes lies for several days on the watershed ridge and on the Edomite mountains, but in summer even Hermon is sometimes quite snowless at 9,000 ft. above the sea. There is perhaps no country in which such a range of climate can be found, from the Alpine to the tropical, and none in which the range of fauna and flora is consequently so large, from the European to the African.

The rainfall of Pal is between 20 and 30 in. annually, and the rainy season is the same as in other Mediterranean countries. The "form-

6. Rainfall er rains" begin with the thunderstorms of November, and the "latter rains" cease with April showers. From December to February—except in years of drought—the rains are heavy. In most years the supply is quite sufficient for purposes of cultivation. The ploughing begins in autumn, and the corn is rarely spoiled by storms in summer. The fruits ripen in autumn and suffer only from the occasional appearance of locust swarms. There appears to be no reason to suppose that climate or rainfall have undergone any change since the times of the Bible; and a consideration of Bible allusions confirms this view.

Thus the occurrence of drought, and of consequent famine, is mentioned in the OT as occasional in all times (Gen 12 10; 26 2; 41 50; 7. Drought Lev 26 20; 2 S 21 1; 1 K 8 35; and Isa 5 6; Jer 14 1; Joel 1 10-12; Hag 1 11; Zec 14 17), and droughts are also noticed in the Mish (Ta'anith, i. 4-7) as occurring in autumn, and even lasting throughout the rainy season till spring. Good rains were a blessing from God, and drought was a sign of His displeasure, in Heb belief (Dt 11 14; Jer 5 24; Joel 2 23). A thunderstorm in harvest time (May) was most unusual (1 S 12 17.18), yet such a storm does still occur as a very exceptional phenomenon. By "snow in harvest" (Prov 25 13) we are not to understand a snowstorm, for it is likened to a "faithful messenger," and the reference is to the use of snow for cooling wine, which is still usual at Damascus. The notice of fever on the shores of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8 14) shows that this region was as unhealthy as it still is in summer. The decay of irrigation in Sharon may have rendered the plain more malarious than of old, but the identity of the Palestinian flora with that of the Bible indicates that the climate, generally speaking, is unchanged.

II. Palestine in the Pentateuch.—The Book of Gen is full of allusions to sites sacred to the memory of the Heb patriarchs. In the time of Abraham the population consisted of tribes, mainly Sem, who came originally from Babylonia, including Canaanites ("lowlanders") between Sidon and Gaza, and in the Jordan valley, and Amorites ("highlanders") in the mountains (Gen 10 15-19; Nu 13 29). Their language was akin to Heb, and it is only in Egypt that we read of an interpreter being needed (Gen 42 23), while excavated remains of seal-cylinders, and other objects, show that the civilization of Pal was similar to that of Babylonia.

(1) Shechem.—The first place noticed is the shrine or "station" (mākōm) of Shechem, with the Elon Moreh (LXX "high oak"), where Jacob afterward buried the idols of his wives, and where Joshua set up a stone by the "holy place" (Gen 12 6; 35 4; Josh 24 26). Sam tradition showed the site near Balāta ("the oak") at the foot of Mt. Gerizim. The "Canaanite was then in the land" (in Abraham's time), but was exterminated (Gen 34 25) by Jacob's sons. From Shechem Abraham journeyed southward and raised an altar between Bethel (Beitān) and Hai (Hayān), E. of the town of Luz, the name of which still survives hard-by at the spring of Lōzeh (Gen 12 8; 13 3; 28 11.19; 35 2).

(2) The Negeb.—But, on his return from Egypt with large flocks (12 16), he settled in the pastoral region, between Beersheba and the western Kadesh (13 1; 20 1), called in Heb the neghebh, "dry" country, on the edge of the cultivated lands. From E. of Bethel there is a fine view of the lower Jordan valley, and here Lot "lifted up his eyes" (13 10), and chose the rich grass lands of that valley for his flocks. The "cities of the Plain" (kikkār) were clearly in this valley, and Sodom must have been near the river, since Lot's journey to Zoar (19 22) occupied only an hour or two (vs 15.23) through the plain to the foot of the Moab mountains. These cities are not said to have been visible from near Hebron; but, from the hilltop E. of the city, Abraham could have seen "the smoke of the land" (19 28) rising up. The first land owned by him was the garden of Mamre (13 18; 18 1; 23 19), with the cave-tomb which tradition still points out under the floor of the Hebron mosque. His tent was spread under the "oaks of Mamre" (18 1), where his mysterious guests rested "under the tree" (ver 8). One aged oak still survives in the flat ground W. of the city, but this tree is very uncommon in the mountains of Judah. In all these incidental touches we have evidence of the exact knowledge of Pal which distinguishes the story of the patriarchs.

(3) Campaign of Amraphel.—Pal appears to have been an outlying province of the empire of Hammurabi, king of Babylon in Abraham's time; and the campaign of Amraphel resembled those of later Assy overlords exacting tribute of petty kings. The route (14 5-8) lay through Bashan, Gilead and Moab to Kadesh (probably at Petra), and the return through the desert of Judah to the plains of Jericho. Thus Hebron was not attacked (see ver 13), and the pursuit by Abraham and his Amorite allies led up the Jordan valley to Dan, and thence N. of Damascus (ver 15). The Salem whose king blessed Abraham on his return was thought by the Samaritans, and by Jerome, to be the city near the Jordan valley afterward visited by Jacob (14 18; 33 18); but see JERUSALEM.

(4) Gerar.—Abraham returned to the southern plains, and "sojourned in Gerar" (20 1), now Umm Jerrār, 7 miles S. of Gaza. The wells which he dug in this valley (26 15) were no doubt shallow excavations like those from which the Arabs still obtain the water flowing under the surface in the same vicinity (SWP, III, 390), though that at Beersheba (21 25-32), to which Isaac added another (26 23-25), may have been more permanent. Three masonry wells now exist at Bir es Seba', but the masonry is modern. The planting of a "tamarisk" at this place (21 33) is an interesting touch, since the tree is distinctive of the dry lowlands. From Beersheba Abraham journeyed to "the land of Moriah" (LXX "the high land") to sacrifice Isaac (22 2); and the mountain, according to Heb tradition (2 Ch 3 1), was at Jerus, but according to the Samaritans was Gerizim near the Elon Moreh—a summit which could certainly have been seen "afar off" (ver 4) on "the third day."

Isaac, living in the same pastoral wilderness, at the western Kadesh (25 11) and at Gerar (26 2), suffered like his father in a year of drought, and had similar difficulties with the Philis. At Gerar he sowed corn (26 12), and the vicinity is still capable of such cultivation. Thence he retreated S.E. to Rehoboth (Ruheibeh), N. of Kadesh, where ancient wells like those at Beersheba still exist (26 22). To Beersheba he finally returned (ver 23).

When Jacob fled to Haran from Beersheba (28 10) he slept at the "place" (or shrine) consecrated by Abraham's altar near Bethel, and—like any modern Arab visitor to a shrine—erected a memorial stone (ver 18), which he renewed twenty years later (35 14) when God appeared to him "again" (ver 9).

(1) Haran to Succoth.—His return journey from Haran to Gilead raises an interesting question. The distance is about 350 miles from Haran to the Galeed or "witness heap" (31 48) at Mizpah—probably Sūf in North Gilead. This distance Laban is said to have covered in 7 days (31 23), which would be possible for a force mounted on riding camels. But the news of Jacob's flight reached Laban on the 3d day (ver 22), and some time would elapse before he could gather his "brethren." Jacob with his flocks and herds must have needed 3 weeks for the journey. It is remarkable that the vicinity of Mizpah still presents ancient monuments like the "pillar" (ver 45) round which the "memorial cairn" (yghar-sāhādūthā) was formed. From this place Jacob journeyed to Mahanaim (probably Mahmah), S. of the Jabbok river—a place which afterward became the capital of South Gilead (Gen 32 1f; 1 K 4 14); but, on hearing of the advance of Esau from Edom, he retreated across the river (Gen 32 22) and then reached Succoth (33 17), believed to be Tell Der'ala, N. of the stream.

(2) From the Jordan to Hebron.—Crossing the Jordan by one of several fords in this vicinity, Jacob approached Shechem by the perennial stream of Wādī Fār'ah, and camped at Shalem (Sālim) on the east side of the fertile plain which stretches thence to Shechem, and here he bought land of the Hivites (33 18–20). We are not told that he dug a well, but the necessity for digging one in a region full of springs can only be explained by Hivite jealousy of water rights, and the well still exists E. of Shechem (cf Jn 4 5f), not far from the Elon Moreh where were buried the trāphīm (Gen 35 4) or "spirits" (Assyr tarpu) from Haran (31 30) under the oak of Abraham. These no doubt were small images, such as are so often unearthed in Pal. The further progress of Jacob led by Bethel and Bethlehem to Hebron (35 6.19.27), but some of his elder sons seem to have remained at Shechem. Thus Joseph was sent later from Hebron (37 14) to visit his brethren there, but found them at Dothan.

(3) Dothan (37 17) lay in a plain on the main trade route from Egypt to Damascus, which crossed the low watershed at this point and led down the valley to Jezreel and over Jordan to Bashan. The "well of the pit" (SWP, II, 169) is still shown at Tell Dothān, and the Ishmaelites, from Midian and Gilead, chose this easy caravan route (37 25.28) for camels laden with the Gilead balm and spices. The plain was fitted for feeding Jacob's flocks. The products of Pal then included also honey, pistachio nuts, and almonds (43 11); and a few centuries later we find notice in a text of Thothmes III of honey and balsam, with oil, wine, wheat, spelt, barley and fruits, as rations of the Egyptian troops in Canaan (Brugsch, Hist Egypt, I, 332).

The episode of Judah and Tamar is connected with a region in the Sh'phēlāh, or low hills of Judaea.

Adullam (Aid-el-mā), Chezib (Ain Kezbeh), and Timnath (Tibneh) are not far apart (Gen 38 1.5.12), the latter being in a pastoral valley where Judah met his "sheep shearers." Tamar sat at "the entrance of Enaim" (cf vs 14.22 ERV) or Enam (Josh 15 34), perhaps at Kefr 'Ana, 6 miles N.W. of Timnath. She was mistaken for a k'dheshāh, or votary of Ashtoreth (Gen 38 15.21), and we know from Hammurabi's laws that such votaries were already recognized. The mention of Judah's signet and staff (ver 18) also reminds us of Bab customs as described by Herodotus (i.195), and signet-cylinders of Bab style, and of early date, have been unearthed in Pal at Gezer and elsewhere (cf the "Bab garment," Josh 7 21).

Generally speaking, the geography of Gen presents no difficulties, and shows an intimate knowledge of the country, while the allusions to natural products and to customs are in accord with the results of scientific discovery. Only one difficulty needs notice, where Atad (50 10) on the way from Egypt to Hebron is described as "beyond the Jordan." In this case the Assy language perhaps helps us, for in that tongue Yaur-danu means "the great river," and the reference may be to the Nile itself, which is called Yaur in Heb (yē'ōr) and Assy alike.

Ex is concerned with Egypt and the Sinaitic desert, though it may be observed that its simple agricultural laws (chs 21–23), which

6. Exodus so often recall those of Hammurabi, and Leviticus would have been needed at once on the conquest of Gilead and Bashan, before crossing the Jordan. In Lev (ch 11) we have a list of animals most of which belong to the desert—as for instance the "coney" or hyrax (Lev 11 5; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 26), but others—such as the swine (Lev 11 7), the stork and the heron (ver 19)—to the 'Arabah and the Jordan valley, while the hoopoe (AV "lapwing," ver 19) lives in Gilead and in Western Pal. In Dt (ch 14) the fallow deer and the roe (ver 5) are now inhabitants of Tabor and Gilead, but the "wild goat" (ibex), "wild ox" (buball), "pygarg" (addax) and "chamois" (wild sheep), are found in the 'Arabah and in the deserts.

In Nu the conquest of Eastern Pal is described, and most of the towns mentioned are known (21 18–33); the notice of vineyards in

7. Numbers Moab (ver 22) agrees with the discovery of ancient rock-cut wine presses near Heshbon (SEP, I, 221). The view of Israel, in camp at Shittim by Balaam (22 41), standing on the top of Pisgah or Mt. Nebo, has been shown to be possible by the discovery of Jebel Neba, where also rude dolmens recalling Balak's altars have been found (SEP, I, 202). The plateau of Moab (32 3) is described as a "land for cattle," and still supports Arab flocks. The camps in which Israel left their cattle, women and children during the wars, for 6 months, stretched (33 49) from Beth-jeshimoth (Suweimeh), near the northeastern corner of the Dead Sea over Abel-shittim ("the acacia meadow"—a name it still bears) in a plain watered by several brooks, and having good herbage in spring.

(1) Physical allusions.—The description of the "good land" in Dt (8 7) applies in some details with special force to Mt. Gilead, which 8. Deuteronomy possesses more perennial streams than Western Pal throughout—"a land of brooks of water, of fountains and springs, flowing forth in valleys and hills"; a land also "of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of olive-trees and honey" is found in Gilead and Bashan. Pal itself is not a mining country, but the words (ver 9), "a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig copper," may be explained by the facts that iron mines existed near Beirūt in the 10th cent. AD, and copper mines at Punon N. of Petra in the 4th cent. AD, as described by Jerome (Onom, s.v. "Phinōn"). In Dt also (11 29; cf 27 4; Josh 8 30) Ebal and Gerizim are first noticed, as beside the "oaks of Moreh." Ebal the mountain of curses (3,077 ft. above sea-level) and Gerizim the mountain of blessings (2,850 ft.) are the two highest tops in Samaria, and Shechem lies in a rich valley between them. The first sacred center of Israel was thus established at the place where Abraham built his first altar and Jacob dug his well, where Joseph was buried and where Joshua recognized a holy place at the foot of Gerizim (Josh 24 26). The last chapters of Dt record the famous Pisgah view from Mt. Nebo (34 1–3), which answers in all respects to that from Jebel Neba, except as to Dan, and the utmost (or "western") sea, neither of which is visible. Here we should probably read "toward" rather than "to," and there is no other hill above the plains of Shittim whence a better view can be obtained of the Jordan valley, from Zoar to Jericho, of the watershed mountains as far N. as Gilboa and Tabor, and of the slopes of Gilead.

(2) Archaeology.—But besides these physical allusions, the progress of exploration serves to illustrate the archaeology of Dt. Israel was commanded (12 3) to overthrow the Can. altars, to break the standing stones which were emblems of superstition, to burn the 'āshērāh poles (or artificial trees), and to hew down the graven images. That these commands were obeyed is clear. The rude altars and standing stones are now found only in Moab, and in remote parts of Gilead, Bashan, and Galilee, not reached by the power of reforming kings of Judah. The 'āshērāh poles have disappeared, the images are found, only deep under the surface. The carved tablets which remain at Damascus, and in Phoenicia and Syria, representing the gods of Canaan or of the Hittites, have no counterpart in the Holy Land. Again when we read of ancient "landmarks" (Dt 19 14; Prov 22 28; 23 10), we are not to understand a mere boundary stone, but rather one of those monuments common in Babylonia—as early at least as the 12th cent. BC—on which the boundaries of a field are minutely described, the history of its grant by the king detailed, and a curse (cf Dt 27 17) pronounced against the man who should dare to remove the stone. (See illustration under NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

III. Palestine in the Historic Books of the OT.—Josh is the great geographical book of the OT; and the large majority of the 600 names of places, rivers and mountains of Joshua in Pal mentioned in the Bible are to be found in this book.

(1) Topographical accuracy.—About half of this total of names were known, or were fixed by Dr. Robinson, between 1838 and 1852, and about 150 new sites were discovered (1872–78, 1881–82) in consequence of the 1-in. trigonometrical survey of the country, and were identified by the present writer during this period; a few interesting sites have been added by M. Clermont-Ganneau (Adulam and Gezer), by Rev A. Henderson (Kiriath-jearim), by Rev. W. F. Birch (Zoar at Tell esh Shāghār), and by others. Thus more than three-quarters of the sites have been fixed with more or less certainty, most of them preserving their ancient names. It is impossible to study this topography without seeing that the Bible writers had personal knowledge of the country; and it is incredible that a Heb priest, writing in Babylonia, could have possessed that intimate acquaintance with all parts of the land which is manifest in the geographical chapters of Josh. The towns are enumerated in due order by districts; the tribal boundaries follow natural lines—valleys and mountain ridges—and the character of various regions is correctly indicated. Nor can we suppose that this topography refers to conditions subsequent to the return from captivity, for these were quite different. Simeon had ceased to inhabit the south by the time of David (1 Ch 4 24), and the lot of Dan was colonized by men of Benjamin after the captivity (8 12, 13; Neh 11 34, 35). Tirzah is mentioned (Josh 12 24) in Samaria, whereas the future capital of Omri is not. Ai is said to have been made "a heap for ever" (8 28), but was inhabited apparently in Isaiah's time (10 28=Aiath) and certainly after the captivity (Ezr 2 28; Neh 7 32; 11 31=Aija). At latest, the topography seems to be that of Solomon's age, though it is remarkable that very few places in Samaria are noticed in the Book of Josh.

(2) The passage of the Jordan.—Israel crossed Jordan at the lowest ford E. of Jericho. The river was in flood, swollen by the melting snows of Hermon (Josh 3 15); the stoppage occurred 20 miles farther up at Adam (ed-Dāmīeh), the chalky cliffs at a narrow place being probably undermined and falling in, thus damming the stream. A Moslem writer asserts that a similar stoppage occurred in the 13th cent. AD, near the same point. (See JORDAN RIVER.) The first camp was established at Gilgal (Jilgālieh), 3 miles E. of Jericho, and a "circle" of 12 stones was erected. Jericho was not at the mediaeval site (er Riha) S. of Gilgal, or at the Herodian site farther W., but at the great spring 'Ain es Sultān, close to the mountains to which the spies escaped (2 16). The great mounds were found by Sir C. Warren to consist of sun-dried bricks, and further excavations (see Mitteil. der deutschen Orient-Gesell., December, 1909, No. 41) have revealed little but the remains of houses of various dates.

(3) Joshua's first campaign.—The first city in the mountains attacked by Israel was Ai, near Hayān, 2 miles S. E. of Bethel. It has a deep valley to the N., as described (Josh 8 22). The fall of Ai and Bethel (ver 17) seems to have resulted in the peaceful occupation of the region between Gibeon and Shechem (8 30–9 27); but while the Hivites submitted, the Amorites of Jerus and of the S. attacked Gibeon (el Jīb) and were driven down the steep pass of Beth-horon (Beit 'Aūr) to the plains (10 1–11). Joshua's great raid, after this victory, proceeded through the plain to Makkedah, now called el Mughār, from the "cave" (cf 10 17), and by Libnah to Lachish (Tell el Hesay), whence he went up to Hebron, and "turned" S. to Debir (edh Dhāherīyeh), thus subduing the sh'phēlāh of Judah and the southern mountains, though the capital at Jerus was not taken. It is now very generally admitted that the six letters of the Amorite king of Jerus included in Am Tab may refer to this war. The 'Abiri or Habiri are therein noticed as a fierce people from Seir, who "destroyed all the rulers," and who attacked Ajalon, Lachish, Ashkelon, Keilah (on the main road to Hebron) and other places (see EXODUS, THE).

(4) The second campaign (11 1–14) was against the nations of Galilee; and the Heb victory was gained at "the waters of Merom" (ver 5). There is no sound reason for placing these at the Hūleh lake; and the swampy Jordan valley was a very unlikely field of battle for the Can. chariots (ver 6). The kings noticed are those of Madon (Madīn), Shimron (Semmunieh), Dor (possibly Tell Thorah), "on the west," and of Hazor (Hazzūr), all in Lower Galilee. The pursuit was along the coast toward Sidon (ver 8); and Merom may be identical with Shimron-meron (12 20), now Semmunieh, in which case the "waters" were those of the perennial stream in Wādī el Melek, 3 miles to the N., which flow W. to join the lower part of the Kishon. Shimron-meron was one of the 31 royal cities of Pal W. of the Jordan (12 9–24).

The regions left unconquered by Joshua (13 2–6) were those afterward conquered by David and Solomon, including the Phil. plains, and the Sidonian coast from Mearah (el Mogheirīyeh) northward to Aphek (Afka) in Lebanon, on the border of the Amorite country which lay S. of the "land of the Hittites" (1 4). Southern Lebanon, from Gebal (Jubeil) and the "entering into Hamath" (the Eleutherus Valley) on the W., to Baal-gad (probably at 'Ain Judeideh on the northwestern slope of Hermon) was also included in the "land" by David (2 S 8 6–10). But the whole of Eastern Pal (13 7–32), and of Western Pal, excepting the shore plains, was allotted to the 12 tribes. Judah and Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh), being the strongest, appear to have occupied the mountains and the sh'phēlāh, as far N. as Lower Galilee, before the final allotment.

Thus the lot of Simeon was within that inherited by Judah (19 1), and that of Dan seems to have been partly taken from Ephraim, since Joseph's lot originally reached to Gezer (16 3); but Benjamin appears to have received its portion early (cf 15 5-11; 16 1.2; 18 11-28). This lot was larger than that of Ephraim, and Benjamin was not then the "smallest of the tribes of Israel" (1 S 9 21), since the destruction of the tribe did not occur till after the death of Joshua and Eleazar (Jgs 20 28).

The twelve tribes were distributed in various regions which may here briefly be described. Reuben held the Moab plateau to the Arnon (Wādī Mōjūb) on the S., and to the "river of Gad" (Wādī Nā'ār) on the N., thus including part of the Jordan valley close to the Dead Sea. Gad held all the W. of Gilead, being separated from the Ammonites by the upper course of the Jabbok. All the rest of the Jordan valley E. of the river was included in this lot. Manasseh held Bashan, but the conquest was not completed till later. Simeon had the neghebb plateau S. of Beersheba. Judah occupied the mountains S. of Jerus, with the sh^cphēlāh to their W., and claimed Philistia S. of Ekron. Benjamin had the Jericho plains and the mountains between Jerus and Bethel. The border ran S. of Jerus to Rachel's tomb (1 S 10 2), and thence W. to Kiriath-jearim (Erma) and Ekron. Dan occupied the lower hills W. of Benjamin and Ephraim, and claimed the plain from Ekron to Rakkon (Tell er Rakkei) N. of Joppa. Manasseh had a large region, corresponding to Samaria, and including Carmel, Sharon and half the Jordan valley, with the mountains N. of Shechem; but this tribe occupied only the hills, and was unable to drive the Canaanites out of the plains (Josh 17 11.16). Ephraim also complained of the smallness of its lot (ver 15), which lay in rugged mountains between Bethel and Shechem, including, however, the corn plateau E. of the latter city. Issachar held the plains of Esdraelon and Dothan, with the Jordan valley to the E., but soon became subject to the Canaanites. Zebulun had the hills of Lower Galilee, and the coast from Carmel to Accho. Naphtali owned the mountains of Upper Galilee, and the rich plateau between Tabor and the Sea of Galilee. Asher had the low hills W. of Naphtali, and the narrow shore plains from Accho to Tyre. Thus each tribe possessed a proportion of mountain land fit for cultivation of figs, olives and vines, and of arable land fit for corn. The areas allotted appear to correspond to the density of population that the various regions were fitted to support.

The Levitical cities were fixed in the various tribes as centers for the teaching of Israel (Dt 33 10), but a Levite was not obliged to live in such a city, and was expected to go with his course annually to the sacred center, before they retreated to Jerus on the disruption of the kingdom (2 Ch 11 14). The 48 cities (Josh 21 13-42) include 13 in Judah and Benjamin for the priests, among which Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 13.15) and Anathoth (1 K 2 26) are early noticed as Levitical. The other tribes had 3 or 4 such cities each, divided among Kohathites (10), Gershonites (13), and Merarites (12). The six Cities of Refuge were included in the total, and were placed 3 each side of the Jordan in the S., in the center, and in the N., namely Hebron, Shechem and Kedesh on the W., and Bezer (unknown), Ramoth (Reimān) and Golan (probably Sahem el Jaulān) E. of the river. Another less perfect list of these cities, with 4 omissions and 11 minor differences, mostly clerical, is given in 1 Ch 6 57-81. Each of these cities had "suburbs," or open spaces, extending (Nu 35 4) about a quarter-mile beyond the wall, while the fields, to about half a mile distant, also belonged to the Levites (Lev 25 34).

(1) Early wars.—In Jgs, the stories of the heroes who successively arose to save Israel from the heathen carry us to every part of the country. "After the death of Joshua"

2. Book of Judges (1 1) the Canaanites appear to have recovered power, and to have rebuilt some of the cities which he had ruined. Judah fought the Perizzites ("villagers") at Berek (Berkah) in the lower hills W. of Jerus, and even set fire to that city. Caleb attacked Debir (vs 12-15), which is described (cf Josh 15 15-19) as lying in a "dry" (AV "south") region, yet with springs not far away. The actual site (edh Dhāheriyyeh) is a village with ancient tombs 12 miles S.W. of Hebron; it has no springs, but about 7 miles to the N.E. there is a perennial stream with "upper and lower springs." As regards the Philistines (Jgs 1 18), the LXX reading seems preferable; for the Gr says that Judah "did not take Gaza," nor Ashkelon nor Ekron, which agrees with the failure in conquering the "valley" (ver 19) due to the Canaanites having "chariots of iron." The Can. chariots are often mentioned about this time in the Am Tab and Eyp accounts speak of their being plated with metals. Manasseh, Ephraim, Zebulun, Asher and Naphtali, were equally powerless against cities in the plains (vs 27-33); and Israel began to mingle with the Canaanites, while the tribe of Dan seems never to have really occupied its allotted region, and remained encamped in the borders of Judah till some, at least, of its warriors found a new home under Hermon (1 34; 18 1-30) in the time of Jonathan, the grandson of Moses.

(2) Defeat of Sisera.—The oppression of Israel by Jabin II of Hazor, in Lower Galilee, appears to have occurred in the time of Rameses II, who, in his 8th year, conquered Shalem (Sālm, N. of Taanach), Anem (Anīn), Dapur (Debūrieh, at the foot of Tabor), with Bethanath (Ainitha) in Upper Galilee (Brugsch, Hist Egypt, II, 64). Sisera may have been an Eyp resident at the court of Jabin (Jgs 4 2); his defeat occurred near the foot of Tabor (ver 14) to which he advanced E. from Harosheth (el Harathiyyeh) on the edge of the sea plain. His host "perished at Endor" (Ps 83 9) and in the swampy Kishon (Jgs 5 21). The site of the Kedesh in "the plain of swamps" (4 11) to which he fled is doubtful. Perhaps Kedesh of Issachar (1 Ch 6 72) is intended at Tell Kadeis, 3 miles N. of Taanach, for the plain is here swampy in parts. The Can. league of petty kings fought from Taanach to Megiddo (5 19), but the old identification of the latter city with the Rom town of Legio (Lejjān) was a mere guess which does not fit with Eyp accounts placing Megiddo near the Jordan. The large site at Mugedd'a, in the Valley of Jezreel seems to be more suitable for all the OT as well as for the Eyp accounts (SWP, II, 90-99).

(3) Gideon's victory.—The subsequent oppression by Midianites and others would seem to have coincided with the troubles which occurred in the 5th year of Minepthah (see EXODUS, THE). Gideon's home (Jgs 6 11) at Ophrah, in Manasseh, is placed by Sam tradition at Fer'ata, 6 miles W. of Shechem, but his victory was won in the Valley of Jezreel (7 1-22); the sites of Beth-shittah (Shafta) and Abel-meholah (Ain Helweh) show how Midian fled down this valley and S. along the Jordan plain, crossing the river near Succoth (Tell Der'ala) and ascending the slopes of Gilead to Jogbehah (Ju-beihah) and Nobah (8 4-11). But Oreb ("the raven") and Zeeb ("the wolf") perished at "the raven's rock" and "the wolf's hollow" (cf 7 25, W. of the Jordan). It is remarkable (as pointed out by the present author in 1874) that, 3 miles N. of Jericho, a sharp peak is now called "the raven's nest," and a ravine 4 miles farther N. is named "the wolf's hollows." These sites are rather farther S. than might be expected, unless the two chiefs were separated from the fugitives, who followed Zebah and Zalmunna to Gilead. In this episode "Mt. Gilead" (7 3) seems to be a clerical error for "Mt. Gilboa," unless the name survives in corrupt form at Ain Jalād ("Goliath's spring"), which is a large pool, usually supposed to be the spring of Harod (7 1), where Gideon camped, E. of Jezreel.

The story of Abimelech takes us back to Shechem. He was made king by the "oak of the pillar" (9 6), which was no doubt Abraham's oak already noticed; it seems also to be called 'the enchanter's oak' (ver 37), probably from some superstition connected with the burial of the Teraphim under it by Jacob. The place called Beer, to which Jotham fled from Abimelech (ver 21), may have been Beeroth (Bt'reh) in the lot of Benjamin. Thebez, the town taken by the latter (ver 50), and where he met his death, is now the village T'abās, 10 miles N.E. of Shechem.

The Ammonite oppression of Israel in Gilead occurred about 300 years after the Heb conquest (11 26), and Jephthah the deliverer returned to Mizpah (ver 29), which was probably the present village Sāf (already noticed), from his exile in the "land of Tob" (vs 3.6). This may have been near Taiyibeh, 9 miles S. of Gadara, in the extreme N. of Gilead—a place notable for its ancient dolmens and rude stone monuments, such as occur also at Mizpah. Jephthah's dispute with the men of Ephraim (12 1) indicates the northern position of Mizpah. Aroer (11 33) is unknown, but lay near Rabbath-ammon (Josh 13 25; 2 S 24 5); it is to be distinguished from Aroer ('Ar'a'ir) in the Arnon ravine, mentioned in Jgs 11 26.

The scene of Samson's exploits lies in the sh'phē-lāh of Judah on the borders of Philistia. His home at Zorah (Šūr'ah) was on the hills N. of the Valley of Sorek, and looked down on "the camp of Dan" (13 25 m), which had been pitched in that valley near Beth-shemesh. Eshtaol (Eshu'a) was less than 2 miles E. of Zorah on the same ridge. Timnath (14 1) was only 2 miles W. of Beth-shemesh, at the present ruin Tibneh. The region was one of vineyards (ver 5), and the name Sorek (Sārīk) still survives at a ruin 2 miles W. of Zorah. Sorek signified a "choice vine," and a rock-cut wine press exists at the site (SWP, III, 126). These 5 places, all close together, were also close to the Philii corn lands (15 5) in a region of vines and olives. Samson's place of refuge in the "cleft of the rock of Etam" (see 15 8) was probably at Beit 'Atāb, only 5 miles E. of Zorah, but rising with a high knoll above the southern precipices of the gorge which opens into the Valley of Sorek. In this knoll, under the village, is a rock passage now called "the well of refuge" (Bir el Hasūtah), which may have been the "cleft" into which Samson "went down." Lehi (ver 9) was apparently in the valley beneath, and the name ("the jaw") may refer to the narrow mouth of the gorge whence, after conference with the Philis, the men of Judah "went down" (ver 11) to the "cleft of the rock of Etam" (SWP, III, 83, 137), which was a passage 250 ft. long leading down, under the town, to the spring. All of Samson's story is connected with this one valley (for Delilah also lived in the "Valley of Sorek," 16 4) excepting his visit to Gaza, where he carried the gates to the 'hill facing Hebron' (16 3), traditionally shown (SWP, III, 255) at the great mound on the E. side of this town where he died, and where his tomb is (wrongly) shown. Another tomb, close to Zorah, represents a more correct tradition (16 31), but the legends of Samson at this village are of modern Christian origin.

The appendix to Jgs includes two stories concerning Levites who both lived in the time of the 2d generation after the Heb conquest (18 30; 20 28), and who both "sojourned" in Bethlehem of Judah (17 8; 19 2), though their proper city was one in Mt. Ephraim. In the first case Jonathan, the grandson of Moses, founded a family of idolatrous priests, setting up Micah's image at Dan (Tell el Kādī) beside the sources of the Jordan, where ancient dolmen altars still exist. This image may have been the cause why Jeroboam afterward established a calf-temple at the same place. It is said to have stood there till the "captivity of the ark" (St. Petersburg MS, Jgs 18 30), "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (ver 31). From this narrative we learn that the tribe of Dan did not settle in its appointed lot (18 1), but pitched in the "camp of Dan," west of Kiriath-jearim (ver 12). This agrees with the former mention of the site (13 25) as being near Zorah; and the open valley near Beth-shemesh is visible, through the gorges of Lehi, from the site of Kiriath-jearim at 'Erma.

(4) Appendix: Defeat of Benjamin.—In the 2d episode we trace the journey of the Levite from Bethlehem past Jerus to Gibeah (Jeba'), E. of Ramah (er-Rām), a distance which could easily be traversed in an afternoon (cf 19 8–14). Gibeah was no doubt selected as a halting-place by the Levite, because it was a Levitical city. The story of the great crime of the men of Gibeah was well known to Hosea (9 9). Israel gathered against them at Mizpah (Tell en Naṣbeh) on the watershed, 3 miles to the N.W., and the ark was brought by Phinehas to Bethel (cf 20 1.31; 18 26.27), 3 miles N.E. of Mizpah. The defeat of Benjamin occurred where the road to Gibeah leaves the main north road to Bethel (ver 31), W. of Ramah. The survivors fled to the rock Rimmon (Rummōn), 3½ miles E. of Bethel, on the edge of the "wilderness" which stretches from this rugged hill toward the Jordan valley. The position of Shiloh, 9 miles N. of this rock, is very accurately described (21 19) as being N. of Bethel (Beitin), and E. of the main road, thence to Shechem which passes Lebonah (Lubban), a village 3 miles N.W. of Seilān or Shiloh. The "vineyards," in which the maidens of Shiloh used to dance (ver 20) at the Feast of Tabernacles, lay no doubt where vineyards still exist in the little plain S. of this site. It is clear that the writer of these two narratives had an acquaintance with Palestinian topography as exact as that shown throughout Jgs. Nor (if the reading "captivity of the ark" be correct) is there any reason to suppose that they were written after 722 BC.

The Book of Ruth gives us a vivid picture of Heb life "when the judges ruled" (1 1 AV), about a century before the birth of David. Laws as old as Hammurabi's age allowed the widow the choice of remaining with the husband's family, or of quitting his house (cf 1 8). The beating out of gleanings (2 17) by women is still a custom which accounts for the rock mortars found so often scooped out on the hillside. The villager still sleeps, as a guard, beside the heap of winnowed corn in the threshing-floor (3 7); the head-veil, still worn, could well have been used to carry six measures of barley (ver 15). The courteous salutation of his reapers by Boaz (2 4) recalls the common Arab. greeting (Allah ma'kām), "God be with you." But the thin wine (ver 14) is no longer drunk by Moslem peasants, who only "dip" their bread in oil.

(1) Samuel.—The two Books of S present an equally valuable picture of life, and an equally real topography throughout. Sam-

4. Books of uel's father—a pious Levite (1 Ch Samuel 6 27)—descended from Zuph who had lived at Ephrathah (Bethlehem; cf 1 S 9 4.5), had his house at Ramah (1 19) close to Gibeah, and this town (er-Rām) was Samuel's home also (7 17; 25 1). The family is described as 'Ramathites, Zuphites of Mt. Ephraim' (1 1), but the term "Mt. Ephraim" was not confined to the lot of Ephraim, since it included Bethel and Ramah, in the land of Benjamin (Jgs 4 5). As a Levite, Elkanah obeyed the law of making annual visits to the central shrine, though this does not seem to have been generally observed in an age when "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Jgs 21 25). The central shrine had been removed by Joshua from Shechem to the remote site of Shiloh (Josh 22 9), perhaps for greater security, and here the tabernacle (ver 19) was pitched (cf 1 S 2 22) and remained for 4 centuries till the death of Eli. The great defeat of Israel, when the ark was captured by the Philis, took place not far from Mizpah (4 1), within an easy day's journey from Shiloh (cf ver 12). Ekron, whence it was sent back (6 16), was only 12 miles from Beth-shemesh ('Ain-shems), where the ark rested on a "great stone" (LXX, ver 18); and Beth-shemesh was only 4 miles W. of Kiriath-jearim (ver 21), which was in the mountains, so that its inhabitants "came down" from "the hill" (6 21; 7 1) to fetch the ark, which abode there for 20 years, till the beginning of Saul's reign (14 18), when, after the war, it may have been restored to the tabernacle at Nob, to which place the latter was probably removed after Eli's death, when Shiloh was deserted. The exact site of Nob is not known, but probably (cf Isa 10 32) it was close to Mizpah, whence the first glimpse of Jerus is caught, and thus near Gibeon, where it was laid up after the massacre of the priests (1 S 21 1; 22 9, 18; 2 Ch 1 3), when the ark was again taken to Kiriath-jearim (2 S 6 2). Mizpah (Tell en-Naşbeh) was the gathering-place of Israel under Samuel; and the "stone of help" (Eben-ezer) was erected, after his victory over the Philis, "between Mizpah and Shen" (1 S 7 12)—the latter place (see LXX) being probably the same as Jeshanah ('Ain Sinai), 6 miles N. of Mizpah which Samuel visited yearly as a judge (ver 16).

(2) Saul's search.—The journey of Saul, who, "seeking asses found a kingdom," presents a topography which has often been misunderstood. He started (9 4) from Gibeah (Jeba') and went first to the land of Shalisha through Mt. Ephraim. Baal-shalisha (2 K 4 42) appears to have been the present Kejfr Thilth, 18 miles N. of Lydda and 24 miles N.W. from Gibeah. Saul then searched the land of Shalim—probably that of Shual (1 S 13 17), N.E. of Gibeah. Finally he went south beyond the border of Benjamin (10 2) to a city in the "land of Zuph," which seems, probably to have been Bethlehem, whence (as above remarked) Samuel's family—descendants of Zuph—came originally. If so, it is remarkable that Saul and David were anointed in the same city, one which Samuel visited later (16 1, 2 ff) to sacrifice, just as he did when meeting Saul (9 12), who was probably known to him, since Gibeah and Ramah were only 2 miles apart. Saul's journey home thus naturally lay on the road past Rachel's tomb near Bethlehem, and along the Bethel road (10 2, 3) to his home at Gibeah (vs 5, 10). It is impossible to suppose that Samuel met him at Ramah—a common mistake which creates great confusion in the topography.

(3) Saul's coronation and first campaign.—Saul concealed the fact of his anointing (10 16) till the lot fell upon him at Mizpah. This public choice by lot has been thought (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 1885, 252) to indicate a double narrative, but to a Hebrew there would not appear to be any discrepancy, since "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of Jeh" (Prov 16 33). Even at Mizpah he was not fully accepted till his triumph over the Ammonites, when the kingdom was "renewed" at Gilgal (11 14). This campaign raises an interesting question of geography. Only 7 days' respite was allowed to the men of Jabesh in Gilead (11 3), during which news was sent to Saul at Gibeah, and messengers dispatched "throughout the borders of Israel" (ver 7), while the hosts gathered at Bezek, and reached Jabesh on the 7th or 8th day (vs 8–10) at dawn. Bezek appears to be a different place from that W. of Jerus (Jgs 1 4) and to have been in the middle of Pal at Ibztik, 14 miles N. of Shechem, and 25 miles W. of Jabesh, which probably lay in Wady Yabis in Gilead. The farthest distances for the messengers would not have exceeded 80 miles; and, allowing a day for the news to reach Saul and another for the march from Bezek to Jabesh, there would have been just time for the gathering of Israel at this fairly central meeting-place.

The scene of the victory over the Philis at Michmash is equally real. They had a 'post' in Geba (or Gibeah, 13 3), or a governor (cf LXX), whom Jonathan slew. They came up to Michmash (Mukhmās) to attack Jonathan's force which held Gibeah, on the southern side of the Michmash valley, hard by. The northern cliff of the great gorge was called Bozez ("shining") in contrast to the southern one (in shadow) which was named Seneh or "thorn" (14 4). Jos (BJ, V, ii, 2) says that Gibeah of Saul was by "the valley of thorns," and the ravine, flanked by the two precipitous cliffs E. of Michmash, is still called Wady es Suweint, or "the valley of little thorn trees." Jonathan climbed the steep slope that leads to a small flat top (1 S 14 14 AV), and surprised the Phili 'post.' The pursuit was by Bethel to the Valley of Aijalon, down the steep Beth-horon pass (vs 23, 31); but it should be noted that there was no "wood" (vs 25, 26) on this bare hilly ridge, and the word (cf Cant 5 1) evidently means "honeycomb." It is also possible that the altar raised by Saul, for fulfilment of the Law (Gen 9 4; Ex 20 25), was at Nob where the central shrine was then established.

(4) David's early life.—David fed his flocks in the wilderness below Bethlehem, where many a silent and dreadful "Valley of Shadows" (cf Ps 23 4) might make the stoutest heart fail. The lion crept up from the Jordan valley, and (on another occasion) the bear came down from the rugged mountains above (1 S 17 34). No bears are now known S. of Hermon, but the numerous references (2 K 2 24; Isa 59 11; Hos 13 8; Prov 17 12; 28 15) show that they must have been exterminated, like the lion, in comparatively late times. The victory over Goliath, described in the chapter containing this allusion, occurred in the Valley of Elah near Shochoth (Shuweikeh); and this broad valley (Wady es Sumt) ran into the Phili plain at the probable site of Gath (Tell es Sâfi) to which the pursuit led (1 S 17 1, 2, 52). The watercourse still presents "smooth stones" (ver 40) fit for the sling, which is still used by Arab shepherds; and the valley still has in it fine "terebinths" such as those from which it took its name Elah. The bronze armor of the giant (vs 5, 6) indicates an early stage of culture, which is not contradicted by the mention of an iron spearhead (ver 7), since iron is found to have been in use in Pal long before David's time. The curious note (ver 54) as to the head of Goliath being taken "to Jerus" is also capable of explanation. Jerus was not conquered till at least 10 years later, but it was a general practice (as late as the 7th cent. BC in Assyria) to preserve the heads of dead foes by salting them, as was probably done in another case (2 K 10 7) when the heads of Ahab's sons were sent from Samaria to Jezreel to be exposed at the gate.

David's outlaw life began when he took refuge with Samuel at the "settlements" (Naioth) near Ramah, where the company of prophets lived. He easily met Jonathan near Gibeah, which was only 2 miles E.; and the "stone of departure" ('Ezel), 1 S 20 19) may have marked the Levitical boundary of that town. Nob also (21 1) was, as we have seen, not far off, but Gath (ver 10) was beyond the Heb boundary. Thence David retreated up the Valley of Elah to Adullam ('Aid-el-ma), which stood on a hill W. of this valley near the great turn (southward) of its upper course. An inhabited cave still exists here (cf 22 1), and the site meets every requirement (SWP, III, 311, 347, 361–67). Keilah (23 1) is represented by the village Kila, on the east side of the same valley, 3 miles farther up; and Hereth (22 5) was also near, but "in Judah" (23 3), at the village Kharâs on a wooded spur 7 miles N.W. of Hebron. Thence David went "down" (ver 4) to Keilah 2 miles away to the W. As there was no safety for the outlaws, either in Philistia or in Judah, they had to retreat to the wilderness of Ziph (Tell ez Zîf), 4 miles S.E. of Hebron. The word "wood" (hōresh) may more probably be a proper name, represented by the ruin of Khoreisa, rather more than a mile S. of Ziph, while the hill Hachilah (ver 19) might be the long spur, over the Jeshimon or desert of Judah, 6 miles E. of Ziph, now called el Kôla. Maon (M'ain) lay on the edge of the same desert still farther S., about 8 miles from Hebron. En-gedi (23 29; 24 1.2) was on the precipices by the Dead Sea. The "wild goats" (ibex) still exist here in large droves, and the caves of this desert are still used as folds for sheep in spring (ver 3). The villagers S. of Hebron are indeed remarkable for their large flocks which—by agreement with the nomads—are sent to pasture in the Jeshimon, like those of Nabal, the rich man of Carmel (Kurmul), a mile N. of Maon (25 2), who refused the customary present to David's band which had protected his shepherds "in the fields" (ver 15) or pastures of the wilderness. In summer David would naturally return to the higher ridge of Hachilah (26 1) on the south side of which there is a precipitous gorge (impassable save by a long détour), across which he talked to Saul (ver 13), likening himself (ver 20) to the desert "partridge," still found in this region.

(5) Defeat and death of Saul.—The site of Ziklag is doubtful, but it evidently lay in the desert S. of Beersheba (Josh 15 31; 19 5; 1 Ch 4 30; 1 S 27 6-12), far from Gath, so that King Achish did not know whether David had raided the S. of Judah, or the tribes toward Shur. Saul's power in the mountains was irresistible; and it was for this reason perhaps that his fatal battle with the Philis occurred far N. in the plain near Jezreel. They camped (1 S 28 4) by the fine spring of Shunem (Sâlem), and Saul on Gilboa to the S. The visit to Endor (Andûr) was thus a perilous adventure, as Saul must have stolen by night round the Philis host to visit this place N. of Shunem. He returned to the spur of Gilboa on which Jezreel stands (29 1), and the spring noticed is a copious supply N. of the village Zer'in. Beth-shan (31 12) was at the mouth of the valley of Jezreel at Beisân, and here the bodies of Saul and his sons were burned by the men of Jabesh-gilead; but, as the bones were preserved (ver 13; 2 S 21 13), it is possible that the corpses were cremated in pottery jars afterward buried under the tree. Excavations in Pal and in Babylonia show that this was an early practice, not only in the case of infants (as at Gezer, and Taanach), but also of grown men. See PALESTINE (RECENT EXPLORATION). The list of cities to which David sent presents at the time of Saul's death (30 26-31) includes those near Ziklag and as far N. as Hebron, thus referring to "all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt."

(6) Wellhausen's theory of a double narrative.—The study of David's wanderings, it may be noted, and of the climatic conditions in the Jeshimon desert, does not serve to confirm Wellhausen's theory of a double narrative, based on the secret unction and public choice of Saul, on the double visit to Hachilah, and on the fact that the gloomy king had forgotten the name of David's father. The history is not a "pious make-up" without "a word of truth" (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 248-49); and David, as a "youth" of twenty years, may yet have been called a "man of war"; while "transparent artifice" (p. 251) will hardly be recognized by the reader of this genuine chronicle. Nor was there any "Aphek in Sharon" (p. 260), and David did not "amuse himself by going first toward the north" from Gibeah (p. 267); his visit to Ramah does not appear to be a "worthless anachronistic anecdote" (p. 271); and no one who has lived in the terrible Jeshimon could regard the meeting at Hachilah as a "jest" (p. 265). Nor did the hill ("the dusky top") "take its name from the circumstance," but Wellhausen probably means the Sela ha-mahlekêh ("cliff of slippings" or of "slippings away"), now Wady Malâkeh near Ziph.

(7) Early years of David's reign.—David, till the 8th year of his reign, was king of Judah only. The first battle with Saul's son occurred at Gibeon (2 S 2 13), where the "pool" was no doubt the cave of the great spring at el Jîb; the pursuit was by the 'desert Gibeon road' (ver 24) toward the Jordan valley. Gibeon itself was not in a desert, but in a fertile region. Abner then deserted to David, but was murdered at the "well of Sirah" (Ain Sârah) on the road a mile N. of David's capital at Hebron. Nothing more is said about the Philis till David had captured Jerus, when they advanced on the new capital by the valley of Rephaim (5 22), which apparently ran from S. of Jerus to join the valley of Elah. If David was then at Adullam ("the hold," ver 17 AV; cf 1 S 22 5), it is easy to understand how he cut off the Philis retreat (2 S 5 23), and thus conquered all the hill country to Gezer (ver 25). After this the ark was finally brought from Baale-judah (Kiriath-jearim) to Jerus (6 2), and further was beyond the limits of Western Pal, in Moab (8 2) and in Syria (vs 3-12); but for "Syrians" (ver 13) the more correct reading appears to be Edomites (1 Ch 18 12), and the "Valley of Salt" was probably S. of the Dead Sea. Another war with the Syrians, aided by Aramaeans from E. of the Euphrates, occurred E. of the Jordan (2 S 10 16-18), and was followed by the siege of Rabbath-ammon ('Ammân), E. of Gilead, where we have notice of the "city of waters" (12 27), or lower town by the stream, contrasted, it seems, with the citadel which was on the northern hill.

(8) Hebrew letter-writing.—In this connection we find the first notice of a "letter" (11 14) as written by David to Joab. Writing is of course noticed as early as the time of Moses when—as we now know—the Canaanites wrote letters on clay tablets in cuneiform script. These, however, were penned by special scribes; and such a scribe is mentioned early (Jgs 8 14). David himself may have employed a professional writer (cf 2 S 8 17), while Uriah, who carried his own fate in the letter, was probably unable to read. Even in Isaiah's time the art was not general (Isa 29 12), though Heb kings could apparently write and read (Dt 17 18; 2 K 19 14); to the present day the accomplishment is not general in the East, even in the upper class. It should be noted that the first evidence of the use of an alphabet is found in the early alphabetic Pss, and the oldest dated alphabetic text yet known is later than 900 BC. The script used in the time of Moses may have been cuneiform, which was still employed at Gezer for traders' tablets in 649 BC. The alphabet may have come into use first among Hebrews, through Phoen influence in the time of David; and so far no script except this and the cuneiform has been unearthed in Pal, unless it is to be recognized in signs of the Hittite syllabary at Lachish and Gezer. Another interesting point, as regards Heb civilization in David's time, is the first mention of "mules" (2 S 13 29; 18 9; 1 K 1 33.38), which are unnoticed in the Pent. They are represented as pack animals on an Assyrian bas-relief; but, had they been known to Moses, they would probably have been condemned as unclean. The sons of David fled on mules from Baal-hazor (Tell 'Aşûr) "beside Ephraim" (now probably Taiyibeh), N. of Bethel, where Absalom murdered Amnon.

(9) Later years of David's reign.—On the rebellion of Absalom David retreated to Mahanaim, apparently by the road N. of the Mount of Olives, if the Tg of Jonathan (2 S 16 5) is correct in placing Bahurim at Almon (Almūt), N.E. of Jerus. It is not clear where the "wood of Ephraim," in which Absalom perished, may have been, but it was beyond Jordan in Gilead (17 22; 18 6); and oak woods are more common there than in Western Pal. The latest revolt, after Absalom's death, was in the extreme north at Abel (Abil), in Upper Galilee (20 14), after which Joab's journey is the last incident to be studied in the Books of S. For census purposes he went E. of the Jordan to Aroer (perhaps the city on the Arnon), to the "river of Gad" (Wādī Nā'ār) near Jazer, and through Gilead. Tahtim-hodshi (24 6) is believed (on the authority of three Gr MSS) to be a corruption of "the Hittites at Kadesh" (Kades), the great city on the Orontes (see HITTITES), which lay on the northern boundary of David's dominions, S. of the kingdom of Hamath. Thence Joab returned to Zidon and Tyre, and after visiting all Judah to Beersheba reached Jerus again within 10 months. The acquisition of the temple-site then closes the book.

(1) Solomon's provinces.—The Books of K contain also some interesting questions of geography.

Solomon's twelve provinces appear to answer very closely to the lots of the 12 tribes described in Josh. They included (1 K 4 7-19) the following:

(a) Ephraim, (b) Dan, (c) Southern Judah (see Josh 12 17), (d) Manasseh, (e) Issachar, (f) Northern Gilead and Bashan, (g) Southern Gilead, (h) Naphtali, (i) Asher, (j) part of Issachar and probably Zebulun (the text is doubtful, for the order of ver 17 differs in LXX), (k) Benjamin, (l) Reuben. LXX renders the last clause (ver 19), "and one Naseph [i.e. "officer"] in the land of Judah"—probably superior to the other twelve. Solomon's dominions included Philistia and Southern Syria, and stretched along the trade route by Tadmor (Palmyra) to Tiphseh on the Euphrates (vs 21.24; cf 9 18=Tamar; 2 Ch 8 4=Tadmor). Another Tiphseh (now Tafseh) lay 6 miles S.W. of Shechem (2 K 15 16). Gezer was presented to Solomon's wife by the Pharaoh (1 K 9 16).

(2) Geography of the Northern Kingdom.—Jeroboam was an Ephraimite (11 26) from Zereda, probably Surdah, 2 miles N.W. of Bethel, but the LXX reads "Sarira," which might be Sarra, 1½ miles E. of Shiloh. After the revolt of the ten tribes, "Shishak king of Egypt" (11 40; 14 25) sacked Jerus. His own record, though much damaged, shows that he not only invaded the mountains near Jerus, but that he even conquered part of Galilee. The border between Israel and Judah lay S. of Bethel, where Jeroboam's calf-temple was erected (12 29), Ramah (er-Rām) being a frontier town with Geba and Mizpah (15 17.22); but after the Syrian raid into Galilee (ver 20), the capital of Israel was fixed at Tirzah (ver 21), a place celebrated for its beauty (Cant 6 4), and perhaps to be placed at Tetashir, about 11 miles N.E. of Shechem, in romantic scenery above the Jordan valley. Omri reigned here also for six years (16 23) before he built Samaria, which remained the capital till 722 BC. Samaria appears to have been a city at least as large as Jerus, a strong site 5 miles N.W. of Shechem, commanding the trade route to its west. It resisted the Assyrians for 3 years, and when it fell Sargon took away 27,290 captives. Excavations at the site will, it may be hoped, yield results of value not as yet published. See next article.

The wanderings of Elijah extended from Zarephath (Surafend), S. of Sidon, to Sinai. The position of the Brook Cherith (17 3) where—according to one reading—"the Arabs brought him bread and flesh" (17 6) is not known. The site of this great contest with the prophets of the Tyrian Baal is supposed to be at el Mahrakah ("the place of burning") at the southeastern end of the Carmel ridge. Some early king of Israel perhaps, or one of the judges (cf Dt 33 19), had built an altar to Jeh above the Kishon (1 K 18 20.40) at Carmel; but, as the water (ver 33) probably came from the river, it is doubtful whether this altar was on the "top of Carmel," 1,500 ft. above, from which Elijah's servant had full view of the sea (vs 42.43). Elijah must have run before Ahab no less than 15 miles, from the nearest point on Carmel (ver 46) to Jezreel, and the journey of the Shunammite woman to find Elisha (2 K 4 25) was equally long. The vineyard of Naboth in Jezreel (1 K 21 1) was perhaps on the east of the city (now Zer'in), where rock-cut wine presses exist. In the account of the ascension of Elijah, the expression "went down to Bethel" (2 K 2 2) is difficult, if he went "from Gilgal" (ver 1). The town intended might be Jiljilia, on a high hill 7 miles N. of Bethel. LXX, however, reads "they came."

(3) Places connected with Elisha.—The home of Elisha was at Abel-meholah (1 K 19 16) in the Jordan valley (Jgs 7 22), probably at Ain Helweh, 10 miles S. of Beth-shan. If we suppose that Ophel (2 K 5 24 RVm), where he lived, was the present 'Afuleh, it is not only easy to understand that he would often "pass by" Shunem (which lay between Ophel and Abel-meholah), but also how Naaman might have gone from the palace of Jezreel to Ophel, and thence to the Jordan and back again to Ophel (vs 6.14.24), in the course of a single day in his chariot. The road down the valley of Jezreel was easy, and up it Jehu afterward drove furiously, coming from Ramoth in Gilead, and visible afar off from the wall of Jezreel (9 20). The 'top of the ascents' (ver 13), at Ramoth, refers no doubt to the high hill on which this city (now Reimān) stood as a strong fortress on the border between Israel and the Syrians. The flight of Ahaziah of Judah, from Jezreel was apparently N. by Gur (Kāra), 4 miles W. of Ibleam (Yebla), on the road to "the garden house" (Beit Jenn), and thence by Megiddo (Mujidda) down the Jordan valley to Jerus (9 27.28). Of the rebellion of Moab (2 K 1 1; 3 4) it is enough to point out here that King Mesha's account on the M S agrees with the OT, even in the minute detail that "men of Gad dwelt in Ataroth from of old" (cf Nu 32 34), though it lay in the lot of Reuben.

The topographical notices in the books written after the captivity require but short notice. The Benjamites built up Lod (Ludd), Ono (Kefr 'Ana) and Ajlalon (Yalo), which were in the lot of Dan (1 Ch 8 12; Neh 11 35), and it is worthy of note that Lod (Lydda) is not to be regarded as a new town simply because not mentioned in the earlier books; for Lod is mentioned (no. 64) with Ono in the lists of Thothmes III, a century before the Heb conquest of Pal. The author of Ch had access to information not to be found elsewhere in the OT. His list of Rehoboam's fortresses (2 Ch 11 6-10) includes 14 towns, most of which were on the frontiers of the diminished kingdom of Judah, some being noticed (such as Shoco and Adoraim) in the list of Shishak's conquests. He speaks of the "valley of Zephathah" (14 10), now Wady Sâfeh, which is otherwise unnoticed, and places it correctly at Mareshah (Mer'ash) on the edge of the Phil plain. He is equally clear about the topography in describing the attack on Jehoshaphat by the Ammonites, Moabites and Edomites. They camped at En-gedi (Ain Jidi), and the thanksgiving assembly, after the Heb victory, was in the valley of Beracah (2 Ch 20 1.20.26), which retains its name as Breikât, 4 miles W. of Tekoa.

IV. Palestine in the Poetic Books of the OT.—

In Job the scene is distinctively Edomite. Uz (Job

1 1; cf Gen 22 21 ERV; Jer 25 20; Lam 4 21) and Buz (Job 32 2; cf of Job Gen 22 21) are the Assyr Hazu and Bazu reached by Esarhaddon in 673

BC S. of Edom. Tema and Sheba (Job 6 19) are noticed yet earlier, by Tiglath-pileser III, and Sargon, who conquered the Thamudites and Nabataeans. We have also the conjunction of snowy mountains and ice (Job 6 16) with notice of the desert and the 'Arabah valley (24 5), which could hardly apply to any region except Edom. Again, we have a nomad population dwelling close to a city (29 4-7)—perhaps Petra, or Mâ'an in Edom. There were mines, not only in the Sinaitic desert, but at Punon in Northern Edom (cf 28 2-11). The white broom (30 4) is distinctive of the deserts of Moab and Edom. The wild ass and the ostrich (39 5.13) are now known only in the desert E. of Edom; while the stork (39 13 RVm) could have been found only in the 'Arabah, or in the Jordan valley. The wild ox (39 9 RV), or Bos primigenius, is now extinct (LXX "unicorn," Nu 23 22; Dt 33 17), though its bones occur in Lebanon caves. It was hunted about 1130 BC in Syria by Tiglath-pileser I (cf Ps 29 6), and is mentioned as late as the time of Isaiah (34 7) in connection with Edom; its Heb name (r'ēm) is the Assyr rimu, attached to a representation of the beast. As regards the crocodile ("leviathan," 41 1), it was evidently well known to the writer, who refers to its strong, musky smell (ver 31), and it existed not only in Egypt but in Pal, and is still found in the Crocodile River, N. of Caesarea in Sharon. Behemoth (40 15), though commonly supposed to be the hippopotamus, is more probably the elephant (on account of its long tail, its trunk, and its habit of feeding in mountains, vs 17.20.24); and the elephant was known to the Assyrians in the 9th cent. BC, and was found wild in herds on the Euphrates in the 16th cent. BC. The physical allusions in Job seem clearly, as a rule, to point to Edom, as do the geographical names; and though Christian tradition in the 4th cent. AD (St. Silvia, 47) placed Uz in Bashan, the LXX (42 18) defines it as lying "on the boundary of Edom and Arabia." None of these allusions serves to fix dates, nor do the peculiarities of the language, though they suggest Aram. and Arab. influences. The mention of Babylonians (1 17) (Kasdim) as raiders may, however, point to about 600 BC, since they could not have reached Edom except from the N., and did not appear in Pal between the time of Amraphel (who only reached Kadesh-barnea), and of Nebuchadnezzar. It is at least clear (24 1-12) that this great poem was written in a time of general anarchy, and of Arab lawlessness.

In the Pss there are many allusions to the natural phenomena of Pal, but there is very little detailed topography. "The mountain of Bashan" (Ps 68 15) rises E. of the plateau to 5,700 ft. above sea-level; but Zalmon (ver 14) is an unknown mountain (cf Zalmon, Jgs 9 48).

This Ps might well refer to David's conquest of Damascus (2 S 8 6), as Ps 72 refers to the time of Solomon, being the last in the original collection of "prayers of David" (ver 20). In Ps 83 (vs 6-8) we find a confederacy of Edom, Ishmael, Moab and the Hagarenes (or "wanderers" E. of Pal; cf 1 Ch 5 18-22) with Gebal (in Lebanon), Ammon, Amalek, and Tyre, all in alliance with Assyria—a condition which first existed in 732 BC, when Tiglath-pileser III conquered Damascus. The reference to the "northern" ("hidden") tribes points to this date (ver 3), since this conqueror made captives also in Galilee (2 K 15 29; 1 Ch 5 26; Isa 9 1).

In Prov the allusions are more peaceful, but not geographical. They refer to agriculture (3 10; 11 26; 12 11; 25 13), to trade (7 16; 31 14.24) and to flocks (27 23-27). The most remarkable passage (26 8) reads literally, "As he that packs a stone into the stone-heap, so is he that giveth honor to a fool."

Jerome said that this referred to a superstitious custom; and the erection of stone heaps at graves, or round a pillar (Gen 31 45.46), is a widely spread and very ancient custom (still preserved by Arabs), each stone being the memorial of a visitor to the spot, who thus honors either a local ghost or demon, or a dead man—a rite which was foolish in the eyes of a Hebrew of the age in which this verse was written (see Expos T, VIII, 399, 524).

The geography of Cant is specially important to a right understanding of this bridal ode of the Syrian princess who was Solomon's first bride.

4. Song of Songs It is not confined, as some critics say it is, to the north, but includes the whole of Pal and Syria. The writer names Kedar in North Arabia (1 5) and Egypt, whence horses came in Solomon's time (1 9; 1 K 10 28.29). He knows the henna (AV "camphire") and the vineyards of En-gedi (1 14), where vineyards still existed in the 12th cent. AD. He speaks of the "rose" of Sharon (2 1), as well as of Lebanon, with Shenir (Assyr Saniru) and Hermon (4 8) above Damascus (7 4). He notices the pastoral slopes of Gilead (6 5), and the brown pool, full of small fish, in the brook below Heshbon (7 4), in Moab. The locks of the "peaceful one" (6 13, Vulg pacifica) are like the thick copses of Carmel; 'the king is caught in the tangles' (7 5). See GALLERY. She is "beautiful as Tirzah [in Samaria], comely as Jerus, terrible to look at" (6 4 AV). She is a garden and a "paradise" ("orchard") of spices in Lebanon, some of which spices (calamus, cinnamon, frankincense and myrrh) have come from far lands (4 12-15). Solomon's vineyard—another emblem of the bride—(1 6; 8 11) was in Baalhamon, which some suppose to be Baal-hermon, still famous for its vineyards. He comes to fetch her from the wilderness (3 6); and the dust raised by his followers is like that of the whirlwind pillars which stalk over the dry plains of Bashan in summer. The single word "paradise" (4 13 m) is hardly evidence enough to establish late date, since—though used in Pers—its etymology and origin are unknown. The word for "nuts" (Heb 'ēghōz) is also not Pers (6 11), for the Arab. word جوز, jauz, is Sem, and means a "pair," applying to the walnut which abounds in Shechem. The "rose of Sharon" (2 1), according to the Tg, was the white "narcissus"; and the Heb word occurs also in Assyr (habašillatu), as noted by Delitzsch (quoting WAI, V, 32, no. 4), referring to a white bulbous plant.

Sharon in spring is covered still with wild narcissi, Arab. buseil (cf Isa 35 1.2). There is perhaps no period when such a poem is more likely to have been written than in the time of Solomon, when Israel "dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree" (1 K 4 25); when the roe and the fallow deer (Cant 2 17; 1 K 4 23) abounded; and when merchants (Cant 3 6) brought "powders" from afar; when also the dominion included Damascus and Southern Lebanon, as well as Western Pal with Gilead and Moab. See also SONG OF SONGS.

V. Palestine in the Prophets.—Isaiah (1 8) likens Zion, when the Assyrian armies were holding Samaria, Moab and Philistia, to "a booth in a vineyard, a lodge in a garden of cucumbers." He refers no doubt to a "tower" (Mt 21 33), or platform, such as is to be found beside the rock-cut wine press in the deserted vineyards of Pal; and such as is still built, for the watchman to stand on, in vineyards and vegetable gardens.

The chief topographical question (10 28-32)

Sâmieh, 2 miles S.W. of Heshbon (Heshbân)—is said to have had vines reaching to Jazer (Sâ'aûr, 6 miles to the N.); and rock-cut wine presses still remain at Sibmah (Isa 16 8; Jer 48 32). The Bozrah mentioned with Edom (Isa 34 6; 63 1; Jer 49 13.22; Mic 2 12) is probably Buseirah, near the southern border of Moab. In the last-cited passage there is a play on the words baqrâh ("fortress") and boqrâh for "sheepfold."

In Jer (1 1), Anathoth ('Anâta) is mentioned as a priests' city (cf 1 K 2 26). The "place" or shrine of Shiloh was deserted (Jer 7 12), but

2. Jeremiah the town seems still to have been inhabited (41 5). The "pit" at Mizpah (vs 6-9) may have been the great rock reservoir S. of Tell en-Naşbeh. The Moabite towns noticed (48 1-5.20-24.31-45; 49 3) with Rabbah ('Ammân) have been mentioned as occurring in the parallel passages of Isa. The numerous petty kings in Edom, Moab, Philistia, Phoenicia, and Arabia (25 20-24) recall those named in Assyrian lists of the same age. Lam 4 3 recalls Job 39 14 in attributing to the refers to the Assyrian advance from the north, when the outposts covered the march through Samaria (whether in 732, 722, or 702 BC) to Philistia. They extended on the left wing to Ai (Ḥayân), Michmash (Mukhmâs), and Geba, S. of the Michmash valley (Jeba'), leading to the flight of the villagers, from Ramah (er-Râm) and the region of Gibeah—which included Ramah, with Geba (1 S 22 6) and Migron (1 S 14 2) or "the precipice." They were alarmed also at Gallim (Beit Jâla), and Anathoth ('Anâta), near Jerus; yet the advance ceased at Nob (cf Neh 11 32) where, as before noted, the first glimpse of Zion would be caught if Nob was at or near Mizpah (Tell en Naşbeh), on the main north road leading W. of Ramah.

Another passage refers to the towns of Moab (Isa 15 1-6), and to Nimrim (Tell Nimrîn) and Zoar (Tell esh Shâghâr) in the valley of Shittim. The ascent of Luhith (ver 5) is the present Tal'at el Heith, on the southern slope of Nebo (Jebel Neba). The curious term "a heifer of three years old" (cf Jer 48 34 m) is taken from LXX, but might better be rendered "a round place with a group of three" (see EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH). It is noticed with the "high places" of Moab (Isa 15 2; Jer 48 35), and probably refers to one of those large and ancient stone circles, surrounding a central group of three rude pillars, which still remain in Moab (SEP, I, 187, 203, 233) near Nebo and Zoar. Sibmah—probably ostrich want of care for her young, because she endeavors (like other birds) to escape, and thus draws away the hunter from the nest. This verse should not be regarded as showing that the author knew that whales were mammals, since the word "sea-monsters" (AV) is more correctly rendered "jackals" (RV) or "wild beasts."

In Ezk (ch 27), Tyre appears as a city with a very widespread trade extending from Asia Minor to Arabia and Egypt, and from Assyria

3. Ezekiel to the isles (or "coasts") of the Mediterranean. The "oaks of Bashan" (27 6; Isa 2 13; Zec 11 2) are still found in the S.W. of that region near Gilead. Judah and Israel then provided wheat, honey, oil and balm for export as in the time of Jacob. Damascus sent white wool and the wine of Helbon (Helbôn), 13 miles N., where fine vineyards still exist. The northern border described (47 15-18) is the same that marked that of the dominions of David, running along the Eleutherus River toward Zedad (Şûdûd). It is described also in Nu 34 8-11 as passing Riblah (Riblah) and including Ain (el 'Ain), a village on the western slopes of the Anti-Lebanon, E. of Riblah. In this passage (as in Ezk 47 18) the Hauran (or Bashan plain) is excluded from the land of Israel, the border following the Jordan valley, which seems to point to a date earlier than the time when the Havvoth-jair (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Josh

13 30; Jgs 10 4; 1 K 4 13; 1 Ch 2 23), in Gilead and Bashan, were conquered or built—possibly after the death of Joshua. The southern border of the land is described by Ezekiel (47 19) as reaching from Kadesh (-barnea)—probably Petra—to Tamar, which seems to be Tamrah, 6 miles N.E. of Gaza.

In the Minor Prophets there are fewer topographical notices. Hosea (12 11) speaks of the altars of Gilead and Gilgal as being

4. Minor Prophets

“as heaps in the furrows of the fields.” He perhaps alludes to the large dolmen-fields of this region, which still characterize the country E. of the Jordan. He also perhaps speaks of human sacrifice at Bethel (13 2). In Joel (1 12) the apple tree (Heb tappūh, Arab. tuffāh) is noticed (cf Cant 2 3,5; 8 5), and there seems to be no reason to doubt that the apple was cultivated, since el Mukaddasi mentions “excellent apples” at Jerus in the 10th cent. AD, though it is not now common in Pal. The sycamore fig (Am 7 14), which was common in the plains and in the shephēlāh (1 K 10 27), grew also near Jericho (Lk 19 4), where it is still to be found. In Mic (1 10-15), a passage which appears to refer to Hezekiah’s reconquest of the shephēlāh towns and attack on Gaza before 702 BC (2 K 18 8; 2 Ch 28 18) gives a list of places and a play on the name of each. They include Gath (Tell es Sāfi), Saphir (es Sāfir), Lachish (Tell el-Hesi), Achzib (‘Ain Kezbeh), and Mareshah (Mer’ash): “the glory of Israel shall come even unto Adullam” (‘Aid-el-ma) perhaps refers to Hezekiah himself (Mic 1 15). After the captivity Philistia (Zec 9 5) was still independent. See PHILISTINES. The meaning of the “mourning of Hadadrimmon in the Valley of Megiddon” (Zec 12 11) is disputed. Jerome (see Reland, Pal Illustr., II, 891) says that the former of these names referred to a town near Jezreel (Maximianopolis, now Rum-māneh, on the western side of the plain of Esdraelon), but the mourning, “for an only son” was probably a rite of the Syrian god called Hadad, or otherwise Rimmon, like the mourning for Tammuz (Ezk 8 14).

VI. Palestine in the Apocrypha.—The Book of Jth is regarded by Renan (Evangelies, 1877, 29) as a Haggādāh or legend, written in Heb in 74 AD. It is remarkable, however, that its geographical allusions are very correct.

1. Book of Judith

Judith was apparently of the tribe of Manasseh (8 23); and her husband, who bore this name, was buried between Dothaim (Tell Dothan) and Balamon (in Wādī Belameh), E. of Dothan. Her home at Bethulia was thus probably at Mithlieh, on a high hill (6 11,12), 5 miles S.E. of Dothan (SWP, II, 156), in the territory of Manasseh. The requirements of the narrative are well met; for this village is supplied only by wells (7 13,20), though there are springs at the foot of the hill to the S. (7 7,12), while there is a good view over the valley to the N. (10 10), and over the plain of Esdraelon to Nazareth and Tabor. Other mountains surround the village (15 3). The camp of the invaders reached from Dothan to Belmalm (Balamon) from W. to E., and their rear was at Cyamon (Tell Keimān), at the foot of Carmel. The Babylonians were allied with tribes from Carmel, Gilead and Galilee on the N. with the Samaritans, and with others from Betane (probably Beth-anoth, now Beit ‘Ainān, N. of Hebron), Chellus (Kialash—the later Elusa—8 miles S.W. of Beersheba), and Kades (‘Ain Kadis) on the way to Egypt. Among Samaritan towns S. of Shechem, Ekrebel (‘Akrah) and Chusi (Kāzah) are mentioned, with “the brook Mochmur” (Wādī el Humr) rising N. of Ekrebel and running E. into the Jordan.

The philosophical Book of Wisd has no references to Pal; and in Eccles the only allusions are to the palm of En-gaddi (24 14), where palms still exist, and to the “rose plant in Jericho” (24 14; cf 39 13; 50 8); the description of the rose as “growing by the brook in the field” suggests the rhododendron (Tristram, NHB, 477), which flourishes near the Jordan and grows to great size beside the brooks of Gilead.

Judas Maccabaeus.—The first Book of Macc is a valuable history going down to 135 BC, and its geographical allusions are sometimes important. Modin, the home of Judas Maccabaeus (2 15), where his brother Simon erected seven monuments visible from the sea (9 19; 13 25-30), was above the plain in which Cedron (Katrah, 5 miles E. of Jamnia) stood (15 40,41 16 4,9), and is clearly the present village el Midich on the low hills with a sea view, 17 miles from Jerus and 6 miles E. of Lydda, near which latter Eusebius (Onom s.v. “Modem”) places Modin. The first victory of Judas (3 24) was won at Beth-horon, and the second at Emmaus (Amuda) by the Valley of Aljalon—the scenes of Joshua’s victories also.

The Greeks next attempted to reach Jerus from the S. and were again defeated at Beth-zur (4 29), now Beit-zūr, on the watershed, 15 miles S. of Jerus, where the road runs through a pass. Judas next (after cleansing the temple in 165 BC) marched S. of the Dead Sea, attacking the Edomites at Arabattine (perhaps Akrahbim) and penetrating to the Moab plateau as far N. as Jazar (5 3-8). On his return to Judaea the heathen of Gilead and Bashan rose against the Israelites of Tubias (ver 13) or Tob (Taiyibeh), and the Phoenicians against the Galilean Hebrews who were, for a time, withdrawn to Jerus until the Hasmoneans won complete independence (11 7,59). In the regions of Northern Gilead and Southern Bashan (5 26,36,37) Judas conquered Bosor (Busr), Alema (Kefr el-ma), Casphon (Khisfn), Maged (perhaps el Mejd, N. of Ammān), and Carnaim (Ash-teroth-karnaim), now Tell ‘Ashterah. The notice of a “brook” at the last-named place (ver 42) is an interesting touch, as a fine stream runs S. from the west side of the town. In 162 BC Judas was defeated at Bathzacharias (6 32), now Beit Skāria, 9 miles S. of Jerus, but the cause was saved by a revolt in Antioch; and in the next year he defeated Nicanor near Caphar-salama (perhaps Selmeh, near Joppa), and slew him at Adasah (‘Adaseh), 8 miles S.E. of Beth-horon (7 31,40,45). The fatal battle in which Judas was killed (9 5,15) was fought also near Beth-horon. He camped at Eleasa (‘Ilasa), close by, and defeated the Greeks on his right, driving them to Mt. ‘Azotus (or Beth-zetho, according to Jos [Ant. XII, xi, 2]), apparently near Bit-er-Zeit, 4 miles N.W. of Bethel; but the Greeks on his left surrounded him during this rash pursuit.

On the death of Judas, Bacchides occupied Judaea and fortified the frontier towns (9 50,51) on all sides. Simon and Jonathan were driven to the marshes near the Jordan, but in 159 BC the Greeks made peace with Jonathan who returned to Michmash (ver 73) and 7 years later to Jerus (10 1,7). Three districts on the southern border of Samaria were then added to Judaea (10 30; 11 34), namely Lydda, Apherema (or Ephraim) now Taiyibeh, and Ramathem (er-Rām); and Jonathan defeated the Greeks in Philistia (10 69; 11 6). Simon was “captain” from the “Ladder of Tyre” (Rās en Nakūrah), or the pass N. of Accho, to the borders of Egypt (11 59); and the Greeks in Upper Galilee were again defeated by Jonathan, who advanced from Genesaret to the plain of Hazor (Hazzūr), and pursued them even to Kedesh Naphtali (Kedes), northward (vs 63,73). He was victorious even to the borders of Hamath, and the Eleutherus River (Nahr el Kebir), N. of Tripolis, and defeated the Arabs, called Zabadeans (probably at Zeb-dāny in Anti-Lebanon), on his way to Damascus (12 25,30,32). He fortified Adida (Haditheh) in the shephēlāh (ver 38), W. of Jerus, where Simon awaited the Gr usurper Tryphon (13 13,20), who attempted to reach Jerus by a long détour to the S. near Adoraim (Dāra), but failed on account of the snow in the mountains. After the treacherous capture of Jonathan at Accho, and his death in Gilead (12 48; 13 23), Simon became the ruler of all Pal to Gaza (13 43), fortifying Joppa, Gezer and Ashdod (14 34) in 140 BC. Five years later he won a final victory at Cedron (Katrah), near Jamnia (Yebnah), but was murdered at Dok (16 15), near Jericho, which site was a small fort at ‘Ain Dūk, a spring N. of the city.

The second Book of Macc presents a contrast to the first in which, as we have seen, the geography is easily understood. Thus the site of Caspis with its lake (12 13,16) is doubtful. It seems to be placed in Idumaea, and Charax may be the fortress of Kerah in Moab (ver 17). Ephron, W. of Ashteroth-karnaim (vs 26,27), is unknown; and Beth-shean is called by its later name Scythopolis (ver 29), as in the LXX (Jgs 1 27) and in Jos (Ant. XII, viii 5; vi, 1). A curious passage (13 4-6) seems to refer to the Pers burial towers (still used by Parsees), one of which appears to have existed at Berea (Aleppo), though this was not a Gr custom. See ASMONEANS.

4. 2 Macca-bees

VII. Palestine in the NT.—We are told that Our Lord was born in “Bethlehem of Judaea”; and the theory of Neubauer, adopted by

1. Synoptic Gospels (Josh 19 15)—which was the present Beit-Lahm, 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth—is to be understood, is based on a mistake. The Jews expected the Messiah to appear in the home of David (Mic 5 2); and the Northern Bethlehem was not called "of Nazareth," as asserted by Rix (Tent and Testament, 258); this was a conjectural reading by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm., 189), but the Talm (Talm Jerus, M'ghillah 1 1) calls the place Bethlehem-s'rîdh (or "of balm"), no doubt from the storax bush (Styrax officinalis) or stacte (Ex 30 34), the Arab. 'abhar, which still abounds in the oak wood close by.

(1) Galilean scenery.—The greater part of the life of Jesus was spent at Nazareth in Zebulun, and the ministry at Capernaum in Naphtali (cf Mt 4 13-15; Isa 9 1), with yearly visits to Jerus. The Gospel narratives and the symbolism of the parables constantly recall the characteristic features of Galilean scenery and nature, as they remain unchanged today. The "city set on a hill" (Mt 5 14) may be seen in any part of Pal; the lilies of the field grow in all its plains; the "foxes have holes" and the sparrows are still eaten; the vineyard with its tower; the good ploughland, amid stony and thorny places, are all still found throughout the Holy Land. But the deep lake surrounded by precipitous cliffs and subject to sudden storms, with its shoals of fish and its naked fishers; the cast nets and drag nets and small heavy boats of the Sea of Galilee, are more distinctive of the Gospels, since the lake is but briefly noticed in the OT.

(2) Nazareth was a little village in a hill plateau N. of the plain of Esdraelon, and 1,000 ft. above it.

Plowing near Nazareth.

The name (Heb nāṣārāh) may mean "verdant," and it had a fine spring, but it is connected (Mt 2 23) in the Gospels with the prophecy of the "branch" (nēcer, Isa 11 1) of the house of David. Its population was Hebrew, for it possessed a synagogue (Lk 4 16). The "brow of the hill whereon their city was built" (4 29) is traditionally the "hill of the leap" (Jebel Kaṣṣi), 2 miles to the S.—a cliff overlooking the plain. Nazareth was not on any great highway; and so obscure was this village that it is unnoticed in the OT, or by Jos, while even a Galilean (Jn 1 46) could hardly believe that a prophet could come thence. Jerome (Onom s.v.) calls it a "village"; but today it is a town with 4,000 Christians and 2,000 Moslems, the former taking their Arab. name (Naṣārāh) from the home of their Master.

(3) Capernaum (Mt 4 13; 9 1) lay on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, apparently (Mt 14 34; Jn 6 17) in the little plain of Gennesaret, which stretches for 3 miles on the northwest side of the lake, and which has a breadth of 2 miles. It may have stood on a low cliff (though this is rendered doubtful by the Sin. MS rendering of Mt 11 23—"Shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?"), and it was a military station where taxes were levied (9 9), and possessed a synagogue (Mk 1 21; Lk 4 33; Jn 6 59). Christian tradition, since the 4th cent. AD, has placed the site at Tell Hām, where ruins of a synagogue (probably, however, not older than the 2d cent. AD) exist; but this site is not in the plain of Gennesaret, and is more probably K'phar 'Aḥīm (Talm Bab, M'nāḥōth 85a). Jewish tradition (Midhrash Kōheleth, vii.20) connects Capernaum with mīnīm or "heretics"—that is to say Christians—whose name may yet linger at 'Ain Minyeh at the north end of the plain of Gennesaret. Jos states (BJ, III, x, 8) that the spring of Capernaum watered this plain, and contained the catfish (coracinus) which is still found in 'Ain el Mudawverah ("the round spring"), which is the principal source of water in the Gennesaret oasis.

(4) The site of Chorazin (Kerāzeh) has never been lost. The ruined village lies about 2½ miles N. of Tell Hām and possesses a synagogue of similar character. Bethsaida ("the house of fishing") is once said to have been in Galilee (Jn 12 21), and Reland (Pal Illustr., II, 553-55) thought that there were two towns of the name. It is certain that the other notices refer to Bethsaida, called Julias by Herod Philip, which Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; iv, 6; BJ, III, x, 7) and Pliny (NH, v.15) place E. of the Jordan, near the place where it enters the Sea of Galilee. The site may be at the ruin ed Dikkeh ("the platform"), now 2 miles N. of the lake, but probably nearer of old, as the river deposit has increased southward. There are remains of a synagogue here also. The two miracles of feeding the 5,000 and the 4,000 are both described as occurring E. of the Jordan, the former (Lk 9 10) in the desert (of Golan) "belonging to the city called Bethsaida" (AV). The words (Mk 6 45 AV), "to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida," may be rendered without any straining of grammar, "to go to the side opposite to Bethsaida." For the disciples are not said to have reached that city; but, after a voyage of at least 3 or 4 miles (Jn 6 17.19), they arrived near Capernaum, and landed in Gennesaret (Mk 6 53), about 5 miles S.W. of the Jordan.

(5) The place where the swine rushed down a steep place into the lake (Mt 8 32; Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26) was in the country of the Gerasenes (see Vat. MS), probably at Kersa on the eastern shore opposite Tiberias, where there is a steep slope to the water. It should be noted that this was in Decapolis (Mk 5 20), a region of "ten cities" which lay (except Scythopolis) in Southwest Bashan, where a large number of early Gr inscriptions have been found, some of which (e.g. Vogüé-Waddington, nos. 2412, 2413) are as old as the 1st cent. AD. There was evidently a Gr population in this region in the time of Our Lord; and this accounts for the feeding of swine, otherwise distinctive of "a far country" (Lk 15 13.15); for, while no Hebrew would have tended the unclean beast in Pal, the Greeks were swineherds from the time at least of Homer.

(6) The site of Magadan-Magdala (Mejdel) was on the west shore at the S.W. end of the Genesaret plain (Mt 15 39). In Mk 8 10 we find Dalmanutha instead. Magdala was the Heb mighdöl ("tower"), and Dalmanutha may be regarded as the Aram. equivalent (D'almānūthā) meaning "the place of high buildings"; so that there is no necessary discrepancy between the two accounts. From this place Jesus again departed by ship to "the other side," and reached Bethsaida (Mt 16 5; Mk 8 13.22), traveling thence up the Jordan valley to Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16 13; Mk 8 27), or Bāniās, at the Jordan springs. There can be little doubt that the "high mountain apart" (Mt 17 1) was Hermon. The very name signifies "separate," applying to its solitary dome; and the sudden formation of cloud on the summit seems to explain the allusion in Lk 9 34.

(7) Other allusions in the Synoptic Gospels, referring to natural history and customs, include the notice of domestic fowls (Mt 23 37; 26 34), which are never mentioned in the OT. They came from Persia, and were introduced probably after 400 BC. The use of manure (Lk 13 8) is also unnoticed in the OT, but is mentioned in the Mish (Sh'bi'ith, ii.2), as is the custom of annually whitening sepulchers (Mt 23 27; Sh'kalim, i.1). The removal of a roof (Mk 2 4; cf Lk 5 19) at Capernaum was not difficult, if it resembled those of modern Galilean mud houses, though the Third Gospel speaks of "tiles" which are not now used. Finally, the presence of shepherds with their flocks (Lk 2 8) is not an indication of the season of the nativity, since they remain with them "in the field" at all times of the year; and the "manger" (Lk 2 7) may have been (as tradition affirmed even in the 2d cent. AD) in a cave like those which have been found in ruins N. and S. of Hebron (SWP, III, 349, 369) and elsewhere in Pal.

(1) The topography of the Fourth Gospel is important as indicating the writer's personal knowledge of Pal; for he mentions several

2. Fourth Gospel places not otherwise noticed in the NT. Beth-abarah (Jn 1 28, RV "Bethany", 10 40), or "the house of the crossing," was "beyond the Jordan." Origen rejected the reading "Bethania," instead of Beth-abarah, common in his time, and still found in the three oldest uncial MSS in the 4th and 5th cents. AD. The place was a day's journey from Cana (cf Jn 1 29.35.43; 2 1), which may have been at Ain Kānā, a mile N. of Nazareth. It was two or three days' distance from Bethany near Jerus (Jn 10 40; 11 3.6.17), and would thus lie in the upper part of the Jordan valley where, in 1874, the surveyors found a ford well known by the name 'Abārah, N. of Beisān, in the required situation. John, we are told, baptized in "all the region round about the Jordan" (Mt 3 5), including the waters of "Ænon near to Salim" (Jn 3 23). There is only one stream which answers to this description, namely that of Wādī Fār'ah, N.E. of Shechem, on the boundary of Judaea and Samaria, where there is "much water." Ænon would be 'Ainān, 4 miles N., and Salim is Salīm, 4 miles S. of this perennial affluent of the Jordan.

(2) The site of Sychar (Sam Iskar, Arab. 'Askar) near Jacob's well (Jn 4 5.6) lay W. of Salim, and just within the Sam border. The present village is only half a mile N. of the well. Like the preceding sites, it is noticed only in the Fourth Gospel, as is Bethesda, while this Gospel also gives additional indications as to the position of Calvary. The town of Ephraim, "near to the wilderness" (11 54), is noticed earlier (2 S 13 23; cf Ephraim, 2 Ch 13 19 m), and appears to be the same as Apherema (1 Macc 11 34), and as Ophrah of Benjamin (Josh 18 23; 1 S 13 17). Eusebius (Onom s.v.) places it 20 Rom miles N. of Jerus, where the village Taiyibeh looks down on the desert of Judah.

In the Book of Acts the only new site, unnoticed before, is that of Antipatris (23 31). This stood at the head of the stream (Me-jarkon) which runs thence to the sea N. of Joppa, and it was thus the half-way station between Jerus and the sea-side capital at Caesarea. The site is now called Rās el 'Ain ("head of the spring"), and a castle, built in the 12th cent., stands above the waters. The old Rom road runs close by (SWP, II, 258). Caesarea was a new town, founded by Herod the Great about 20 BC (SWP, II, 13-29). It was even larger than Jerus, and had an artificial harbor. Thence we may leave Pal with Paul in 60 AD. The reader must judge whether this study of the country does not serve to vindicate the sincerity and authenticity of Bible narratives in the OT and the NT alike.

LITERATURE.—Though the lit. connected with Pal is enormous, and constantly increasing, the number of really original and scientific sources of knowledge is (as in other cases) not large. Besides the Bible, and Jos, the Mish contains a great deal of valuable information as to the cultivation and civilization of Pal about the 1st and 2d cents. AD. The following 20 works are of primary importance. The Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome shows intimate acquaintance with Pal in the 4th cent. AD, though the identification of Bible sites is as often wrong as right. The rabbinical geography is discussed by A. Neubauer (La géographie du Talmud, 1868), and the scattered notices by Gr and Rom writers were collected by H. Reland (Palæstina ex monumentis veteribus illustrata, 2 vols, 1714). The first really scientific account of the country is that of Dr. E. Robinson (Bib. Researches, 1838, and Later Bib. Researches, 1852; in 3 vols, 1856). The Survey of Western Pal (7 vols, 1883) includes the present writer's account of the natural features, topography and surface remains of all agcs, written while in command (1872-78) of the 1-inch trigonometric survey. The Survey of Eastern Pal (1 vol, 1889) gives his account of Moab and Southern Gilcad, as surveyed in 1881-82. The natural history is to be studied in the same series, and in Canon Tristram's Natural History of the Bible, 1868. The geology is best given by L. Lartet (Essai sur la géologie de la Palestine) and in Professor Hull's Memoir on the Geol. and Geog. of Arabia Petraea, etc, 1886. The Archæological Researches of M. Clermont-Ganneau (2 vols, 1896) include his discoveries of Gezer and Adullam. Much information is scattered through the PEFQ (1864-1910) and in ZDPV. G. Schumacher's Across the Jordan, 1885, Pella, 1888, and Northern 'Ajlān, 1890, give detailed information for Northeast Pal; and Lachish, by Professor Flinders Petrie, is the memoir of the excavations which he began at Tell el-Hesi (identified in 1874 by the present writer), the full account being in A Mound of Many Cities by F. J. Bliss, 1894. Other excavations, at Gath, etc, are described in Excavations in Pal (1898-1900), by F. J. Bliss, R. A. S. Macalister, and Professor Wünsch; while the memoir of his excavations at Gezer (2 vols) has recently been published by Professor Macalister. For those who have not access to these original sources, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land by Professor G. A. Smith, 1894, and the essay (300 pp.) by Professor D. F. Buhl (Géographie des alten Palästina, 1896) will be found useful. The best guide book to Pal is still that of Baedeker, written by Dr. A. Socin and published in 1876^s, 1912. This author had personal acquaintance with the principal routes of the country. Only standard works of reference have been herein mentioned, to which French, German, American, and British explorers and scholars have alike contributed. See JERUSALEM.

LITERATURE

Previous to the last century, almost the entire stock of knowledge concerning ancient Pal, including its races, laws, languages, history and manners, was obtained from Jos and the Bible, with a few brief additional references given by Gr and Rom authors; knowledge concerning modern Pal was limited to the reports of chance travelers. The change has been due largely to the compelling interest taken in sacred history and the "Holy Oracles." This smallest country in the world has aroused the spirit of exploration as no other country has or could. It has largely stimulated many of the investigations carried on in other lands.

1. Era of Preparation.—Much direct information concerning ancient Pal, absolutely essential to the success of modern exploration in that

1. Outside land, has come through discoveries of Palestine in other countries; but due in many cases to Bib. influence. All the most important Heb and Gr MSS and VSS of the Bible and most of the Jewish Talm and apocryphal and Wisdom books were found outside of Pal. The pictures of its population, cities, fortresses and armies give a color and perspective to its ancient history far more vivid than can be found on any of its own contemporary monuments. The records of Thothmes III (15th cent. BC) describing the capture of Megiddo in the plain of Esdraelon with its vast stores of "chariots wrought with gold," bronze armor, silver and ebony statues, ivory and ebony furniture, etc., and of his further capture of 118 other Can. towns, many of which are well known from the Bible, and from which he takes an enormous tribute of war materials, golden ornaments and golden dishes, "too many to be weighed," find no parallel in any indigenous record—such records even if written having been doomed to perish because of the soil, climate and character of the rocks W. of the Jordan. So c 1400 BC, the Am Tab (discovered in 1887) mention by name many Bib. cities, and give much direct information concerning the political and social conditions at that period, with at least 6 letters from the governor of Jerus, who writes to the Pharaoh news that the Egyp fleet has left the coast, that all the neighboring cities have been lost to Egypt, and that Jerus will be lost unless help can be had quickly against the invasion of the Khabiri. The literature of the XIXth Dynasty contains many Heb names with much information concerning Goshen, Pithom, Canaan, etc., while in one huge stele of Menephtah the Israelites are mentioned by name. Later Egyp Pharaohs give almost equally important knowledge concerning Pal, while the Assyrian texts are even more direct. The black obelisk of Shalmaneser II (9th cent.) catalogues and pictures the tribute received from Jehu; almost every king of the 8th cent. tells something of his relations with the rulers of Jerus or Damascus, throwing immense light on local politics, and the later Bab records give vividly the conditions previous to and during the exile, while the edict of Cyrus gives the very decree by virtue of which the Jews could return to their native land. Later discoveries, like the CH at Susa (1901), the Sendjirli and other Aram. texts from Northern Syria (1890, 1908), and the Elephantine papyri, some of which are addressed to the "sons of Sanballat" and describe a temple in Egypt erected to Yahu (Jehovah) in the 5th cent. BC, may not give direct information concerning Pal, but are important to present explorers because of the light thrown upon the laws of Pal in patriarchal times; upon the thought and language of a neighboring Sem community at the time of the Monarchy; upon the religious ritual and festivals of Nehemiah's day, and upon the general wealth and culture of the Jews of the 5th cent.; opening up also for the first time the intimate relations which existed between Jerus and Samaria and the Jews of the Dispersion. So the vast amounts of Gr papyri found recently in the Fayyūm not only have preserved the "Logia" and "Lost Gospels" and fragments of Scripture texts, early Christian Egyp ritual, etc., but have given to scholars for the first time contemporaneous examples of the colloquial language which the Jews of Pal were using in the 1st cent. AD, and in which they wrote the "memoirs" of the apostles and the Gospels of Jesus.

(1) Early Christian period.—At this time, during the first three or four centuries the ancient sites and holy places were identified, giving some valuable information as to the topographical memories of the earlier church. By far the most valuable of these carefully prepared summaries of ancient Bible places, with their modern sites, and the distances between them, was the Onomasticon of Eusebius, as it was enlarged by Jerome, which attempted seriously the identification of some 300 holy places, most of these being vitally important for the modern student of the Bible. While some of these identifications were "curiously incorrect" (Bliss) and the distances even at the best only approximate, yet few satisfactory additions were made to the list for 1,500 years; and it was certainly a splendid contribution to Palestinian topography, for the list as a whole has been confirmed by the scientific conclusions of recent investigators.

(2) Period of cursory observation.—The earliest traveler who has left a record of his journey into Pal was Sinuhit, who, perhaps a century after Abraham, mentions a number of places known to us from the Bible and describes Canaan as a "land of figs and vines, . . . where wine was more plentiful than water, . . . honey and oil in abundance . . . all kinds of fruit upon its trees, barley and spelt in the fields, and cattle beyond number"; each day his table is laden with "bread, wine, cooked flesh and roasted fowl . . . wild game from the hills and milk in every sort of cooked dish" (Breasted, Ancient Records, I, 496). A few other Egyp visitors (1300–1000 BC) add little to our knowledge. The report of the Heb spies (Nu 13) records important observations, although they can only humorously be called "genuine explorers" (Bliss), and Joshua's list of cities and tribes, although their boundaries are carefully described (chs 13–21), are naturally excluded from this review.

The record of early Christian travel begins with the Bordeaux Pilgrim (332 AD), and during the next two centuries scores of others write out their observations in the Holy Land, but for 1,000 years there is scarcely a single visitor who looks at the country except through the eyes of the monks. A woman traveler of the 4th cent. reports some interesting facts about the early ritual of the Jerus church and the catechumen teaching, and surprises us by locating Pithom correctly (although the site was totally forgotten and only recovered in 1883), and the Epitome of Eucherius (5th cent.) gives a clear description of the holy places in Jerus; but almost the only other significant sign that anyone at this era ever made serious observations of value comes from the very large, fine mosaic of the 5th cent. recently discovered at Madeba, which gives a good impression of ancient Jerus with its buildings, and a careful bird's-eye view of the surrounding country (see below II, 3). By the middle of the 6th cent. the old "Holy Places" were covered by churches, while new ones were manufactured or discovered in dreams, and relics of martyrs' bones began to engross so much attention that no time was left in which to make any ordinary geographical or natural-history observations. A little local color and a few facts in regard to the plan of early churches and the persecution of Christians by Moslems constitute almost the sum total of value to be gathered from the multitude of pilgrims between the 6th and 12th cents. In the 12th cent. John of Würzburg gives a few geographical notes of value; Theoderich notices certain inscriptions and tombs, describes accurately the churches and hospitals he visits, with their pictures and decorations, and outlines intelligently the boundaries of Judaea and the salient features of the mountains encompassing Jerus; the Abbot Daniel notices the wild beasts in the Jordan forests and the customs at church feasts, and his account is important because of the light it throws on conditions in Pal just after its conquest by the Crusaders, while in the 13th cent. Burchard of Mt. Zion makes the earliest known mediaeval map of Pal, mentions over 100 Scripture sites, and shows unexpected interest in the plant and animal life of the country—but this practically exhausts the valuable information from Christian sources in these centuries. The Moslem pilgrims and writers from the 9th to the 15th cents. show far more regard to geographical realities than the Christians. It is a Moslem, Istakhri, who in the 10th cent. makes the first effort at a systematic geography of Pal, and in the 10th and 13th cents., respectively, Mukaddasi, after 20 years of preparation, and Yāqūt, in a "vast work," publish observations concerning climate, native customs, geographical divisions, etc., which are yet valuable, while Naṣir-i-Khusran, in the 11th cent., also gave important information concerning Palestinian botany, gave dimensions of buildings and gates, and even noticed to some extent the ancient arches and ruins—though in all these there are pitiful inaccuracies of observation and induction. One of the best Moslem writers thinks the water of Lake Tiberias is not fit to drink because the city sewerage has ceased to flow into it, and Christian writers from the 7th cent. down to modern times continually mention the Jor and Dan as two fountains from which the Jordan rises, and continually report the most absurd stories about the Dead Sea and about its supernatural saltness, never noticing the salt mountain near by and the other simple causes explaining this phenomenon. See DEAD SEA.

In the 14th cent. Marino Sanuto gave a "most complete monograph" (Ritter) of Palestinian geography, his maps being really valuable, though, according to modern standards, quite inaccurate. The Jew, Estioi ben Moses ha-Phorhi, in this same century advanced beyond all Christian writers in a work of "real scientific knowledge" (Bliss), in which he correctly identified Megiddo and other ancient sites, though the value of his work was not recognized for 400 years. The great name of the 15th cent. is that of the Dominican, Father Felix Fabri, who in his large book, Wanderings in the Holy Land, was the first to notice monuments and ruins to which no Bib. traditions were attached (Bliss), and who, within a decade of the discovery of America, described most vividly the dangers and miseries of the sea voyages of that era, and in most modern fashion narrated his adventures among the Saracens; yet notwithstanding the literary value of the book and his better method of arranging his materials, Fabri actually explained the saltness of the Dead Sea as due to the sweat which flowed from the skin of the earth! In the 16th cent. travelers showed more interest in native customs, but the false traditional identification of sites was scarcely questioned; the route of travel was always the same, as it was absolutely impossible to get E. of the Jordan, and even a short trip away from the caravan was dangerous.

(3) Beginning of scientific observation.—In the 17th cent. Michal Nau, for 30 years a missionary in Pal, De la Roque and Hallifax showed a truly scientific veracity of observation and an increasing accuracy in the recording and verification of their notes, and Maundrell advanced beyond all his predecessors in noticing the antiquities on the seacoast, N. of Beirūt; but all of these, though possessing fine qualities as explorers, were forced to travel hastily and limit their study to a very narrow field.

II. Era of Scientific Exploration.—(1) First trained explorers.—True scientific exploration opened with the 18th cent., as men began to think of this as itself an important life-work and not merely as a short episode in a life devoted to more serious pursuits.

1. Period of Individual Enterprise Th. Shaw (1722) carefully fitted himself as a specialist in natural history and physical geography, and scientifically reported a number of new facts, e.g. conditions and results of evaporation, etc. in the Dead Sea. - Bishop Pococke (1738) had been well trained, was free from the bondage of tradition, and did for the antiquities of Pal what Maundrell had done for those of Syria, making a large number of successful identifications of sites and contributing much to the general knowledge of Pal. Volney (1783) was a brilliant literary man, in full sympathy with the scientific spirit, who popularized results and made a considerable number of original researches, esp. in the Lebanon. Seetzen (1800-7) and Burckhardt (1810-12) are called by Bliss "veritable pioneers in the exploration of the ruins of Eastern and Southern Pal." The former opened Caesarea Philippi to light, visited a large unexplored district and made important observations in almost every field of knowledge, zoology, meteorology, archaeology; the latter, having become an Arab in looks and language, was able to go into many places where no European had ventured, one of his chief triumphs being the discovery of Petra and the scientific location of Mt. Sinai.

(2) The climax of individual exploration.—The climax of the era of scientific observation, unassisted by learned societies, was reached by the American clergyman and teacher, Edward Robinson. He spent parts of two years in Pal (1838 and 1852) and in 1856 published 3 vols. of Biblical Researches. He strictly employed the scientific method, and showed such rare insight that scarcely one of his conclusions has been found incorrect. His knowledge was as extensive as minute, and although he gave, in all, only five months of steady labor to the specific task of exploration, yet in that time he "reconstructed the map of Pal" (Bliss), and his conclusions henceforth "formed the ground work of modern research" (Conder). He studied Jerus, being the first to show that the ancient fragment of an arch (now "Robinson's") had been part of the bridge connecting the temple with Mt. Zion, and was the first to trace with accuracy the windings of the tunnel leading from the Virgin's Fount to the Pool of Siloam. All Judaea, Galilee and Samaria were very well covered by him. He was the first to notice that the ruined building at Tell Hām was a synagogue; from the top of one hill he recognized seven Bib. sites which had been lost for at least 1,500 years; he identified correctly at least 160 new sites, almost all being Bib. places. Robinson's results were phenomenal in number and variety, yet necessarily these have been constantly improved upon or added to in each generation since, for no man can cover the entire field or be a specialist in every department. W. M. Thomson in his LB (new ed. 1910) and G. E. Post, Flora of Syria, Pal, and Sinai (1896), gave a needed popular résumé of the manners, customs and folklore of the people, as these illustrated the Bible, and many books and articles since have added to this material.

In 1848 the United States sent an expedition under Lieutenant Lynch to the Dead Sea, which ascertained the exact width, depth, currents, temperature, etc., and many parties since have added to this knowledge (see e.g. DEAD SEA; and also PEFS, 1911, XII, 7). From 1854 to 1862 De Vogüé thoroughly examined the monuments of Central Syria and remained the sole authority on this section down to the American Archaeological Expedition of 1899. Taber (1845-63) scientifically described Jerus and its environs, and the districts lying between Jaffa and the Jordan, and between Jerus and Bethel. Guérin who studied Pal during periods covering 23 years (1852-75), though limited by lack of funds, covered topographically, with a minuteness never before attempted, almost the whole of Judaea, Samaria and Galilee, gathering also many new records of monuments and inscriptions, the record of which was invaluable because many of these had been completely destroyed before the arrival of the next scientific party. A most sensational discovery was that of Rev. F. Klein in 1868, when he found at Dibon the huge basalt tablet set up by Mesha, king of Moab (9th cent. BC), on which in a language closely resembling the Heb., he gave honor to his god Chemosh by describing his successful revolt against a successor of Omri, the latter being mentioned by name with many well-known Bib. places. In style, thought and language this inscription greatly resembles the early OT records.

With the foundation of the Palestine Exploration Fund (1865) the work of exploration took on an entirely new phase, since in this case,

2. Scientific not a single individual, but a large Coöperative company of specialists entered the Surface Ex- work, having behind them sufficient ploration funds for adequate investigation in each necessary line of research, and with the British War Office furnishing its expert Royal Engineers to assist the enterprise. Under the auspices of this society during the next 15 years Jerus was explored as never before, and all Western Pal was topographically surveyed (see below); a geological survey (1883-84) of Sinai, Wady Arabah and the Dead Sea, and later of Mt. Seir (1885) was accomplished under Professor Edward Hull; the natural history of the country was treated with great thoroughness by several specialists; Palmer and Drake in the dress of Syrian natives, without servants, risked the dangerous journey through the Desert of the Tih in order to locate so far as possible the route of the Exodus; Clermont-Ganneau, who had previously made the discovery of the Jewish placard from the Temple, forbidding strangers to enter the sacred enclosure, added greatly to archaeological knowledge by gathering and deciphering many ancient inscriptions, uncovering buried cemeteries, rock-cut tombs and other monuments. He also laid down important criteria for the age of stone masonry (yet see PEFS, 1897, LXI); identified various sites including Adullam, found the "stone of Bethphage," "Zohemoth," etc., and made innumerable plans of churches, mosques, tombs, etc., and did an incredible amount of other important work. Capt., afterward Col., C. R. Conder did an equally important work, and as the head of the archaeological party could finally report 10,000 place-names as having been gathered, and 172 new Bible sites successfully identified, while the boundaries of the tribes had been practically settled and many vitally important Bible locations for the first time fixed. The excavations in Jerus under the same auspices had meanwhile been carried out as planned. After an introductory examination by Sir Charles Wilson, including some little excavating, Sir Charles Warren (1867-70) and, later, Col. Conder (1872-75) made thorough excavations over a large area, sinking shafts and following ancient walls to a depth of 80-150 ft. They uncovered the Temple-area from its countless tons of debris and traced its approximate outline; examined underground rock chambers; opened ancient streets; discovered many thousand specimens of pottery, glass, tools, etc., from Jewish to Byzantine periods; found the pier in the Tyropœon Valley, where Robinson's arch had rested, and also parts of the ancient bridge; traced the line of several important ancient walls, locating gates and towers, and fixed the date of one wall certainly as of the 8th cent. BC, and probably of the age of Solomon (G. A. Smith), thus accomplishing an epoch-making work upon which all more recent explorers have safely rested—as Maudslay (1875), in his masterly discovery and examination of the Great Scarp, and Guthe (1881), who made fine additional discoveries at Ophel, as well as Warren and Conder in their work afterward (1884), when they published plans of the whole city with its streets, churches, mosques, etc., 25 in. to the mile, which in that direction remains a basis for all later work. See JERUSALEM.

Perhaps, however, the greatest work of all done by this society was the Topographical Survey (1881-86), accomplished for Judaea and Samaria by Col. Conder, and for Galilee by Lord Kitchener, resulting in a great map of Western Pal in 26 sheets, on a scale of an inch to the mile (with several abridged additions), showing all previous identifications of ancient places. These maps, with the seven magnificent vols of memoirs, etc., giving the other scientific work done by the various parties, marked such an epoch-making advance in knowledge that it has been called "the most important contribution to illustrate the Bible since its translation into the vulgar tongue."

In addition to the above the Palestine Exploration Fund established a Quarterly Statement and Society of Biblical Archaeology from which subscribers could keep in touch with the latest Bib. results, and published large quantities of trs of ancient texts and travels and of books reporting discoveries as these were made. Altogether more advance was made during these 15 years from 1865-80 than in the 15 centuries before.

The next ten years (1880-90) did not furnish as much new material from Pal exploration, but in

3. Most Recent Results in Surface Exploration 1880 the Siloam Inscription (cf 2 K 20 20; 2 Ch 32 30) was accidentally found in Jerus, showing the accuracy with which the engineers of Hezekiah's day could, at least occasionally, cut long tunnels through the rock (see also Clermont-Ganneau, Archaeological Researches, 313); and in 1881-85 Conder and Schumacher attempted their difficult task of making a scientific topographical map of Eastern Pal. In 1881 H. Clay Trumbull rediscovered and properly described Kadesh-barnea, settling authoritatively its location and thus making it possible to fix previously obscure places mentioned in the account of the Exodus wanderings. Since 1890 continued investigations in small districts not adequately described previously have taken place, new additions to the zoölogical, botanical, geological and meteorological knowledge of Pal have been frequent; studies of irrigation and the water-supply have been made, as well as investigations into the customs, proverbs, folklore, etc., of the Arabs; many districts E. of the Jordan and through Petra down into Sinai have yielded important results, and many discoveries of surface tombs, ossuaries, mosaics, seals and manuscripts have been made in many parts of Pal. This has been done perhaps chiefly by the Palestine Exploration Fund, but much by individuals and some by the newly organized excavation societies (see below). The most surprising discoveries made by this method of surface exploration (a method which can never become completely obsolete) have been the finding at different times of the four Boundary Stones of Gezer (1874, 1881, 1889) by Clermont-Ganneau, and, in 1896, of the very large mosaic at Madeba by Father Cleopas, librarian of the Greek Patriarch.

The latter proved to be part of the pavement of a 6th-cent. basilica and is a "veritable map of Pal," showing its chief cities, the boundaries of the tribes, and esp. the city of Jerus with its walls, gates, chief buildings, including the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and chief streets, notably one long straight street intersecting the city and lined with colonnades. As Madeba lies near the foot of Mt. Nebo, it is thought the artist may have intended to represent ideally a modern (6th-cent.) vision of Moses. George Adam Smith (HGHL, 7th ed, 1901); Jerusalem (2 vols, 1910), and E. Huntington, Pal and Its Transformation (1911), have given fine studies illustrating the supreme importance of accurate topographical knowledge in order to understand correctly the Bible narratives and the social life and politics of the Hebrews.

III. Era of Scientific Excavation.—(1) Tell el-Hesi (Palestine Exploration Fund).—Exploration must always continue, but excavation

1. Southern Palestine is a vast advance. The modern era in Palestinian study begins with Petrie at LACHISH (q.v.) in 1890. Though Renan was actually the first man to put a spade into the soil (1860), yet his results were practically confined to Phœnicia. From Renan's time to 1890 there had been no digging whatever, excepting some narrow but thorough work in Jerus, and a slight tickling of the ground at Jericho and at the so-called Tombs of the Kings. Nothing was more providential than this delay in beginning extensive excavations in Pal, such as had been previously so profitably conducted in Egypt and elsewhere. The results could not have been interpreted even two years earlier, and even when these excavations were commenced, the only man living who could have understood what he found was the man who had been selected to do the work. Nearly two centuries before, a traveler in Pal (Th. Shaw) had suggested the possibility of certain mounds ("tells") being artificial (cf Josh 8 28; Jer 30 18); but not even Robinson or Guérin had suspected that these were the cenotaphs of buried cities, but had believed them to be mere natural hills. The greatest hour in the history of exploration in Pal, and perhaps in any land, was that in which on a day in April, 1890, W. M. Flinders Petrie climbed up the side of Tell el-Hesi, situated on the edge of the Phili plain, c 30 miles S.W. of Jerus, and 17 miles

N.E. from Gaza, and by examining its strata, which had been exposed by the stream cutting down its side, determined before sunset the fact, from pieces of pottery he had seen, that the site marked a city covering 1,000 years of history, the limits of occupation being probably 1500 BC to 500 BC. This ability to date the several occupations of a site without any inscription to assist him was due to the chronological scale of styles of pottery which he had originated earlier and worked out positively for the Gr epochs at Naukratis a year or two before, and for the epochs preceding 1100 BC at Illahun in the Fayyám only a month or two before. The potsherds were fortunately very numerous at Tell el-Hesi, and by the end of his six weeks' work he could date approximately some eight successive occupations of the city, each of these being mutually exclusive in certain important forms of pottery in common use. Given the surface date, depth of accumulation and rate of deposit as shown at Lachish, and a pretty sure estimate of the history of other sites was available. Not only was this pottery scale so brilliantly confirmed and elaborated at Tell el-Hesi that all excavators since have been able accurately to date the last settlement on a mound almost by walking over it; but by observations of the methods of stone dressing he was able to rectify many former guesses as to the age of buildings and to establish some valuable architectural signs of age. He proved that some of the walls at this site were built by "the same school of masons which built the Temple of Solomon," and also that the Ionic volute, which the Greeks borrowed from the Asiatics, went back in Pal at least to the 10th cent. BC, while on one pilaster he found the architectural motif of the "ram's horn" (cf Ps 118 27). He also concluded, contrary to former belief, that this mound marked the site of Lachish (Josh 10 31; 2 K 18 14), as by a careful examination he found that no other ruins near could fill the known historic conditions of that city, and the inscription found by the next excavator and all more recent research make this conclusion practically sure. Lachish was a great fortress of the ancient world. The Egypt Pharaohs often mention it, and it is represented in a picture on an Assyrian monument under which is written, "Sennacherib . . . receives the spoil of Lachish" (see 2 K 18 14). It was strategically a strong position, the natural hill rising some 60 ft. above the valley and the fortification which Sennacherib probably attacked being over 10 ft. thick. The débris lay from 50-70 ft. deep on top of the hill. Petrie fixed the directions of the various walls, and settled the approximate dates of each city and of the imported pottery found in several of these. One of the most unexpected things was an iron knife dug up from a stratum indicating a period not far from the time when Israel must have entered Canaan, this being the earliest remnant of iron weapons ever found up to this date (cf Josh 17 16).

The next two years of scientific digging (1891-92), admirably conducted by Dr. F. G. Bliss on this site, wholly confirmed Petrie's general inductions, though the limits of each occupation were more exactly fixed and the beginning of the oldest city was pushed back to 1700 BC. The work was conducted under the usual dangers, not only from the Bedawín, but from excessive heat (104° in the shade), from malaria which at one time prostrated 8 of the 9 members of the staff, scarcity of water, which had to be carried 6 miles, and from the sirocco (see my report, PEFS, XXI, 160-70 and Petrie's and Bliss's journal, XXI, 219-46; XXIII, 192, etc.). He excavated thoroughly one-third of the entire hill, moving nearly a million cubic feet of débris. He found that the wall of the oldest city was nearly 30 ft. thick, that of the next city 17 ft. thick, while the latest wall was thin and weak. The oldest city covered a space 1,300 ft. sq., the latest one only about 200 ft. sq. The oldest pottery had a richer color and higher polish than the later, and this art was indigenous, for at this level no Phoen or Mycenaean styles were found. The late pre-Israelitish period (1550-800 BC) shows such importations and also local Cypriote imitations. In the "Jewish" period (800-300 BC) this influence is lost and the new styles are coarse and ungraceful, such degeneration not being connected with the entrance of Israel into Canaan, as many have supposed, but with a later period, most probably with the desolation which followed the exile of the ten tribes (Bliss and Petrie). In the pre-Israelite cities were found mighty towers, fine bronze implements, such as battle-axes, spearheads, bracelets, pins, needles, etc., a wine and treacle press, one very large building "beautifully symmetrical," a smelting furnace, and finally an inscribed tablet from Zimrida, known previously from the Am Tab to have been governor of Lachish, c 1400 BC. Many Jewish pit ovens were found in the later ruins and large quantities of pottery, some containing potters' marks and others with inscriptions. Clay figures of Astarte, the goddess of fertility, were found in the various layers, one of these being of the unique Cypriote type, with large earrings, and many Egypt figures, symbols and animal forms. See also LACHISH.

(2) Excavations in Jerus.—During 1894-97, notwithstanding the previously good work done in Jerus (see above) and the peculiar embarrassments connected with the attempt to dig in a richly populated town, Dr. Bliss, assisted by an expert architect, succeeded in adding considerably to the sum of knowledge. He excavated over a large area, not only positively confirming former inductions, but discovering the remains of the wall of the empress Eudocia (450 AD), and under this the line of wall which Titus had destroyed, and at a deeper level the wall which surrounded the city in the Herodian age, and deeper yet that which must probably be dated to Hezekiah, and below this a construction "exquisitely dressed, with pointed masonry," which must be either the remains of a wall of Solomon or some other preëxilic fortification not later than the 8th cent. He found gates and anciently paved streets and manholes leading to ancient sewer systems, and many articles of interest, but esp. settled disputed questions concerning important walls and the levels of the ancient hills, thus fixing the exact topography of the ancient city. H. G. Mitchell and others have also carefully examined certain lines of wall, identifying Nehemiah's Dung Gate, etc., and making a new survey of certain parts of underground Jerus, the results of the entire work being a modification of tradition in a few particulars, but confirmatory in most. The important springs and reservoirs, valleys and hills of the ancient Jerus have been certainly identified. It is now settled that modern Jerus "still sits virtually upon her ancient seat and at much the same slope," though not so large as the Jerus of the kings of Judah which certainly extended over the Southwestern Hill. Mt. Zion, contrary to tradition which located it on the Southwestern Hill where the citadel stands, probably lay on the Eastern Hill above the Virgin's Spring (Gihon). On this Eastern Hill at Ophel lay the Temple, and S. of the Temple on the same hill "above Gihon" lay the old Jebusite stronghold (David's City). The ancient altar of burnt offering was almost surely at es-Sakhra. The evidence has not been conclusive as to the line of the second wall, so that the site of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre cannot certainly be determined (see George Adam Smith's exhaustive work, Jerus, 2 vols, 1907; Sir Charles Wilson, Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre, 1906; and of Selah Merrill, Ancient Jerus, 1908; C. R. Conder, City of Jerus, 1909; P. H. Vincent, Underground Jerus, 1911).

(3) Excavations in the Shephelah (Palestine Exploration Fund).—During 1898–1900 important work was done by Bliss and Macalister at 4 sites on the border land between Philistia and Judaea, while five other small mounds were tunneled, but without important results. The four chief sites were Tell Zakariya, lying about midway between Jerus and Tell el-Hesi; Tell es Sāfi, 5 miles W. of Tell Zakariya, and Tell Sandahannah, about 10 miles S.; while Tell ej-Judeideh lay between Tell Zakariya and Tell Sandahannah. As Tell ej-Judeideh was only half-excavated and merely confirmed other results, not being remarkable except for the large quantity of jar inscriptions found (37), we omit further mention of it. (a) Tell Zakariya: From this height, 1,214 ft. above the sea, almost all Philistia could be seen. A pre-Israelitish town was found under some 20 ft. of débris, containing pre-Israelitish, Jewish and Seleucid pottery. Many vaulted cisterns, partly hewn from the rock, were found in the lowest level. In later levels Jewish pit ovens were found and inscribed jar-handles with winged Egypt symbols, implements of bronze, iron, bone and stone, and Egypt images of Bes and the Horus eye, etc., besides a strange bronze figure of a woman with a fish's tail which seems to represent Atargatis of Ashkelon. The ancient rampart was strengthened, perhaps in Rehoboam's time, and towers were added in the Seleucid era. Only half of this site was excavated. (b) Tell es-Sāfi: The camp was pitched near here in the Vale of Elah. From a depth of 21 ft. to the rock, was found the characteristic pre-Israelitish pottery and much imported pottery of the Mycenaean type. A high place was also found here, containing bones of camels, sheep, cows, etc., and several monoliths of soft limestone in situ, and near by a jar-burial. In an ancient rubbish heap many fragments of the goddess of fertility were found. Many old Egypt and later Gr relics were also found, and four Bab seals and the usual pottery from Jewish and later periods. With strong probability this site was identified as Gath. (c) Tell Sandahannah: This was situated c 1,100 ft. above sea-level. The town covered about 6 acres and was protected by an inner and outer wall and occasional towers. The strongest wall averaged 30 ft. thick. The work done here "was unique in the history of Palestinian excavation" (Bliss). At Tell el-Hesi only one-third of each stratum was excavated; at Tell Zakariya only one-half; at Jerus the work was confined to the enclosures of the temple, a few city walls and a few churches, pools, streets, etc., but at Tell Sandahannah "we recovered almost an entire town, probably the ancient Mareshah [Josh 15 44], with its inner and outer walls, its gates, streets, lanes, open places, houses, reservoirs, etc" (Bliss). Nearly 400 vessels absolutely intact and unbroken were found. It was a Seleucid town of the 3d and 2d cent. BC, with no pre-Israelitish remains. The town was built with thin brick, like blocks of soft limestone, set with wide joints and laid in mud with occasionally larger, harder stones chisel-picked. The town was roughly divided into blocks of streets, some of the streets being paved. The houses were lighted from the street and an open court. Very few rooms were perfectly rectangular, while many were of awkward shape. Many closets were found and pit ovens and vaulted cisterns, reached by staircases, as also portions of the old drainage system. The cisterns had plastered floors, and sometimes two heavy coats of plaster on the walls; the houses occasionally had vaulted roofs but usually the ordinary roof of today, made of boards and rushes covered with clay. No religious building was found and no trace of a colonnade, except perhaps a few fragments of ornament. An enormous columbarium was uncovered (1906 niches). No less than 328 Gr inscriptions were found on the handles of imported wine jars. Under the Seleucid town was a Jewish town built of rubble, the pottery of the usual kind including stamped jar-handles. An Astarte was found in the Jewish or Gr stratum, as also various animal forms. The Astarte was very curious, about 11 in. high, hollow, wearing a long cloak, but with breasts, body and part of right leg bare, having for headdress a closely fitting sunbonnet with a circular serrated top ornament in front and with seven stars in relief. A most striking find dating from about the 2d cent. AD was that of 16 little human figures bound in fetters of lead, iron, etc., undoubtedly representing "revenge dolls" through which the owners hoped to work magic on enemies, and 49 fragments of magical tablets inscribed in Gr on white limestone, with exorcisms, incantations and imprecations. It ought to be added that the four towns as a whole supplement each other, and positively confirm former results. No royal stamps were found at Tell el-Hesi, but 77 were found in these 4 sites, in connection with 2- or 4-winged symbols (Egypt scarabaeus or winged sun-disk). Writing-materials (styli) were found in all strata, their use being "continuous from the earliest times into the Seleucid period" (Bliss). From the four towns the evolution of the lamp could be traced from the pre-Israelite, through the Jewish to the Gr period. Some 150 of the labyrinthine rock-cut caves of the district were also examined, some of which must be pre-Christian, as in one of these a million cubic feet of material had been excavated, yet so long ago that all signs of the rubbish had been washed away.

(4) Painted "Tombs of Marissa."—In 1902 John P. Peters and Hermann Thiersch discovered at Beit Jibrin (adjoining Tell Sandahannah) an example of sepulchral art totally different from any other ever found in Pal. It was a tomb containing several chambers built by a Sidonian, the walls being brilliantly painted, showing a bull, panther, serpent, ibex, crocodile with ibis (?) on its back, hunter on horseback, etc., with dated inscriptions, the earliest being 196 BC (see John P. Peters, Painted Tombs in Necropolis of Marissa, 1905). The writer (April 18, 1913) found another tomb here of similar character, decorated with grapes, birds, two cocks (life size), etc. Perhaps most conspicuous was a wreath of beautiful flowers with a cross ⊕ in its center. Nothing shows the interrelations of that age more than this Phoen colony, living in Pal, using the Gr language but employing Egypt and Libyan characteristics freely in their funeral art.

(1) Tell Ta'anek (Austrian government and Vienna Academy).—During short seasons of three years (1902–4) Professor Ernst Sellin of Vienna made a rapid examination of this town (Bib. Taanach), situated in the plain of Esdraelon in Northern Pal, on the ancient road between Egypt and Interior of Tomb at Marissa.

Babylon. Over 100 laborers were employed and digging was carried on simultaneously at several different points on the mound, the record being kept in an unusually systematic way and the official reports being minute and exhaustive. Only a general statement of results can be given, with an indication of the directions in which the "findings" were peculiar. The absence of Phoen and Mycenaean influence upon the pottery in the earliest levels (1000–1600 BC) is just as marked as at other sites, the kind of pottery and the presence of Sem maggē-bhōth (see IMAGES) in the Jewish periods are just as in previous sites, and the development in mason work and in pottery is identically the same in this first city to be excavated in Northern Pal as in Southern Pal. "The buildings and antiques might be interchanged bodily without any serious confusion of the archaeological history of Pal. . . . Civilization over all Western Pal is thus shown to have had the same course of development, whether we study it N. or S." (Macalister). This is by far the most important result of this excavation, showing that, notwithstanding divergences in many directions, an equivalent civilization, proving a unity in the dominating race, can be seen over all parts of Pal so far examined. Iron is introduced at the same time (c 1000 BC), and even the toys and pottery decorations are similar, and this continues through all the periods, including the Jewish. Yet foreign intercourse is common, and the idols, even from the earliest period, "show religious syncretism" (Sellin). From almost the oldest layer comes a curious seal cylinder containing both Egypt and Bab features. On one pre-Israelite tablet are pictures of Hadad and Baal. The Astarte cult is not quite as prominent here as in Southern Pal. No figures of the goddess come from the earliest strata, but from 1600 BC to c 900–800 BC they are common; after this they cease. The ordinary type of Astarte found in Babylonia and Cyprus as well as in Pal—with crown, necklace, girdle, anklets, and hands clasped on breasts—is found most frequently; but from the 12th to the 9th cent. other forms appear representing her as naked, with hips abnormally enlarged, to show her power of fecundity. One figure is of a peculiarly foreign type, wearing excessively large earrings, and this is in close connection with one of the most unique discoveries ever made in Pal—a hollow terra cotta Can. or Israelite (2 K 16 10) altar (800–600 BC), having no bottom but with holes in its walls which admitted air and insured draft when fire was kindled below; in its ornamentation showing a mixture of Bab and Egypt motives, having on its right side winged animals with human heads by the side of which is a man (or boy) struggling with a serpent the jaws of which are widely distended in anger; at its top two ram's (?) horns, and between them a sacrificial bowl in which to receive the "drink offering"; on its front a tree (of life), and on each side of it a rampant ibex. A bronze serpent was found near this altar, as also near the high place at Gezer. Continuous evidence of the gruesome practice of foundation sacrifices, mostly of little children, but in one case of an adult, was found between the 13th and 9th cents. BC, after which they seem to cease. In one house the skeletons of a lady and five children were found, the former with her rings and necklace of gold, five pearls, two scarabs, etc. Many jar-burials of new-born infants, 16 in one place, were found, and, close to this deposit, a rock-hewn altar with a jar of yellow incense (?). Egypt and Bab images were found of different eras and curious little human-looking amulets (as were also found at Lachish) in which the parental parts are prominent, which Sellin and Bliss believe to be "teraphim" (Gen 31 19,34; but see Driver, Modern Research, 57, etc), such as Rachel, being pregnant, took with her to protect her on the hard journey from Haran to Pal (Macalister).

The high place, with one or more steps leading up to it, suggesting "elevation, isolation and mystery" (Vincent), is represented here as in so many other Palestinian ruins, and the evidence shows that it continued long after the entrance of Israel into Canaan. When Israel entered Pal, no break occurred in the civilization, the art development continuing at about the same level; so probably the two races were at about the same culture-level, or else the Hebrew occupation of the land was very gradual. In the 8th cent. there seems to be an indication of the entrance of a different race, which doubtless is due to the Assyrian exile. A most interesting discovery was that of the dozen cuneiform tablets found in a terra cotta chest or jar (cf Jer 32 14) from the pre-Israelite city.

These few letters cannot accurately be called "the first library found in Pal"; but they do prove that libraries were there, since the personal and comparatively unimportant character of some of these notes and their easy and flowing style prove that legal, business and literary documents must have existed. These show that letter-writing was used not only in great questions of state between foreign countries, but in local matters between little contiguous towns, and that while Pal at this period (c 1400 BC) was politically dependent on Egypt, yet Babylonia had maintained its old literary supremacy. One of these letters mentions "the finger of Ashirat," this deity recalling the 'Asherah or sacred post of the OT (see IMAGES); another note is written by Ahi-Yawi, a name which corresponds to Heb Ahijah ("Jeh is Brother"), thus indicating that the form of the Divine name was then known in Canaan, though its meaning (i.e. the essential name; cf Ex 6 3; 34 6; Neh 1 9; Jer 44 26), may not have been known. Ahi-Yawi invokes upon Ishtar-washur the blessing of the "Lord of the Gods."

On the same level with these letters were found two subterranean cells with a rock-hewn chamber in front and a rock-hewn altar above, and even the ancient drain which is supposed to have conveyed the blood from the altar into the "chamber of the dead" below. It may be added that Dr. Sellin thinks the condition of the various walls of the city is entirely harmonious with the Bible accounts of its history (Josh 12 21; 17 11; Jgs 1 27; 5 19–21; 1 K 4 12; 9 15; 1 Ch 7 29). So far as the ruins testify, there was no settled city life between c 600 BC and 900 AD, i.e. it became a desolation about the time of the Bab captivity. An Arab castle dates from about the 10th cent. AD.

(2) Tell el-Mutesellim (Megiddo, Josh 12 21; Jgs 5 19; 2 K 9 27).—This great commercial and military center of Northern Pal was opened to the world in 1903–5 by Dr. Schumacher and his efficient staff, the diggings being conducted under the auspices of His Majesty the Kaiser and the Ger. Pal Society. The mound, about 5 miles N.W. from Ta'anach, stood prominently 120 ft. above the plain, the ruins being on a plateau 1,020×750 ft. in area. An average of 70 diggers were employed for the entire time. The débris was over 33 ft. deep, covering some eight mutually excluding populations. The surrounding wall, 30×35 ft. thick, conformed itself to the contour of the town. The excavations reached the virgin rock only at one point; but the oldest stratum uncovered showed a people living in houses, having fire, cooking food and making sacrifices; the next city marked an advance, but the third city, proved by its Egypt remains to go back as far as the 20th cent. BC, showed a splendid and in some directions a surprising civilization, building magnificent city gates (57×36 ft.), large houses and tombs with vaulted roofs, and adorning their persons with fine scarabs of white and green steatite and other jewelry of stone and bronze. It was very rich in colored pottery and little objects such as tools, seals, terra cotta figures and animals, including a bridled horse, and some worked iron is also said to have been found. In one pile of bodies were two children wearing beautiful bronze anklets. The city lying above this begins as early as the 15th cent. BC, as is proved by a scarab of Thothmes III and by other signs, although the scarabs, while Egypt in form, are often foreign in design and execution. Anubis, Bes, Horus and other Egypt figures appear, also 32 scarabs in one pot, much jewelry, including gold ornaments, and some very long, sharp bronze knives. One tomb contained 42 vessels, and one skeleton held 4 gold-mounted scarabs in its hand. One remarkable fragment of pottery contained a colored picture of pre-Israelite warriors with great black beards, carrying shields (?). A most interesting discovery was that of the little copper (bronze?) tripods supporting lamps, on one of which is the figure of a flute-player, being strikingly similar to pictures of Delphic oracles and to representations lately found in Crete (MNDPV, 1906, 46). This city was destroyed by a fearful conflagration, and is separated from the next by a heavy stratum of cinders and ashes. The fifth city is remarkable for a splendid palace with walls of stone from 3–5 ft. thick. This city, which probably begins as early as Solomon's time, shows the best masonry. An oval, highly polished seal of jasper on which is engraved a Heb name in script closely resembling the MS, suggests a date for the city, and casts an unexpected light upon the Heb culture of Pal in the days of the monarchy. The seal is equal to the best Egypt or Assyrian work, clearly and beautifully engraved, and showing a climax of art. In the center is the Lion (of Judah), mouth wide open, tail erect, body tense. Upon the seal is carved: "To Shema, servant of Jeroboam." This name may possibly not refer to either of the Bib. kings (10th or 8th cent. BC), but the stratum favors this dating. The seal was evidently owned by some Hebrew noble at a prosperous period when some Jeroboam was in power, and so everything is in favor of this being a relic from the court of one of these kings, probably the latter (Kautzsch, M u. N, 1904, 81). We have here, in any case, one of the oldest Heb inscriptions known, and one of the most elegant ever engraved (see MNDPV, 1906, 33). After seeing it the Sultan took it from the museum into his own private collection. A second seal of lapis lazuli, which Schumacher and Kautzsch date from about the 7th cent. BC, also contains in Old Heb the name "Asaph" (cf M u. N, 1906, 334; MNDPV, 1904, 147). There are several other remarkable works of art, as e.g. a woman playing the tambourine, wearing an Egypt headdress; several other figures of women besides several Astartes, and esp. a series of six terra cotta heads, one with a prominent Sem nose, another with Egypt characteristics, another quite un-Egypt, with regular features, vivacious eyes, curls falling to her shoulders and garlanded with flowers.

The sixth stratum might well be called the temple-city, for here were found the ruins of a sanctuary built of massive blocks in which remained much of the ceremonial furniture—sacificial dishes, a beautiful basalt pot with three feet, a plate having a handle in the form of a flower, etc. Seemingly connected with the former town, three religious stones were found covered by a fourth, and one with a pyramidal top; so here several monoliths were found which would naturally be thought of as religious monuments—though, since they have been touched with tools, this is perhaps doubtful (Ex 20 25). One incense altar, carved out of gray stone, is so beautiful as to be worthy of a modern Gr cathedral. The upper dish rests on a support of carved ornamental leaves painted red, yellow and cobalt blue, in exquisite taste, the colors still as fresh as when first applied. A blacksmith's shop was found in this stratum, containing many tools, including iron plowshares, larger than the bronze ones in the 3d and 4th layers. Allegorical figures were found, which may possibly belong to the former town, representing a man before an altar with his hands raised in adoration, seemingly to a scorpion, above which are a 6-pointed star, crescent moon, etc. Another most wonderful seal of white hard stone is engraved with three lines of symbols, in the first a vulture chasing a rabbit; in the second a conventional palm tree, with winged creatures on each side; in the third a lion springing on an ibex (?) under the crescent moon. Near by was found a cylinder of black jasper, containing hieroglyphs, and much crushed pottery. The 7th city, which was previous to the Gr or Rom eras, shows only a complex of destroyed buildings. After this the place remains unoccupied till the 11th cent. AD, when a poor Arab tower was erected, evidently to protect the passing caravans.

These excavations were specially important in proving the archaeological richness of Pal and the elegance of the native works of art. They were reported with an unexampled minuteness—various drawings of an original design showing the exact place and altitude where every little fragment was found.

(3) Tell Hâm (Capernaum), etc.—In April and May, 1905, the German Oriental Society excavated a Heb synagogue of the Rom era at Tell Hâm. It was 78 ft. long by 59 ft. wide, was built of beautiful white limestone, almost equal to marble, and was in every way more magnificent than any other yet found in Pal, that in Chorazin being the next finest. Its roof was gable-shaped and it was surprisingly ornamented with fine carvings representing animals, birds, fruits, flowers, etc, though in some cases these ornamentations had been intentionally mutilated. In January, 1907, Macalister and Masterman proved that Khan Minyeh was not the ancient Capernaum, as it contained no pottery older than Arab time, thus showing Tell Hâm to be the ancient site, so that the synagogue just excavated may be the one referred to in Lk 7 5. At Samieh, 6 hours N. of Jerus, two important Can. cemeteries were discovered by the fellahin in 1906, consisting of circular or oval tomb chambers, with roofs roughly dome-shaped, as at Gezer (see below). A large quantity of pottery and bronze objects, much of excellent quality, was found (Harvard Theol. Rev., I, 70–96; Masterman, Studies in Galilee; Henson, Researches in Palestine).

Jericho (German Oriental Society).—During 1908–9, Dr. E. Sellin, assisted by a specialist in pottery, (Watzinger) and a professional architect (Langenegger), with the help of over 200 workmen, opened to view this famous Bib. city (Josh 6 1–24). Jericho was most strategically situated at the eastern gateway of Pal, with an unlimited water-supply in the Ain es-Sultan, having complete control of the great commercial highway across the Jordan and possessing Palestine natural provisions in its palm forest (Smith, HGHL). It was also set prominently on a hill rising some 40 ft. above the plain. The excavations proved that from the earliest historic time these natural advantages had been increased by every possible artifice known to ancient engineers, until it had become a veritable Gibraltar. The oldest city, which was in the form of an irregular ellipse, somewhat egg-shaped, with the point at the S.W., was first surrounded with a rampart following the contour of the hill, a rampart so powerful that it commands the admiration of all military experts who have examined it.

The walls even in their ruins are some 28 ft. high. They were built in three sections: (a) a substratum of clay, gravel and small stones, making a deposit upon the rock about 3 or 4 ft. deep, somewhat analogous to modern concrete; (b) a rubble wall, 6 to 8 ft. thick, of large stones laid up to a height of 16 ft. upon this conglomerate, the lowest layers of the stone being enormously large; (c) upon all this a brick wall over 6 ft. thick, still remaining, in places, 8 ft. high. Not even Megiddo, famous as a military center throughout all the ancient world, shows such workmanship (cf Josh 2 1; Nu 13 28). "These were masters in stone work and masonry" (The Builder); "Taken as a whole it may justly be regarded as a triumph of engineering skill which a modern builder, under the same conditions, could scarcely excel" (Langenegger); "It is as well done as a brilliant military engineer with the same materials and tools could do today" (Vincent). All the centuries were not able to produce a natural crevice in this fortification. At the N., which was the chief point of danger, and perhaps along other sections also, a second wall was built about 100 ft. inside the first, and almost as strong, while still another defence ("the citadel"), with 265 ft. of frontage, was protected not only by another mighty wall but by a well-constructed glacis. The old pre-Israelite culture in Jericho was exactly similar to that seen in the southern and northern cities, and the idolatry also. In its natural elements Can. civilization was probably superior to that of the Hebrews, but the repugnant and ever-present polytheism and fear of magic led naturally to brutal and impure manifestations. It cannot be doubted that, at least in some cases, the infants buried in jars under the floors represent foundation sacrifices. Some of the pottery is of great excellence, comparing favorably with almost the best examples from Egypt; a number of decorative figures of animals in relief are specially fine; the bronze utensils are also good; esp. notable are the 22 writing-tablets, all ready to be used but not inscribed. Somewhere near the 15th cent. the old fortifications were seriously damaged, but equally powerful ones replaced them. The German experts all believed that a break in the city's history was clearly shown about the time when, according to the pottery, Israel ought to have captured the city, and it was confidently said that the distinctively Can. pottery ceased completely and permanently at this point; but further research has shown that at least a portion of the old town had a practically continuous existence (so Josh 16 7; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 S 10 5). No complete Israelitish house was preserved, but the Israelitish quarter was located close to the spring and no little furniture of the usual kind was found, including dishes, pots, corn-mills, lamps, etc., many iron instruments and terra cotta heads of men and animals. The pottery is quite unlike the old Canaanite, being closely allied to the Gr-Phoen ware of Cyprus. It is noticeable that, as in other Palestinian towns, in the Jewish era, little Bab influence is discernible; the Aegean and Egypt influence is not as marked as in the cities dug up near the Mediterranean coast. One large edifice (60 by 80 ft.) is so like the dwellings of the 7th cent. BC at Sendjirli that "they seem to have been copied from Syrian plans" (Vincent). Absolutely unique was the series of 12 Rhodian jar-handles stamped in Aram., "To Jehovah" (Yah, Yahu). Vincent has suggested that as during the monarchy (7th to 6th cent.) "To the King" meant probably "For His Majesty's Service," so in post-exilic time the Divine name meant "For the Temple" (Rev. bible). After the exile the city had about 3 centuries of prosperity; but disappears permanently in the Maccabean era (MNDPV, 1907; MDOG, 1908-9; PEFS, 1910; Rev. bible, 1907-9).

(1) Jerusalem.—See above, III, 1, (2).

(2) Samaria (Harvard Expedition).—Although the ancient capital of the Northern Kingdom, yet Samaria was centrally located, being

4. Central Palestine 20 miles from the Mediterranean coast and only about 30 miles N. of Jerus. Ancient Samaria was very famous in Israel for its frivolity and wealth, special mention being made of its ointments, instruments of music, luxurious couches, and its "ivory palace" (Am 6 4-6; 1 K 16 24). Its history is known so fully that the chronological sequences of the ruins can be determined easily. The citadel and town originated with Omri, c 900 BC (1 K 16 24); the Temple of Baal and palace were constructions of Ahab (1 K 16 32; 22 39); it continued prosperous down to the Assyrian exile, 722 BC (1 K 22 to 2 K 17); Sargon and Esarhaddon established a Bab colony and presumably fortified the town (720-670 BC); Alexander the Great captured it in 331 BC, and established there a Syro-Maccabean colony; it was destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 109 BC, but rebuilt by Pompey in 60 BC, and again by Herod (30-1 BC). All of these periods are identified in the excavations, Herod's work being easily recognized, and Josephus' description of the town being found correct; the Gr work is equally well defined, so that the lower layers of masonry which contained the characteristic Jewish pottery, and which in every part of the ruin lay immediately under the Bab and Gr buildings, must necessarily be Heb., the relative order of underlying structures thus being "beyond dispute" (Reisner). During 1908-9 George A. Reisner with a staff of specialists, including David G. Lyon of the Harvard Semitic Museum, G. Schumacher, and an expert architect, undertook systematically and thoroughly to excavate this large detached "tell" lying 350 ft. above the valley and 1,450 ft. above sea-level, its location as the only possible strategic stronghold proving it to be the ancient Samaria. This was a "gigantic enterprise" because of the large village of 800 population (Sebastiyeh), and the valuable crops which covered the hill. Some $65,000 were spent during the two seasons, and the work finally ceased before the site was fully excavated. The following statement is an abridgment, in so far as possible in their words, of the official reports of Drs. Reisner and Lyon to the Harvard Theol. Review: An average of 285 diggers were employed the first season and from 230-60 the second. Hundreds of Arabian lamps, etc., were found close to the surface, and then nothing more until the Rom ruins. Many fine Rom columns still remained upright, upon the surface of the hill. The road of columns leading to the Forum and ornamental gate (oriented unlike the older gates), the great outer wall "20 stadii in circuit" (Jos), the hippodrome, etc., were all found with inscriptions or coins and pottery of the early Roman Empire. Even the old Rom chariot road leading into the Forum was identified. Adjoining the Forum and connected with it by a wide doorway was a basilica, consisting of a large open stone-paved court surrounded by a colonnade with mosaic floor. An inscription in Greek on an architrave in the courtyard dates this to 12-15 AD. The plan of the Herodian temple consisted of a stairway, a portico, a vestibule and a cella with a corridor on each side. The staircase was about 80 ft. wide, composed of 17 steps beautifully constructed, the steps being quite modern in style, each tread overlapping the next lower by several inches. The roof was arched and the walls very massive and covered with a heavy coat of plaster still retaining traces of color. A few Gr graffiti were found near here, and 150 "Rhodian" stamped amphora handles and many fragments of Lat inscriptions. A complete inscription on a large stele proved to be a dedication from some Pannonian soldiers (probably 2d or 3d cent. AD) to "Jupiter Optimus Maximus." Near this was found a torso of heroic size carved in white marble, which is much finer than any ever before discovered in Pal, the work "bringing to mind the Vatican Augustus" (Vincent), though not equal to it. Close to the statue was a Rom altar (presumably Herodian) c 13 by 7 ft., rising in six courses of stone to a height of 6 ft. Beneath the Rom city was a Seleucid town (c 300-108 BC), with its fortifications, gateway, temples, streets, and great public buildings and a complex of private houses, in connection with which was a large bath house, with mosaic floor, hot and cold baths, water closet, etc., which was heated by a furnace. Underneath the Gr walls, which were connected with the well-known red-figured Gr ware of c 400 BC, were brick structures and very thick fortress walls built in receding courses of small stones in the Bab style. In the filling of the construction trench of this Bab wall were found Israelite potsherds and a Heb seal with seemingly Bab peculiarities, and one fragment of a cuneiform tablet. Below these Bab constructions "there is a series of massive walls beautifully built of large limestone blocks founded on rock and forming a part of one great building, which can be no other than the Jewish palace." It consisted of "great open courts surrounded by small rooms, comparable in plan and even in size with the Bab palaces and is certainly royal in size and architecture." Its massive outlines which for the first time reveal to the modern world the masonry of an Israelite palace show that unexpected material resources and technical skill were at the command of the kings of Israel. An even greater discovery was made when on the palace hill was found an alabaster vase inscribed with the cartouche of Osorkon II of Egypt (874-853 BC), Ahab's contemporary; and at the same level, about 75 fragments of pottery, not jar-handles but ostraca, inscribed with records or memorials in ancient Hebrew. The script is Phoen, and according to such experts as Lyon and Driver, practically identical with that of the Siloam Inscription (c 700 BC) and M S (c 850 BC). "The inscriptions are written in ink with a reed pen in an easy flowing hand and show a pleasing contrast to the stiff forms of Phoen inscriptions cut in stone. The graceful curves give evidence of a skill which comes only with long practice" (Lyon). The ink is well preserved, the writing is distinct, the words are divided by dots or strokes, and with two exceptions all the ostraca are dated, the reigning king probably being Ahab. The following samples represent the ordinary memoranda: "In the 11th year. From 'Abi'ezer. For 'Asâ, 'Akhemelek (and) Ba'alâ. From 'Elnathan (?). . . . In 9th yr. From Yasat. For 'Abino'am. A jar of old wine. . . . In 11th yr. For Badyo. The vineyard of the Tell." Baal and El form a part of several of the proper names, as also the Heb Divine name, the latter occurring naturally not in its full form, YHWH, but as ordinarily in compounds YW (Lyon, Harvard Theol. Rev., 1911, 136-43; cf Driver, PEFS, 1911, 79-83). In a list of 30 proper names all but three have Bib. equivalents. "They are the earliest specimens of Heb writing which have been found, and in amount they exceed by far all known ancient Heb inscriptions; moreover, they are the first Palestinian records of this nature to be found" (see esp. Lyon, op. cit., I, 70-96; II, 102-13; III, 136-38; IV, 136-43; Reisner, ib, III, 248-63; also Theol. Literaturblatt, 1911, III, 4; Driver, as above; MNOP, 1911, 23-27; Rev. biblique, VI, 435-45).

(3) Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh, 1 S 6 1-21; 2 K 14 11).—In a short but important campaign, during 1911-12, in which from 36 to 167 workmen were employed, Dr. D. Mackenzie uncovered a massive double gate and primitive walls 12-15 ft. high, with mighty bastions, and found in later deposits Eyp images, Syrian Astartes, imported Aegean vases and a remarkable series of inscribed royal jar-handles "dating from the Israelite monarchy" (Vincent), as also what seemed to be an ancient Sem tomb with façade entrance. The proved Cretan relations here are esp. important. The town was suddenly destroyed, probably in the era of Sennacherib (PEFS, 1911, LXIX, 172; 1912, XII, 145).

(4) Gezer (Palestine Exploration Fund).—Tell ej-Jezer occupies a conspicuous position, over 250 ft. above the plain, and 750 ft. above the sea, on a ridge of hills some 20 miles N.W. of Jerus, overlooking the plain toward Jaffa, which is 17 miles distant. It is in plain sight of the two chief trade caravan roads of Southern Pal which it controlled. The ancient Gezer was well known from many references to it on the Eyp records, the names of several governors of Gezer being given in letters dating from c 1400 BC and Menephtah (c 1200 BC) calling himself "Binder of Gezer," etc. The discovery of the boundary stones of Gezer (see above) positively identified it. It was thoroughly excavated by R. A. Stewart Macalister in 1902-5, 1907-9, during which time 10,000 photographs were made of objects found. No explorations have been so long continued on one spot or have brought more unique discoveries or thrown more light upon the development of Palestinian culture and religion, and none have been reported as fully (Excavations of Gezer, 1912, 3 vols; Hist of Civilization in Pal, 1912). Ten periods are recognized as being distinctly marked in the history of the mound—which broadly speaking represents the development in all parts of Pal: (a) pre-Sem period (c 3000–2500 BC), to the entrance of the first Semites; (b) first Sem city (c 2500–1800 BC), to the end of the XIIth Egyp Dynasty; (c) second Sem city (c 1800–1400 BC), to the end of the XVIIIth Egyp Dynasty; (d) third Sem city (c 1400–1000 BC), to the beginning of the Heb monarchy; (e) fourth Sem city (c 1000–550 BC), to the destruction of the monarchy and the Bab exile; (f) Pers and Hel period (550–100 BC), to the beginning of the Rom dominion; (g) Rom (100 BC–350 AD); (h) Byzantine (350–600 AD); (i) and (j) early and modern Arabian (350 AD to the present). The last four periods have left few important memorials and may be omitted from review.

(a) The aboriginal non-Sem inhabitants of Gezer were troglodytes (cf Gen 14 6) living in the caves which honeycomb this district (cf ZDPV, 1909, VI, 12), modifying these only slightly for home purposes. They were a small race 5 ft. 4 in. to 5 ft. 7 in. in height, slender in form, with rather broad heads and thick skulls, who hunted, kept domestic animals (cows, sheep, goats); had fire and cooked food; possessed no metals; made by hand a porous and gritty soft-baked pottery which they decorated with red lines; and were capable of a rude art—the oldest in Pal—in which drawings of various animals are given. They prized certain bars of stone (possibly phallic); they probably offered sacrifices; they certainly cremated their dead, depositing with the ashes a few food vessels. The crematory found was 31 ft. long by 24 wide, and in it the bodies were burned whole, without regard to orientation. Many cup marks in the rocks suggest possible religious rites; in close connection with these markings were certain remains, including bones of swine (cf Lev 11 7).

(b) The Semites who displaced this population were more advanced in civilization, having bronze tools and potter's wheels, with finer and more varied pottery; they were a heavier race, being 5 ft. 7 in. to 5 ft. 11 in. tall, larger-boned, thicker-skulled, and with longer faces. They did not burn but buried their dead carelessly upon the floor of the natural caves. The grave deposits are the same as before; occasionally some beads are found with the body. The former race had surrounded their settlement with a wall 6 ft. high and 8 ft. thick, mostly earth, though faced with selected stones; but this race built a wall of hammered stones, though irregularly cut and laid, the wall being 10 ft. thick, and one gateway being 42 ft. wide, flanked by two towers. While huts were always the common residences (as in later eras), yet some buildings of stone were erected toward the close of this period and one large palace was found, built of stone and having a row of columns down the center, and containing a complex of rooms, including one rectangular hall, 40 ft. long by 25 ft. wide. Most remarkable of all were their works of engineering. They hewed enormous constructions, square, rectangular and circular, out of the soft chalk and limestone rocks, one of which contained 60 chambers, one chamber being 400 by 80 ft. The supreme work, however, was a tunnel which was made c 2000 BC, passing out of use c 1450–1250 BC, and which shows the power of these early Palestinians. It was 200–250 ft. long and consisted of a roadway cut through the hill of rock some 47½ ft. to an imposing archway 23 ft. high and 12 ft. 10 in. broad, which led to a long sloping passage of equal dimensions, with the arch having a vaulted roof and the sides well plumb. This led into a bed of much harder rock, where dimensions were reduced and the workmanship was poorer, but ultimately reached, about 130 ft. below the present surface of the ground, an enormous living spring of such depth that the excavators could not empty it of the soft mud with which it was filled. A well-cut but well-worn and battered stone staircase, over 12 ft. broad, connected the spring with the upper section of the tunnel 94 ft. above. Beyond the spring was a natural cave 80 by 25 ft. Dr. Macalister asks, "Did a Canaanite governor plan and Canaanite workmen execute this vast work? How did the ancient engineers discover the spring?" No one can answer; but certainly the tunnel was designed to bring the entrance of the water passage within the courtyard protected by the palace walls.

Another great reservoir, 57 by 46 ft., at another part of the city was quarried in the rock to a depth of 29½ ft., and below this another one of equal depth but not so large, and narrowing toward the bottom. These were covered with two coats of cement and surrounded by a wall; they would hold 60,000 gals.

(c) The second Sem city, built on the ruins of the first, was smaller, but more luxurious. There were fewer buildings but larger rooms. The potter's wheel was worked by the foot. Pottery becomes much finer, the styles and decoration reaching a climax of grace and refinement. Foreign trade begins in this period and almost or quite reaches its culmination. The Hyksos scarabs found here prove that under their rule (XVth and XVIIth Dynasties) there was close intercourse with Pal, and the multitudes of Egyp articles show that this was also true before and after the Hyksos. The Cretan and the Aegean trade, esp. through Cyprus, introduced new art ideas which soon brought local attempts at imitation. Scribes' implements for writing in wax and clay begin here and are found in all strata hereafter.

Interments in the Second Burial Cave at Gezer.

While the pottery is elaborately painted, it is but little molded. The older "combed" ornament practically disappears, while burnished ornament reaches high-water mark. Animal figures are common, the eyes often being elaborately modeled and stuck on; but it is infantile art. Burials still occur in natural caves, but also in those hewn artificially; the bodies are carelessly deposited on the floor without coffins, generally in a crouching position, and stones are laid around and over them without system. Drink offerings always and food offerings generally are placed with the dead. Scarabs are found with the skeletons, and ornaments of bronze and silver, occasionally gold and beads, and sometimes weapons. Lamps also begin to be deposited, but in small numbers.

(d) During this period Menephtah "spoiled Gezer," and Israel established itself in Canaan. The excavations have given no hint of Menephtah's raid, unless it be found in an ivory pectoral bearing his cartouche. About 1400 BC a great wall, 4 ft. thick, was built of large and well-shaped stones and protected later by particularly fine towers, perhaps, as Macalister suggests, by the Pharaoh who captured Gezer and gave it as a dowry to his daughter, wife of King Solomon. A curious fact, which seemingly illustrates Josh 16 10, is the large increase of the town shortly after the Heb invasion. "The houses are smaller and more crowded and the sacred area of the high place is built over." "There is no indication of an exclusively Israelite population around the city outside" (Macalister, v. Driver, Modern Research, 69). That land was taken for building purposes from the old sacred enclosure, and that new ideas in building plans and more heavily fortified buildings were now introduced have been thought to suggest the entrance among the ancient population of another element with different ideas. The finest palace of this period with very thick walls (3–9 ft.) carefully laid out at right angles, and certainly built near "the time of the Heb invasion," was perhaps the residence of Hiram (Josh 10 33). At this period seals begin (10 being found here, as against 28 in the next period, and 31 in the Hellenistic) and also iron tools; the use of the carpenter's compass is proved, the bow drill was probably in use, bronze and iron nails appear (wrought iron being fairly common from c 1000 BC); a cooking-pot of bronze was found, and spoons of shell and bronze; modern methods of making buttons and button holes are finest from this period, pottery buttons being introduced in the next city. One incidental Bible reference to the alliance between Gezer and Lachish (Josh 10 33) finds unexpected illustration from the fact that a kind of pottery peculiar to Lachish, not having been found in any other of the Southern Palestinian towns, was found at Gezer. The pottery here in general shows the same method of construction as in the 3d stratum, but the decoration and shapes deteriorate, while there is practically no molding. It shows much the same foreign influence as before, the styles being affected from Egypt, Crete, the Aegean, and esp. Cyprus. From this period come 218 scarabs, 68 from the period previous and 93 from the period following. Ornamental colored specimens of imported Egypt glass also occur, clear glass not being found till the next period. Little intercourse is proved with Babylon at this era: as against 16 Bab cylinders found in the previous period, only 4 were found in this and 15 in the next period. There is no marked change in the method of disposing of the dead, but the food vessels are of smaller size and are placed in the graves in great numbers, most of these being broken either through the use of poor vessels because of economy or with the idea of liberating the spirit of the object that it might serve the deceased in the spirit world. Lamps are common now in every tomb but there is a marked decrease in the quantity and value of ornamental objects. Religious emblems occur but rarely. The worship of Astarte (see ASHTORETH), the female consort of Baal, is most popular at this era, terra cotta figures and plaques of this goddess being found in many types and in large numbers. It is suggestive that these grow notably less in the next stratum. It is also notable that primitive idols are certainly often intentionally ugly (Vincent). So to this day Arabs ward off the evil eye.

(e) This period, during which almost the entire prophetic lit. was produced, is of peculiar interest. Gezer at this time as at every other period was in general appearance like a modern Arab village, a huge mass of crooked, narrow, airless streets, shut inside a thick wall, with no trace of sanitary conveniences, with huge cisterns in which dead men could lie undetected for centuries, and with no sewers. Even in the Maccabean time the only sewer found ran, not into a cesspool, but into the ground, close to the governor's palace. The mortality was excessively high, few old men being found in the cemeteries, while curvature of the spine, syphilis, brain disease, and esp. broken, unset bones were common. Tweezers, pins and needles, kohl bottles, mirrors, combs, perfume boxes, scrapers (for baths) were common in this stratum and in all that follow it, while we have also here silver earrings, bracelets and other beautiful ornaments with the first sign of clear glass objects; tools also of many kinds of stone, bronze and iron, an iron hoe just like the modern one, and the first known pulley of bronze. The multitude of Heb weights found here have thrown much new light on the weight-standards of Pal (see esp. Macalister, Gezer, II, 287-92; E. J. Pilcher, PEFS, 1912; A. R. S. Kennedy, Expos T, XXIV).

The pottery was poor in quality, clumsy and coarse in shape and ornament, excepting as it was imported, the local Aegean imitations being unworthy. Combed ornament was not common, and the burnished as a rule was limited to random scratches. Multiple lamps became common, and a large variety of styles in small jugs was introduced. The motives of the last period survive, but in a degenerate form. The bird friezes so characteristic of the 3d Sem period disappear. The scarab stamp goes out of use, but the impressions of other seals "now become fairly common as potter's marks." These consist either of simple devices (stars, pentacles, etc) or of names in Old Heb script. These Heb-inscribed stamps were found at many sites and consist of two classes,

(i) those containing personal names, such as Azariah, Haggai, Menahem, Shebaniah, etc, (ii) those which are confined to four names, often repeated—Hebron, Socoh, Ziph, Mamshith—in connection with a reference to the king, e.g. "For [or Of] the king of Hebron." These latter date, according to Dr. Macalister's final judgment, from the Stamped Jar-Handles Excavated at Gezer.

Pers period. He still thinks they represent the names of various potters or potters' guilds in Pal (cf 1 Ch 2, 4, 5, and see esp. Bible Side-Lights from Gezer, 150, etc), but others suppose these names to represent the local measures of capacity, which differed in these various districts; others that these represented different tax-districts where wine jars would be used and bought. At any rate, we certainly have here the work of the king's potters referred to in 1 Ch 4 23. Another very curious Heb tablet inscription is the so-called Zodiacal Tablet, on which the signs of the Zodiac are figured with certain other symbols which were at first supposed to express some esoteric magical or religious meaning, but which seem only to represent the ancient agricultural year with the proper months indicated for sowing and reaping—being the same as the modern seasons and crops excepting that flax was cultivated anciently. An even more important literary memorial from this period consists of two cuneiform tablets written about three-quarters of a century after the Ten Tribes had been carried to Assyria and foreign colonies had been thrown into Israelite territory. This collapse of the Northern Kingdom was not marked by any local catastrophe, so far as the ruins indicate, any more than the collapse of the Can. kingdom when Israel entered Pal; but soon afterward we find an Assyrian colony settled in Gezer "using the Assyrian language and letters . . . and carrying on business with Assyrian methods." In one tablet (649 BC), which is a bill of sale for certain property, containing description of the same, appeared the name of the buyer, seals of seller and signature of 12 witnesses, one of whom is the Egypt governor of the new town, another an Assyrian noble whose name precedes that of the governor, and still another a Western Asiatic, the others being Assyrian. It is a Hebrew "Nethaniah," who the next year, as the other tablet shows, sells his field, his seal bearing upon it a lunar stellar emblem. Notwithstanding the acknowledged literary work of high quality produced in Pal during this period, no other hint of this is found clear down to the Gr period except in one neo-Bab tablet.

The burials in this period were much as previously, excepting that the caves were smaller and toward the end of the period shelves around the walls received the bodies. In one Sem tomb as many as 150 vessels were found. Quite the most astonishing discovery at this level was that of several tombs which scholars generally agree to be "Philistine." They were not native Canaanite, but certainly Aegean intruders with relations with Crete and Cyprus, such as we would expect the Philis to have (see PHILISTINES). The tombs were oblong or rectangular, covered with large horizontal slabs, each tomb containing but a single body, stretched out with the head to the E. or W. One tomb was that of a girl of 18 with articles of alabaster and silver about her, and wearing a Cretan silver mouth plate; another was a man of High Place of the Cave-Dwellers at Gezer.

40 with agate seal of Assyrian design, a two-handled glass vessel, etc.; another was a woman surrounded by handsome ornaments of bronze, lead, silver and gold, with a basalt scarab between her knees. The richest tomb was that of a girl whose head had been severed from the body; with her was a hemispherical bowl, ornamented with rosette and lotus pattern, and a horde of beautiful things. The iron in these tombs was noticeable (cf 1 S 17 7), and in one tomb were found two ingots of gold, one of these being of the same weight almost to a fraction as that of Achan (Josh 7 21). The most impressive discovery was the high place. This began as early as 2500-2000 BC, and grew by the addition of monoliths and surrounding buildings up to this era. The eight huge uncut pillars which were found standing in a row, with two others fallen (yet cf Benzinger, Heb Archaeology, 320), show us the actual appearance of this ancient worshipping-place so famous in the Bible (Dt 16 22; 2 K 17 9.11; 23 8). The top of one of these monoliths had been worn smooth by kisses; another was an importation, being possibly, as has been suggested, a captured "Ari"; another stone, near by, had a large cavity in its top, nearly 3 ft. long and 2 ft. broad and 1 ft. 2 in. deep, which is differently interpreted as being the block upon which the 'āshērāh, so often mentioned in connection with the maṣṣēbhōth, may have been erected, or as an altar, or perhaps a laver for ritual ablutions. Inside the sacred enclosure was found a small bronze cobra (2 K 18 4), and also the entrance to an ancient cave, where probably oracles were given, the excavators finding that this cave was connected with another by a small, secret passage—through which presumably the message was delivered. In the stratum underlying the high place was a cemetery of infants buried in large jars. "That the sacrificed infants were the firstborn, devoted in the temple, is indicated by the fact that none were over a week old" (Macalister). In all the Sem strata bones of children were also found in corners of the houses, the deposits being identical with infant burials in the high place; and examination showed that these were not stillborn children. At least some of the burials under the house thresholds and under the foundation of walls carry with them the mute proofs of this most gruesome practice. In one place the skeleton of an old woman was found in a corner where a hole had been left just large enough for this purpose. A youth of about 18 had been cut in two at the waist and only the upper part of his body deposited. Before the coming into Pal of the Israelites, a lamp began to be placed under the walls and foundations, probably symbolically to take the place of human sacrifice. A lamp and bowl deposit under the threshold, etc., begins in the 3d Sem period, but is rare till the middle of that period. In the 4th Sem period it is common, though not universal; in the Hellenic it almost disappears. Macalister suspects that these bowls held blood or grape juice. In one striking case a bronze figure was found in place of a body. Baskets full of phalli were carried away from the high place. Various types of the Astarte were found at Gezer. When we see the strength and popularity of this religion against which the prophets contended in Canaan, "we are amazed at the survival of this world-religion," and we now see "why Ezra and Nehemiah were forced to raise the 'fence of the law' against this heathenism, which did in fact overthrow all other Sem religions" (George Adam Smith, PEFS, 1906, 288).

(f) During the Maccabean epoch the people of Gezer built reservoirs (one having a capacity of 4,000,000 gals.), used well-paved rooms, favored complex house plans with pillars, the courtyard becoming less important as compared with the rooms, though domestic fowls were now for the first time introduced. The architectural decorations have all been annihilated (as elsewhere in Pal) excepting a few molded stones and an Ionic volute from a palace, supposed to be that of Simon Maccabaeus because of the references in Jos and because of a scribbled imprecation found in the courtyard: "May fire overtake [?] Simon's palace." This is the only inscription from all these post-exilic centuries, to which so much of the beautiful Bible lit. is ascribed, excepting one grotesque animal figure on which is scrawled a name which looks a little like "Antiochus." Only a few scraps of Gr bowls, some Rhodian jar-handles, a few bronze and iron arrow heads, a few animal figures and a fragment of an Astarte, of doubtful chronology, remain from these four centuries. The potsherds prove that foreign imports continued and that the local potters followed classic models and did excellent work. The ware was always burnt hard; combed ornament and burnishing were out of style; molded ornament was usually confined to the rope design; painted decorations were rare; potter's marks were generally in Gr, though some were in Heb, the letters being of late form, and no names appearing similar to those found in Scripture. The tombs were well-cut square chambers, with shafts hewn in the rock for the bodies, usually nine to each tomb, which were run into them head foremost. The doorways were well cut, the covers almost always being movable flat slabs, though in one case a swinging stone door was found—circular rolling stones or the “false doors” so often found in the Jerus tombs being unknown here. Little shrines were erected above the forecourt or vestibule. When the body decayed, the bones in tombs having these kūkhān, shafts, were collected into ossuaries, the inscriptions on these ossuaries showing clearly the transition from Old Heb to the square character. After the Maccabean time the town was deserted, though a small Christian community lived here in the 4th cent. AD. See also GEZER.

PALLU, pal’ū, PALLUTES, pal’ū-its (פָּלִיטָא, palū, “distinguished”): A son of Reuben (Gen 46 9 [“Phallu”]; Ex 6 14; Nu 26 5.8; 1 Ch 5 3). Perhaps Peleth of Nu 16 1 is the same. Pallutes, the patronymic, occurs in Nu 26 5.

PALM, pām (OF THE HAND) (כַּף, kaph): The Heb word which is used in a variety of senses (see HAND; PAW) is usually tr^d “hand” in EV, but the tr “palm” is found in 5 passages of the OT, in 3 of which the Heb text adds the word פָּדָה, yādh (“hand,” 1 S 5 4; 2 K 9 35; Dnl 10 10). It would properly mean the “hollow hand” (root kāphaph, “to bend,” “to curve”), which receives or grasps things. It is therefore used in reference to filling the priest’s hands with sacrificial portions (Lev 14 15.26). The palms of the hands of Dagon are mentioned as cut off, when the idol was found mutilated in the presence of the ark of Jeh (1 S 5 4), from which may be inferred that this idol probably was represented with hands spread out in blessing, as we find in numerous Bab representations of divinities.

In a beautiful metaphor God answers the repentant people of Jerus, who thought Jeh had forgotten and forsaken them: “Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands” (Isa 49 16; see also Ecclus 18 3). Daniel is touched upon the palms of his hands to wake him from sleep (Dnl 10 10).

In the NT we find the phrase, “to smite with the palms of the hands,” as a tr of the Gr vb. παλίσω, rhapiō (Mt 26 67; see also 5 39 and LXX Hos 11 4; 1 Esd 4 30), and, derived from the same vb., πάπισμα, rhāpisma, a blow of the palm on the cheek, etc (Mk 14 65; Jn 18 22; 19 3, where, however, in EV the word “palm” has not been given). The marginal tr “to smite or strike with rods” (Mt 26 67; Jn 18 22; 19 3) and “strokes of rods” (Mk 14 65 m) does not seem to be applicable to the Gr text of the OT and NT, while it is a frequent meaning of the words in classical language. It would therefore be better to eliminate these marginal additions.

PALM TREE, pām’trē (תַּמָּר, tāmār, same as the Aram. and Ethiopic, but in Arab.=“date”; φοίνιξ, phoinix [Ex 15 27; Lev 23 40; Nu 33 9;

Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 Ch 28 15; Neh 8 15; Ps 92 12; Cant 7 7 f; Joel 1 12]; תַּמָּר, tōmer, Deborah “dwelt under the palm-tree” [Jgs 4 5]; “They are like a palm-tree [m “pillar”], of turned work” [Jer 10 5]; תַּמְרָה, tīmōrah [only in pl.], the palm tree as an architectural feature [1 K 6

Date Palm with Fruit (at Jaffa).

29.32.35; 7 36; 2 Ch 3 5; Ezk 40 16]; Gr only Ecclus 50 12; Jn 12 13; Rev 7 9): The palm, Phoenix dactylifera (N.O. Palmeae), Arab. nakhl, is a tree which from the earliest times has been associated with the Sem peoples. In Arabia the very existence of man depends largely upon its presence, and many authorities consider this to have been its original habitat. It is only natural that such a tree should have been sacred both there and in Assyria in the earliest ages. In Pal the palm leaf appears as an ornament upon pottery as far back as 1800 BC (cf PEF, Gezer Mem., II, 172). In Egypt the tall palm stem forms a constant feature in early architecture, and among the Hebrews it was extensively used as a decoration of the temple (1 K 6 29.32.35; 7 36; 2 Ch 3 5). It is a symbol of beauty (Cant 7 7) and of the righteous man:

“The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree:
He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.
They are planted in the house of Jehovah;
They shall flourish in the courts of our God.
They shall still bring forth fruit in old age;
They shall be full of sap and green” (Ps 92 12-14).

The palm tree or branch is used extensively on Jewish coinage and most noticeably appears as a symbol of the land upon the celebrated Judaea Capta coins of Vespasian. A couple of centuries or so later it forms a prominent architectural feature in the ornamentation of the Galilean synagogues, e.g. at Tell Hām (Capernaum). The method of artificial fertilization of the pistillate (female) flowers by means of the staminate (male) flowers appears to have been known in the earliest historic times. Winged figures are depicted on some of the early Assyrian sculptures shaking a bunch of the male flowers over the female for the same purpose as the people of modern Gaza ascend the tall trunks of the fruit-bearing palms and tie among the female flowers a bunch of the pollen-bearing male flowers.

In Pal today the palm is much neglected; there are few groves except along the coast, e.g. at the bay of Akka, Jaffa and Gaza; solitary palms occur all over the land in the courtyards of mosques (cf Ps 92 13). Abundance and houses even in the mountains.

in Palestine Once palms flourished upon the Mount of Olives (Neh 8 15), and

Jericho was long known as the "city of palm-trees"

(Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 Ch 28 15; Jos, BJ, IV, viii, 2-3), but today the only palms are scarce and small; under its name Hazazon-tamar

(2 Ch 20 2), En-gedi would appear to have been as much a place of palms in ancient days as we know it was in later history. A city, too, called Tamar ("date palm") appears to have been somewhere near the southwestern corner of the Dead Sea (Ezk 47 19; 48 28). Today the numerous salt-encrusted stumps of wild palm trees washed up all along the shores of the Dead Sea witness to the existence of these trees within recent times in some of the deep valleys around.

Branches of palms have been symbolically associated with several different ideas. A palm branch is used in Isa 9 14; 19 15 to signify the "head," the highest of the people, as contrasted with the rush, the "tail," or humblest of the people. Palm branches appear from early times to have been associated with rejoicing. On the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles the Hebrews were commanded to take branches of palms, with other trees, and rejoice before God (Lev 23 40; cf Neh 8 15; 2 Macc 10 7). The palm branch still forms the chief feature of the lulābh carried daily by every pious Jew to the synagogue, during the feast. Later it was connected with the idea of triumph and victory. Simon Maccabaeus entered the Akra at Jerus after its capture, "with thanksgiving, and branches of palm trees, and with harps, and cymbals, and with viols, and hymns, and songs: because there was destroyed a great enemy out of Israel" (1 Macc 13 51 AV; cf 2 Macc 10 7). The same idea comes out in the use of palm branches by the multitudes who escorted Jesus to Jerus (Jn 12 13) and also in the vision of the "great multitude, which no man could number . . . standing before the . . . Lamb, arrayed in white robes, and palms in their hands" (Rev 7 9). Today palms are carried in every Moslem funeral procession and are laid on the new-made grave.

PALMER-WORM, pām'ēr-wŭrm (פֶּלֶם, gāzām; LXX κάμμη, kāmpē [Am 4 9; Joel 1 4; 2 25]): "Palmer-worm" means "caterpillar," but the insect meant is probably a kind of locust. See INSECT; LOCUST.

PALSY, pól'zi, PARALYSIS, pa-ral'i-sis (παράλυσις, parálusis): The Eng. word "palsy" is derived from the OFr. paralesie, which in Middle Eng. was shortened into palesie, the form in which it appears in Wyclif's version. In the 16th cent. it appears as "palsy," the form used in AV. This, however, is seldom used at the present day, the Latinized Gr form "paralysis" being more frequently employed, both in modern literature and in colloquial Eng. "Sick of the palsy" is the tr either of the adj. para- lutikós or of the part. of the vb. paraliómai. The disease is one characterized by extreme loss of the power of motion dependent on some affection either of the motor centers of the brain or of the spinal cord. It is always serious, usually intractable, and generally sudden in onset (1 Macc 9 55f). Miraculous cures by Our Lord are related in general terms, as in Mt 4 24; Acts 8 7. Aeneas (Acts 9 33) was probably a paralytic eight years bedridden. Though the Lord addressed the paralytic let down through the roof (Mt 9 6; Mk 2 3; Lk 5 18) as "son," it was not necessarily a proof that he was young, and though He prefaces the cure by declaring the forgiveness of sin, we need not infer that the disease was the result of an evil life, although it may have been. Bennett conjectures that the centurion's palsied servant grievously tormented was suffering from progressive paralysis with respiratory spasms (see PAIN). The subst. paralysis is only once used in the LXX in Ezk 21 10, but here it refers to the loosing of the sword, not to the disease.

PALTI, pal'ti (פַּלְתִּי, pal'ti, "Jeh delivers"):

(1) One of the "searchers" of Canaan sent by Moses (Nu 13 9), representing Benjamin in the expedition (ver 9).

(2) The man to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife, after the estrangement (1 S 25 44). He is "the captain of the people" of 2 Esd 5 16 ("Phaltiel," m "Psaltiel"). In 2 S 3 15, he is named "Phaltiel" (AV), "Paltiel" (RV), and is there mentioned in connection with David's recovery of Michal.

PALTIEL, pal'ti-el (פַּלְתִּיֵּל, pal'ti'el, "God's deliverance"):

(1) A prince of Issachar (Nu 34 26).

(2) Same as PALTÍ, (2) (q.v.).

PALTITE, pal'tit (פַּלְתִּי, pal'ti [as Paltí]; LXX Β, Κελωθεί, Kelōthēi, Α, Φελλωνεί, Phellōneí): The description occurs but once in this form and is then applied to Helez, one of David's 30 valiant men (2 S 23 26). Helez' name, however, occurs in 1 Ch 11 27 and 27 10 as the "Pelonite." Doubtless there is some confusion of words. The word may be given as a patronymic of Palti, or it may designate a native of the village of Beth-pelet mentioned in Josh 15 27 and Neh 11 26 as being in Lower Judah. Helez, however, is described as "of the children of Ephraim" in 1 Ch 27 10.

PAMPHYLIA, pam-fil'i-a (Παμφυλία, Pamphylia): A country lying along the southern coast of Asia Minor, bounded on the N. by Pisidia, on the E. by Isauria, on the S. by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the W. by Lycia (Acts 2 10; 27 5).

In the earliest time Pamphylia was but a narrow strip of low-lying land between the base of the mountains and the sea, scarcely more than 20 miles long and half as wide. A high and imposing range of the Taurus Mountains practically surrounds it upon three sides, and, jutting out into the sea, isolates it from the rest of Asia Minor. Its two rivers, the Cestrus and the Cataractes, are said by ancient writers to have been navigable for several miles inland, but now the greater part of their water is diverted to the fields for irrigating purposes, and the general surface of the country has been constantly changed by the many rapid mountain streams. The level fertile coast land is therefore well watered, and the moist air, which is excessively hot and enervating, has always been laden with fever. Several roads leading from the coast up the steep mountain to the interior existed in ancient times; one of them, called the Kimax or the Ladder, with its broad stair-like steps 2,000 ft. high, may still be seen. Beyond the steps is the high land which was once called "Pisidia," but which the Romans, in 70 AD, made a part of Pamphylia.

Pamphylia, unless in pre-historic times, was never an independent kingdom; it was subject successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedonia, Pergamos and Rome. Because of its comparatively isolated position, civilization there was less developed than in the neighboring countries, and the Asiatic influence was at most times stronger than the Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC a Gr colony settled there, but the Gr language which was spoken in some of its cities soon became corrupt; the Gr inscriptions, appearing upon the coins of that age, were written in a peculiar character, and before the time of Alexander the Great, Gr ceased to be spoken. Perga then became an important city and the center of the Asiatic religion, of which the Artemis of Perga, locally known as Leto, was the goddess. Coins were struck also in that city. Somewhat later the Gr city of Attalia, which was founded by Attalus III Philadelphus (159-138 BC), rose to importance, and until recent years has been the chief port of entry on the southern coast of Asia Minor. About the beginning of our era, Side became the chief city, and issued a long and beautiful series of coins, possibly to facilitate trade with the pirates who found there a favorable market for their booty. Pamphylia is mentioned as one of the recipients of the "letters" of 1 Macc 15 23.

2. Im- portance

Christianity was first introduced to Pamphylia by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13 13; 14 24), but

3. Intro- duction of Christianity because their stay in the country was brief, or because of the difficulty of communication with the neighboring countries, or because of the Asiatic character of the population, it was slow in being established. See also ATTALIA; PERGA; SIDE, the chief cities of Pamphylia.

PAN: Name of a utensil used in the preparation or the serving of food, and representing several words in the original. Passing over the use of the word in connections like 1 Ch 9 31, "things baked in pans," where the Heb word hābhūṭīm refers, not to the pan itself, but to the cakes baked in the flat pan or griddle which was called maḥābhath (see below), and the "firepans" (maḥtāh) (Ex 27 3; 1 K 7 50, etc) which seem to have been used to carry burning coals, we note the following words:

(1) מִתְבַּת, maḥābhath, "pan" AV, "baking-pan" RV, a dish of uncertain shape and size which was used in the preparation of the minḥāh, or vegetable offering. See Lev 2 5; 6 21; 7 9; 1 Ch 23 29. On the basis of Ezk 4 3 it might be assumed that the pan was rectangular in shape and of good size.

(2) כִּיּוֹר, kiyyōr, rendered "pan" in 1 S 2 14. The same word is used in the phrase, "pan of fire" RV, "hearth of fire" AV (Zec 12 6); and it is also tr^d "laver" in the descriptions of the furnishing of tabernacle and temple (Ex 30 18; 1 K 7 30, etc). As it held water and was used for boiling meat and the like, it must have been a kind of pot or kettle.

(3) מִשְׁרֵת, masrēth (2 S 13 9). The connection gives no clue as to shape or size except that it must have been small enough to serve food in, and of the proper shape to hold a substance which could be poured out. Some authorities suggest a connection with the root שָׁאָר, s'ōr, "leaven," and think that this pan was like the kneading-trough in shape.

(4) סִיר, ṣīr, rendered "pan" in Ex 27 3 AV, "pot" RV (see Pot).

(5) פָּרֹר, pārūr, "pan" in Nu 11 8 AV, "pot" RV (see Pot).

(6) צֶלֶהָה, ṣēlāhāh (2 Ch 35 13). Some kind of dish or pot. Slightly different forms of the same root are rendered "cruse" (2 K 2 20 [ṣ'lēhāth]), "dish" (2 K 21 13 [ṣallāhath]); and also in RV in Prov 19 24; 26 15, instead of the probably incorrect "bosom" of AV.

(7) לֶבֶשׂ, lēbēs, tr^d "pan" in 1 Esd 1 12 AV (RV "cauldron").

(8) תִּגְאָנוֹן, tēganon, 2 Macc 7 3.5, with the vb. תִּגְאָנִיזָו, tēganīzō, ver 5, is the usual Gr word for "frying-pan," but here a large sheet of metal must be meant (cf 4 Macc 8 13; 12 10.20).

PANNAG, pan'ag (פַּנָּאג, pannagh; קַסְיָא, kasia; Ezk 27 17 m, "Perhaps a kind of confection"): One of the articles of commerce of Judah and Israel. The kasia of the LXX is said to be a shrub similar to the laurel. Nothing is known of the nature of pannag. Cheyne (EB, 3555) thinks the Heb letters have got misplaced and should be פֶּנֶן, gephen, "vine," and he would join to it the דְּבַשׁ, d'bbash, "honey," which follows in the verse, giving a tr "grape honey," the ordinary dibbs of Pal—an extremely likely article of commerce. See HONEY.

PANOPLY, pan'o-ply: 1 Macc 13 29 RVm. See ARMOR.

PAP (שֶׁד, shadh, שֹׁדֶה, shōdh, "breast" [Ezk 23 21]; μαστός, masτός, "the breast" [Lk 11 27; 23 29; Rev 1 13]): The Eng. word, which goes back to Middle Eng. "pappe" (see Skeat, Concise Etymological Dict. of the Eng. Language, 327) and is now obsolete, has been replaced in RV by "breast." The Heb word signifies the "female breast"; the Gr word has a wider signification, including the male chest.

PAPER, pā'pēr. See CRAFTS, II, 13; PAPYRUS; REED; WRITING.

PAPER REEDS, rēdz: In Isa 19 7 AV (RV "meadows").

PAPHOS, pā'fos: The name of two towns, Old (Παλαία Πάφος, Palaiā Pāphos, or Παλαίραφος, Palairaphos) and New Paphos (Νέα Πάφος, Nēa Pāphos), situated at the southwestern extremity of Cyprus.

1. Site Considerable confusion is caused by the use of the single name Paphos in ancient writers to denote now one, now the other, of these cities. That referred to in Acts 13 6.13 is strictly called New Paphos (modern Baffa), and lay on the coast about a mile S. of the modern Ktima and some 10 miles N.W. of the old city. The latter (modern Kouklia) is situated on an eminence more than a mile from the sea, on the left bank of the Diárrizo, probably the ancient Bocarus.

It was founded by Cinyras, the father of Adonis, or, according to another legend, by Aerias, and formed the capital of the most important kingdom in Cyprus except that of Old of Salamis. Its territory embraced Paphos a considerable portion of Western Cyprus, extending northward to that of Soli, southward to that of Curium and eastward to the range of Troödis. Among its last kings was Nicocles, who ruled shortly after the death of Alexander the Great. In 310 BC Nicocreon of Salamis, who had been set over the whole of Cyprus by Ptolemy I of Egypt, was forced to put an end to his life at Paphos for plotting with Antigonos (Diodorus xx. 21, who wrongly gives the name as Nicocles; see Athenische Mittheilungen, XXII, 203 ff), and from that time Paphos remained under Egypt rule until the Rom annexation of Cyprus in 58 BC. The growth of New Paphos brought with it the decline of the old city, which was also ruined by successive earthquakes. Yet its temple still retained much of its old fame, and in 69 AD Titus, the future emperor of Rome, turned aside on his journey to Jerus, which he was to capture in the following year, to visit the sacred shrine and to inquire of the priests into the fortune which awaited him (Tacitus Hist. ii.2-4; Suetonius Titus 5).

New Paphos, originally the seaport of the old town, was founded, according to tradition, by

3. History Pausan. viii.5, 2). Its possession of a good harbor secured its prosperity, and it had several rich temples. According to Dio Cassius (liv.23) it was restored by Augustus in 15 BC after a destructive earthquake and received the name Augusta (Gr Sebaste). Under the Rom Empire it was the administrative capital of the island and the seat of the governor. The extant remains all date from this period and include those of public buildings, private houses, city walls and the moles of the harbor.

But the chief glory of Paphos and the source of its fame was the local cult, of which the kings and

4. The Temple and Cult their descendants remained hereditary priests down to the Rom seizure of Cyprus. The goddess, identified with the Gr Aphrodite, who was said to have risen from the sea at Paphos, was in reality a Nature-goddess, closely resembling the Bab Ishtar and the Phoen Astarte, a native deity of Asia Minor and the Aegean Islands. Her cult can be traced back at Paphos to Homeric times (Odyssey viii.362) and was repeatedly celebrated by Gr and Lat poets (Aeschylus Suppl. 555; Aristoph. Lys. 833; Virgil Aen. i.415; Horace Odes i.19 and 30; iii.26; Statius Silvae i.2, 101, etc.). The goddess was represented, not by a statue in human form, but by a white conical stone (Max. Tyr. viii.8; Tacitus Hist. ii.3; Servius Ad Aen. i.724), of which models were on sale for the benefit of pilgrims (Athenaeus xv.18); her worship was sensuous in character and she is referred to by Athanasius as the deification of lust (Contra Gentes 9). Excavation has brought to light at Old Paphos a complex of buildings belonging to Rom times and consisting of an open court with chambers or colonnades on three sides and an entrance on the E. only, the whole forming a quadrilateral enclosure with sides about 210 ft. long. In this court may have stood the altar, or altars, of incense (Homer speaks of a single altar, Virgil of "a hundred altars warm with Sabaeen frankincense"); no blood might be shed thereon, and although it stood in the open it was "wet by no rain" (Tacitus, l.c.; Pliny, NH. ii.210). On the south side are the ruins of another building, possibly an earlier temple, now almost destroyed save for the western wall (Journal of Hellenic Studies, IX, 193-224). But the fact that no remains or inscriptions have been found here earlier than the Rom occupation of Cyprus militates against the view that the sanctuary stood at this spot from prehistoric times. Its site may be sought at Xylino, a short distance to the N. of Kouklia (D. G. Hogarth, Times, August 5, 1910), or possibly on the plateau of Rhantidi, some 3 miles S.E. of the village, where numerous inscriptions in the old Cyprian syllabic script were found in the summer of 1910 (M. Ohnefalsch-Richter, Times, July 29, 1910).

After visiting Salamis and passing through the whole island, about 100 miles in length, Barnabas,

5. The Apostles' Visit Paul and Mark reached Paphos, the residence of the Rom proconsul, Sergius Paulus (for the title see CYPRUS). Here too they would doubtless begin by preaching in the synagogue, but the governor—who is probably the same Paulus whose name appears as proconsul in an inscription of Soli (D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, 114)—hearing of their mission, sent for them and questioned them on the subject of their preaching. A Jew named Bar-Jesus or Elymas, who, as a Magian or soothsayer, "was with the proconsul," presumably as a member of his suite, used all his powers of persuasion to prevent his patron from giving his adherence to the new faith, and was met by Paul (it is at this point that the name is first introduced) with a scathing denunciation and a sentence of temporary loss of sight. The blindness which at once fell on him produced a deep impression on the mind of the proconsul, who professed his faith in the apostolic teaching. From Paphos, Paul and his companions sailed in a northwesterly direction to Perga in Pamphylia (Acts 13 6-13).

Paul did not revisit Paphos, but we may feel confident that Barnabas and Mark would return there on their 2d missionary journey (Acts 15 39). Of the later history of the Paphian church we know little. Tychicus, Paul's companion, is said to have been martyred there, and Jerome tells us that Hilarion sought in the neighborhood of the decayed and almost deserted town the quiet and retirement which he craved (Vita Hilar. 42). The Acta Barnabae speak of a certain Rhodon, who was attached to the temple service at Old Paphos, as having accepted the Christian faith.

A marsh or water plant, abundant in Egypt in ancient times, serving many purposes in antiquity. The papyrus tuft was the emblem of the Northern Kingdom in Egypt. Like the lotus, it suggested one of the favorite capitals of Egypt architecture. Ropes, sandals, and mats were made from its fibers (see Odyssey xxi.391; Herod. ii.37, 69), and bundles of the long, light stalks were bound together into light boats (Isa 18 2; Breasted, Hist Egyptians, 91).

Most importantly, from it was made the tough and inexpensive paper which was used from very ancient times in Egypt and which

1. Papyrus Paper became the common writing-material of the ancient world. The white cellular pith of the long triangular papyrus stalk was stripped of its bark or rind and sliced into thin strips. Two layers of these strips were laid at right angles to each other, pasted together (Pliny says with the aid of Nile water), dried and smoothed. The sheets thus formed were pasted one to another to form a roll of any length desired. The process and the product are described by Pliny the Elder (NH, xiii.11-13).

Egypt papyrus rolls are in existence dating from the 27th cent. BC, and no doubt the manufacture of papyrus had been practised for centuries before. The Egypt rolls were sometimes of great length and were often beautifully decorated with colored vignettes (Book of the Dead). Egypt docuincense and burnt offerings. In 408, the Egyptians had destroyed their temple at Yeb, and the Jews appealed for redress to the Pers governor. It is well known that some Jews had taken refuge in Egypt in 586 BC, taking the prophet Jeremiah with them, and with some such band of refugees the Yeb colony may have originated, although it may have been much older (cf Jer 44 1.15; BW, XXIX, 1907, 305 ff; XXXI, 448 ff; chief publications by Euting, Sayce and Cowley, and esp. Sachau, Drei aramäische Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, 2d ed, 1908; Aramäische Papyrus und Ostraka, 1911).

With Alexander's conquest of Egypt (332 BC), and the subsequent Ptolemaic dynasty, Greeks came more than ever before into

4. Greek Papyri Egypt, and from Gr centers like Alexandria and Arsinoë in the Fayûm the Gr language began to spread.

Through the Ptolemaic (323-30 BC), Rom (30 BC-292/93 AD), and Byzantine periods (292/93-640 AD), that is, from the death of Alexander to the Arab conquest, Gr was much used in Upper and Lower Egypt, and Gr papyri from these times are now abundant. The 300 Aphrodito Gr and Coptic papyri published by Bell and Crum (1910) date from 698-722 AD, and show how Gr persisted in the Arab period.

The first important discovery of Gr papyri made in modern times was among the ruins of Herculaneum, near Naples, where in 1752

5. Their Discovery in the ruins of the house of a philosopher which had been destroyed and buried by volcanic ashes from Vesuvius (79 AD) a whole library of papyrus rolls was found, quite charred by the heat. With the utmost pains many of these have been unrolled and deciphered, and the first part of them was published in 1793. They consist almost wholly of works of Epicurean philosophy. In 1778 the first discovery of Gr papyri in Egypt was made. In that year some Arabs found 40 or 50 papyrus rolls in an earthen pot, probably in the Fayûm, where Philadelphus settled his Gr veterans. One was purchased by a dealer and found its way into the hands of Cardinal Stefano Borgia; the others were destroyed as of no worth. The Borgia Papyrus was published 10 years later. It was a document of little value, recording the forced labor of certain peasants upon the Nile embankment of a given year.

In 1820 another body of papyri was found by natives, buried, it was said, in an earthen pot, on the site of the Serapeum at Memphis, just above Cairo. These came for the most part from the 2d cent. BC. They fell into various hands, and are now in the museums of London, Paris, Leyden, Rome and Dresden. With them the stream of papyri began to flow steadily into the British and Continental museums. In 1821 an Englishman, Mr. W. J. Bankes, bought an Elephantine roll of the xivth book of the Iliad, the first Gr literary papyrus to be derived from Egypt. The efforts of Mr. Harris and others in 1847-50 brought to England considerable parts of lost orations of Hyperides, new papyri of the xviith book of the Iliad, and parts of Iliad ii, iii, ix. In 1855 Mariette purchased a fragment of Alcman for the Louvre, and in 1856 Mr. Stobart obtained the funeral oration of Hyperides.

The present period of papyrus recovery dates from 1877, when an immense mass of Gr and other papyri, for the most part documentary, not literary, was found in the Fayûm, on the site of the ancient Arsinoë. The bulk of this collection passed into the hands of Archduke Rainer at Vienna, minor portions of it being secured by the museums of Paris, London, Oxford and Berlin. These belong largely to the Byzantine period. Another great find was made in 1892 in the Fayûm; most of these ments of great historical value have been preserved on these fragile rolls. The Papyrus Ebers of the 16th cent. BC sums up the medical lore of the Egyptians of the time of Amenhotep I. The Papyrus Harris, 133 ft. long, in 117 columns, dates from the middle of the 12th cent. BC and records the benefactions and achievements of Ramses III. For the XIXth, XXth and XXIst dynasties, indeed, papyri are relatively numerous, and their contribution important for Egypt history, life and religion. By the year 1000 BC, papyrus had doubtless come to be used for writing far beyond the limits of Egypt. The Wenamon Papyrus (11th cent.) relates that 500 rolls of papyrus were among the gifts sent from the Delta to the Prince of Biblus, but except in the rarest instances papyri have escaped destruction only in Upper Egypt, where climatic conditions esp. favored their preservation.

In very recent years (1898, 1904, 1907) several Aram. papyri have been found on the Island of

3. Aramaic Papyri Elephantine, just below the First Cataract, dating from 494 to 400 BC. They show that between 470 and 408

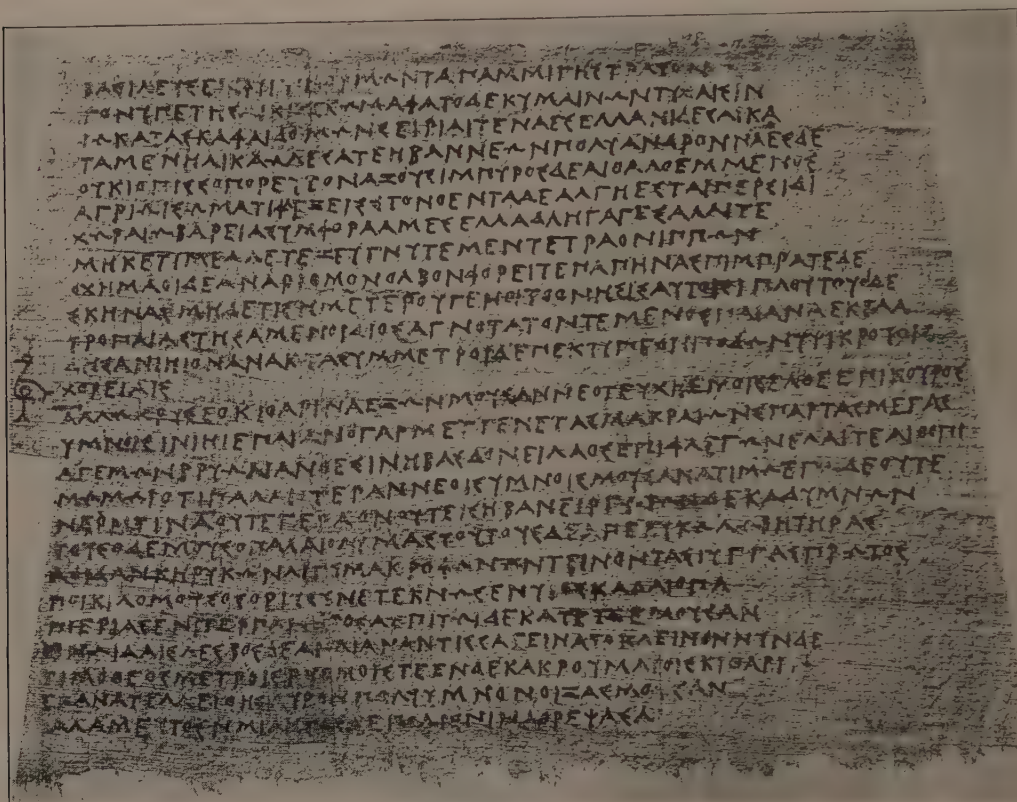

BC a flourishing colony of Jews existed there, doing business under Pers sway, and worshipping their god Yahu, not in a synagogue, but in a temple, in which they offered meal offerings, went to Berlin, some few to the British Museum, Vienna and Geneva. These were mostly of the Rom period.

It will be seen that most of these discoveries were the work of natives, digging about indiscriminately in the hope of finding antiquities to sell to tourists or dealers. By this time, however, the Egypt Exploration Fund had begun its operations in Egypt, and Professor Flinders Petrie was at work there. Digging among Ptolemaic tombs at Gurob in 1889-90, Professor Petrie found many mummies, or mummy-casings, adorned with breast-pieces and sandals made of papyri pasted together. The separation of these was naturally a tedious and delicate fell, the first of many important works in this field from his pen.

With Arthur S. Hunt, of Oxford, Mr. Grenfell excavated in 1896-97, at Behnesa, the Rom Oxyrhynchus, and unearthed the greatest mass of Gr papyri of the Rom period thus far found. In 9 large quarto volumes, aggregating 3,000 pages, only a beginning has been made of publishing these Oxyrhynchus texts, which number thousands and are in many cases of great importance. The story of papyrus digging in Egypt since the great find of 1896-97 is largely the record of the work of Grenfell and Hunt. At Tebtunis, in the Fayûm, in 1900, they found a great mass of Ptolemaic papyri, com-task, and the papyri when extricated were often badly damaged or mutilated; but the Petrie papyri, as they were called, were hailed by scholars as the most important found up to that time, for they came for the most part from the 3d cent. BC. Startling acquisitions were made about this time by representatives of the British Museum and the Louvre. The British Museum secured papyri of the lost work of Aristotle on the Constitution of Athens, the lost Mimes of Herodas, a fragment of an oration of Hyperides, and extensive literary papyri of works already extant; while the Louvre secured the larger part of the Oration against Athenogenes, the masterpiece of Hyperides. In 1894 Bernard P. Grenfell, of Oxford, appeared in Egypt, working with Professor Petrie in his excavations, and securing papyri with Mr. Hogarth for England. In that year Petrie and Grenfell obtained from native dealers papyrus rolls, one more than 40 ft. in length, preserving revenue laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus, dated in 259-258 BC. These were published in 1896 by Mr. Grenparable in importance with their great discovery at Oxyrhynchus. One of the most productive sources of papyri at Tebtunis was the crocodile cemetery, in which many mummies of the sacred crocodiles were found rolled in papyrus. Important Ptolemaic texts were found in 1902 at Hibeh, and a later visit to Oxyrhynchus in 1903 produced results almost as astonishing and quite as valuable as those of the first excavations there. The work of Rubensohn at Abusir in 1908 has exceptional interest, as it developed the first considerable body of Alexandrian papyri that has been found. The soil and climate of Alexandria are destructive to papyri, and only to the fact that these had anciently been carried off into the interior as rubbish is their preservation due. Hogarth, Jouguet, Wilcken and other Continental scholars have excavated in Egypt for papyri with varying degrees of success. The papyri are found in graves a few feet below the surface, in house ruins over which sand has drifted, or occasionally in earthen pots buried in the ground. Despite government efforts to stop indiscriminate native digging, papyri in considerable quantities have continued to find their way into the hands of native dealers, and thence into English, Continental, and even American collections.

Thus far upward of 650 literary papyri, great and small, of works other than Bib. have been published. The fact that about one-third

6. Classical of these are Homeric attests the great popularity enjoyed by the Homeric poems in Gr-Rom times. These are now so abundant and extensive as to make an important contribution to the Homeric text. Rather less than one-third preserve works of other ancient writers which were already known to us through later copies, mediaeval or modern. Among these are works of Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, Thucydides, Euripides, Sophocles, Aeschines, Herodotus and others. Rather more than one-third preserve works, or fragments of works, which have been either quite unknown or, oftener, regarded as lost. Such are portions of Alcman and Sappho, fragments of the comedies of Menander and the iambi of Callimachus, Mimes of Herodas, poems of Bacchylides, parts of the lost Antiope and Hypsipyle of Euripides, Aristotle On the Constitution of Athens, the Persae of Timotheus (in a papyrus of the 4th cent. BC, probably the oldest Gr book in the world), and six orations, one of them complete, of Hyperides. In 1906 Grenfell and Hunt discovered at Oxyrhynchus the unique papyrus of the lost Paeans of Pindar, in 380 fragments, besides the Hellenica of Theopompus (or Cratippus?), whose works were believed to have perished.

Of the Gr OT (LXX) more than 20 papyri have been discovered. Perhaps the most important of these is the Berlin Genesis (3d or 4th

Amherst (2), British Museum (3), and Oxyrhynchus (4), papyri date from the 3d or 4th cent. A Bodleian papyrus leaf (5) (7th or 8th cent.) preserves Cant 1 6-9. An Amherst papyrus (6) (7th cent.) contains Job 1 21 f; 2 3. There are several papyri of parts of the Ps. An Amherst papyrus (7) (5th or 6th cent.) has Ps 5 6-12. Brit. Mus. 37 (Fragmenta Londinensia, 6th or 7th cent.) (8), of thirty leaves, contains Ps 10 2-18 6 and 20 14-34 6. This was purchased in 1836 and is one of the longest of Bib. papyri. Brit. Mus. 230 (9) (3d cent.) preserves Ps 12 7-15 4. A Berlin papyrus (10) contains Ps 40 26-41 4. Oxyrhynchus papyrus 845 (11) (4th or 5th cent.) contains parts of Pss 68, 70. Another Amherst papyrus (12) (7th cent.) shows parts of Pss 108, 118, 135, 138-140. There is also a papyrus at Leipzig (13) which contains part of the Ps. Of the Prophets the chief papyrus is the Heidelberg codex (14) (7th cent.), which contains Zec 4 6-Mal 4 5. Oxyrhynchus 846 (15) (6th cent.) contains Am 2. A Rainer papyrus (16) (3d cent.) preserves Isa 38

these documents gives especial interest to their readings.

Twenty-three papyri containing parts of the Gr NT have thus far been published, nearly half of them coming from Oxyrhynchus (O.P.

Among other theological papyri, the Oxyrhynchus Sayings of Jesus (O.P. 1,654), dating from the 2d and 3d cents., are probably the most

9. Theological Papyri widely known (see LOGIA). Other Oxyrhynchus pieces preserve parts of the Apocalypse of Baruch (chs 12-14; 4th or 5th cent.; O.P. 403); the Gospel according to the Hebrews (? in its later form, if at all; 3d cent.; O.P. 655); the Acts of John (4th cent.; O.P. 850, cf 851); the Shepherd of Hermas (3d or 4th cent.; O.P. 404); Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., iii.9 (3d cent.; O.P. 405). Other small fragments of the Shepherd and Ignatius are among the Amherst and Berlin papyri. Early Christian hymns, prayers and letters of interest have also been found.

We have spoken thus far only of literary papyri, classical and theological. The overwhelming majority of the papyri found have of course

10. Documentary Papyri been documentary—private letters, accounts, wills, receipts, contracts, leases, deeds, complaints, petitions, notices, invitations, etc. The value of these contemporary and original documents for the illumination of ancient life can hardly be overestimated. The life of Upper Egypt in Ptolemaic and Rom times is now probably better known to us than that of any other period of history down to recent times. Many papyrus collections have no literary papyri at all, but are rich in documents. Each year brings more of these to light and new volumes of them into print. All this vast and growing body of material contributes to our knowledge of Ptolemaic and imperial times, often in the most intimate ways. Among the most important of these documentary papyri from Ptolemaic times are the revenue laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus (259 BC) and the decrees of Ptolemy Euergetes II, 47 in number (118 BC, 140-139 BC). Very recently (1910) a Hamburg papyrus has supplied the Constitutio Antoniniana, by which Rom citizenship was conferred upon the peregrini of the empire. The private documents in ways even more important illustrate the life of the common people under Ptolemaic and Rom rule.

It is not necessary to point out the value of all this for Bib. and esp. NT study. The papyri have already made a valuable contribution to textual materials of both OT and NT. 11. Contribution to NT Study For other early Christian lit. their testimony has been of surprising interest (the Oxyrhynchus Logia and Gospel fragments). The discovery of a series of uncial MSS running through six centuries back of the Codex Vaticanus bridges the gap between what were our earliest uncials and the hand of the inscriptions, and puts us in a better position than ever before to fix the dates of uncial MSS. Minuscule or cursive hands, too, so common in NT MSS of the 10th and later cents., appear in a new light when it is seen that such writing was not a late invention arising out of the uncial, but had existed side by side with it from at least the 4th cent. BC, as the ordinary, as distinguished from the literary, or book, hand. See WRITING. The lexical contribution of these documentary papyri, too, is already considerable, and is likely to be very great. Like the NT writings, they reflect the common as distinguished from the literary language of the times, and words which had appeared exceptional or unknown in Gr lit. are now shown to have been in common use. The problems of NT syntax are similarly illuminated. Specific historical notices sometimes light up dark points in the NT, as in a British Museum decree of Gaius Vibius Maximus, prefect of Egypt (104 AD), ordering all who are out of their districts to return to their own homes in view of the approaching census (cf Lk 2 1-5). Most important of all is the contribution of the papyri to a sympathetic knowledge of ancient life. They constitute a veritable gallery of NT characters. A strong light is sometimes thrown upon the social evils of the time, of which Paul and Juvenal wrote so sternly. The child, the prodigal, the thief, the host with his invitations, the steward with his accounts, the thrifty householder, the soldier on service receiving his viaticum, or retired as a veteran upon his farm, the Jewish money-lender, the husbandman, and the publican, besides people in every domestic relation, we meet at first hand in the papyri which they themselves in many cases have written. The worth of this for the historical interpretation of the NT is very great.

The principal collections of Gr papyri with their editors are Schow, Herculaneum Papyri; Peyron, Turin Papyri; Leemans, Leyden Papyri; Wessely, Rainer and Paris Papyri; Kenyon and Bell, British Museum Papyri; Mahaffy and Smyly, Petrie Papyri; Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus, Amherst and Hibeh Papyri (with Hogarth), Fayûm Papyri, and (with Smyly and Goodspeed) Tebtunis Papyri; Hunt, Rylands Papyri; Nicole, Geneva Papyri; Krebs, Wilcken, Viereck, Schubart and others, Berlin Papyri; Meyer, Hamburg and Giessen Papyri; Deissmann, Heidelberg Papyri; Vitelli and Compagetti, Florence Papyri; Mitteis, Leipzig Papyri; Preisigke, Strassburg Papyri; Reinach, Paris Papyri; Jouquet and Lesquier, Lille Papyri; Rubensohn, Elephantine Papyri; Maspero, Cairo Papyri; Goodspeed, Cairo and Chicago Papyri. The Munich papyri have been described by Wilcken. Milligan's Gr Papyri, Kenyon's Palaeography of Gr Papyri, and Deissmann's Light from the Ancient East are useful introductions to the general subject. Mayser has prepared a Grammatik der Ptolemäischen Papyri.

Coptic, Arab., Heb and Demotic papyri are numerous; even Lat papyri are found. The Coptic have already made important contributions to early Christian literature. A considerable

13. Coptic, Coptic fragment of the Acts of Paul, Arabic and a Coptic (Akhmîmic) codex of 1 Other Papyri Clement, almost complete, have recently been published by Carl Schmidt.

Another much mutilated papyrus of 1 Clement, with James, complete, is at Strassburg. A Coptic text of Prov has been brought to Berlin from the same source which supplied the Clement codex (the White Convent, near Akhmîm); indeed, Bib. papyri in Coptic are fairly numerous, and patristic lit. is being rapidly enriched by such discoveries of Coptic papyri, e.g. the Dt, Jon, Acts papyrus, 1912 (cf Sahidic NT, Oxford, 1911).

Arab. papyri first began to appear from Egypt in 1825, when three Arab. pieces were brought to Paris and published by Silvestre de Sacy. Two others, from the 7th cent., were published by him in 1827. It was not until the great papyrus finds of 1877-78, however, that any considerable number of Arab. papyri found their way into Europe. The chief collections thus far formed are at Vienna (Rainer Collection), Berlin and Cairo. Becker has published the Schott-Reinhardt Arab. papyri at Heidelberg, and Karabacek has worked upon those at Vienna. They belong of course to the period after the Arab. conquest, 640 AD.

PARABLE, par'-a-b'l:

1. Name
2. Historical Data
3. Christ's Use of Parables
4. Purpose of Christ in Using Parables
5. Interpretation of the Parables
6. Doctrinal Value of the Parables

Etymologically the word "parable" (παράβολον, paraballō) signifies a placing of two or more objects together, usually for the purpose of

1. Name a comparison. In this widest sense of the term there is practically no difference between parable and simile (see Thayer, Dict. of NT Gr., s.v.). This is also what substantially some of Christ's parables amount to, which consist of only one comparison and in a single verse (cf Mt 13 33.44-46). In the more usual and technical sense of the word, "parable" ordinarily signifies an imaginary story, yet one that in its details could have actually transpired, the purpose of the story being to illustrate and inculcate some higher spiritual truth. These features differentiate it from other and similar figurative narratives as also from actual history. The similarity between the last-mentioned and a parable is sometimes so small that exegetes have differed in the interpretation of certain pericopes. A characteristic example of this uncertainty is the story of Dives and Lazarus in Lk 16 19-31. The problem is of a serious nature, as those who regard this as actual history are compelled to interpret each and every statement, including too the close proximity of heaven and hell and the possibility of speaking from one place to the other, while those who regard it as a parable can restrict their interpretation to the features that constitute the substance of the story. It differs again from the fable, in so far as the latter is a story that could not actually have occurred (e.g. Jgs 9 8 ff; 2 K 14 9; Ezk 17 2 f). The parable is often described as an extended metaphor. The etymological features of the word, as well as the relation of parables to other and kindred devices of style, are discussed more fully by Ed. Koenig, in HDB, III, 660 ff.

Although Christ employed the parable as a means of inculcating His message more extensively and more effectively than any other teacher, He did not invent the parable. It was His custom

2. Historical Data in general to take over from the religious and linguistic world of thought in His own day the materials that

He employed to convey the higher and deeper truths of His gospels, giving them a world of meaning they had never before possessed. Thus e.g. every petition of the Lord's Prayer can be duplicated in the Jewish liturgies of the times, yet on Christ's lips these petitions have a significance they never had or could have for the Jews. The term "Word" for the second person in the Godhead is an adaptation from the Logos-idea in contemporaneous religious thought, though not specifically of Philo's. Baptism, regeneration, and kindred expressions of fundamental thoughts in the Christian system, are terms not absolutely new (cf Deutsch, art. "Talmud," Literary Remains). The parable was employed both in the OT and in contemporaneous Jewish literature (cf e.g. 2 S 12 1-4; Isa 5 1-6; 28 24-28, and for details see Koenig's art., l.c.). Jewish and other non-Bib. parables are discussed and illustrated by examples in Trench's Notes on the Parables of Our Lord, introd. essay, ch iv: "On Other Parables besides Those in the Scriptures."

The one and only teacher of parables in the NT is Christ Himself. The Epp., although they often employ rhetorical allegories and similes,

3. Christ's Use of Parables make absolutely no use of the parable, so common in Christ's pedagogical methods. The distribution of these in the Canonical Gospels is unequal, and they are strictly confined to the three Synoptic Gospels. Mark again has only one peculiar to this book, namely, the Seed Growing in Secret (Mk 4 26), and he gives only three others that are found also in Mt and Lk, namely the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Wicked Husbandman, so that the bulk of the parables are found in the First and the Third Gospels. Two are common to Mt and Lk, namely the Leaven (Mt 13 33; Lk 13 21) and the Lost Sheep (Mt 18 12; Lk 15 3 ff). Of the remaining parables, 18 are found only in Lk and 10 only in Mt. Lk's 18 include some of the finest, viz. the Two Debtors, the Good Samaritan, the Friend at Midnight, the Rich Fool, the Watchful Servants, the Barren Fig Tree, the Chief Seats, the Great Supper, the Rash Builder, the Rash King, the Lost Coin, the Lost Son, the Unrighteous Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Unprofitable Servants, the Unrighteous Judge, the Pharisee and Publican, and the Pounds. The 10 peculiar to Mt are the Tares, the Hidden Treasure, the Pearl of Great Price, the Draw Net, the Unmerciful Servant, the Laborers in the Vineyard, the Two Sons, the Marriage of the King's Son, the Ten Virgins, and the Talents. There is some uncertainty as to the exact number of parables we have from Christ, as the Marriage of the King's Son is sometimes regarded as a different recension of the Great Supper, and the Talents of the Pounds. Other numberings are suggested by Trench, Jülicher and others.

It is evident from such passages as Mt 13 10 ff (cf Mk 4 10; Lk 8 9) that Christ did not in the beginning of His career employ the

4. Purpose of Christ in Using Parables parable as a method of teaching, but introduced it later. This took place evidently during the 2d year of His public ministry, and is closely connected with the changes which about that time He made in His attitude toward the people in general. It evidently was Christ's purpose at the outset to win over, if possible, the nation as a whole to His cause and to the gospel; when it appeared that the leaders and the great bulk of the people would not accept Him for what He wanted to be and clung tenaciously to their carnal Messianic ideas and ideals, Christ ceased largely to appeal to the masses, and, by confining His instructions chiefly to His disciples and special friends, saw the necessity of organizing an ecclesiola in ecclesia, which was eventually to develop into the world-conquering church. One part of this general withdrawal of Christ from a proclamation of His gospel to the whole nation was this change in His method of teaching and the adoption of the parable. On that subject He leaves no doubt, according to Mt 13 11 ff; Mk 4 12; Lk 8 10. The purpose of the parable is both to reveal and to conceal the truth. It was to serve the first purpose in the case of the disciples, the second in the case of the undeserving Jews. Psychologically this difference, notwithstanding the acknowledged inferiority in the training and education of the disciples, esp. as compared with the scribes and lawyers, is not hard to understand. A simple-minded Christian, who has some understanding of the truth, can readily understand figurative illustrations of this truth, which would be absolute enigmas even to an educated Hindu or Chinaman. The theological problem involved is more difficult. Yet it is evident that we are not dealing with those who have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, for whom there is no possibility of a return to grace, according to He 6 4-10; 10 26 (cf Mt 12 31-32; Mk 3 28-30), and who accordingly could no longer be influenced by an appeal of the gospel, and we have rather before us those from whom Christ has determined to withdraw the offer of redemption—whether temporarily or definitely and finally, remaining an open question—according to His policy of not casting pearls before the swine. The proper sense of these passages can be ascertained only when we remember that in Mk 4 12 and Lk 8 10, the ἴνα, ἵνα, need not express purpose, but that this particle is used here to express mere result only, as is clear too from the passage in Mt 13 13, where the ἵνα, ἵνα, is found. The word is to be withheld from these people, so that this preaching would not bring about the ordinary results of conversion and forgiveness of sins. Hence Christ now adopts a method of teaching that will hide the truth from all those who have not yet been imbued by it, and this new method is that of the parable.

The principles for the interpretation of the parables, which are all intended primarily and in the first place for the disciples, are furnished by the nature of the parable itself and by Christ's own method of interpreting some of them. The first and foremost thing to be discovered is the scope or the particular spiritual truth which the parable is intended to convey. Just what this scope is may be stated in so many words, as is done, e.g., by the introductory words to that of the Pharisee and the Publican. Again the scope may be learned from the occasion of the parable, as the question of Peter in Mt 18 21 gives the scope of the following parable, and the real purpose of the Prodigal Son parable in Lk 15 11 ff is not the story of this young man himself, but is set over against the murmuring of the Pharisees because Christ received publicans and sinners, in vs 1 and 2, to exemplify the all-forgiving love of the Father. Not the Son but the Father is in the foreground in this parable, which fact is also the connecting link between the two parts. Sometimes the scope can be learned only from an examination of the details of the parable itself and then may be all the more uncertain.

A second principle of the interpretation of the parables is that a sharp distinction must be made between what the older interpreters called the body (corpus) and the soul (anima) of the story; or, to use other expressions, between the shell or bark (cortex) and the marrow (medulla). Whatever serves only the purpose of the story is the "ornamentation" of the parable, and does not belong to the substance. The former does not call for interpretation or higher spiritual lesson; the latter does. This distinction between those parts of the parable that are intended to convey spiritual meanings and those which are to be ignored in the interpretation is based on Christ's own interpretation of the so-called parabolae perfectae. Christ Himself, in Mt 13 18 ff, interprets the parable of the Sower, yet a number of data, such as the fact that there are four, and not more or fewer kinds of land, and others, are discarded in this explanation as without meaning. Again in His interpretation of the Tares among the Wheat in Mt 13 36 ff, a number of details of the original parable are discarded as meaningless.

Just which details are significant and which are meaningless in a parable is often hard, sometimes impossible to determine, as the history of their exegesis amply shows. In general it can be laid down as a rule, that those features which illustrate the scope of the parable belong to its substance, and those which do not, belong to the ornamentation. But even with this rule there remain many exegetical crucis or difficulties. Certain, too, it is that not all of the details are capable of interpretation. Some are added of a nature that indeed illustrate the story as a story, but, from the standpoint of Christian morals, are more than objectionable. The Unjust Steward in using his authority to make the bills of the debtors of his master smaller may be a model, in the shrewd use of this world's goods for his purpose, that the Christian may follow in making use of his goods for his purposes, but the action of the steward itself is incapable of defence. Again, the man who finds in somebody else's property a pearl of great price but conceals this fact from the owner of the land and quietly buys this ground may serve as an example to show how much the kingdom of God is worth, but from an ethical standpoint his action cannot be sanctioned. In general, the parable, like all other forms of figurative expression, has a meaning only as far as the tertium comparationis goes, that is, the third thing which is common to the two things compared. But all this still leaves a large debatable ground in many parables. In the Laborers in the Vineyard does the "penny" mean anything, or is it an ornament? The history of the debate on this subject is long. In the Prodigal Son do all the details of his sufferings, such as eating the husks intended for swine, have a spiritual meaning?

The interpreters of former generations laid down the rule, theologia parabolica non est argumentativa, i.e. the parables, very rich in mission

6. Doctrinal thoughts, do not furnish a basis for Value of the doctrinal argument. Like all figurative Parables tive expressions and forms of thought, the parables too contain elements of doubt as far as their interpretation is concerned. They illustrate truth but they do not prove or demonstrate truth. Omnia similia claudicunt, "all comparisons limp," is applicable here also. No point of doctrine can be established on figurative passages of Scripture, as then all elements of doubt would not be eliminated, this doubt being based on the nature of language itself. The argumentative or doctrinal value of parables is found in this, that they may, in accordance with the analogy of Scripture, illustrate truth already clearly expressed elsewhere. Cf esp. Trench, introd. essay, in Notes on the Parables of Our Lord, ch iii, 30-43; and Terry,

PARACLETE, par'a-klēt:

This word occurs 5 t in the NT, all in the writings of John. Four instances are in the Gospel and one in the First Ep. In the Gospel the

The tr of the word in EV is "Comforter" in the Gospel, and "Advocate" in the Ep. The Gr word is παρακλητος, paráklētos, from the vb. παρακαλέω, parakalēō. The word for "Paraclete" is passive in form, and etymologically signifies "called to one's side." The active form of the word is παρακλητωρ, paraklētor, not found in the NT but found in LXX in Job 16 2 in the pl., and means "comforters," in the saying of Job regarding the "miserable comforters" who came to him in his distress.

In general the word signifies (1) a legal advocate, or counsel for defence, (2) an intercessor, (3) a helper, generally. The first, or technical, judicial meaning is that which

Meaning sponding to our word "advocate,"

"counsel," or "attorney." The corresponding Lat word is advocatus, "advocate," the word applied to Christ in EV in the tr of the Gr word paraklētos, in 1 Jn 2 1. There is some question whether the tr "Comforter" in the passages of John's Gospel in AV and RV is warranted by the meaning of the word. It is certain that the meaning "comforter" is not the primary signification, as we have seen. It is very probably, however, a secondary meaning of the word, and some of its cognates clearly convey the idea of comfort in certain connections, both in LXX and in the NT (Gen 37 35; Zec 1 13; Mt 5 4; 2 Cor 1 3.4). In the passage in 2 Cor the word in one form or another is used 5 t and in each means "comfort." In none of these instances, however, do we find the noun "Paraclete," which we are now considering.

Among Jewish writers the word "Paraclete" came to have a number of meanings. A good deed

Talmud and penance and good works were called Targums paracletes: "The works of benevolence and mercy done by the people of Israel in this world become agents of peace and intercessors [paracletes] between them and their Father in heaven." The sin offering is a paraclete; the paraclete created by each good deed is called an angel (Jew Enc, IX, 514-15, art. "Paraclete").

Philo employs the word in several instances. Usually he does not use it in the legal, technical sense. Joseph

Philo declaring that they needed "no one else as paraclete," or intercessor (De Joseph c. 40). In his Life of Moses, iii.14, is a remarkable passage which indicates Philo's spiritualizing methods of interpreting Scripture as well as reflects his philosophic tendency. At the close of a somewhat elaborate account of the emblematic significance of the vestments of the high priest and their jeweled decorations, his words are: "The twelve stones arranged on the breast in four rows of three stones each, namely, the logeum, being also an emblem of that reason which holds together and regulates the universe. For it was indispensable [ἀναγκαῖον, anagkaiōn] that the man who was consecrated to the Father of the world should have, as a paraclete, his son, the being most perfect in all virtue, to procure the forgiveness of sins, and a supply of unlimited blessings." This is rather a striking verbal or formal parallel to the statement in 1 Jn 2 1 where Christ is our Advocate with the Father, although of course Philo's conceptions of the Divine "reason" and "son" are by no means the Christian conceptions.

If now we raise the question what is the best tr of the term "Paraclete" in the NT, we have a choice of several words. Let us glance at

- 5. The Best them in order. The tr "Comforter"

Translation contains an element of the meaning of the word as employed in the Gospels, and harmonizes with the usage in connection with its cognates, but it is too narrow in meaning to be an adequate tr. Dr. J. Hastings in an otherwise excellent article on the Paraclete in HDB says the Paraclete was not sent to comfort the disciples, since prior to His actual coming and after Christ's promise the disciples' sorrow was turned into joy. Dr. Hastings thinks the Paraclete was sent to cure the unbelief or half-belief of the disciples. But this conceives the idea of comfort in too limited a way. No doubt in the mind of Jesus the comforting aspect of the Spirit's work applied to all their future sorrows and trials, and not merely to comfort for their personal loss in the going of Christ to the Father. Nevertheless there was more in the work of the Paraclete than comfort in sorrow. "Intercessor" comes nearer the root idea of the term and contains an essential part of the meaning. "Advocate" is a closely related word, and is also suggestive of the work of the Spirit. Perhaps there is no Eng. word broad enough to cover all the significance of the word "Paraclete" except the word "Helper." The Spirit helps the disciples in all the above-indicated ways. Of course the objection to this tr is that it is too indefinite. The specific Christian conception is lost in the comprehensiveness of the term. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the term "Paraclete" itself would perhaps be the best designation of the Spirit in the passage in John's Gospel. It would thus become a proper name for the Spirit and the various elements of meaning would come to be associated with the words which are found in the context of the Gospel.

Christianity introduced many new ideas into the world for which current terms were inadequate media of expression. In some cases it is best to adopt the Christian term itself, in our translations, and let the word slowly acquire its own proper significance in our thought and life. If, however, instead of translating we simply transfer the word "Paraclete" as a designation of the Holy Spirit in the Gospel passages, we would need then to translate it in the passage in the Ep. where it refers to Christ. But this would offer no serious difficulty. For fortunately in the Ep. the word may very clearly be tr'd "Advocate" or "Intercessor."

We look next at the contents of the word as employed by Jesus in reference to the Holy Spirit.

- 6. Christ's as one who is to take the place of Jesus.

Use of the It is declared elsewhere by Jesus that Word it is expedient that He go away, for unless He go away the Paraclete will not come (Jn 16 7). Is the Paraclete, then, the successor or the substitute for Christ as He is sometimes called? The answer is that He is both and neither. He is the successor of Christ historically, but not in the sense that Christ ceases to act in the church. He is the substitute for Christ's physical presence, but only in order that He may make vital and actual Christ's spiritual presence. As we have seen, the Paraclete moves only in the range of truths conveyed in and through Christ as the historical manifestation of God. A "Kingdom of the Spirit," therefore, is impossible in the Christian sense, save as the historical Jesus is made the basis of the Spirit's action in history. The promise of Jesus in 14 18, "I come unto," is parallel and equivalent in meaning with the preceding promise of the Paraclete. The following are given as the specific forms of activity of the Holy Spirit: (1) to show them the things of Christ, (2) to teach them things to come, (3) to teach them all things, (4) to quicken their memories for past teaching, (5) to bear witness to Christ, (6) to dwell in believers, (7) other things shown in the context such as "greater works" than those of Christ (see Jn 14 16,17), (8) to convict of sin, of righteousness and judgment. It is possible to range the shades of meaning outlined above under these various forms of the Spirit's activity. As Comforter His work would come under (1), (2), (3) and (6); as Advocate and Intercessor under (6), (7), (8); as Helper and Teacher under (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (7), (8).

The manner of the sending of the Paraclete is of interest. In Jn 14 16 the Paraclete comes in answer to Christ's prayer. The Father will give the Spirit whom the world cannot receive. In 14 26 the Father will send the Spirit in Christ's name. Yet in 15 26 Christ says, "I will send [him] unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth," and in 16 7, "If I go, I will send him unto you." See HOLY SPIRIT.

It remains to notice the passage in 1 Jn 2 1 where the term "Paraclete" is applied to Christ:

"If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous"; ver 2 reads: "and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world." Here the meaning is quite clear and specific. Jesus Christ the righteous is represented as our Advocate or Intercessor with the Father. His righteousness is set over against our sin. Here the Paraclete, Christ, is He who, on the basis of His propitiatory offering for the sins of men, intercedes for them with God and thus averts from them the penal consequences of their transgressions. The sense in which Paraclete is here applied to Christ is found nowhere in the passages we have cited from the Gospel. The Holy Spirit as Paraclete is Intercessor or Advocate, but not in the sense here indicated. The Spirit as Paraclete convicts the world of sin, of righteousness and judgment. Jesus Christ as Paraclete vindicates believers before God.

PARADISE, par'a-dis (פָּרַדֵּיז, pardēs; παράδεισος, parádeisos): A word probably of Pers origin meaning a royal park. See GARDEN.

1. Origin and Meaning The word occurs in the Heb Scriptures but 3 t: Cant 4 13, where it is tr^d "an orchard"; Neh 2 8, where it is tr^d "a forest" (RVm "park"); Eccl 2 5, where it is in the pl. number (AV "orchards," RV "parks"). But it was early introduced into the Gr language, being made specially familiar by Xenophon upon his return from the expedition of Cyrus the Younger to Babylonia (see Anab. i.2, § 7; 4, §9; Cyrop. i.3, §14). In LXX the word is of frequent use in translating other terms of kindred significance. The Garden of Eden became "the paradise of pleasure or luxury" (Gen 2 15; 3 23; Joel 2 3). The valley of the Jordan became "the paradise of God" (Gen 13 10). In Ezk 31 8,9, according to LXX, there is no tree in the 'paradise of God' equal to that which in the prophet's vision symbolizes the glory of Assyria. The figures in the first 9 verses of this chapter may well have been suggested by what the prophet had himself seen of parks in the Pers empire.

In the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical lit. the word is extensively used in a spiritual and symbolic sense, signaling the place of happiness to be inherited by the righteous in contrast to Gehenna, the place of punishment to which the wicked were to be assigned. In the later Jewish lit.

"Sheol" is represented as a place where preliminary rewards and punishments are bestowed previous to the final judgment (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT; and cf 2 Esd 2 19; 8 52). But the representations in this lit. are often vague and conflicting, some holding that there were 4 divisions in Sheol, one for those who were martyred for righteousness' sake, one for sinners who on earth had paid the penalty for their sins, one for the just who had not suffered martyrdom, and one for sinners who had not been punished on earth (En 102 15). But among the Alexandrian Jews the view prevailed that the separation of the righteous from the wicked took place immediately after death (see Wisd 3 14; 4 10; 5 1,7; Jos, Ant. XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). This would seem to be the idea underlying the use of the word in the NT where it occurs only 3 t, and then in a sense remarkably free from sensuous suggestions.

Christ uses the word but once (Lk 23 43), when He said to the penitent thief, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (see ABRAHAM'S BOSOM [cf HADES]).

3. Used by Christ This was no time to choose words with dialectical precision. The consolation needed by the penitent thief suffering from thirst and agony and shame was such as was symbolized by the popular conception of paradise, which, as held by the Essenes, consisted of "habitations beyond the ocean, in a region that is neither oppressed with storms of rain, or snow, or with intense heat, but that this place is such as is refreshed by the gentle breathing of a west wind, that is perpetually blowing from the ocean" (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 11). See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

Nowhere in His public teaching did Christ use the word "Paradise." He does indeed, when speaking in parables, employ the figure of the marriage supper, and of new wine, and elsewhere of Abraham's bosom, and of

4. Other Forms and Uses houses not made by hands, eternal in the heavens; but all these references are in striking contrast to the prevailing sensuous representations of the times (see 2 Esd 2 19; 8 52), and such as have been introduced into Mohammedan lit. Likewise St. Paul (2 Cor 12 4) speaks of having been "caught up into Paradise" where he "heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

But in ver 2 this is referred to more vaguely as "the third heaven." In Rev 2 7 it is said to the members of the church at Ephesus who should overcome, "I [will] give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God," where the Eden of Gen 2 8 is made the symbol of the abode of the righteous, more fully described without the words in the last chapter of the book. The reticence of the sacred writers respecting this subject is in striking contrast to the profuseness and crudity both of rabbinical writers before Christ and of apocryphal writers and Christian commentators at a later time. "Where the true Gospels are most reticent, the mythical are most exuberant" (Perowne). This is esp. noticeable in the Gospel of Nicodemus, the Acta Philippi, the writings of Tertullian (De Idol. c. 13; De Anim. c. 55; Tertullian's treatise De Paradiso is lost), Clement of Alexandria (Frag. 51), and John of Damascus (De Orthod. Fid., ii, 11). In modern lit. the conception of Paradise is effectually sublimated and spiritualized in Faber's familiar hymn:

"O Paradise, O Paradise,
I greatly long to see
The special place my dearest Lord
Is destined for me;
Where loyal hearts and true
Stand ever in the light,
All rapture thro' and thro',
In God's most holy sight."

PARAH, pā'ra, par'a (פָּרָה, hā-pārāh; B, Φαρά, Phará, A, 'Αφάρ, Aphár): A city named as in the territory of Benjamin between Avvim and Ophrah (Josh 18 23). It may with some confidence be identified with Fārah on Wādy Fārah, which runs into Wādy Suweinūt, about 3 miles N.E. of 'Anāta.

PARALYSIS, pa-ral'i-sis, PARALYTIC, par-a-lit'ik. See PALSY.

PARAMOUR, par'a-mōōr (פִּלְגֶּשֶׁת, pilleghesh, "a concubine," masc. or fem.): A term applied in Ezk 23 20 to the male lover, but elsewhere tr^d "concubine."

PARAN, pā'ran, EL-PARAN (פָּרָן, pārān, אֵיל פָּרָן, 'ēl-pārān; Φαράν, Pharān):

(1) El-paran (Gen 14 6) was the point farthest S. reached by the kings. LXX renders אֵיל by τερέβινθος, terēbinthos, and reads, "unto the terebinth of Paran." The evidence is slender, but it is not unreasonable to suppose that this is the place elsewhere (Dt 2 8; 1 K 9 26, etc) called Elath or Eloth (אֵיל with fem. termination), a seaport town which gave its name to the Aelanitic Gulf (modern Gulf of 'Akaba), not far from the wilderness of Paran (2).

(2) Many places named in the narrative of the wanderings lay within the Wilderness of Paran (Nu 10 12; 13 21; 27 14; cf 13 3, 26, etc). It is identified with the high limestone plateau of Et-Tih, stretching from the S.W. of the Dead Sea to Sinai along the west side of the Arabah. This wilderness offered hospitality to Ishmael when driven from his father's tent (Gen 21 21). Hither also came David when bereaved of Samuel's protection (1 S 25 1).

(3) Mount Paran (Dt 33 2; Hab 3 3) may be either Jebel Makrah, 29 miles S. of 'Ain Kādīs (Kadesh-barnea), and 130 miles N. of Sinai (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 510); or the higher and more imposing range of mountains W. of the Gulf of 'Akaba. This is the more probable if El-paran is rightly identified with Elath.

(4) Some place named Paran would seem to be referred to in Dt 1 1; but no trace of such a city has yet been found. Paran in 1 K 11 18 doubtless refers to the district W. of the Arabah.

PARBAR, pār'bār (פָּרְבָר, parbār [1 Ch 26 18], and פָּרְוֹרִים, parwōrīm, tr^d "precincts" [AV "suburbs" in 2 K 23 11]; LXX φαρουρεῖν, pharoureim): In 1 Ch 26 18 reference is made to the position of the gatekeepers, "for Parbar westward, four at the causeway, and two at Parbar." The word is supposed to be of Pers origin, connected with Parwār, meaning "possessing light," and hence the meaning has been suggested of "colonnade" or "portico," some place open to the light. In the pl. form (2 K 23 11) the situation of the house of

"Nathan-melech" is described, and the tr, "in the colonnades," should, if the above origin is accepted, be more correct than EV. It is difficult to understand the occurrence of a Pers word at this time, and it has been suggested (EB, col 3585) that the word is a description of the office of Nathan-melech, ba-parwārīm being a misreading for ba-p'rādhīm, meaning "who was over the mules."

PARCEL, pār'sel: Properly "a little part," in Elizabethan Eng. being used in almost any sense. In AV of Gen 33 19; Josh 24 32; Ruth 4 3; 1 Ch 11 13, 14 it is the tr of חֶלְקָה, helkäh; Jn 4 5 of χωριον, chōrion—both the Gr and Heb words meaning a "piece of land." RV writes "plot" in 1 Ch 11 13, 14, but if the change was needed at all, it should have been made throughout.

PARCHED, pärch't: Four different root words have been tr^d "parched" in EV:

(1) קָלָה, kālāh, "roasted." This word is applied to corn or pulse. It is a common practice in Pal and Syria to roast the nearly ripe wheat for eating as a delicacy. A handful of heads of fully developed grain, with the stalks still attached, are gathered and bound together and then, holding the bunch by the lower ends of the stalks, the heads are toasted over a fire of straw or thorn bush. By the time most of the sheaths are blackened the grain is toasted, and, after rubbing off the husks between the hands, is ready to eat (Lev 2 14). A form of pulse is toasted in the same way and is more sought after than the grain. In the larger towns and cities, venders go about the streets selling bunches of toasted chick-peas. The Bible references, however, are probably to another form of roasted grain. The threshed wheat or pulse is roasted over a fire on an iron pan or on a flat stone, being kept in constant motion with a stirrer until the operation is finished. The grain thus prepared is a marketable article. Parched grain is not now so commonly met with as the pulse, which either roasted or unroasted is called hommos (from Arab. "to roast" or "parch"). Parched pulse is eaten not only plain, but is often made into confection by coating the seeds with sugar. In Bible times parched wheat or pulse was a common food, even taking the place of bread (Lev 23 14; Josh 5 11; Ruth 2 14). It was a useful food supply for armies, as it required no further cooking (1 S 17 17). It was frequently included in gifts or hostages (1 S 25 18; 2 S 17 28).

(2) הָרַק, hārēr, "burned" or "parched" (cf Arab. harik, "burned"), is used in the sense of dried up or arid in Jer 17 6.

(3) צָהָה, ṣāhēh, is used in Isa 5 13, AV "dried up," RV "parched"; צָהִיחָה, ṣāhīhāh, in Ps 68 6, AV "dry," RV "parched."

(4) שָׁרַב, shārābh, rendered "parched" in AV, is "glowing" in RV. The word implies the peculiar wavy effect of the air above parched ground, usually accompanied by mirages (cf Arab. serāb, "mirage") (Isa 35 7; 49 10). In predicting a happy future for Zion the prophet could have chosen no greater contrast than that the hot glowing sands which produce illusive water effects should be changed into real pools. See MIRAGE. JAMES A. PATCH

PARCHED, pärch't, CORN. See FOOD.

PARCHMENT, pärch'ment (μεμβράνα, membrána [2 Tim 4 13]): The word "parchment," which occurs only once (2 Tim 4 13), is derived from Lat pergamena (Gr Περγαμένη, Pergamenē), i.e. pertaining to Pergamum, the name of an ancient city in Asia Minor where, it is believed, parchment was first used. Parchment is made from the skins of sheep, goats or young calves. The hair and fleshy portions of the skin are removed as in tanning by first soaking in lime and then dehairing, scraping and washing. The skin is then stretched on a frame and treated with powdered chalk, or other absorptive agent, to remove the fatty substances, and is then dried. It is finally given a smooth surface by rubbing with powdered pumice. Parchment was extensively used at the time of the early Christians for scrolls, legal documents, etc., having replaced papyrus for that purpose. It was no doubt used at even a much earlier time. The roll mentioned in Jer 36 may have been of parchment. Scrolls were later replaced by codices of the same material. After the Arabs introduced paper, parchment was still used for centuries for the book bindings. Diplomas printed on "sheepskins," still issued by many universities, represent the survival of an ancient use of parchment. See following article.

JAMES A. PATCH

PARCHMENTS, pārch'ments (μεμβράναι, membrānai, "membranes," "parchments," "vellum"): The skins, chiefly of sheep, lambs, goats and calves, prepared so as to be used for writing on (2 Tim 4 13).

In Gr and Rom times parchment was much employed as a writing material. "At Rome, in the 1st cent. BC, and the 1st and 2d cents. AD, there is evidence of the use of vellum, but only for notebooks and for rough drafts or inferior copies of literary works. . . . A fragment of a vellum MS, which may belong to this period, is preserved in Brit. Mus. Add. MS 34.473, consisting of two leaves of Demosthenes, De Fals. Leg., in a small hand, which appears to be of the 2d cent." (F. G. Kenyon in HDB, IV, 947).

Paul directs Timothy that, when he comes from Ephesus to Rome, he is to bring "the books, esp. the parchments." These, as well as the "cloak," which is also mentioned, had evidently been "left at Troas with Carpus." What were these parchments? They are distinguished from "the books," which were probably a few choice volumes or rolls, some portions of the Scriptures of the OT, some volumes of the Law of Moses or of the Prophets or of the Pss. Among "the books" there might also be Jewish exegetical works, or heathen writings, with which, as is made evident by references in his Epp., Paul was well acquainted.

The parchments were different from these, and were perhaps notebooks, in which the apostle had, from time to time, written what he had observed and wished to preserve as specially worthy of remembrance, facts which he had gathered in his study of the OT or of other books. These notes may have been the result of many years' reading and study, and he wished Timothy to bring them to him.

Various conjectures have been made in regard to the contents of "the parchments." It has been suggested by Kenyon (HDB, III, 673) that they contained the OT in Gr; by Farrar, that the parchments were a diploma of Paul's Rom citizenship; by Bull, that they were his commonplace books; by Latham, that the parchments were a copy of the Grundchrift of the Gospels, a volume containing the all-important narrative of the Saviour's life and cross and resurrection. Workman (Persecution in the Early Church, 39) writes: "By tas membranas I understand the proofs of his citizenship."

Whatever their contents may have been, they were of such value that Paul wished to have them with him in his prison at Rome, so that, if life were spared for even a few weeks or months, the books and parchments might be at hand for reference. Perhaps in the fact that the books and the parchments and the cloak had been left at Troas with Carpus, there may be a hint that his final arrest by the Rom authorities took place at that city, and that it was the suddenness of his arrest that caused him to be unable to carry his books and parchments and the cloak with him. "The police had not even allowed him time to find his overcoat or necessary documents" (Workman, op. cit., 39; see p. 1886, 14).

Be this as it may, he desired to have them now. His well-disciplined mind, even in the near prospect of death by public execution, could find the most joyous labor in the work of the gospel, wherever his influence reached, and could also find relaxation among "the books, esp. the parchments."

PARDON, pārd'n, pārd'un. See FORGIVENESS.

PARE, pār (THE NAILS) (פָּרַע, 'āsāh, "to fix," "manipulate"): The word, which in Heb has a very wide range of application, and which is of very frequent occurrence in the Heb Bible, is found in the above meaning in but one passage of EV (Dt 21 12; see NAIL). In a similar sense it is found in 2 S 19 24, where it is used to express the dressing of the feet and the trimming of the beard.

PARENT, pārent. See CHILDREN; CRIMES; EDUCATION; FAMILY; PUNISHMENTS.

PARK, pārk (פָּרְדֵּס, pardēs; LXX παράδεισος, parádeisos; cf Arab. فِرْدَوْس, firdaus): "I made me gardens and parks," AV "orchards" (Eccl 2 5); "Asaph the keeper of the king's forest," RVm "park" (Neh 2 8). The same word occurs in Cant 4 13, "Thy shoots are an orchard [RVm "paradise"] of pomegranates." According to Liddell and Scott, parádeisos occurs first in Xenophon, who always uses it of the parks of Pers kings and noblemen. Like many other quadrilaterals the word is undoubtedly of eastern origin. It seems to connote an inclosure. It is used in LXX of the Garden of Eden. Cf Lk 23 43; 2 Cor 12 4; Rev 2 7. See PARADISE. ALFRED ELY DAY

PARLOR, pārlér: This word in AV, occurring in Jgs 3 20-25; 1 S 9 22; 1 Ch 28 11, is in every instance changed in RV: in Jgs into "upper room," in 1 S into "guest-chamber," in 1 Ch into "chambers," representing as many Heb words. See HOUSE.

PARMASHTA, pār-mash'ta (פָּרְמַשְׁתָּא, par-mashtā; LXX Μαρμασίμνᾱ, Marmasimnā, or Μαρμασίμνᾱ, Marmasimnā): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 9).

PARMENAS, pār'mē-nas (Παρμενᾱς, Parmenās): A Gr name, an abbreviated form of Parmenides. Parmenas was one of "the seven" chosen by the people and appointed by the apostles to superintend the daily distribution to the Christian poor of Jerus (Acts 6 5). Tradition states that he was martyred at Philippi, in the reign of Trajan, but his name does not appear again in Scripture.

PARNACH, pār'nak (פָּרְנָךְ, parnākh, "gifted"): Father of Elizaphan, the prince of Zebulun (Nu 34 25).

PAROSH, pā'rosh, par'osh (פָּרוֹשׁ, par'ōsh, "flea" [leap]): A family that in part returned under Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 3; Neh 7 8), and in part under Ezra (Ezr 8 3; there spelt "Pharosh," AV). Some of the family had foreign wives (Ezr 10 25). One descendant, Pedaiah (see PEDAIAH, [3]), helped to rebuild the city walls (Neh 3 25), and others were among those who "sealed" the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 1.14). In 1 Esd 5 9; 8 30; 9 26, "Phoros."

LITERATURE

I. The Apostolic Doctrine.—The Second Coming of Christ (a phrase not found in the Bible) is expressed by the apostles in the following special terms: (1) "Parousia" (παρουσία, parousia), a word fairly common in Gr, with the meaning "presence" (2 Cor 10 10; Phil 2 12). More esp. it may mean "presence after absence," "arrival" (but not "return," unless this is given by the context), as in 1 Cor 16 17; 2 Cor 7 6,7; Phil 1 26. And still more particularly it is applied to the Coming of Christ in 1 Cor 15 23; 1 Thess 2 19; 3 13; 4 15; 5 23; 2 Thess 2 1,8; Jas 5 7,8; 2 Pet 1 16; 3 4,12; 1 Jn 2 28—in all 13 t, besides 2 Thess 2 9, where it denotes the coming of Antichrist. This word for Christ's Second Coming passed into the early Patristic lit. (Diognetus, vii.6, e.g.), but its use in this sense is not invariable. For instance the word in Ignatius, Philadelphians, ix.2, means the Incarnation. Or the Incarnation is called the first Parousia, as in Justin, Trypho, xiv. But in modern theology it means invariably the Second Coming. Recent archaeological discoveries have explained why the word received such general Christian use in the special sense. In Hellenistic Gr it was used for the arrival of a ruler at a place, as is evidenced by inscriptions in Egypt, Asia Minor, etc. Indeed, in an Epidaurus inscription of the 3d cent. BC (Dittenberger, *Sylloge*², No. 803, 34), "Parousia" is applied to a manifestation of Aesculapius. Consequently, the adoption by the Gr-speaking Christians of a word that already contained full regal and even Divine concepts was perfectly natural. (The evidence is well summarized in Deissmann, *Light from the Ancient East*³, 372-73, Ger. ed, 281-87.) (2) "Epiphany" (ἐπιφάνεια, epipháneia), "manifestation," used of the Incarnation in 2 Tim 1 10, but of the Second Coming in 2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 4 1,8; Tit 2 13. The word was used like Parousia in Hellenistic Gr to denote the ceremonial arrival of rulers; cf Deissmann, as above. (3) "Apocalypse" (ἀποκάλυψις, apokálupsis), "revelation," denotes the Second Coming in 1 Cor 1 7; 2 Thess 1 7; 1 Pet 1 7, 13; 4 13. (4) "Day of the Lord," more or less modified, but referring to Christ in 1 Cor 1 8; 5 5; 2 Cor 1 14; Phil 1 6,10; 2 16; 1 Thess 5 2; 2 Thess 2 2. The phrase is used of the Father in the strict OT sense in Acts 2 20; 2 Pet 3 12; Rev 16 14, and probably in 2 Pet 3 10. Besides, as in the OT and the intermediate lit., "day of wrath," "last day," or simply "day" are used very frequently. See DAY OF THE LORD.

Of the first three of the above terms, only Parousia is found in the Gospels, 4 t, all in Mt 24 (vs 3.27,37,39), and in the last three of these all in the set phrase "so shall be the Parousia of the Son of Man." As Christ spoke in Aram., the use of "Parousia" here is of course due to Matthew's adoption of the current Gr word.

The last of the 4 terms above brings the apostolic doctrine of the Parousia into connection with the eschatology (Messianic or otherwise)

2. Data and Sources of the OT and of the intermediate writings. But the connection is far closer than that supplied by this single term only, for nearly every feature in the apostolic doctrine can be paralleled directly from the Jewish sources. The following summary does not begin to give complete references to even such Jewish material as is extant, but enough is presented to show how closely allied are the eschatologies of Judaism and of early Christianity.

The end is not to be expected instantly. There are still signs to come to pass (2 Thess 2 3), and in especial the determined number of martyrs must be filled up (Rev 6 11; cf 2 Esd 4 35,36). There is need of patience (Jas 5 7, etc; cf 2 Esd 4 34; Bar 83 4). But it is at hand (1 Pet 4 7; Rev 1 3; 22 10; cf 2 Esd 14 17). "Yet a little while" (He 10 37,25), "The night is far spent" (Rom 13 12), "The Lord is at hand" (Phil 4 5). "We that are alive" expect to see it (1 Thess 4 15; 1 Cor 15 51; cf Bar 76 5); the time is shortened henceforth (1 Cor 7 29; cf Bar 20 1; 2 Esd 4 26, and the comms. on 1 Cor). Indeed, there is hardly time for repentance even (Rev 22 11, ironical), certainly there is no time left for self-indulgence (1 Thess 5 3; 1 Pet 4 2; 2 Pet 3 11; Rev 3 3; cf Bar 83 5), and watchfulness is urgently demanded (1 Thess 5 6; Rev 3 3).

An outpouring of the Spirit is a sign of the end (Acts 2 17,18; cf XII P, Test. Levi 13 11; Sib Or 4 46, always after the consummation in the Jewish sources). But the world is growing steadily worse, for the godly and intense trials are coming (passim), although those esp. favored may be spared suffering (Rev 3 10; cf Bar 29 2). This is the beginning of Judgment (1 Pet 4 17; cf En 99 10). Iniquity increases and false teachers are multiplied (Jude ver 18; 2 Pet 3 3; 2 Tim 3, esp. ver 13; cf En 80 7; Bar 70 5; 2 Esd 5 9,10). Above all there is to be an outburst of diabolic malevolence in the Antichrist (1 Jn 2 18,22; 4 3; 2 Jn ver 7; 2 Thess 2 8-10; Rev 19 19; cf Bar 36 8-10; Sib Or 3 63-70, and see ANTICHRIST), who will gather all nations to his ensign (Rev 19 19; 2 Thess 2 10 of 2 Esd 13 5; En 56). Plagues fall upon men (Rev, passim; cf esp. Philo, Excer.), and natural portents occur (Acts 2 19,20; Rev, passim; cf 2 Esd 5 4,5; En 80 5-8). But the conversion of the Jews (Rom 11 26) is brought about by these plagues (Rev 11 13; in the Jewish sources, naturally, conversion of Gentiles, as in Sib Or 3 616-623; En 10 21). Then Christ is manifested and Antichrist is slain or captured (2 Thess 2 8; Rev 19 20; cf 2 Esd 13 10,11). In Rev 20 3 the Millennium follows (cf 2 Esd 7 28; 12 34; Bar 40 3, and often in rabbinical lit.; the "millennium" in Slavic En, ch 33, is of very dubious existence), but other traces of millennial doctrine in the NT are of the vaguest (cf the comms. to 1 Cor 15 24, for instance, esp. Schmiedel, J. Weiss, and Lietzmann, and see MILLENNIUM). The general resurrection follows (see RESURRECTION for details).

The Father holds the Judgment in He 10 30; 12 23; 13 4; Jas 4 11,12; 1 Pet 1 17; Rev 14 7; 20 11, and probably in Jude vs 14,15. Christ is Judge in Acts 10 42; 2 Cor 5 10; 2 Tim 4 1. The two concepts are interwoven in Rom 14 9,10. God mediates judgment through Christ in Acts 17 31; Rom 2 16, and probably in Rom 2 2-6; 3 6. In 2 Thess Christ appears as the executor of punishment. For similar uncertainties in the Jewish schemes, cf, for instance, 2 Esd 7 33 and En 45 3. For the fate of the wicked see ESCHATOLOGY; HELL; St. Paul, rather curiously, has very little to say about this (Rom 2 3; 1 Cor 3 17; 2 Thess 1 8,9). Then all Nature is renewed (Rom 8 21; En 45 4,5) or completely destroyed (1 Cor 7 31; He 12 27; Rev 21 1; cf En 1 6; 2 Esd 7 30); by fire in 2 Pet 3 10 (cf Sib Or 4 172-77), so as to leave only the eternal verities (He 12 27; cf 2 Esd 7 30[?]), or to be replaced with a new heaven and a new earth (Rev 21 1; cf Slavic En 33 1-2). And the righteous receive the New Jerus (Gal 4 26; He 12 22; Rev 3 12; 21 2.10; cf Bar 4 2-6; 2 Esd 7 26).

It is of course possible, as in the older works on dogmatics, to reconcile the slight divergences of the above details and to fit them all into a single scheme. But the propriety of such an undertaking is more than dubious, for the traditional nature of these details is abundantly clear—a tradition that is not due solely to the fact that the Christian and the Jewish schemes have a common OT basis. That the Jewish writers realized that the eschatological details were merely symbolic is made obvious by the contradictions that every apocalypse contains—the contradictions that are the despair of the beginner in apocalypics. No writer seems to have thought it worth while to reconcile his details, for they were purely figures of dimly comprehended forces. And the Christian symbolism must be interpreted on the same principle. No greater injustice, for instance, could be done St. Paul's thought than to suppose he would have been in the least disturbed by St. John's interpretation of the Antichrist as many persons and all of them ordinary human beings (1 Jn 2 18.19).

The symbolism, then, in which the Parousia is described was simply that held by the apostles in their pre-Christian days. This symbolism, to be sure, has been thoroughly purified from such puerilities as the Symbolism feast on Leviathan and Behemoth of Bar 29, or the "thousand children" of En 10 17, a fact all the more remarkable as 2d-cent. Christianity has enough of this and to spare (e.g. Irenaeus, v.33). What is more important is that the symbolism of the Parousia is simply in the Jewish sources the symbolism of the coming of the Messiah (or of God in such schemes as have no Messiah). Now it is to be observed that among the apostles the Kingdom of God is almost uniformly regarded as a future quantity (1 Cor 6 9.10; 15 50; Gal 5 21; Eph 5 5; 2 Tim 4 1.18; 2 Pet 1 11; Rev 11 15; 12 10), with a definitely present idea only in Col 1 13. Remembering again that the term "Messiah" means simply "the Bringer of the Kingdom," the case becomes entirely clear. No apostle, of course, ever thought of Christ as anything but the Messiah. But neither did they think of His Messianic work as completed, or, if the most exact terminology be pressed, of the strict Messianic work as done at all. Even the Atonement belonged to the preliminary acts, viewed perhaps somewhat as En 39 6 views the preëxistent Messiah's residence among the "church expectant." This could come to pass more readily as the traditions generally were silent as to what the Messiah was to do before He brought the Kingdom, while they all agreed that He was not to be created only at that moment. Into this blank, esp. with the aid of Isa 53, etc., Our Lord's earthly life and Passion fitted naturally, leaving the fact of His Second Coming to be identified with the coming of the Messiah as originally conceived.

II. The Teaching of Jesus.—It will be found helpful, in studying the bitter controversies that have raged around Christ's teaching about the future, to remember that the apostolic idea of the word "Messiah" is the only definition that the word has; that, for instance, "Messiah" and "Saviour of the world" are not quite convertible terms, or that a redefinition of the Messiah as a moral teacher or an expounder of the will of God does not rest on a "spiritualizing" of the term, but on a destruction of it in favor of "prophet." Now the three expressions,

"Messianic work," "coming of the Kingdom," and "Parousia" are only three titles for one and the same thing, while the addition of "Son of Man" to them merely involves their being taken in the most transcendental form possible. In fact, this is the state of affairs found in the Synoptists. Christ predicts the coming of the Kingdom. He claims the title of its king (or Regent under the Father). The realization of this expectation He placed on the other side of the grave, i.e. in a glorified state. And in connection with this evidence we find His use of the title Son of Man. From all this the doctrine of the Parousia follows immediately, even apart from the passages in which the regular apocalyptic symbolism is used. The contention may be made that this symbolism in the Gospels has been drawn out of other sources by the evangelists (the so-called "Little Apocalypse" of Mk 13 7-9.14-20.24-27.30-31 is the usual point of attack), but, even if the contention could be made out (and agreement in this regard is anything but attained), no really vital part of the case would be touched. Of course, it is possible to begin with the a priori assumption that "no sane man could conceive of himself as an apocalyptic being walking the earth incognito," and to refer to later tradition everything in the Gospels that contradicts this assumption. But then there are difficulties. The various concepts involved are mentioned directly so often that the number of passages to be removed grows alarmingly large. Then the concepts interlock in such a way as to present a remarkably firm resistance to the critical knife; the picture is much too consistent for an artificial product. Thus there are a number of indirect references (the title on the Cross, the "Palm-Sunday" procession, etc.) that contradict all we know of later growths. And, finally, the most undeterred critic finds himself confronted with a last stubborn difficulty, the unwavering conviction of the earliest church that Christ made the eschatological claims. It is conceivable that the apostles may have misunderstood Christ in other matters, but an error in this central point of all (as the apostles appraised things) is hardly in the realms of critical possibility. On the whole, such an attempt to force a way through the evidence of the documents would seem something surprisingly like the violence done to history by the most perverse of the older dogmatists.

The number of relevant passages involved is so large and the critical problems so intricate that any detailed discussion is prohibited here.

2. Summary Moreover, the symbolism presents nothing novel to the student familiar with the usual schemes. Forces of evil increase in the world, the state of the righteous grows harder, distress and natural portents follow, at the climax Christ appears suddenly with His angels, bringing the Kingdom of God, gathers the elect into the Kingdom, and dismisses the wicked into outer darkness (or fire). The Father is the Judge in Mt 10 32.33, but the Son in the || Lk 12 8.9, and in Mt 13 41; 16 27; 25 32; probably in Mt 24 50 || Lk 12 46; Mk 8 38 and its || Lk 9 26 are uncertain. At all events, the eternal destiny of each man depends on Christ's attitude, possibly with the Father's (invariable) ratification considered.

How far Christ connected the Parousia and the fall of Jerus, it is not easy to say. Various sayings of Christ about the future were certainly grouped by the evangelists; cf Mt Jerusalem 24 with Mk 13 and Lk 17 20-37; or Lk 17 31 with Mk 13 15.16 (noting the inappropriateness of Lk 17 31 in its present context). The critical discussions of Mk 13 are familiar and those of Lk 21 (a still more complex problem) only less so. Remembering what the fall of Jerus or its immediate prospect would have meant to the apostles, the tendency to group the statements of Christ will be realized. Consequently, not too much stress should be laid on the connection of this with the Parousia, and in no case can the fall of Jerus be considered to exhaust the meaning of the Parousia.

The most debated question is that of the time of the Parousia. Here Mk 13 30 || Lk 21 32 || Mt 24

34 place it within Christ's generation, Mk 9 1 || Lk 9 27 || Mt 16 28 within the lifetime of some of His hearers, Mt 10 23 before all the cities of Judaea are closed to Christ's apostles. (Only the first of these contains any reference to the fall of Jerus.) Then there is "ye shall see" of Mk 14 62; Lk 13 35 || Mt 23 39. Agreeing with this are the exhortations to watchfulness (Mk 13 33-37; Lk 12 40 || Mt 24 44, etc., with many parables, such as the Ten Virgins). Now Mk 13 32 || Mt 24 36 do not quite contradict this, for knowledge of the generation is quite consistent with ignorance of the day and hour; "It will be within your generation, but nothing more can be told you, so watch!" The real difficulty lies in Mk 13 10 || Mt 24 14, the necessity of all Gentiles hearing the gospel (Lk 21 24 is hardly relevant). To leave the question here, as most conservative scholars do, is unsatisfactory, for Mk 13 10 is of no deep value for apologetic service and this value is far outweighed by the real contradiction with the other passages. The key, probably, lies in Mt 10 18, from which Mk 13 10 differs only in insisting on all Gentiles, perhaps with the apostles' thought that "world" and "Rom Empire" were practically coextensive. With this assumption the data yield a uniform result.

III. St. John's Evaluation.—It appears, then, that Christ predicted that shortly after His death an event would occur of so transcendental

1. Solution a nature that it could be expressed of Problem only in the terms of the fullest eschatological symbolism. St. John has a clear interpretation of this. In place of the long Parousia discourses in the Synoptists, we have, in the corresponding part of the Fourth Gospel, chs 13-17, dealing not only with the future in general but concretely with Christ's coming and the Judgment. Christ indeed came to His own (Jn 14 18), and not He only but the Spirit also (14 16), and even the Father (14 23). When the disciples are so equipped, their presence in the world subjects the world to a continual sifting process of judgment (16 11). The fate of men by this process is to be eternally fixed (3 18), while the disciples newly made are assured that they have already entered into their eternal condition of blessedness (11 25, 26; 5 24; 10 28; 17 2, 3). Equally directly the presence of Christ is conceived in Rev 3 20. So in St. Paul, the glorified Christ has returned to His own to dwell in them (Rom 8 9, 10, etc.), uniting them into a body vitally connected with Him (Col 1 18), so supernatural that it is the teacher of 'angels' (Eph 3 10), a body whose members are already in the Kingdom (Col 1 13), who even sit already in heavenly places (Eph 2 6). The same thought is found in such synoptic passages (Lk 7 28 || Mt 11 11; Lk 17 21[?]; see KINGDOM OF GOD) as represent the Kingdom as present. Already the eschatological promises were realized in a small group of men, even though they still lacked the transforming influence of the Spirit. Compare the continuous coming of Mt 26 64 (Lk 22 69).

It is on these lines of the church as a supernatural quantity (of course not to be confused with any particular denomination) that the immediate realization of the Parousia promises is to be sought. Into human history has been "injected" a supernatural quantity, through which a Divine Head works, whose reaction on men settles their eternal destiny, and within which the life of heaven is begun definitely. The force in this

2. The Church a Divine Quantity body is felt at the crises of human history, perhaps esp. after the catastrophe that destroyed Jerus and set Christianity free from the swaddling clothes of the primitive community. This conception of the church as a Divine quantity, as, so to speak, a part of heaven extended into earth, is faithful to the essentials of the predictions. Nor is it a rationalization of them, if the idea of the church itself be not rationalized. With this conception all realms of Christian activity take on a transcendental significance, both in life and (esp.) death, giving to the individual the confidence that he is building better than he knows, for even the apostles could not realize the full significance of what they were doing. Generally speaking, the details in the symbolism must not be pressed. The purpose of revelation is to minister to life, not to curiosity, and, in teaching of the future, Christ simply taught with the formal language of the schools of the day, with the one change that in the supernatural process He Himself was to be the central figure. Still, the end is not yet. "The hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice" (Jn 5 28; cf 6 40; 21 23; 1 Jn 2 28). In Christ human destiny is drawing to a climax that can be expressed only in spiritual terms that transcend our conceptions. See, further, ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

LITERATURE.—This is overwhelming. For the pre-suppositions, *GJV*⁴ (HJP is antiquated); Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie; Bousset, Religion des Judentums. Anti-eschatological: Sharman, The Teaching of Jesus about the Future (minute criticism, inadequate premises, some astounding exegesis); Bacon, The Beginnings of Gospel Story (based on Wellhausen). PARTHIANS, pār'thi-anz (Πάρθοι, Párthoi): A people mentioned in Acts 2 9 only, in connection with other strangers present at Jerus

1. Country and Early History at Pentecost, from which we infer that they were Jews or proselytes from the regions included in the Parthian empire. This empire stretched from the Euphrates to the confines of India and the Oxus, and for centuries was the rival of Rome, and more than once proved her match on the battlefield. The Parthians are not mentioned in the OT, but are frequently in Jos, and they had an important connection with the history of the Jews, on account of the large colonies of the latter in Mesopotamia, and the interference of the Parthians in the affairs of Judaea, once making it a vassal state.

Parthia proper was a small territory to the S.E. of the Caspian Sea, about 300 miles long by 120 wide, a fertile though mountainous region, bordering on the desert tract of Eastern Persia. The origin of the Parthians is rather uncertain, though the prevailing opinion is that they were of Scythic stock or of the great Tartar race. We have no reference to them earlier than the time of Darius the Great, but they were doubtless among the tribes subdued by Cyrus, as they are mentioned by Darius as being in revolt. They seem to have remained faithful to the Persians after that, and submitted to Alexander without resistance.

They next came under the rule of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but revolted about 250 BC, in the reign of Antiochus II (Theos), and gained their independence under the lead of Arsaces I who established the dynasty of the Arsacidae, which continued for nearly 5 centuries. His capital was Hecatompylos, but his reign continued only about 3 years, and his brother Tridates succeeded him as Arsaces II and he consolidated the kingdom. The war between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies freed him from interference from that quarter until 237 BC, when Seleucus II (Callinicus) marched against him, but was completely defeated, and Parthian independence was secured. Artabanus I, who followed him, extended his dominions westward to the Zagros Mountains, but Antiochus III would not permit such an encroachment with impunity, and led an expedition against him, driving him back and even invading his ancestral dominion. But after a struggle of some years the Parthians remained still unsubdued, and the difficulties of the contest led Antiochus to conclude peace with him in which he acknowledged the independence of Parthia. For about a quarter of a century the king of Parthia remained quiet, but Phraates I (181-174 BC) recommenced aggressions on the Seleucid empire which were continued by Mithridates I (174-137), who added to his dominions a part of Bactria, on the E., and Media, Persia and Babylonia on the W. This was a challenge to Demetrius II, of Syria, to whose empire the provinces belonged, and he marched against him with a large force, but was defeated and taken prisoner. He remained in Parthia some years, well treated by Phraates II, whose sister he married, and, when Phraates wished to create a diversion against Antiochus Sidetes, he set Demetrius at liberty and sent him back to Syria. Antiochus was at first successful, as his force of 300,000 men far outnumbered the Parthians, but he was at last defeated and slain in 129 BC and his army destroyed. This was the last attempt of the Seleucid kings to subdue Parthia, and it was acknowledged as the dominant power in Western Asia. But Phraates fell in conflict with the Scyths, whom he called in to aid him in his war with Sidetes, and his successor likewise, and it was only on the accession of Mithridates in 124 BC that these barbarians were checked. The king then turned his attention toward Armenia, which he probably brought under his control, but its king Tigranes recovered its independence and even attacked the Parthians, and took from them two provinces in Mesopotamia.

Not long after, the power of Rome came into contact with Armenia and Parthia. In 66 BC when, after subduing Mithridates of Pontus, Pompey came into Syria, Phraates III made an alliance with him against Armenia, but was offended by the way in which he was treated and thought of turning against his ally, but refrained for the time being. It was only a question of time when the two powers would come to blows, for Parthia had become an empire and could ill brook the intrusion of Rome into Western Asia. It was the ambition and greed of Crassus that brought about the clash of Rome and Parthia. When he took the East as his share of the Rom world as apportioned among the triumvirs, he determined to rival Caesar in fame and wealth by subduing Parthia, and advanced across the Euphrates on his ill-fated expedition in 53 BC. The story of his defeat and death and the destruction of the army and loss of the Rom eagles is familiar to all readers of Rom history. It revealed Parthia to the world as the formidable rival of Rome, which she continued to be for nearly 3 centuries. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians crossed the Euphrates and ravaged Northern Syria, but retired the following year without securing any portion of the country, and thus ended the first war with Rome. In 40 BC, after the battle of Philippi, Pacorus, who was then king, invaded Syria a second time and took possession of it together with all Pal, Tyre alone escaping subjection. He set Antigonus on the throne of Judaea, deposing Hyrcanus for the purpose. Syria and Pal remained in the hands of Parthia for 3 years, but the coming of Ventidius gave a new turn to affairs. He drove the Parthians out of Syria, and when they returned the following year, he defeated them again and Pacorus was slain. Parthia had to retire within her own borders and remain on the defensive. Antony's attempt to subdue them proved abortive, and his struggle with Octavian compelled him to relinquish the project. The Parthians were unable to take advantage of the strife in the Rom empire on account of troubles at home. An insurrection led by Tiridates drove the king Phraates IV from the throne, but he recovered it by the aid of the Scyths, and Tiridates took refuge in Syria with the youngest son of the king. Augustus afterward restored him without ransom, and obtained the lost standards of Crassus, and thus peace was established between the rival empires. Each had learned to respect the power of the other, and, although contention arose regarding the suzerainty of Armenia, peace was not seriously disturbed between them for about 130 years, or until the reign of Trajan. Parthia was not at peace with herself, however. Dynastic troubles were frequent, and the reigns of the kings short. Artabanus III, who reigned 16-42 AD, was twice expelled from his kingdom and twice recovered his throne. In his days occurred a terrible massacre of Jewish colonists in Mesopotamia, as narrated by Jos (Ant, XVIII, ix). The contest with Rome over Armenia was settled in the days of Nero in a manner satisfactory to both parties, so that peace was not broken for 50 years. The ambition of Trajan led him to disregard the policy inaugurated by Augustus, adhered to, for the most part, by succeeding emperors, not to extend the limits of the empire. After the conquest of Dacia he turned his attention to the East and resolved on the invasion of Parthia. The Parthian king, Chosroës, endeavored to placate Trajan by an embassy bearing presents and proposals of peace, but Trajan rejected them and carried out his purpose. He subdued Armenia, took Upper Mesopotamia, Adiabênê (Assyria), Ctesiphon, the capital, and reached the Pers Gulf, but was obliged to turn back by revolts in his rear and failed to reduce the fortress of Hatra. The conquered provinces were restored, however, by Hadrian, and the Parthians did not retaliate until the reign of Aurelius, when they overran Syria, and in 162 AD Lucius Verus was sent to punish them. In the following year he drove them back and advanced into the heart of the Parthian empire, inflicting the severest blow it had yet received. It was evident that the empire was on the decline, and the Romans did not meet with the resistance they had experienced in former times. Severus and Caracalla both made expeditions into the country, and the latter took the capital and massacred the inhabitants, but after his assassination his successor, Macrinus, fought a three days' battle with the Parthians at Nisibis in which he was worsted and was glad to conclude a peace by paying an indemnity of some £1,500,000 (217 AD).

But this was the last achievement of the Parthians. It is evident that Artabanus had suffered severely in his conflict with the Romans, and was unable to put down the revolt of the Persians under the lead of Artaxerxes, who overthrew the Parthian empire and established the dynasty of the Sassanidae in its place (226 AD).

The Parthians were not a cultured people, but displayed a rude magnificence, making use, to some extent, of remains of Gr culture which they found within the regions they seized from the empire of Alexander. They had no native lit., as far as known, but made use of Gr in writing and on their coins. They were familiar with Heb or Syro-Chaldaic, and the later kings had Sem legends on their coins. Jos is said to have written his history of the Jewish War in his native tongue for Parthian readers. In their method of government they seem to have left the different provinces pretty much to themselves, so long as they paid tribute and furnished the necessary contingents.

PARTICULAR, pār-tik'ū-lar, par-tik'ū-lar, PARTICULARLY: The adverbial phrase "in particular" occurs twice in AV (1 Cor 12 27, ἐκ μέρους, ἐκ μέρους, RV "severally," Rm "each in his part"; and Eph 5 33, οὐ καθ' ἑνα, οὐ καθ' ἑνα, RV "severally"); in both cases it has the obsolete meaning of "severally," "individually." The advb. "particularly" occurs in the same sense in Acts 21 19 AV, καθ' ἑν ἑκάστου, καθ' ἑν ἑκάστον, RV "one by one," and He 9 5 AV, κατὰ μέρος, κατὰ μέρος, RV "severally." We have the pl. noun in the sense of "details" in 2 Macc 2 30: "to be curious in particulars"; 11 20 (AV "Of the particulars I have given order," RV "I have given order in detail"); and the adj. "particular" in the sense of "special" in the first Prologue to Sirach (AV, Vulg peculiaries; the whole section omitted in RV).

PARTITION, pār-tish'un, par-tish'un, THE MIDDLE WALL OF (τὸ μεσότοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ, tô mesôtôichon toû phragmou [Eph 2 14]): What Paul here asserts is that Christ is our peace, the peace of both Jewish and gentile believers. He has made them both to be one in Himself, and has broken down the middle wall of partition which divided them from one another. Then the apostle regards Jew and Gentile as two, who by a fresh act of creation in Christ are made into one new man. In the former of these similes he refers to an actual wall in the temple at Jerus, beyond which no one was allowed to pass unless he were a Jew, the balustrade or barrier which marked the limit up to which a Gentile might advance but no farther. Curiously, this middle wall of partition had a great deal to do with Paul's arrest and imprisonment, for the multitude of the Jews became infuriated, not merely because of their general hostility to him as an apostle of Christ and a preacher of the gospel for the world, but specially because it was erroneously supposed that he had brought Trophimus the Ephesian past this barrier into the temple (Acts 21 29), and that he had in this manner profaned the temple (24 6), or, as it is put in 21 28, he had 'brought Greeks into the temple and polluted this holy place.' In the assault which they thereupon made on Paul they violently seized and dragged him out of the temple—dragged him outside the balustrade. The Levites at once shut the gates, to prevent the possibility of any further profanation, and Paul would have been torn in pieces, had not the Rom commander and his soldiers forcibly prevented.

In building the temple Herod the Great had inclosed a large area to form the various courts. The temple itself consisted of the two divisions, the Holy Place, entered by the priests every day, and the Holy of Holies into which the high priest entered alone once every year. Immediately outside the temple there was the Court of the Priests, and in it was placed the great altar of burnt offering. Outside of this again was the Court of the Sons of Israel, and beyond this the Court of the Women. The site of the temple itself and the space occupied by the various courts already mentioned formed a raised plateau or platform. "From it you descended at various points down 5 steps and through gates in a lofty wall, to find yourself overlooking another large court—the outer court to which Gentiles, who desired to see something of the glories of the temple and to offer gifts and sacrifices to the God of the Jews, were freely admitted. Farther in than this court they were forbidden, on pain of death, to go. The actual boundary line was not the high wall with its gates, but a low stone barrier about 5 ft. in height, which ran round at the bottom of 14 more steps" (J. Armitage Robinson, D.D., St. Paul's Ep. to the Eph., 59; see also Edersheim, The Temple, Its Ministry and Services as They Were at the Time of Jesus Christ, 46).

The middle wall of partition was called šōrēgh, and was built of marble beautifully ornamented.

The Court of the Gentiles formed the lowest and the outermost inclosure of all the courts of the sanctuary. It was paved with the finest variegated marble. Its name signified that it was open to all, Jews or Gentiles alike. It was very large, and is said by Jewish tradition to have formed a square of 750 ft.

It was in this court that the oxen and sheep and the doves for the sacrifices were sold as in a market. It was in this court too that there were the tables of the money-changers, which Christ Himself overthrew when He drove out the sheep and oxen and them that bought and sold in His Father's house. The multitudes assembling in this court must have been very great, esp. on occasions such as the Passover and Pentecost and at the other great feasts, and the din of voices must oftentimes have been most disturbing. As already seen, beyond this court no Gentile might go. See TEMPLE.

In the year 1871, while excavations were being made on the site of the temple by the Palestine Exploration Fund, M. Clermont-Ganneau discovered one of the pillars which Jos describes as having been erected upon the very barrier or middle wall of partition, to which Paul refers. This pillar is now preserved in the Museum at Constantinople and is inscribed with a Gr inscription in capital or uncial letters, which is translated as follows:

NO MAN OF ANOTHER NATION TO ENTER WITHIN THE FENCE AND ENCLOSURE ROUND THE TEMPLE, AND WHOEVER IS CAUGHT WILL HAVE HIMSELF TO BLAME THAT HIS DEATH ENSUES

While Paul was writing the Ep. to the Eph at Rome, this barrier in the temple at Jerus was still standing, yet the chained prisoner of Jesus Christ was not afraid to write that Christ had broken down the middle wall of partition, and had thus admitted Gentiles who were far off, strangers and foreigners, to all the privileges of access to God anciently possessed by Israel alone; that separation between Jew and Gentile was done away with forever in Christ.

If Paul wrote the Ep. to the Eph in 60 or 61 AD, then the actual barrier of stone remained in its position in the Court of the Gentiles not more than some 10 years, for it was thrown down in the burning of the temple by the Rom army. And out of those ruins a fragment has been excavated in our own day, containing the very inscription threatening death to the gentile

4. The Throwing Down of the Barrier

The first reference to it is found in 1 S 26 20: "Now therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth away from the presence of Jeh: for the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains." David in this dialogue with Saul clearly indicates that if he did not hunt the partridge himself, he knew how it was done. The birds were commonly chased up the mountains and stunned or killed with "throw sticks." David knew how deft these birds were at hiding beside logs and under dry leaves colored so like them as to afford splendid protection; how swiftly they could run; what expert dodgers they were; so he compared taking them with catching a flea. The other reference is found in Jer 17 11: "As the partridge that sitteth on eggs which she hath not laid, so is he that getteth riches, and not by right; in the midst of his days they shall leave him, and at his end he shall be a fool." intruder, and reminding us that it is only in Christ Jesus that we now draw nigh unto God, and that we are thus one body in Christ, one new man. Christ has broken down the middle wall of partition, for He, in His own person, is our peace.

JOHN RUTHERFURD
PARTRIDGE, pār'trij (קָרָא, kōrē; Lat perdix; LXX, 1 S 26 20, νυκτικόραξ, nuktikōrax, "owl," Jer 17 11, πέρδιξ, perdix): A bird of the family Tetraonidae. The Heb word for this bird, kōrē, means "a caller," and the Lat perdix is supposed to be an imitation of its cry, and as all other nations base their name for the bird on the Lat, it becomes quite evident that it was originally named in imitation of its call. The commonest partridge of Pal, very numerous in the wilderness and hill country, was a bird almost as large as a pheasant. It had a clear, exquisite cry that attracted attention, esp. in the mating season. The partridge of the wilderness was smaller and of beautifully marked plumage. It made its home around the Dead Sea, in the Wilderness of Judaea and in rocky caverns. Its eggs were creamy white; its cry very similar to its relatives'. The partridge and its eggs were used for food from time immemorial.

supposed to indicate that partridges are in the habit of brooding on the nest of their kind or of different birds, it fails wholly to take into consideration the history of the bird. Partridges select a location, carefully deposit an egg a day for from 10 to 15 days, sometimes 20, and then brood, so that all the young emerge at one time. But each bird knows and returns to its nest with unfailing regularity. It would require the proverbial "Philadelphia lawyer" to explain this reference to a "partridge sitting on eggs she had not laid." No ornithologist ever could reconcile it to the habits or characteristics of the birds. AV tr^d these lines, "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not." This was easy to explain clearly. The eggs of the partridge were delicious food, and any brooding bird whose nest was discovered after only a few days of incubation did not hatch, because she lost her eggs. Also the eggs frequently fall prey to other birds or small animals. Again, they are at the mercy of the elements, sometimes being spoiled by extremely wet cold weather. Poultry fanciers assert that a heavy thunder storm will spoil chicken eggs when hatching-time is close; the same might be true with eggs of the wild. And almost any wild bird will desert its nest and make its former brooding useless, if the location is visited too frequently by man or beast.

There is also a partridge reference in the Book of Eccles (11 29 ff RV): "Bring not every man into thine house; for many are the plots of the deceitful man. As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heart of a proud man; and as one that is a spy, he looketh upon thy falling. For he lieth in wait to turn things that are good into evil; and in things that are praiseworthy he will lay blame." The reference is to confining a tame partridge in a hidden cage so that its calls would lure many of its family within range of arrows or "throw sticks" used by concealed hunters.

PARUAH, pa-rōō'a (פָּרֻיָּה, pārū'ah, "blooming"): Father of Jehoshaphat, who was one of Solomon's twelve victualers or providers, and had charge in Issachar of this function (1 K 4 17).

PARVAIM, pār-vā'im (פָּרְוָיִם, parwāyim; LXX Φαρουαίμ, Pharouaím): The word occurs only in 2 Ch 3 6, as the place from which Solomon obtained gold for the decoration of his Temple. A derivation is given from the Sanskrit pūrva, "eastern," so that the name might be a vague term for the East (Gesenius, Thesaurus, 1125). Whether there was such a place in Arabia is doubtful. Farwa in Yemen has been suggested, and also Sāk el Farwain in Yemamah. Some have considered the name a shortened form of Sepharvāyim which occurs in the Syr and Tg Jonathan for the "Sephar" of Gen 10 30.

PASACH, pā'sak (פָּסַח, pāshakh, "divider"): Son of Japhlet, descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 33).

PAS-DAMMIM, pas-dam'im. See EPHESDAMMIM.

PASEAH, pa-sē'a, pas'ē-a (פָּסֵעַ, pāšē'ah, "limping"):

- (1) A son of Eshton, descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 12).
- (2) The eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51, AV "Phaseah" = "Phinoe" 1 Esd 5 31).
- (3) Father of Joiada, who helped to repair the old gate (Neh 3 6).

PASHHUR, pash'hur, PASHUR, pash'ur (פָּשְׁחֹר, pashhūr, "splitter," "cleaver"): The name of several persons difficult to individuate:

- (1) A priest, son of Immer, and "chief governor in the house of the Lord" (Jer 20 1), who persecuted Jeremiah, putting him in "the stocks," hard by the "house of Jeh" in the "gate of Benjamin" (Jer 20 2). When released, Jeremiah pronounced Divine judgment on him and the people. Future captivity and an exile's death are promised to Pashur whose name he changed from its masterful significance to a cowering one. "Terror on every side" (māghōr mīssābhīb) is to take the place of "stable strength" (Jer 20 3 ff).

(2) Son of Melchiah, a prince of Judah, and one of the delegation sent by Zedekiah, the king, to consult Jeremiah (Jer 21 1). It looks like a larger and later deputation, similarly sent, to which this Pashur belongs, whose record is given in Jer 38 1-13. Accompanying them was one, Gedaliah, who was a son of (3).

(3) Another Pashur (Jer 38 1), who may be the person mentioned in 1 Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12.

(4) A priest, of those who "sealed" Nehemiah's covenant (Neh 10 1.3), who may, however, be the same as (5).

(5) The chief of a priestly family called "sons of Pashur" (Ezr 2 38; 10 22; Neh 7 41; 1 Esd 5 25 ["Phassurus," m "Pashhur"]; 9 22 ["Phaisur," m "Pashhur"]). Doubtless it is this Pashur, some of whose sons had "strange wives" (Ezr 10 22).

PASS, pas, PASSAGE, pas'āj, PASSENGER, pas'en-jēr: "To pass" bears different meanings and corresponds to various words in Heb and Gr. It occurs frequently in the phrase "and it came to pass" (lit. and it was). This is simply a Heb idiom linking together the different paragraphs of a continuous narrative. As a rule "pass" renders the Heb word פָּסַח, ābhar. This vb. has various meanings, e.g. "to pass over" a stream (Gen 31 21); "to cross" a boundary (Nu 20 17); "to pass through," or "traverse," a country (Nu 21 22); "to pass on" (Gen 18 5); "to pass away," "cease to exist" (Job 30 15). The word is used metaphorically, "to pass over," "overstep," "transgress" (Nu 14 41). In the causative form the vb. is used in the phrase "to cause to pass through fire" (Dt 18 10; 2 K 16 3). In AV "pass" sometimes has the force of "surpass," "exceed," e.g. 2 Ch 9 22, "King Solomon passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom"; cf also Eph 3 19, "the love of Christ which passeth knowledge," and Phil 4 7, "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding."

Passage in AV renders מַעְבָּרָה, ma'ābhārāh, or מַעְבְּרָה, ma'ābhārāh. The former word denotes (1) the ford of a river (Gen 32 23 AVm); (2) the pass of a mountain range (1 S 13 23). In the only other instance of the use of the shorter form (Isa 30 32 m), AV renders "where the grounded staff shall pass." A more correct tr would be, "and every sweep [or stroke] of the appointed staff." The longer form bears both meanings, viz. "ford" (e.g. Josh 2 7; Jgs 3 28, etc) and "pass" (1 S 14 4; Isa 10 29). In Josh 22 11, the rendering "towards the region opposite the children of Israel" would be more correct than AV, "at the passage of the children of Israel." In EV of Nu 20 21 "passage" seems to mean "right of way," and renders the infinitive of the Heb vb. In Jer 22 20 AV the word rendered "passage" should be tr^d "from Abarim" (as in RV), a mountain range in Moab, N.E. of the Dead Sea.

Passenger in AV means a "passer-by." In Ezk 39 11.14.15 where the word occurs 4 t in AV, RV translates "them that pass through." T. LEWIS PASSING OF MARY, THE. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

PASSION, pash'un, PASSIONS, pash'unz: "Passion" is derived from Lat passio, which in turn is derived from the vb. patior, with the √ pat. The Lat words are connected with the Gr √ παθ, path, which appears in a large number of derivatives. And in Gr, Lat, and Eng. (with other languages in addition) words connected with this √ pat, path, are often susceptible of a great variety of meanings, for which the dicts. must be consulted. For "passion," however, as it appears in EV, only three of these meanings need be considered. (1) Close to what seems to be the primary force of the root is the meaning "suffer," and in this sense "passion" is used in Acts 1 3, "to whom he also showed himself alive after his passion." This tr is a paraphrase (Gr "after he had suffered"), due to the Vulg (post passionem suam), and in Eng. is as old as Wycliff, whom the subsequent EV has followed. This is the only case in AV and RV where "passion" has this meaning, and it can be so used in modern Eng. only when referring (as here) to the sufferings of Christ (cf "Passion play"). (2) "Suffering," when applied to the mind, came to denote the state that is controlled by some emotion, and so "passion" was applied to the emotion itself. This is the meaning of the word in Acts 14 15, "men of like passions," and Jas 5 17, "a man of like passions," Gr ὁμοιοπαθής, homoioopathēs; RvM "of like nature" gives the meaning exactly: "men with the same emotions as we." (3) From "emotion" a transition took place to "strong emotion," and this is the normal force of "passion" in modern Eng. AV does not use this meaning, but in RV "passion" in this sense is the tr of πάθος, páthos, in its three occurrences: Rom 1 26 (AV "affection"); Col 3 5 (AV "inordinate affection"); 1 Thess 4 5 (AV "lust"). It is used also for two occurrences of πάθημα, páthēma (closely allied to pathos) in Rom 7 5 (AV "motions," AVm "passions") and in Gal 5 24 (AV "affection"). The fixing of the exact force in any of these cases is a delicate problem fully discussed in the comms. In Col 3 5 only does "passion" stand as an isolated term. The context here perhaps gives the word a slight sexual reference, but this must not be overstressed; the warning probably includes any violent over-emotion that robs a man of his self-control. See AFFECTION; MOTION.

PASSOVER, pas'ō-vēr (Πᾶσχα, pešah, from pāšah, "to pass" or "spring over" or "to spare" [Ex 12 13.23.27; cf Isa 31 5]. Other conjectures connect the word with the "passing over" into a new year, with Assyr pašāhu, meaning "to placate," with Heb pāšah, meaning "to dance," and even with the skipping motions of a young lamb; Aram. נִפְּחָה, pašhā, whence Gr Πᾶσχα, Páscha; whence Eng. "paschal." In early Christian centuries folk-etymology connected páscha with Gr páschō, "to suffer" [see PASSION], and the word was taken to refer to Good Friday rather than the Passover):

10. The Jewish Passover

The Passover was the annual Heb festival on the evening of the 14th day of the month of 'Abhibh or Nisan, as it was called in later times. It was followed by, and closely connected with, a 7 days' festival of maççōth, or unleavened bread, to which the name Passover was also applied by extension (Lev 23 5). Both were distinctly connected with the Exodus, which, according to tradition, they commemorate; the Passover being in imitation of the last meal in Egypt, eaten in preparation for the journey, while Jeh, passing over the houses of the Hebrews, was slaying the firstborn of Egypt (Ex 12 12 f; 13 2.12 ff); the maççōth festival being in memory of the first days of the journey during which this bread of haste was eaten (Ex 12 14-20).

The ordinance of pešah miçrayim, the last meal in Egypt, included the following provisions: (1) the taking of a lamb, or kid without blemish, for each household on the 10th of the month; (2) the killing of the lamb on the 14th at even; (3) the sprinkling of the blood on doorposts and lintels of the houses in which it was to be eaten; (4) the roasting of the lamb with fire, its head with its legs and inwards—the lamb was not to be eaten raw nor sodden (bāshal) with water; (5) the eating of unleavened bread and bitter herbs; (6) eating in haste, with loins girded, shoes on the feet, and staff in hand; (7) and remaining in the house until the morning; (8) the burning of all that remained; the Passover could be eaten only during the night (Ex 12 1-23).

This service was to be observed as an ordinance forever (Ex 12 14.24), and the night was to be lail shimmūrīm, "a night of vigils," or, at least, "to be much observed" of all the children of Israel throughout their generations (Ex 12 42). The details, however, of the pešah dōrōth, or later observances of the Passover, seem to have differed slightly from those of the Eyp Passover (Mish, P'sāhīm, ix.5). Thus it is probable that the victim could be taken from the flock or from the herd (Dt 16 2; cf Ezk 45 22). (3), (6) and (7) disappeared entirely, and judging from Dt 16 7, the prohibition against seething (Heb bāshal) was not understood to apply (unless, indeed, the omission of the expression "with water" gives a more general sense to the Heb word bāshal, making it include roasting). New details were also added: for example, that the Passover could be sacrificed only at the central sanctuary (Dt 16 5); that no alien or uncircumcised person, or unclean person could partake thereof, and that one prevented by uncleanness or other cause from celebrating the Passover in season could do so a month later (Nu 9 9 ff). The singing of the Hallel (Pss 113-118), both while the Passover was being slaughtered and at the meal, and other details were no doubt added from time to time.

Unleavened bread was eaten with the Passover meal, just as with all sacrificial meals of later times (Ex 23 18; 34 25; Lev 7 12), in-

4. Maççōth dependently perhaps of the fact that the Passover came in such close proximity with the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Ex 12 8). Jewish tradition distinguishes, at any rate, between the first night and the rest of the festival in that the eating of maççōth is an obligation on the first night and optional during the rest of the week (P'sāhīm 120a), although the eating of unleavened bread is commanded in general terms (Ex 12 15. 18; 13 6.7; 23 15; 34 18; Lev 23 6; Nu 28 17). The eating of leavened bread is strictly prohibited, however, during the entire week under the penalty of kārēth, "excision" (Ex 12 15.19 f; 13 3; Dt 16 3), and this prohibition has been observed traditionally with great care. The 1st and 7th days are holy convocations, days on which no labor could be done except such as was necessary in the preparation of food. The festival of maççōth is reckoned as one of the three pilgrimage festivals, though strictly the pilgrimage was connected with the Passover portion and the first day of the festival.

During the entire week additional sacrifices were offered in the temple: an offering made by fire and a burnt offering, 2 young bullocks, 1 ram, 7 lambs of the first year without blemish, together with meal offerings and drink offerings and a goat for a sin offering.

During the week of the maḥṣōth festival comes the beginning of the barley harvest in Pal (M^enāhōth 65b) which lasts from the end of March in the low Jordan valley to the beginning of May in the elevated portions.

The time of the putting-in of the sickle to the standing corn (Dt 16 9) and of bringing the sheaf of the peace offering is spoken of as the morrow after the Sabbath (Lev 23 15), that is, according to the Jewish tradition, the day after the first day, or rest-day, of the Passover (M^enā. 65b; M^eg Ta'an. 1; Jos, Ant, III, x, 5), and according to Samaritan and Boethusian traditions and the modern Karites the Sunday after the Passover. At this time a wave offering is made of a sheaf, followed by an offering of a lamb with a meal and drink offering, and only thereafter might the new corn be eaten. From this day 7 weeks are counted to fix the date of Pentecost, the celebration connected with the wheat harvest. It is of course perfectly natural for an agricultural people to celebrate the turning-points of the agricultural year in connection with their traditional festivals. Indeed, the Jewish liturgy of today retains in the Passover service the Prayer of Dew (tal) which grew up in Pal on the basis of the needs of an agricultural people.

Many writers, however, eager to explain the entire festival as originally an agricultural feast (presumably a Canaanitic one, though there is not a shred of evidence that the Canaanites had such a festival), have seized upon the 'ōmer, or sheaf offering, as the basis of the ḥagḥ (festival), and have attempted to explain the maḥṣōth as bread hastily baked in the busy harvest times, or as bread quickly baked from the freshly exempted first-fruits. Wherein these theories are superior to the traditional explanation so consistently adhered to throughout the Pent it is difficult to see. In a similar vein, it has been attempted to connect the Passover with the sacrifice or redemption of the firstborn of man and beast (both institutions being traditionally traced to the judgment on the firstborn of Egypt, as in Ex 13 11-13; 22 29.30; 23 19; 34 19.20), so as to characterize the Passover as a festival of pastoral origin. Excepting for the multiplication of highly ingenious guesses, very little that is positive has been added to our knowledge of the Passover by this theory.

The Pent speaks of the Passover in many contexts and naturally with constantly varying emphasis. Thus in the story of the Exodus it is natural to expect fewer ritual details than in a manual of temple services; again, according to the view here taken, we must distinguish between the pesaḥ miḥrayim and the pesaḥ dōrōth. Nevertheless, great stress is laid on the variations in the several accounts, by certain groups of critics, on the basis of which they seek to support their several theories of the composition of the Pent or Hex. Without entering into this controversy, it will be sufficient here to enumerate and classify all the discrepancies said to exist in the several Passover passages, together with such explanations as have been suggested. These discrepancies, so called, are of three kinds: (1) mere omissions, (2) differences of emphasis, and (3) conflicting statements. The letters, J, E, D, P and H will here be used to designate passages assigned to the various sources by the higher criticism of today merely for the sake of comparison. (1) There is nothing remarkable about the omission of the daily sacrifices from all passages except Lev 23 8 (H) and Nu 28 19 (P), nor in the omission of a specific reference to the holy convocation on the first day in the contexts of Dt 16 8 and Ex 13 6, nor even in the omission of reference to a central sanctuary to be attached to the fact that the precise day is not specified in Ex 23 (E) where the appointed day is spoken of, and in Lev 23 15 (H) where the date can be figured out from the date of Pentecost there given. (2) As to emphasis, it is said that the so-called Elohist Covenant (E) (Ex 23) has no reference to the Passover, as it speaks only of maḥṣōth in ver 15, in which this festival is spoken of together with the other reḡhālīm or pilgrimage festivals. The so-called Jehovistic source (J) (Ex 34 18-21.25) is said to subordinate the Passover to maḥṣōth, the great feast of the Jehovistic history (JE) (Ex 12 21-27.29-36.38.39; 13 3-16); in Dt (D) the Passover is said to predominate over maḥṣōth, while in Lev (P and H) it is said to be of first importance. JE and P emphasize the historical importance of the day. Whether these differences in emphasis mean much more than that the relative amount of attention paid to the paschal sacrifice, as compared with maḥṣōth, depends on the context, is of course the fundamental question of the higher criticism; it is not answered by pointing out that the differences of emphasis exist. (3) Of the actual conflicts, we have already seen that the use of the words "flock" and "herd" in Dt and Heb bāshal are open to explanation, and also that the use of the maḥṣōth at the original Passover is not inconsistent with the historical reason for the feast of maḥṣōth—it is not necessary to suppose that maḥṣōth were invented through the necessity of the Hebrews on their journey. There is, however, one apparent discrepancy in the Bib. narrative that seems to weaken rather than help the position of those critics who would ascribe very late dates to the passages which we have cited: Why does Ezekiel's ideal scheme provide sacrifices for the Passover different from those prescribed in the so-called P ascribed to the same period (Ezk 45 21)?

The children of Israel began the keeping of the Passover in its due season according to all its ordinances in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 9 5). In the very beginning of their national life in Pal we find them celebrating the Passover under the leadership of Joshua in the plains of Jericho (Josh 5 10). History records but few later celebrations in Pal, but there are enough intimations to indicate that it was frequently if not regularly observed. Thus Solomon offered sacrifices three times a year upon the altar which he had built to Jeh, at the appointed seasons, including the Feast of Unleavened Bread (1 K 9 25=2 Ch 8 13). The later prophets speak of appointed seasons for pilgrimages and sacrifices (cf Isa 1 12-14), and occasionally perhaps refer to a Passover celebration (cf Isa 30 29, bearing in mind that the Passover is the only night-feast of which we have any record). In Hezekiah's time the Passover had fallen into such a state of desuetude that neither the priests nor the people were prepared for the king's urgent appeal to observe it. Nevertheless, he was able to bring together a large concourse in Jerus during the 2d month and institute a more joyful observance than any other recorded since the days of Solomon. In the 18th year of King Josiah, however, there was celebrated the most memorable Passover, presumably in the matter of conformity to rule, since the days of the Judges (2 K 23 21; 2 Ch 35 1 ff). The continued observance of the feast to the days of the exile is attested by Ezekiel's interest in it (Ezk 45 18). In post-exilic times it was probably observed more scrupulously than ever before (Ezr 6 19 ff).

Further evidence, if any were needed, of the importance of the Passover in the life of the Jews of the second temple is found in the Talm, which devotes to this subject an entire tractate, Pesaḥim, on which we have both Bab and Pal g^mmarā. These are devoted to the sacrificial side and to the minutiae of searching out and destroying leaven, what constitutes leaven, and similar questions, instruction in which the children of Israel sought for 30 days before the Passover. Jos speaks of the festival often (Ant, II, xiv, 6; III, x, 5; IX, iv, 8; XIV, ii, 2; XVII, ix, 3; BJ, II, i, 3; V, iii, 1; VI, ix, 3). Besides repeating the details already explained in the Bible, he tells of the innumerable multitudes that came for the Passover to Jerus out of the country and even from beyond its limits. He estimates that in one year in the days of Cestius, 256,500 lambs were slaughtered and that at least 10 men were counted to each. (This estimate of course includes the regular population of Jerus. But even then it is doubtless exaggerated.) The NT bears testimony, likewise, to the coming of great multitudes to Jerus (Jn 11 55; cf also 2 13; 6 4). At this great festival even the Rom officers released prisoners in recognition of the people's celebration. Travel and other ordinary pursuits were no doubt suspended (cf Acts 12 3; 20 6). Naturally the details were impressed on the minds of the people and lent themselves to symbolic and homiletic purposes (cf 1 Cor 5 7; Jn 19 34-36, where the paschal lamb is made to typify Jesus; and He 11 28). The best-known instance of such symbolic use is the institution of the Eucharist on the basis of the paschal meal. Some doubt exists as to whether the Last Supper was the paschal meal or not. According to the Synoptic Gospels, it was (Lk 22 7; Mt 26 17; Mk 14 12); while according to John, the Passover was to be eaten some time following the Last Supper (Jn 18 28). Various harmonizations of these passages have been suggested, the most ingenious, probably, being on the theory that when the Passover fell on Friday night, the Pharisees ate the meal on Thursday and the Sadducees on Friday, and that Jesus followed the custom of the Pharisees (Chwolson, Das letzte Passahmal Jesu, 2d ed, St. Petersburg, 1904). Up to the Nicene Council in the year 325, the church observed Easter on the Jewish Passover. Thereafter it took precautions to separate the two, condemning their confusion as Arianism.

After the destruction of the temple the Passover became a home service. The paschal lamb was no longer included. Only the Samaritans

10. The Jewish Passover have continued this rite to this day. In the Jewish home a roasted bone is placed on the table in memory of the rite, and other articles symbolic of the Passover are placed beside it: such as a roasted egg, said to be in memory of the free-will offering; a sauce called hārōseth, said to resemble the mortar of Egypt; salt water, for the symbolic dipping (cf Mt 26 23); the bitter herbs and the maṣṣāh. The ṣēdher (program) is as follows: sanctification; washing of the hands; dipping and dividing the parsley; breaking and setting aside a piece of maṣṣāh to be distributed and eaten at the end of the supper; reading of the haggādāh shel peṣaḥ, a poetic narrative of the Exodus, in answer to four questions asked by the youngest child in compliance with the Bib. command found 3 t in Ex and once in Dt, "Thou shalt tell thy son on that day"; washing the hands for eating; grace before eating; tasting the maṣṣāh; tasting the bitter herbs; eating of them together; the meal; partaking of the maṣṣāh that had been set aside as 'āphikōmēn or dessert; grace after meat; Hallel; request that the service be accepted. Thereafter folk-songs are sung to traditional melodies, and poems recited, many of which have allegorical meanings. A cup of wine is used at the sanctification and another at grace, in addition to which two other cups have been added, the 4 according to the Mish (Pēṣāḥim x.1) symbolizing the 4 words employed in Ex 6 6, 7 for the delivery of Israel from Egypt. Instead of eating in haste, as in the Egyp Passover, it is customary to recline or lean at this meal in token of Israel's freedom.

The prohibition against leaven is strictly observed. The searching for hidden leaven on the evening before the Passover and its destruction in the morning have become formal ceremonies for which appropriate blessings and declarations have been included in the liturgy since the days when Aram. was the vernacular of the Jews. As in the case of other festivals, the Jews have doubled the days of holy convocation, and have added a semi-holiday after the last day, the so-called 'issur haḡh, in token of their love for the ordained celebration and their loathness to depart from it.

LITERATURE

The First and Second Epp. to Tim, and the Ep. to Tit form a distinct group among the letters written by Paul, and are now known as the Pastoral Epp. because they were addressed to two Christian ministers. When Timothy and Titus received these epp. they were not acting, as they had previously done, as missionaries or itinerant evangelists, but had been left by Paul in charge of churches; the former having the oversight of the church in Ephesus, and the latter having the care of the churches in the island of Crete. The Pastoral Epp. were written to guide them in the discharge of the duties devolving upon them as Christian pastors. Such is a general description of these epp. In each of them, however, there is a great deal more than is covered or implied by the designation, "Pastoral"—much that is personal, and much also that is concerned with Christian faith and doctrine and practice generally.

I. Genuineness.—In regard to the genuineness of the epp. there is abundant external attestation.

Allusions to them are found in the writings of Clement and Polycarp. In the middle of the 2d cent. the epp. were recognized as Pauline in authorship, and were freely quoted.

"Marcion indeed rejected them, and Tatian is supposed to have rejected those to Timothy. But, as Jerome states in the preface to his Comm. on Tit, these heretics rejected the epp., not on critical grounds, but merely because they disliked their teaching. He says they used no argument, but merely asserted, This is Paul's, This is not Paul's. It is obvious that men holding such opinions as Marcion and Tatian held, would not willingly ascribe authority to epp. which condemned asceticism. So far, then, as the early church can guarantee to us the authenticity of writings ascribed to Paul, the Pastoral Epp. are guaranteed" (Marcus Dods, Intro to the NT, 167).

The external evidence is all in favor of the reception of these epp., which were known not only to Clement and Polycarp, but also to Irenaeus, Tertullian, the author of the Ep. to the churches of Vienne and Lyons, and Theophilus of Antioch. The evidence of Polycarp, who died in 167 AD, is remarkably strong. He says, "The love of money is the beginning of all trouble, knowing . . . that we brought nothing into the world, neither can carry anything out" (cf 1 Tim 6 7, 10). It would be difficult to overthrow testimony of this nature.

The decision of certain critics to reject the Pastoral Epp. as documents not from the hand of Paul, "is not reached on the external evidence, which is perhaps as early an attestation as can be reasonably expected. They are included in the Muratorian Canon, and quoted by Irenaeus and later writers as Paul's" (A. S. Peake, A Critical Intro to the NT, 60). This admission is satisfactory. In recent times, however, the authenticity of these epp. has been called in question by Schmidt, Schleiermacher, Baur, Renan, and many others. Baur asserted that they were written for the purpose of combating the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., and of defending the church from it by means of ecclesiastical organization, and that the date of their composition was about the year 150 AD.

II. Alleged Difficulties against Pauline Authorship.—Various difficulties have been alleged against the reception of the Pastoral Epp. as Pauline. The chief of these are: (1) the difficulty of finding any place for these letters in the life of Paul, as that is recorded in the Acts and in the Pauline Epp. written before the Pastorals; (2) the fact that there are said to be in them indications of an ecclesiastical organization, and of a development of doctrine, both orthodox and heretical, considerably in advance of the Pauline age; (3) that the language of the epp. is, to a large extent, different from that in the accepted epp.; (4) the "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship—so writes Dr. A. C. McGiffert (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 402)—is that "the Christianity of the Pastoral Epp. is not the Christianity of Paul."

Where can a place be found for these epp., in the life of Paul? The indications of the date of their composition given in the epp. themselves are these.

1. Relative to Paul's Experiences (1) Data in 1 Tim.—In 1 Tim 1 3 Paul had gone from Ephesus to Macedonia, and had left Timothy in Ephesus in charge of the church there. In the Acts and in the previously written Pauline epp., it is impossible to find such events or such a state of matters as will satisfy these requirements. Paul had previously been in Ephesus, on several occasions. His 1st visit to that city is recorded in Acts 18 19-21. On that occasion he went from Ephesus, not into Macedonia, but into Syria. His 2d visit was his 3 years' residence in Ephesus, as narrated in Acts 19; and when he left the city, he had, previous to his own departure from it, already sent Timothy into Macedonia (19 22)—a state of matters exactly the reverse of that described in 1 Tim 1 3. Timothy soon rejoined Paul, and so far was he from being left in Ephesus then, that he was in Paul's company on the remainder of his journey toward Jerus (Acts 20 4; 2 Cor 1 1).

No place therefore in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerus, and his first Rom imprisonment, can be found, which satisfies the requirements of the situation described in 1 Tim 1 3. "It is impossible, unless we assume a second Rom imprisonment, to reconcile the various historical notices which the ep. [2 Tim] contains" (McGiffert, op. cit., 407).

In addition to this, the language used by the apostle at Miletus, when he addressed the elders of the Ephesian church (Acts 20 30) about the men speaking perverse things, who should arise among them, showed that these false teachers had not made their appearance at that time. There is, for this reason alone, no place for the Pastoral Epp. in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerus. But Paul's life did not end at the termination of his first Rom imprisonment; and this one fact gives ample room to satisfy all the conditions, as these are found in the three Pastorals.

Those who deny the Pauline authorship of these epp. also deny that he was released from what, in this article, is termed his 1st Rom imprisonment. But a denial of this latter statement is an assumption quite unwarranted and unproved. It assumes that

Paul was not set free, simply because there is no record of this in the Acts. But the Acts is, on the very face of it, an incomplete or unfinished record; that is, it brings the narrative to a certain point, and then breaks off, evidently for the reason which Sir W. M. Ramsay demonstrates, that Luke meant to write a sequel to that book—a purpose, however, which he was unable, owing to some cause now unknown, to carry into execution. The purpose of the Acts, as Ramsay shows (St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 23, 308), is to lead up to the release of Paul, and to show that the Christian faith was not a forbidden or illegal religion, but that the formal impeachment of the apostle before the supreme court of the empire ended in his being set at liberty, and thus there was established the fact that the faith of Jesus Christ was not, at that time, contrary to Rom law. "The Pauline authorship . . . can be maintained only on the basis of a hypothetical reconstruction, either of an entire period subsequent to the Rom imprisonment, or of the events within some period known to us" (McGiffert, op. cit., 410). The one fact that Paul was set free after his 1st Rom imprisonment gives the environment which fits exactly all the requirements of the Pastoral Epp.

Attention should be directed to the facts and to the conclusion stated in the art. PRAETORIUM (q.v.), Mommsen having shown that the words, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole praetorian guard" (Phil 1 13), mean that at the time when Paul wrote the Ep. to the Phil, the case against him had already come before the supreme court of appeal in Rome, that it had been partly heard, and that the impression made by the prisoner upon his judges was so favorable, that he expected soon to be set free.

The indications to be drawn from other expressions in three of the epp. of the Rom captivity—Phil, Col and Philem—are to the same effect. Thus, writing to the Philippians, he says that he hopes to send Timothy to them, so soon as he sees how matters go with him, and that he trusts in the Lord that he himself will visit them shortly. And again, writing to his friend Philemon in the city of Colossae, he asks him to prepare him a lodging, for he trusts that through the prayers of the Colossians, he will be granted to them.

These anticipations of acquittal and of departure from Rome are remarkable, and do not in any degree coincide with the idea that Paul was not set free but was condemned and put to death at that time. "It is obvious that the importance of the trial is intelligible only if Paul was acquitted. That he was acquitted follows from the Pastoral Epp. with certainty for all who admit their genuineness; while even they who deny their Pauline origin must allow that they imply an early belief in historical details which are not consistent with Paul's journeys before his trial, and must either be pure inventions or events that occurred on later journeys. . . . If he was acquitted, the issue of the trial was a formal decision by the supreme court of the empire that it was permissible to preach Christianity; the trial, therefore, was really a charter of religious liberty, and therein lies its immense importance. It was indeed overturned by later decisions of the supreme court; but its existence was a highly important fact for the Christians" (Ramsay, op. cit., 308). "That he was acquitted is demanded both by the plan evident in Acts and by other reasons well stated by others" (ib, 360).

It should also be observed that there is the direct and corroborative evidence of Paul's release, afforded by such writers as Cyril of Jerus, Ephrem Syr., Chrysostom and Theodoret, all of whom speak of Paul's going to Spain. Jerome (Vir. Ill., 5) gives it as a matter of personal knowledge that Paul traveled as far as Spain. But there is more important evidence still. In the Muratorian Canon, l. 37, there are the words, "profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis" ("the journey of Paul as he journeyed from Rome to Spain"). Clement also in the ep. from the church in Rome to the church in Corinth, which was written not later than the year 96 AD, says in reference to Paul, "Having taught righteousness to the whole world, and having gone to the extremity of the west [ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δὴσεως ἐλθὼν] and having borne witness before the rulers, so was he released from the world and went to the holy place, being the greatest example of endurance." The words, "having gone to the extremity of the west," should be specially noticed. Clement was in Rome when he wrote this, and, accordingly, the natural import of the words is that Paul went to the limit of the western half of the then known world, or in other words, to the western boundary of the lands bordering the Mediterranean, that is, to Spain.

Now Paul never had been in Spain previous to his arrest in Jerus, but in Rom 15 24.28 he had twice expressed his intention to go there. These independent testimonies, of Clement and of the Muratorian Canon, of the fact that after Paul's arrest in Jerus he did carry into execution his purpose to visit Spain, are entitled to great weight. They involve, of course, the fact that he was acquitted after his 1st Rom imprisonment.

Having been set free, Paul could not do otherwise than send Timothy to Philippi, and himself also go there, as he had already promised when he wrote to the Philippian church (Phil 2 19.24). As a matter of course he would also resume his apostolic journeys for the purpose of proclaiming the gospel. There is now ample room in his life for the Pastoral Epp., and they give most interesting details of his further labors. The historical and geographical requirements in 1 Tim are, in this way, easily satisfied. It was no great distance to Ephesus from Philippi and Colossae, where he had promised that he would "come shortly."

(2) Data in 2 Tim.—The requirements in 2 Tim are (a) that Paul had recently been at Troas, at Corinth, and at Miletus, each of which he mentions (2 Tim 4 13.20); (b) that when he wrote the epp. he was in Rome (1 17); (c) that he was a prisoner for the cause of the gospel (1 8; 2 9), and had once already appeared before the emperor's supreme court (4 16.17); (d) that he had then escaped condemnation, but that he had reason to believe that on the next hearing of his case the verdict would be given against him, and that he expected it could not be long till execution took place (4 6); (e) that he hoped that Timothy would be able to come from Ephesus to see him at Rome before the end (4 9.21). These requirements cannot be made to agree or coincide with the first Rom captivity, but they do agree perfectly with the facts of the apostle's release and his subsequent second imprisonment in that city.

(3) Data in Tit.—The data given in the Ep. to Tit are (a) that Paul had been in Crete, and that Titus had been with him there, and had been left behind in that island, when Paul sailed from its shores, Titus being charged with the oversight of the churches there (Tit 1 5); and (b) that Paul meant to spend the next winter at Nicopolis (3 12). It is simply impossible to locate these events in the recorded life of Paul, as that is found in the other epp., and in the Acts. But they agree perfectly with his liberation after his first Rom imprisonment. "As there is then no historical evidence that Paul did not survive the year 64, and as these Pastoral Epp. were recognized as Pauline in the immediately succeeding age, we may legitimately accept them as evidence that Paul did survive the year 64—that he was acquitted, resumed his missionary labors, was again arrested and brought to Rome, and from this second imprisonment wrote the Second Ep. to Tim—his last extant writing" (Dods, Intro to the NT, 172).

The second difficulty alleged against the acceptance of these epp. as Pauline is that there are said to exist in them indications of an

2. Subject-Matter Post-Pauline ecclesiastical organization and of a doctrinal development, both orthodox and heretical, considerably later than those of the Pauline age.

(1) The first statement, that the epp. imply an ecclesiastical organization in advance of the time when Paul lived, is one which cannot be maintained in view of the facts disclosed in the epp. themselves. For directions are given to Timothy and to Titus in regard to the moral and other characteristics necessary in those who are to be ordained as bishops, elders, and deacons. In the 2d cent. the outstanding feature of ecclesiastical organization was the development of monarchical episcopacy, but the Pastoral Epp. show a presbyterial administration. The office held by Timothy in Ephesus and by Titus in Crete was, as the epp. themselves show, of a temporary character. The directions which Paul gives to Timothy and Titus in regard to the ordaining of presbyters in every church are in agreement with similar notices found elsewhere in the NT, and do not coincide with the state of church organization as that existed in the 2d cent., the period when, objectors to the genuineness of the epp. assert, they were composed. "Everyone acquainted with ancient literature, particularly the literature of the ancient church, knows that a forger or fabricator of those times could not possibly have avoided anachronisms" (Zahn, Intro to the NT, II, 93). But the ecclesiastical arrangements in the Pastoral Epp. coincide in all points with the state of matters as it is found in the church in the time of the apostles, as that is described in the Acts and elsewhere in the NT.

It seems an error to suppose, as has often been done, that these epp. contain the germ of monarchical episcopacy; for the Christian church had already, from the day of Pentecost, existed as a society with special officers for the functions of extension, discipline and administration. The church in the Pastoral Epp. is a visible society, as it always was. Its organization therefore had come to be of the greatest importance, and esp. so in the matter of maintaining and handing down the true faith; the church accordingly is described as "the pillar and stay of the truth" (1 Tim 3 15 m), that is, the immovable depository of the Divine revelation.

(2) The other statement, that the epp. show a doctrinal development out of harmony with the Pauline age is best viewed by an examination of what the epp. actually say.

In 1 Tim 6 20, Paul speaks of profane and vain babblings and oppositions of gnōsis (RV "knowledge," AV "science") falsely so called. In Tit 3 9, he tells Titus to avoid foolish questions and genealogies and contentions and strivings about the law. These phrases have been held to be allusions to the tenets of Marcion, and to those of some of the gnostic sects. There are also other expressions, such as fables and endless genealogies (1 Tim 1 3.4; 6 3), words to no profit but the subverting of the hearer (2 Tim 2 14), foolish and unlearned questions which do gender strifes (2 Tim 2 23), questions and strifes of words (1 Tim 6 4.5), discussions which lead to nothing but word-battles and profane babbling. Such are the expressions which Paul uses. These, taken with what is even more clearly stated in the Ep. to the Col, certainly point to an incipient Gnosticism. But had the writer of the Pastoral Epp. been combating the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., it would not have been phrases like these that he would have employed, but others much more definite. Godet, quoted by Dods (Intro, 175), writes, "The danger here is of substituting intellectualism in religion for piety of heart and life. Had the writer been a Christian of the 2d cent., trying, under the name of Paul, to stigmatize the gnostic systems, he would certainly have used much stronger expressions to describe their character and influence."

It should be observed that the false teachers described in 2 Tim 3 6-9.13, as well as in other places in these epp., were persons who taught that the Mosaic Law was binding upon all Christians. They laid stress upon rabbinic myths, upon investigations and disputations about genealogies and specific legal requirements of the OT. What they taught was a form of piously sounding doctrine assuming to be Christian, but which was really rabbinism.

"For a pseudo-Paul in the post-apostolic age—when Christians of Jewish birth had become more and more exceptions in the gentile Christian church—to have invented a description of and vigorously to have opposed the heterodidaskalos, who did not exist in his own age, and who were without parallel in the earlier epp. of Paul, would have been to expose himself to ridicule without apparent purpose or meaning" (Zahn, Intro, II, 117). "A comparison of the statements in these epp. about various kinds of false doctrine, and of those portions of the same that deal with the organization and officers of the church, with conditions actually existing in the church, esp. the church of Asia Minor, at the beginning and during the course of the 2d cent., proves, just as clearly as does the external evidence, that they must have been written at latest before the year 100. But they could not have been written during the first two decades after Paul's death, because of the character of the references to persons, facts and conditions in Paul's lifetime and his own personal history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery. Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion" (Zahn, op. cit., II, 118).

The third difficulty alleged against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. is connected with the language

3. Difficulty Connected with the Language employed, which is said to be, to a large extent, different from that in the accepted epp. The facts in regard to this matter are that in 1 Tim there are 82 words not found elsewhere in the NT; in 2 Tim there are 53 such words, and in Tit there are 33. But, while the total of such words in the three epp. is 168, this number, large though it appears, may be compared with the words used only once in the other Epp. of Paul. In Rom, 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, Eph, Phil, Col, 1 Thess, 2 Thess and Philem, the words of this description are 627 in number. So nothing can be built upon the fact of the 168 peculiar words in the Pastoral Epp., that can safely be alleged as proof against their Pauline authorship. The special subjects treated in these epp. required adequate language, a requirement and a claim which would not be refused in the case of any ordinary author.

The objections to the Pauline authorship of the Pastorals, based upon the dissimilarity of diction in them and in Eph, Phil and Col, cease to exist when the theory is no longer persisted in, that the nucleus of the Pastoral Epp. was composed during the Rom imprisonment, which, according to this theory ended, not in the apostle's release, but in his execution. The fact that he was writing to intimate and beloved friends, both on personal matters and on the subject of church organization, and on that of incipient Gnosticism, which was troubling the churches of Asia Minor, made it essential that he should, to a large extent, use a different vocabulary.

The "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship is that "the Christianity of the Pastoral Epp. is not the Christianity of Paul" (McGiffert, A History of Christianity, 402). "For the most part," Dr. McGiffert writes, "there is no trace whatever of the great fundamental truth of Paul's gospel—death unto the flesh and life in the Spirit." Now this is not so, for the passages which

Dr. McGiffert himself gives in a footnote (2 Tim 1 9-11; 2 11 ff; Tit 3 4-7), as well as other references, do most certainly refer to this very aspect of the gospel. For example, the passage in 2 Tim 2 contains these words, "If we died with him [Christ], we shall also live with him." What is this but the great truth of the union of the Christian believer with Christ? The believer is one with Christ in His death, one with Him now as He lives and reigns. The objection, therefore, which is "most decisive of all," is one which is not true in point of fact. Dr. McGiffert also charges the author of the Pastoral Epp. as being "one who understood by resurrection nothing else than the resurrection of the fleshly body" (p. 430). The body of Our Lord was raised from the dead, but how very unjust this accusation is, is evident from such a passage as 1 Tim 3 16, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness;

He who was manifested in the flesh,
Justified in the Spirit,
Seen of angels,
Preached among the nations,
Believed on in the world,
Received up in glory."

Charges of this nature are unsupported by evidence, and are of the kind on which Dr. A. S. Peake (A Critical Intro to the NT, 71) bases his rejection of the Pauline authorship—except for a Pauline nucleus—that he "feels clear." More than an ipse dixit of this sort is needed.

The theory that the Pastoral Epp. are based upon genuine letters or notes of Paul to Timothy and Titus is thus advocated by Peake, McGiffert, Moffatt and many others. It bears very hard upon 1 Tim. "In 1 Tim not a single verse can be indicated which clearly bears the stamp of Pauline origin" (Peake, op. cit., 70). "We may fairly conclude then in agreement with many modern scholars that we have here, in the Pastoral Epp., authentic letters of Paul to Timothy and Titus, worked over and enlarged by another hand" (McGiffert, op. cit., 405). In regard to 1 Tim he writes, "It is very likely that there are scattered fragments of the original ep. in 1 Tim, as for instance in ver 23. But it is difficult to find anything which we can be confident was written by Paul" (p. 407).

Dr. McGiffert also alleges that in the Pastoral Epp., the word "faith" "is not employed in its profound Pauline sense, but is used to signify one of the cardinal virtues, along with love, peace, purity, righteousness, sanctification, patience and meekness." One of the Pauline epp., with which he contrasts the Pastorals, is the Ep. to the Gal; and the groundlessness of this charge is evident from Gal 5 22, where "faith" is included in the list there given of the fruit of the Spirit, along with love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness and self-control.

If the Pastoral Epp. are the work of Paul, then, Dr. McGiffert concludes, Paul had given up that form of the gospel which he had held and taught throughout his life, and descended from the lofty religious plane upon which he had always moved, to the level of mere piety and morality (op. cit., 404). But this charge is not just or reasonable, in view of the fact that the apostle is instructing Timothy and Titus how to combat the views and practices of immoral teachers. Or again, in such a passage as 1 Tim 1 12-17 AV, the author of the ep. has not descended from the lofty plane of faith to that of mere piety and morality, when he writes, "The grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief."

If such be the "most decisive" objection against the Pauline authorship, the other difficulties, as already seen, need not cause alarm, for they resolve themselves into the equally groundless charges that the historical requirements of the epp. cannot be fitted into any part of Paul's life, and that the doctrine and ecclesiastical organization

4. Is There "Another Gospel" in the Pastorals? is no trace whatever of the great fundamental truth of Paul's gospel—death unto the flesh and life in the Spirit." Now this is not so, for the passages which do not suit the Apostolic age. These objections have been already referred to.

The real difficulty, writes Dr. Peake (A Critical Intro, 68), is that "the old energy of thought and expression is gone, and the greater smoothness and continuity in the grammar is a poor compensation for the lack of grip and of continuity in the thought." Dr. Peake well and truly says that this statement does not admit of detailed proof. Lack of grip and lack of continuity of thought are not the characteristics of such passages as 1 Tim 1 9-17, a passage which will bear comparison with anything in the acknowledged Pauline Epp.; and there are many other similar passages, e.g. Tit 2 11-3 7.

What must be said of the dullness of the intelligence of Christian men and of the Christian church as a whole, if they could thus let themselves be imposed upon by epp. which purported to be Paul's, but which were not written by him at all, but were the enlargement of a Pauline nucleus? Can it be believed that the church of the 2d cent., the church of the martyrs, was in such a state of mental decrepitude as to receive epp. which were spurious, so far as the greater portion of their contents is concerned? And can it be believed that this idea, so recently originated and so destitute of proof, is an adequate explanation of epp. which have been received as Pauline from the earliest times?

When placed side by side with sub-apostolic writings like the Didache, Clem. Rom., Polycarp and Ignatius, "it is difficult to resist the idea which returns upon one with almost every sentence that . . . the Pastorals are astonishingly superior" (Moffatt, The Historical NT, 556). Godet, quoted by R. D. Shaw (The Pauline Epp., 441), writes, "When one has had enough of the pious amplifications of Clement of Rome, of the ridiculous inanities of Barnabas, of the general oddities of Ignatius, of the well-meant commonplaces of Polycarp, of the intolerable verbiage of Hermas, and of the nameless platitudes of the Didache, and, after this promenade in the first decade of the 2d cent., reverts to our Pastoral Epp., one will measure the distance that separates the least striking products of the apostolic literature from what has been preserved to us as most eminent in the ancient patristic literature."

In the case of some modern critics, the interpolation hypothesis "is their first and last appeal, the easy solution of any difficulty that presents itself to their imaginations. Each writer feels free to give the kaleidoscope a fresh turn, and then records with blissful confidence what are called the latest results. . . . The whole method postulates that a writer must always preserve the same dull monotone or always confine himself to the same transcendental heights. . . . He must see and say everything at once; having had his vision and his dream, he must henceforth be like a star and dwell apart. . . . To be stereotyped is his only salvation. . . . On such principles there is not a writer of note, and there never has been a man in public life, or a student in the stream of a progressive science, large parts of whose sayings and doings could not be proved to be by some one else" (Shaw, The Pauline Epp., 483).

III. Date and Order.—In regard to the date of these epp., external and internal evidence alike go to show that they belong to practically the same period. The dates of their composition are separated from each other by not more than three or four years; and the dates of each and all of them must be close to the Neronian persecution (64 AD). If Paul was executed 67 AD (see Ramsay, St. Paul, 396), there is only a short interval of time between his release in 61 or 62, and his death in 67, that is a period of some 5 or 6 years, during which his later travels took place, and when the Pastoral Epp. were written. "Between the three letters there is an affinity of language, a similarity of thought, and a likeness of errors combated, which prevents our referring any of them to a period much earlier than the others" (Zahn, Intro, II, 37).

The order in which they were written must have been 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim. It is universally acknowledged that 2 Tim is the very last of Paul's extant epp., and the internal evidence of the other two seems to point out 1 Tim as earlier than Tit.

To sum up, the evidence of the early reception of the Pastoral Epp. as Pauline is very strong. "The confident denial of the genuineness of these letters—which has been made now for several generations more positively than in the case of any other Pauline epp.—has no support from tradition. . . . Traces of their circulation in the church before Marcion's time are clearer than those which can be found for Rom and 2 Cor" (Zahn, op. cit., II, 85). The internal evidence shows that all three are from the hand of one and the same writer, a writer who makes many personal allusions of a nature which it would be impossible for a forger to invent. It is generally allowed that the personal passages in 2 Tim 1 15-18; 4 9-22 are genuine. But if this is so, then it is not possible to cut and carve the epp. into fragments of this kind. Objections dating only a century back are all too feeble to overturn the consistent marks of Pauline authorship found in all three epp., corroborated as this is by their reception in the church, dating from the very earliest period. The Pastoral Epp. may be used with the utmost confidence, as having genuinely come from the hand of Paul.

PASTURAGE, pas'tūr-āj, PASTURE, pas'tūr.
See SHEEP-TENDING.

PATARA, pat'a-ra (ῥὰ Πάταρα, tá Pátara): A coast city of ancient Lycia, from which, according to Acts 21 1, Paul took a ship for Phoenicia. Because of its excellent harbor, many of the coast trading ships stopped at Patara, which therefore became an important and wealthy port of entry to the towns of the interior. As early as 440 BC autonomous coins were struck there; during the 4th and the 3d cents. the coinage was interrupted, but was again resumed in 168 BC when Patara joined the Lycian league. Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged the city, and changed its name to Arsinoë in honor of his wife. The city was celebrated not only as a trading center, but esp. for its celebrated oracle of Apollo which is said to have spoken only during the six winter months of the year. Among the ruins there is still to be seen a deep pit with circular steps leading to a seat at the bottom; it is supposed that the pit is the place of the oracle. In the history of early Christianity, Patara took but little part, but it was the home of a bishop, and the birthplace of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of the sailors of the E. Though born at Patara, St. Nicholas was a bishop and saint of Myra, a neighboring Lycian city, and there he is said to have been buried. Gelemish is the modern name of the ruin. The walls of the ancient city may still be traced, and the foundations of the temple and castle and other public buildings are visible. The most imposing of the ruins is a triumphal arch bearing the inscription: "Patara the Metropolis of the Lycian Nation." Outside the city walls many sarcophagi may be seen, but the harbor, long ago choked by sand, has been converted into a useless swamp. See also MYRA. E. J. BANKS

PATE, pāt (קֶדֶשׁ, kodhḥōdh): The word usually trd "crown," "crown of the head" (Gen 49 26; Dt 28 35; 33 16.20; 2 S 14 25; Job 2 7; Isa 3 17; Jer 2 16; 48 45) and "scalp" (Ps 68 21) is rendered "pate" in Ps 7 16 in agreement with earlier Eng. translators since Coverdale: "His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violence shall come down upon his own pate." The reason for the choice of the word lies evidently in the desire to make the Heb parallelism with "head" (rō'sh) apparent. The same object has, however, been achieved differently in another poetical passage (Gen 49 26 || Dt 33 16), viz. by the juxtaposition of "head" and "crown of the head."

PATH, path, PATHWAY, path'wā (אֶרֶץ, 'ōrah, נְתִיבָה, nethibhah, etc; τριβος, tribos, τροχιά, trochiá):

(1) In the OT.—In addition to its obvious literal sense (e.g. Gen 49 17), it has very frequently a figurative meaning. (a) As applied to man, a course or manner of life: (i) man's outward lot in life, his career or destiny, whether of the just man (Isa 26 7) or of the ungodly (Job 8 13); (ii) frequently in an ethical sense, of men's conduct or inward life-purpose, whether it be good or evil (e.g. Prov 2 15), generally accompanied by a term defining the moral quality of the conduct, either an abstract noun (e.g. "the paths of uprightness," Prov 2 13; 4 11; "the paths of justice," Prov 2 8; Isa 40 14; "the paths of life," Ps 16 11; Prov 2 19), or a concrete adj. or noun (e.g. "crooked paths," Isa 59 8; "the paths of the righteous," Prov 2 20; 4 18). (b) The term is also applied to God either (i) of the methods of the Divine Providence, God's dealings with men (Ps 25 10; 65 11), or (ii) of the principles and maxims of religion and morality Divinely revealed to man ("Show me thy ways, O Jeh, teach me thy paths," Ps 25 4; cf Isa 2 3).

(2) In the Apoc we have the "paths" of Wisdom (tribos, Bar 3 21.31); the "path" shown to men by the Law (semita, 2 Ead 14 22); and a man's "paths" (tribos, Tob 4 10).

(3) In the NT the word occurs only in Mt 3 3 and || passages Mk 1 3; Lk 3 4 (of the forerunner's work), and in He 12 13 (in the OT ethical sense).

Pathway occurs in Prov 12 28 (derekh nethibhah) and Wisd 5 10 (atrapós). See WAY.

D. MIAL EDWARDS

PATHEUS, pa-thē'us (Παθαῖος, Pathaios, Φαθαῖος, Phathaios): One of the Levites who had married a foreign wife (1 Ead 9 23) = "Pethahiah" of Ezr 10 23.

PATHROS, path'ros (פַּתְרוֹס, pathrōs; Egypt Pata resii, the "South land"; LXX γῆ Παθουρῆς, gē Pathourēs): The Heb form of the Egypt name for Upper Egypt (Isa 11 11; Jer 44 1.15; Ezk 29 14; 30 14).

PATHRUSIM, path-rō'sim, path-rū'sim (פַּתְרוֹסִים, pathrušim, "an inhabitant of Pathros"; LXX οἱ Πατροσώνιμ, hoi Patrosōnieim): The branch of the Egyptians who came from PATHROS (q.v.). They are represented as begotten of Mizraim, "Mizraim begat Zudim . . . and Pathrusim" (Gen 10 13 f; 1 Ch 1 11 f).

PATIENCE, pā'shens (ὑπομονή, hupomonē, μακροθυμία, makrothumia): "Patience" implies suffering, enduring or waiting, as a determination of the will and not simply under necessity. As such it is an essential Christian virtue to the exercise of which there are many exhortations. We need to "wait patiently" for God, to endure uncomplainingly the various forms of sufferings, wrongs and evils that we meet with, and to bear patiently injustices which we cannot remedy and provocations we cannot remove.

The word "patience" does not occur in the OT, but we have "patiently" in Ps 40 1 as the tr of kāwāh, "to wait," "to expect," which word frequently expresses the idea, esp. that of waiting on God; in Ps 37 7, "patiently" ("wait patiently") is the tr of hūl, one of the meanings of which is "to wait" or "to hope for" or "to expect" (cf Job 35 14); "patient" occurs (Ecl 7 8) as the tr of 'erekh rū'h, "long of spirit," and (Job 6 11) "that I should be patient" (ha'ārikh nephesh). Cf "impatient" (Job 21 4).

"Patience" occurs frequently in the Apoc, esp. in Eccles, e.g. 2 14; 16 13; 17 24; 41 2 (hupomonē); 5 11 (makrothumia); 29 8 (makrothumēō, RV "long suffering"); in Wisd 2 19, the Gr word is anezikakia.

In the NT hupomonē carries in it the ideas of endurance, continuance (Lk 8 15; 21 19; Rom 5 3.4, ARV "steadfastness"; 8 25, etc).

In all places ARV has "steadfastness," except Jas 5 11, where it has "endurance"; makrothumia is trd "patience" (He 6 12; Jas 5 10); makrothumēō, "to bear long" (Mt 18 26.29; Jas 5 7; see LONGSUFFERING); the same vb. is trd "be patient" (1 Thess 5 14, RV "longsuffering"; Jas 5 7.8, AV and RV "patient"); makrothumōs, "patiently" (Acts 26 3); hupomēnō (1 Pet 2 20); anezikakos is trd "patient" (2 Tim 2 24, RV, AVm, "forbearing"); epieikēs, "gentle" (1 Tim 3 3, RV "gentle"); hupomēnō (Rom 12 12, "patient in tribulation"). For "the patient waiting for Christ" (2 Thess 3 5), RV has "the patience of Christ."

Patience is often hard to gain and to maintain, but, in Rom 15 5, God is called "the God of patience" (ARV "steadfastness") as being able to grant that grace to those who look to Him and depend on Him for it. It is in reliance on God and acceptance of His will, with trust in His goodness, wisdom and faithfulness, that we are enabled to endure and to hope steadfastly. See also GOD.

PATMOS, pat'mos (Πάτμος, Pátmos; Ital. San Giovanni di Patino): A Turkish island of the group Sporades, S.W. of Samos, mentioned once in the Bible, Rev 1 9, "I, John . . . was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (διὰ τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦ, diá tón lógon tou theou kai tēn marturían Iēsou). The island is 10 miles long, and about 6 broad along the northern coast. It is for the most part rocky. The highest part is Mt. St. Elias, which rises to a height of over 800 ft. As in Greece, and in the adjacent mainland of Asia Minor, the land is treeless. Near the city of Patmos there is a good harbor. A famous monastery, St. Christodoulos, was founded on the island in 1088. Near this is a thriving school, attended by students from all parts of the Archipelago. The population of the island numbers 3,000, almost entirely Gr. The ancient capital was on an isthmus between the inlets of La Scala and Merika. Many ruins can still be seen. The huge walls of Cyclopean masonry, similar to those at Tiryns, attest their great age. In Rom times Patmos was one of the many places to which Rome banished her exiles. In 95 AD, according to a tradition preserved by Irenaeus, Eusebius, Jerome and others, St. John was exiled here—in the 14th year of the reign of Domitian—whence he returned to Ephesus under Nerva (96 AD). The cave in which he is said to have seen his visions is still pointed out to the traveler. Only a small part of the once valuable library in the monastery of St. Christodoulos is left. Just 100 years ago (1814) Mr. E. D. Clark purchased here the manuscript of Plato which is now in the Bodleian Library, the celebrated Clarkianus, a parchment written in the year 895, and admittedly the best of all for the 1st of the 2 vols into which the works of Plato were divided for convenience. Patmos is mentioned by Thucydides (iii.33), by Pliny (NH, iv.23), and by Strabo (x.5). See also JOHN THE APOSTLE; REVELATION OF JOHN.

PATRIARCH, pā'tri-ārk, PATRIARCHS (πατριάρχης, patriárchēs): The word occurs in the NT in application to Abraham (He 7 4), to the sons of Jacob (Acts 7 8,9), and to David (Acts 2 29). In LXX it is used as the equivalent of the head of the fathers' house, or of a tribe (1 Ch 24 31; 27 32; 2 Ch 26 12). Commonly now the term is used of the persons whose names appear in the genealogies and covenant-histories in the periods preceding Moses (Gen 5, 11, histories of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, etc.; cf "patriarchal dispensation"). The problems connected with the longevity ascribed to the patriarchs in the genealogies and narratives in Gen are dealt with in special articles. PATRIMONY, pat'ri-mō-ni (הֶקְדֶּשֶׁת, hā-'ābhōth, "the fathers'"): A word occurring once in EV (Dt 18 8), meaning lit. "the fathers," which, however, is obscure, probably by reason of abbreviation for some phrase, e.g. "house of the fathers." It may indicate "some private source of income possessed by the Levite [who has come up from a country district to the central sanctuary] distinct from what he receives as a priest officiating at the central sanctuary" (Driver, "Dt," ICC, in loc.). Beyond this one occurrence of the word the same idea is conveyed often by other words or phrases: "He divided unto them his living" (Lk 15 13); "Teacher, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me" (Lk 12 13). Full and specific directions were given in the Law for the division of the patrimony (Nu 27; Dt 21, etc) and for its redemption (Ruth 4 1–12). The idea was frequently used with figurative and spiritual application: the land of Canaan was Israel's patrimony, being inherited from Jeh (Ps 105 11); salvation because of its origin in grace was the believer's patrimony (Gal 3 26–4 7). Contrariwise Israel was Jeh's inheritance (Isa 19 25; 63 14; cf Ps 33 12); and the whole earth is the Messiah's patrimony, inherited from His Eternal Father (Ps 2 8). See BIRTHRIGHT; FAMILY; INHERITANCE; PROPERTY.

PATROBAS, pat'rō-bas (Πατρόβας, Patrōbas): The name of a member of the Christian community at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 14). The name is an abbreviated form of "Patrobius." There was a wealthy freedman of Nero of the same name who was put to death by Galba (Tac. Hist. i.49; ii.95). The Patrobas of St. Paul may have been a dependent of his.

PATROCLUS, pa-trō'klus (Πάτροκλος, Pátroklos): The father of the Syrian general Nicanor (2 Macc 8 9).

PATTERN, pat'ern (תבנית, tabhnūth, "model," מראה, mar'eh, "a vision" or "view"): The OT words tr^d "pattern" do not necessarily indicate a drawing such as a modern constructor begins with, or the patterns made from these drawings for the guidance of workmen. In Ex 25 9,40 the word "idea" or "suggestion" would possibly indicate more distinctly than "pattern" what Moses received in regard to the building of the tabernacle, etc. It is doubtful if any architect's drawing was ever made of the temple. It is not the custom in Pal and Syria today to work from any pattern more concrete than an idea. A man who wants a house calls the builder and says he wants to build so many rooms of such and such dimensions with, for example, a court 10 drahs (arm's lengths) wide and 15 drahs long, made of sandstone and plastered inside and out. With these meager instructions the builder starts. The details are worked out as the building proceeds. When a piece of iron or brass work is to be made, the customer by gestures with his hands outlines the form the piece should take. "I want it haik wa haik" ("thus and thus"), he says, and leaves the metal worker to conceive the exact form. It is probable that directions similar to these were given by David to Solomon. "Then David gave Solomon his son the pattern [his conception] of the porch of the temple," etc (1 Ch 28 11). The above does not apply to Gr and Rom work in Syria. Their workmen, probably mostly native, were trained to work from models. Williams in the Architect, January, 1913, says of the works at Baalbek and Palmyra, "There is a machine-like resemblance betokening slavish copying." At the present time native workmen coming under the influence of foreigners are beginning to work from models and plans, but they show little tendency to create models of their own.

Three Gr words have been tr^d in the NT: τύπος, týpos, "type," occurs in Tit 2 7 and He 8 5. In the first instance RV reads "ensample." ὑποτύπωσις, hypotýpōsis, "outline," has been similarly tr^d in 1 Tim 1 16, but "pattern" in 2 Tim 1 13. In He 9 24 ARV ἀντίτυπος, antítupos, is rendered "like in pattern." ὑπόδειγμα, hypódeigma, AV "pattern," is tr^d in ARV "copy" (He 8 5), "copies" (He 9 23). At the time of the tr of AV the word "pattern" meant either the thing to be copied or the copy.

LITERATURE

I. Sources.—For discussion of the historical value of the Acts of the Apostles see the art. on that subject. It is only necessary to say here

1. The Acts that the view of Sir W. M. Ramsay in general is accepted as to the trustworthiness of Luke, whose authorship of the Acts is accepted and proved by Harnack (Die Apostelgeschichte, 1908; The Acts of the Apostles, tr by Wilkinson, 1909; Neue Untersuch. zur Ap., 1911; The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, tr by Wilkinson, 1911). The proof need not be given again. The same hand appears in the "we"-sections and the rest of the book. Even Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 311) admits the Lukan authorship though dating it in 100 AD instead of 60-62 AD, against Harnack. The Acts is written independently of the Epp. of Paul, whether early or late, and supplements in a wonderful way the incidental references in the epp., though not without lacunae and difficulties.

(1) Pauline authorship.—See the articles on each ep. for detailed criticism. It is here assumed that the Ep. to the He was not written by Paul, though Pauline in point of view.

Thirteen One cannot stop to prove every statement in an article like this, else a large book would be needed. Criticism is not an infallible science. One can turn easily from the Hatch-Van Manen art. on "Paul" in EB (1902) to the Maclean art. on "Paul the Apostle" in the 1-vol HDB (1909). Van Manen's part of the one denies all the thirteen, while Maclean says: "We shall, in what follows, without hesitation use the thirteen epp. as genuine." It is certain that Paul wrote more epp., or "letters," as Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 225) insists on calling all of Paul's epp. Certainly Philem is a mere "letter," but it is difficult to say as much about Rom. Deissmann (St. Paul, 22) admits that portions of Rom are like "an epistolary letter." At any rate, when Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 64-82) carefully justifies the Pauline authorship of both 1 and 2 Thess, it is clear that the case against them cannot be very strong, esp. as Moffatt stands out against the genuineness of Eph (op. cit., 393) and the Pastoral Epp. (p. 414).

Bartlet, who was once at a loss to know what to do with the Pastorals on the theory that Paul was not released from the Rom imprisonment (Apostolic Age, 1899, 200), is now quite willing to face the new facts set forth by Ramsay (Expos, VII, viii-ix, VIII, 1), even if it means the admission of a second Rom imprisonment, a view that Bartlet had opposed. He now pleads for "the fresh approach from the side of experience, by men who are in touch with the realities of human nature in all its variety, as well as at home in the historical background of society in the early Rom empire, that has renovated the study of them and taken it out of the old ruts of criticism in which it has moved for the most part in modern times" (Expos, January, 1913, 29). Here Bartlet, again, now eloquently presents the view of common-sense criticism as seen by the practical missionary better than by a life "spent amid the academic associations of a professor's chair," though he pauses to note as an exception Professor P. Gardner's The Religious Experience of St. Paul (1912). We may quote Bartlet once more (Expos, January, 1913, 30): "In the recovery of a true point of view a vital element has been the newer conception of Paul himself and so of Paulinism. Paul the doctrinaire theologian, or at least the prophet of a one-sided gospel repeated with fanatical uniformity of emphasis under all conditions, has largely given place to Paul the missionary, full indeed of inspired insight on the basis of a unique experience, but also of practical instinct, the offspring of sympathy with living men of other types of training. When the Pastorals are viewed anew in the light of this idea, half their difficulties disappear." One need not adopt Deissmann's rather artificial insistence on "letters" rather than "epistles," and his undue depreciation of Paul's intellectual caliber and culture as being more like Amos than Origen (St. Paul, 1912, 6), in order to see the force of this contention for proper understanding of the social environment of Paul. Against Van Manen's "historical Paul" who wrote nothing, he places "the historic Paul" who possibly wrote all thirteen. "There is really no trouble except with the letters to Timothy and Titus, and even there the difficulties are perhaps not quite so great as many of our specialists assume" (St. Paul, 15). See PASTORAL EPISTLES. Deissmann denies sharply that Paul was an "obscurantist" who corrupted the gospel of Jesus, "the dregs of doctrinaire study of St. Paul, mostly in the tired brains of gifted amateurs" (p. 4). But A. Schweitzer boldly proclaims that he alone has the key to Paul and Jesus. It is the "exclusively Jewish eschatological" (Paul and His Interpreters, 1912, ix) conception of Christ's gospel that furnishes Schweitzer's spring-board (The Quest of the Historical Jesus). Thus he will be able to explain "the Hellenization of the gospel" as mediated through Paul. To do that Schweitzer plows his weary way from Grotius to Holtzmann, and finds that they have all wandered into the wilderness. He is positive that his eschatological discovery will rescue Paul and some of his epp. from the ruin wrought by Steck and Van Manen, to whose arguments modern criticism has nothing solid to offer, and the meager negative crumbs offered by Schweitzer ought to be thankfully received (ib, 249).

(2) Lightfoot's grouping (cf Bib. Essays, 224).—There is doubt as to the position of Gal. Some advocates of the South-Galatian theory make it the very earliest of Paul's Epp., even before the Jerus Conference in Acts 15. So Emmet, Comm. on Gal (1912), ix, who notes (Preface) that his comm. is the first to take this position. But the North-Galatian view still has the weight of authority in spite of Ramsay's powerful advocacy in his various books (see Hist. Comm. on Gal), as is shown by Moffatt, Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 90 ff. Hence Lightfoot's grouping is still the best to use.

(a) First Group: 1 and 2 Thess, from Corinth, 52-53 AD. Harnack's view that 2 Thess is addressed to a Jewish Christian church in Thessalonica while 1 Thess is addressed to a gentile church is accepted by Lake (Earlier Epp. of St. Paul, 1911, 83 ff), but Frame (ICC, 1912, 54) sees no need for this hypothesis. Milligan is clear that 1 Thess precedes 2 Thess (Comm., 1908, xxxix) and is the earliest of Paul's Epp. (p. xxxvi). The accent on eschatology is in accord with the position of the early disciples in the opening chapters of Acts. They belong to Paul's stay in Corinth recorded in Acts 18.

(b) Second Group: 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, Rom, 55-58 AD. This is the great doctrinal group, the four chief epp. of Baur. They turn about the Judaizing controversy which furnishes the occasion for the expansion of the doctrine of justification by faith in opposition to the legalistic contention of the Judaizing Christians from Jerus (Acts 15 1-3; Gal 2 1-10). The dates of these epp. are not perfectly clear. 1 Cor was written shortly before the close of Paul's 3 years' stay at Ephesus (Acts 20 31; 1 Cor 16 8; Acts 20 1f). 2 Cor was written a few months later while he was in Macedonia (2 13; 7 5,13; 8 16-24). Rom was written from Corinth (16 23; Acts 20 2f) and sent by Phoebe of Cenchreae (Rom 16 1). The integrity of Rom is challenged by some who deny in particular that ch 16 belongs to the ep. Moffatt (Intro, 134-38) gives an able, but unconvincing, presentation of the arguments for the addition of the chapter by a later hand. Deissmann (St. Paul, 19) calls Rom 16 "a little letter" addressed to the Christians at Ephesus. Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 78) easily justifies the presence of Rom 16 in the Ep. to the Rom: "These greetings, moreover, were certainly intended by St. Paul to create bonds of fellowship between the Pauline Christians and the Rom community, and to show that he had not written to them quite exclusively in his own name." A common-sense explanation of Paul's personal ties in Rome is the fact that as the center of the world's life the city drew people thither from all parts of the earth. So today many a man has friends in New York or London who has never been to either city. A much more serious controversy rages as to the integrity of 2 Cor. Semler took 2 Cor 10-13 to be a separate and later ep., because of its difference in tone from 2 Cor 1-9, but Hausrath put it earlier than chs 1-9, and made it the letter referred to in 2 4. He has been followed by many scholars like Schmiedel, Cone, McGiffert, Bacon, Moffatt, Kennedy, Rendall, Peake, Plummer. Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 50) accepts the partition-theory of 2 Cor heartily: "It may be shown with the highest degree of probability that this letter has come down to us in 2 Cor 10 1-13 10." But the unity of the ep. on the theory that the change in tone is a climax to the disobedient element of the church is still maintained with force and justice by Klopper, Zahn, Bachmann, Denney, Bernard, A. Robertson, Weiss, Menzies. The place of the writing of Gal turns on its date. Lightfoot (in loc.) argues for Corinth, since it was probably written shortly before Rom. But Moffatt (Intro, 102) holds tentatively to Ephesus, soon after Paul's arrival there from Galatia. So he gives the order: Gal, 1 and 2 Cor, Rom. In so much doubt it is well to follow Lightfoot's logical argument. Gal leads naturally to Rom, the one hot and passionate, the other calm and contemplative, but both on the same general theme.

(c) Third group: Phil, Philem, Col, Eph. Date 61-63, unless Paul reached Rome several years earlier. This matter depends on the date of the coming of Festus to succeed Felix (Acts 24 27). It was once thought to be 60 AD beyond any doubt, but the whole matter is now uncertain. See "Chronology," III, 2, (2), below. At any rate these four epp. were written during the first Rom imprisonment, assuming that he was set free.

But it must be noted that quite a respectable group of scholars hold that one or all of these epp. were written from Caesarea (Schultz, Thiersch, Meyer, Hausrath, Sabatier, Reuss, Weiss, Haupt, Spitta, McPherson, Hicks). But the arguments are more specious than convincing. See Hort, Rom and Eph, 101-10. There is a growing opinion that Philem, Col and Eph were written from Ephesus during a possible imprisonment in Paul's stay of 3 years there. So Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 229; St. Paul, 16); St. Lisco (Vincula Sanctorum, 1900); M. Albertz (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1910, 551 ff); B. W. Bacon (Journal of Bib. Lit., 1910, 181 ff). The strongest argument for this position is that Paul apparently did not know personally the readers of Eph (1 15); cf also Col 1 4. But this objection need not apply if the so-called Ephesian Ep. was a circular letter and if Paul did not visit Colossae and Laodicea during his 3 years at Ephesus. The theory is more attractive at first than on reflection. It throws this group before Rom—a difficult view to concede.

But even so, the order of these epp. is by no means certain. It is clear that Philem, Col and Eph were sent together. Tychicus was the bearer of Col (4 7 f) and Eph (6 21 f). Onesimus bore Philem (vs 10.13) and was also the companion of Tychicus to Colossae (Col 4 9). So these three epp. went together from Rome. It is commonly assumed that Phil was the last of the group of four, and hence later than the other three, because Paul is balancing life and death (Phil 1 21 ff) and is expecting to be set free (1 25), but he has the same expectation of freedom when he writes Philem (ver 22). The absence of Luke (Phil 2 20) has to be explained on either hypothesis. Moffatt (Intro, 159) is dogmatic, "as Phil was certainly the last letter that he wrote," ruling out of court Eph, not to say the later Pastoral Epp. But this conclusion gives Moffatt trouble with the Ep. to the Laodiceans (Col 4 16) which he can only call "the enigmatic reference" and cannot follow Rutherford (St. Paul's Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea, 1908) in identifying the Laodicean Ep. with Eph, as indeed Marcion seems to have done. But the notion that Eph was a circular letter designed for more than one church (hence without personalities) still holds the bulk of modern opinion.

Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 294) is as dogmatic as Wrede or Van Manen: "All which has hitherto been said concerning this ep., its form, its content, its ideas, its presuppositions, absolutely excludes the possibility of a Pauline authorship." He admits "verbal echoes of Pauline epp."

Lightfoot puts Phil before the other three because of its doctrinal affinity with the second group in ch 3 as a reminiscence, and because of its anticipation of the Christological controversy with incipient Gnosticism in ch 2. This great discussion is central in Col and Eph. At any rate, we have thus a consistent and coherent interpretation of the group. Philem, though purely personal, is wondrously vital as a sociological document. Paul is in this group at the height of his powers in his grasp of the Person of Christ.

(d) Fourth group: 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim. The Pastoral Epp. are still hotly disputed, but there is a growing willingness in Britain and Germany to make a place for them in Paul's life. Von Soden bluntly says: "It is impossible that these epp. as they stand can have been written by St. Paul" (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 310). He finds no room for the heresy here combated, or for the details in Paul's life, or for the linguistic peculiarities in Paul's style. But he sees a "literary nicety"—this group that binds them together and separates them from Paul. Thus tersely he puts the case against the Pauline authorship. So Moffatt argues for the "sub-Pauline environment" and "sub-Pauline atmosphere" of these epp. with the advanced ecclesiasticism (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 410 ff). Wrede thrusts aside the personal details and argues that the epp. give merely the tendency of early Christianity (Ueber Aufgabe und Methode der Sogen. NT Theologie, 1897, 357). The Hatch-Van Manen art. in EB admits only that "the Pastoral Epp. occupy themselves chiefly with the various affairs of the churches within 'Pauline circles.'"

Moffatt has a vigorous attack on these letters in EB, but he "almost entirely ignores the external evidence, while he has nothing to say to the remarkable internal evidence which immediately demands our attention" (Knowing, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, 3d ed, 1911, 129). Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 414) holds that the Pastoral Epp. came from one pen, but the personality and motives are very vague to him. The personal details in 2 Tim 1 14-18; 4 9-22 are not on a par with those in The Acts of Paul and Thekla in the 2d cent. Many critics who reject the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. admit the personal details in 2 Tim, but it is just in such matters that forgeries are recognizable. To admit these fragments is logically to admit the whole (Maclean in 1-vol HDB), as Moffatt sees (Intro, 414), however much he seeks to tone down the use of Paul's name as "a Christian form of suasoriae," and "a further and inoffensive development of the principle which sought to claim apostolic sanction for the expanding institutions and doctrines of the early church" (ib. 415). The objection against these epp. from differences in diction has been grievously overdone. As a matter of fact, each of the four groups has words peculiar to it, and naturally so. Style is a function of the subject as well as a mark of the man. Besides, style changes with one's growth. It would have been remarkable if all four groups had shown no change in vocabulary and style. The case of Shakespeare is quite pertinent, for the various groups of plays stand more or less apart. The Pastoral Epp. belong to Paul's old age and deal with personal and ecclesiastical matters in a more or less reminiscent way, with less of vehement energy than we get in the earlier epp., but this situation is what one would reasonably expect. The "ecclesiastical organization" argument has been greatly overdone. As a matter of fact, "the organization in the Pastoral Epp. is not apparently advanced one step beyond that of the church in Philippi in 61 AD" (Ramsay, Expos., VII, viii, 17). The "gnosis" met by these epp. (1 Tim 6 20; Tit 1 14) is not the highly developed type seen in the Ignatian Epp. of the 2d cent. Indeed, Bartlet ("Historic Setting of the Pastoral Epp.," Expos., January, 1913, 29) pointedly says that, as a result of Hort's "Judaistic Christianity" and "Christian Ecclesia" and Ramsay's "Historical Comm. on the Epp. of Timothy" (Expos., VII, vii, ix, VIII, i), "one feels the subject has been lifted to a new level of reality and that much criticism between Baur and Jülicher is out of date and irrelevant." It is now shown that the Pastoral Epp. are not directed against Gnosticism of advanced type, but even of a more Jewish type (Tit 1 14) than that in Col. Ramsay (Expos., VIII, i, 263) sweeps this stock criticism aside as "from the wrong point of view." It falls to the ground. Lightfoot ("Note on the Heresy Combated in the Pastoral Epp.," Bib. Essays, 413) had insisted on the Jewish character of the Gnosticism attacked here. As a matter of fact, the main objection to these epp. is that they do not fit into the story in Acts, which breaks off abruptly with Paul in Rome. But it is a false premise to assume that the Pastoral Epp. have to fit into the events in Acts. Harnack turns the objection that Paul in Acts 20 26 predicted that he would never see the Ephesian elders again into a strong argument for the date of Luke's Gospel before 2 Tim 4 21 (The Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospels, 103). Indeed, he may not have revisited Ephesus after all, but may have seen Timothy at Miletus also (1 Tim 1 3). Harnack frankly admits the acquittal and release of Paul and thus free play for the Pastoral Epp. Blass (Acta Apostolorum, 24) acknowledges the Pastoral Epp. as genuine. So also Findlay, art. "Paul," in HDB; Maclean in 1-vol HDB; Denney in Standard BD. Sanday (Inspiration, 364) comments on the strength of the external evidence for the Pastoral Epp. Even Holtzmann (Einh., 291) appears to admit echoes of the Pastoral Epp. in the Ignatian Epp. Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, "Date of the Pastoral Epp.," 399-437) justifies completely the acceptance of the Pauline authorship. Deissmann (St. Paul, 15) has a needed word: "The delusion is still current in certain circles that the scientific distinction of a Bible scholar may be estimated in the form of a percentage according to the proportion of his verdicts of spuriousness. . . . The extant letters of St. Paul have been innocently obliged to endure again a fair share of the martyrdom suffered by the historic St. Paul." See further PASTORAL EPISTLES.

(3) Paul's conception of his Epp.—Assuming, therefore, the Pauline authorship of the thirteen epp., we may note that they reveal in a remarkable way the growth in Paul's apprehension of Christ and Christianity, his adaptation to varied situations, his grasp of world-problems and the eternal values of life. Paul wrote other epp., as we know. In 1 Cor 5 9 there is a clear reference to a letter not now known to us otherwise, earlier than 1 Cor. The use of "every epistle" in 2 Thess 3 17 naturally implies that Paul had written more than two already. It is not certain to what letter Paul refers in 2 Cor 2 4—most probably to one between 1 and 2 Cor, though, as already shown, some scholars find that letter in 2 Cor 10-13. Once more Paul (Col 4 16) mentions an ep. addressed to the church at Laodicea. This ep. is almost certainly that which we know as Eph. If not, here is another lost ep. Indeed, at least two apocryphal Epp. to the Laodiceans were written to supply this deficiency. As early as 2 Thess 2 2 forgers were at work to palm off epp. in Paul's name, "or by ep. as from us," to attack and pervert Paul's real views, whom Paul denounces. It was entirely possible that this "nefarious work" would be continued (Gregory, Canon and Text of the NT, 1907, 191), though, as Gregory argues, Paul's exposure here would have a tendency to put a stop to it and to put Christians on their guard and to watch for Paul's signature to the epp. as a mark of genuineness (2 Thess 3 17; 1 Cor 16 21; Gal 6 11; Col 4 18). This was all the more important since Paul evidently dictated his letters to amanuenses, as to Tertius in the case of Rom (16 22). In the case of Philem (ver 19), Paul probably wrote the whole letter. We may be sure therefore that, if we had the other genuine letters of Paul, they would occupy the same general standpoint as the thirteen now in our possession. The point to note here is that the four groups of Paul's Epp. fit into the historical background of the Acts as recorded by Luke, barring the fourth group which is later than the events in Acts. Each group meets a specific situation in a definite region or regions, with problems of vital interest. Paul attacks these various problems (theological, ecclesiastical, practical) with marvelous vigor, and applies the eternal principles of the gospel of Christ in such fashion as to furnish a norm for future workers for Christ. It is not necessary to say that he was conscious of that use. Deissmann (St. Paul, 12 f) is confident on this point: "That a portion of these confidential letters should be still extant after centuries, St. Paul cannot have intended, nor did it ever occur to him that they would be." Be that as it may, and granted that Paul's Epp. are "survivals, in the sense of the technical language employed by the historical method" (ib, 12), still we must not forget that Paul attached a great deal of importance to his letters and urged obedience to the teachings which they contained: "I adjure you by the Lord that this ep. be read unto all the brethren" (1 Thess 5 27). This command we find in the very first one preserved to us. Once more note 2 Thess 3 14: "And if any man obeyeth not our word by this ep., note that man, that ye have no company with him." Evidently therefore Paul does not conceive his epp. as mere incidents in personal correspondence, but authoritative instructions for the Christians to whom they are addressed. In 1 Cor 7 17, "And so ordain I in all the churches," he puts his epistolary commands on a par with the words of Jesus quoted in the same chapter. Some indeed at Corinth (2 Cor 10 9 f) took his "letters" as an effort to "terrify" them, a thing that he was afraid to do in person. Paul (ver 11) does not deny the authority of his letters, but claims equal courage when he comes in person (cf 2 Cor 13 2.10). That Paul expected his letters to be used by more than the one church to which they were addressed is clear from Col 4 16: "And when this ep. hath been read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye also read the ep. from Laodicea." If the letter to Laodicea is our Eph and a sort of circular letter (cf Gal), that is clear. But it must be noted that Col, undoubtedly a specific letter to Colossae, is likewise to be passed on to Laodicea. It is not always observed that in 1 Cor 1 2, though the ep. is addressed "unto the church of God which is at Corinth," Paul adds, "with all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place, their Lord and ours." Philem is, of course, a personal letter, though it deals with a sociological problem of universal interest. The Pastoral Epp. are addressed to two young ministers and have many personal details, as is natural, but the epp. deal far more with the social aspects of church life and the heresies and vices that were threatening the very existence of Christianity in the Rom empire. Paul is eager that Timothy shall follow his teaching (2 Tim 3 10 f), and "the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (2 2). It is this larger view of the future of Christianity that concerns Paul very keenly. The very conception of his ministry to the Gentiles (Rom 15 16; Eph 3 7 f) led Paul to feel that he had a right to speak to all, "both to Greeks and to Barbarians" (Rom 1 14), and hence even to Rome (1 15 f). It is a mistake to limit Paul's Epp. to the local and temporary sphere given them by Deissmann.

(4) Development in Paul's Epp.—For Paul's gospel or theology see later. Here we must stress the fact that all four groups of Paul's Epp. are legitimate developments from his fundamental experience of grace as conditioned by his previous training and later work. He met each new problem with the same basal truth that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, revealed to Paul on the way to Damascus. The reality of this great experience must here be assumed (see discussion later). It may be admitted that the Acts does not stand upon the same plane as the Pauline Epp. as a witness concerning Paul's conversion (Fletcher, The Conversion of St. Paul, 1910, 5). But even so, the Epp. amply confirm Luke's report of the essential fact that Jesus appeared to Paul in the same sense that He did to the apostles and 500 Christians (1 Cor 15 4-9). The revelation of Christ to Paul and in Paul (ἐν ἐμοί, ἐν ἐμοί, Gal 1 16) and the specific call connected therewith to preach to the Gentiles gave Paul a place independent of and on a par with the other apostles (1 16 f; 2 1-10). Paul's first preaching (Acts 9 20) "proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God." This "primitive Paulinism" (Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, 1893, 113) lay at the heart of Paul's message in his sermons and speeches in Acts. Professor P. Gardner regards Luke as a "careless" historian ("The Speeches of St. Paul in Acts," Cambridge Bib. Essays, 1909, 386), but he quite admits the central place of Paul's conversion, both in the Acts and the Epp. (ib; cf also The Religious Experience of St. Paul).

We cannot here trace in detail the growth of Paulinism. Let Wernle speak (Beginnings of Christianity, 1903, I, 224) for us: "The decisive factor in the genius of St. Paul's theology was his personal experience, his conversion on the road to Damascus." This fact reappears in each of the groups of the Epp. It is the necessary implication in the apostolic authority claimed in 1 Thess 2 4-6; 2 Thess 2 15; 3 6.14. "We might have claimed authority as apostles of Christ" (1 Thess 2 6). For the second group we need only refer to 1 Cor 9 1 f and 15 1-11, where Paul justifies his gospel by the fact of having seen the risen Jesus. His self-depreciation in ver 9 is amply balanced by the claims in ver 10. See also 2 Cor 10-13 and Gal 1 and 2 for Paul's formal defence of his apostolic authority. The pleasantries in Rom 15 14 does not displace the claim in 15 16.23 f. In the third group note the great passage in Phil 3 12-14, where Paul pointedly alludes to his conversion: "I was laid hold of by Jesus Christ," as giving him the goal of his ambition, "that I may lay hold"; "I count not myself yet to have laid hold." This concentration of effort to come up to Christ's purpose in him is the key to Paul's life and letters, "I press on toward the goal." So the golden cord reappears in Eph 3 2-13: "How that by revelation was made known unto me the mystery, as I wrote before in few words, whereby, when ye read, ye can perceive my understanding in the mystery of Christ." In the fourth group he still recalls how Christ Jesus took pity on him, the blasphemer, the persecutor, the chief of sinners, and put him into the ministry, "that in me as chief might Jesus Christ show forth all his longsuffering, for an ensample of them that should thereafter believe on him unto eternal life" (1 Tim 1 16). He kept up the fight to the end (2 Tim 4 6 f), for the Lord Jesus stood by him (4 17), as on the road to Damascus. So the personal note of experience links all the epp. together. They reveal Paul's growing conception of Christ. Paul at the very start perceived that men are redeemed by faith in Jesus as the Saviour from sin through

His atoning death, not by works of the Law (Acts 13 38 f). In the first group there are allusions to the "work of faith and labor of love and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess 1 3). He speaks of "election" (1 4) and "our gospel" (1 5) and the resurrection of Jesus (1 10). The Father, Son and Spirit cooperate in the work of salvation (2 Thess 2 13 f), which includes election, belief, sanctification, glorification. It is not necessary to press the argument for the conception of salvation by faith in Christ, grace as opposed to works, in the second group. It is obviously present in the third and the fourth. We seem forced to the view therefore that Paul's experience was revolutionary, not evolutionary. "If we consider the whole history of Paul as it is disclosed to us in his letters, are we not forced to the conclusion that his was a catastrophic or explosive, rather than a slowly progressive personality?" (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1911, 32). "His gospel was included in his conversion, and it was meditation that made explicit what was thus implicit in his experience" (ib). This is not to say that there was no "spiritual development of St. Paul" (Matheson, 1890). There was, and of the richest kind, but it was a growth of expression in the successive application of the fundamental Christian conception. The accent upon this or that phase of truth at different stages in Paul's career does not necessarily mean that the truth is a new one to him. It may simply be that the occasion has arisen for emphasis and elaboration.

In a broad generalization the first group of the epp. is eschatological, the second soteriological, the third Christological, and the fourth pastoral (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 22). But one must not get the notion that Paul did not have a full gospel of salvation in the first group, and did not come to the true motive of the person of Christ as Lord till the second, or understand the pastoral office till the fourth. See emphasis on Paul's work as pastor and preacher in 1 Thess 2 (first group), and the Lordship of Christ also (1 Thess 1 1.3; 2 Thess 1 1; 2 13 f), on a par with the Father.

There was a change of accent in each group on questions of eschatology, but in each one Paul cherishes the hope of the second coming of Christ up to the very end when he speaks of his own death (2 Tim 4 8.18). Paul has a whole gospel of grace in all his epp., but he presses home the special phase of truth needed at the moment, always with proper balance and modification, though not in the form of a system of doctrine. In the first group he relieves the minds of the Thessalonian Christians from the misapprehension into which they had fallen concerning his position on the immediate coming of Christ. In the second group Paul vindicates the gospel of grace from the legalistic addition of the Judaizers who sought to rob the Gentiles of their freedom by insisting that they become Jews as well as Christians. This ringing battle is echoed in Acts 15 and is the mightiest conflict of Paul's career. We hear echoes of it in Phil 3, but he had won his contention. In the third group the battle with error has shifted to the province of Asia, esp. the Lycus Valley, where a mystic mixture of Judaism (Essenism) and heathen mystery-religions and philosophies (incipient Gnosticism) was so rife in the 2d cent. (the various forms of Gnosticism which combined with some aspects of Christianity). It is possible also that Mithraism was already a foe of Christianity. The central position and essential deity of Jesus Christ was challenged by these new and world-old heresies, and Paul attacks them with marvelous skill in Col and Eph and works out in detail his teaching concerning the person of Christ with due emphasis on the soteriological aspects of Christ's work and on Christian life. Bruce (St. Paul's Conception of Christianity) conceives that Paul gives us his entire conception of Christianity in the four great epp. of the second group, while B. Weiss (Bib. Theol. of the NT) sees a more developed doctrine in the third group. He is in his prime in both groups. In the fourth group the same struggle lingers on with variations in Crete and even in Ephesus. The Jewish phase of the heresy is more decided (perhaps Pharisaic), and recalls to some extent the Judaistic controversy in the second group. Paul is older and faces the end, and Christianity has enemies within and without. He turns to young ministers as the hope of the future in the propagation of the gospel of the happy God. The fires have burned lower, and there is less passion and heat. The tone is now fierce, now tender. The style is broken and reminiscent and personal, though not with the rush of torrential emotion in 2 Cor, nor the power of logic in Gal and Rom. Each ep. fits into its niche in the group. Each group falls into proper relation to the stage in Paul's life and justly reveals the changes of thought and feeling in the great apostle. It is essential that one study Paul's Epp. in their actual historical order if one wishes to understand the mind of Paul. Scholars are not agreed, to be sure on this point. They are not agreed on anything, for that matter. See two methods of presenting Paul's Epp. in Robertson, Chronological NT (1904), and Moffatt, Historical NT (1901).

II. Modern Theories about Paul.—Findlay (HDB, "Paul") utters a needed warning when he reminds us that the modern historical and psychological method of study is just as liable to prepossession and prejudice as the older categories of scholastic and dogmatic theology. "The focus of the picture may be displaced and its colors falsified by philosophical no less than by ecclesiastical spectacles" (ib). Deissmann (St. Paul, 4 f) sympathizes with this protest against the infallibility of modern subjective criticism: "That really and properly is the task of the modern student of St. Paul: to come back from the paper St. Paul of our western libraries, Germanized, dogmatized, modernized, to the historic St. Paul; to penetrate through the 'Paulinism' of our NT theologies to the St. Paul of ancient reality." He admits the thoroughness and the magnitude of the work accomplished in the 19th cent. concerning the literary questions connected with Paul's letters, but it is a "doctrinaire interest" that "has gone farther and farther astray." Deissmann conceives of Paul as a "hero of piety first and foremost," not as a theologian. "As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." In this position of Deissmann we see a return to the pre-Baur time. Deissmann would like to get past all the schools of criticism, back to Paul himself.

Baur started the modern critical attitude by his Pastoralbriefe (1835, p. 79), in which he remarked that there were only four epp. of Paul (Gal 1 and 2 Cor, Rom) which could be accepted as genuine. In his Paulus (1845) he expounded this thesis. He also rejected the Acts. From the four great epp. and from the pseudo-Clementine literature of the 2d cent., Baur argued that Paul and Peter were bitter antagonists. Peter and the other apostles were held fast in the grip of the legalistic conception of Christianity, a sort of Christianized Pharisaism. Paul, when converted, had reacted violently against this view, and became the exponent of gentle freedom. Christianity was divided into two factions, Jewish Christians (Petrinists) and gentile Christians (Paulinists). With this "key" Baur ruled out the other Pauline epp. and Acts as spurious, because they did not show the bitterness of this controversy. He called them "tendency" writings, designed to cover up the strife and to show that peace reigned in the camp. This arbitrary theory cut a wide swath for 50 years, and became a fetich with many scholars, but it is now dead. "It has been seen that it is bad criticism to make a theory on insecure grounds, and then to reject all the literature which contradicts it" (Maclean in 1-vol HDB). Ramsay (The First Christian Cent., 1911, 195) contends that the perpetuation of the Baur standpoint in Moffatt's Intro to the Lit. of the NT is an anachronism: "We are no longer in the 19th cent. with its negations, but in the 20th cent. with its growing power of insight and the power of belief that springs therefrom." Van Manen (EB) calls the Baur view that of the "old guard" of liberal theology in Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, and, to some extent, in Britain.

But even in Germany the older conservative view of Paul has always had champions. The most consistent of the recent opponents of Baur's

3. Protest views in Germany is Th. Zahn (of his against Einl. in das NT, 2 vols, 1897-99; Intro Baur's View to the NT, 3 vols, 1910). In Britain the true successor of Lightfoot as the chief antagonist of the Tübingen School is Sir W. M. Ramsay, whose numerous volumes (Church in the Rom Empire, 1893; Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, 1895; St. Paul the Traveller, 1896; Pauline and Other Studies, 1906; Cities of St. Paul, 1908; Luke the Physician and Other Studies, 1908; Pictures of the Apostolic Church, 1910; The First Christian Century, 1911) have given the finishing touches to the overthrow of Baur's contention.

But even so, already the Baur school had split into two parts. The ablest representatives, like

H. J. Holtzmann, Pfeiderer, Harnack, Jülicher, Lipsius, von Soden, were

4. Succes- sors to Baur compelled to admit more of Paul's Epp. as genuine than the four principal ones, till there are left practically none to fight over but Eph and the Pastoral Epp. This progress eliminated completely Baur's thesis and approached very nearly to the position of Lightfoot, Ramsay and Zahn. Von Soden (Early Christian Lit., 324) still stands out against 2 Thess, but Harnack has deserted him on that point. But the old narrow view of Baur is gone, and von Soden is eloquent in his enthusiasm for Paul (ib, 119): "As we gaze upon the great literary memorials of the Greeks we may well question whether these Pauline letters are not equal to them—indeed, do not surpass them—in spiritual significance, in psychological depths and loftiness of ideal, above all in the art of complete and forcible expression." The other wing of Baur's school Findlay (HDB) calls "ultra-Baurians." It is mainly a Dutch school with Loman and Van Manen as its main exponents, though it has support in Germany from Steck and Völter, and in America from W. B. Smith. These writers do not say that Paul is a myth, but that our sources (Acts and the 13 epp.) are all legendary. It is a relentless carrying of Baur's thesis to a reductio ad absurdum. Van Manen (EB) says of "the historical Paul" as distinct from "the legendary Paul": "It does not appear that Paul's ideas differed widely from those of the other disciples, or that he had emancipated himself from Judaism or had outgrown the law more than they." When one has disposed of all the evidence he is entirely free to reconstruct the pictures to suit himself. Quite arbitrarily, Van Manen accepts the "we"-sections in Acts as authoritative. But these give glimpses of the historical Jesus quite as truly as the Pauline Epp., and should therefore be rejected by advocates of the mythical Jesus. So the pendulum swings back and forth. One school destroys the other, but the fact of Paul's personality remains. "The new start is one of such importance that we must distinguish the pre-Pauline from the post-Pauline Christianity, or, what amounts to the same thing, the Palestinian sect and the world-religion" (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, I, 159).

In his Paulus (1904), Wrede finds the explanation of Paul's theology in late Jewish apocalyptic views and in the oriental mystery-religions. Bousset (Die Religion des Judenthums im NT Zeitalter, 1903)

5. Appeal to Comparative Religion

seeks to find in the "late Jewish apocalyptic" "conceptions from the Bab and the Irano-Zarathustrian religions" (Schweitzer, Paul and His Interpreters, 173). According to Wrede's view, Paul is one of the creators of "Christ" as distinct from the Jesus of history (cf "Jesus or Christ," HJ, suppl., January, 1909). "Wrede's object is to overthrow the view predominant in modern theology, that Paul loyally and consistently expounded and developed the theology of Jesus" (J. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, 1909, 2). J. Weiss in this book makes a careful reply to Wrede as others have done; cf A. Meyer, Jesus or Paul (1909), who concludes (p. 134) dramatically: "Paul—just one who points the way to Jesus and to God!" See also Jülicher, Paulus und Jesus (1907); Kaftan, Jesus und Paulus (1906); Kölbinger, Die geistige Einwirkung der Person Jesu und Paulus (1906). The best reply to Wrede's arguments about the mystery-religion is found in articles in the Expos for 1912-13 (now in book form) by H. A. A. Kennedy on "St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions." The position of Wrede is carried to its logical conclusion by Drews (Die Christus-Mythe, 1909), who makes Paul the creator of Christianity. W. B. Smith (Der vorchristliche Jesus, 1906) tries to show that "Jesus" was a pre-Christian myth or god. Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 235) sums the matter up thus: "Drews's thesis is not merely a curiosity; it indicates the natural limit at which the hypothesis advanced by the advocates of comparative religion, when left to its own momentum, finally comes to rest."

Schweitzer himself may be accepted as the best exponent of the rigid application of this view to Paul (Paul and His Interpreters, 1912)

6. The Eschatological Interpretation that he had made to Jesus (The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1910). He calibrates the ability to answer the absurdities of Steck, Loman and Van Manen and Drews by showing that the eschatological conceptions of Paul in his epp. are primitive, not late, and belong to the 1st cent., not to the 2d (Paul and His Interpreters, 249). He thus claims to be the true pupil of Baur, though reaching conclusions utterly different. There is undoubtedly an element of truth in this contention of Schweitzer, but he loses his case, when he insists that nothing but eschatology must be allowed to figure. "The edifice constructed by Baur has fallen," he proclaims (p. viii), but he demands that in its place we allow the "exclusively Jewish-eschatological" (p. ix) interpretation. There he slips, and his theory will go the way of that of Baur. C. Anderson Scott ("Jesus and Paul," Cambridge Bib. Essays, 365) admits that Paul has the same eschatological outlook as Jesus, but also the same ethical interest. It is not "either . . . or," but both in each case. See a complete bibliography of the "Jesus and Paul" controversy in J. G. Machens' paper on "Jesus and Paul" in Bib. and Theol. Studies (1912, 547 f). As Ramsay insists, we are now in the 20th cent. of insight and sanity, and Paul has come to his own. Even Wernle (Beginnings of Christianity, I, 163) sees that Paul is not the creator of the facts: "He merely transmits historical facts. God—Christ—Paul, such is the order." Saintsbury (History of Criticism, 152) says: "It has been the mission of the 19th cent. to prove that everybody's work was written by somebody else, and it will not be the most useless task of the 20th to betake itself to more profitable inquiries."

III. Chronology of Paul's Career.—There is not a single date in the life of Paul that is beyond dispute, though several are narrowed

1. Schemes to a fine point, and the general course and relative proportion of events are clear enough. Luke gave careful data for the time of the birth of Jesus (Lk 2 1 f), for the entrance of the Baptist on his ministry (3 1 f), and the age of Jesus when He began His work (3 23), but he takes no such pains in the Acts with chronology. But we are left with a number of incidental allusions and notes of time which call for some discussion. For fuller treatment see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 1910, 181) gives a comparative table of the views of Harnack, Turner, Ramsay and Lightfoot for the events from the crucifixion of Christ to the close of Acts. The general scheme is nearly the same, differing from one to four years here and there. Shaw (The Pauline Epp., xi) gives a good chronological scheme. Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 62 f) gives the theories of 23 scholars:

Turner, "Chronology," in HDB; Neteler, Untersuchung NT Zeitverhältnisse, 1894; O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgeschichte, 1895, changed in 2d ed. 1906; Bartlet, Apostolic Age, xlii f; Cornely (cf Laurent), NT Studien; Harnack, Chron. d. altchristl. Lit. bis Eusebius, 233-39; McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 164, 172; Zahn, Intro, III, 450 f; Ramsay, "The Pauline Chronology," Pauline and Other Studies, 345 f; Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 213-33; Wendt, Acts, 53-60, Meyer, Comm.; Renan, St. Paul; Bornemann, Theses, 17 f; Meyer, Comm.; Clemens, Paulus, I, 411; Giffert, Student's Life of Paul, 242-59; Weiss, Intro, I, 154 f; Sabatier, Paul, 13 f; Jülicher, Einl., 31 f; Findlay, "Paul" in HDB; Farrar, Paul, Appendix; Belser, Theol. Quartalschrift; Steinmann, Abfassungszeit d. Gal, 169; Hoennicke, Die Chronologie des Paulus.

Let us look at the dates given by ten of this list:

	Turner	Bartlet	Harnack	McGiffert	Zahn	Ramsay	Lightfoot	Clemens	Findlay	Hoennicke

Death of Paul	64-65	61-62	64	58	66-67	67	67	64	67	..

This table shows very well the present diversity of opinion on the main points in Paul's life. Before expressing an opinion on the points at issue it is best to examine a few details. Paul himself gives some notes of time. He gives "after 3 years" (Gal 1 18) as the period between his conversion and first visit to Jerus, though he does not necessarily mean 3 full years. In Gal 2 1, Paul speaks of another visit to Jerus "after the space of 14 years." Then again Luke quotes him as saying to the Ephesian elders at Miletus that he had spent "3 years" at Ephesus (Acts 20 31). These periods of time all come before Paul's last visit and arrest in Jerus, and they do not embrace all the time between his conversion and arrest. There is also another note of time in 2 Cor 12 2, where he speaks in an enigmatic way of experiences of his "14 years" ago from the writing of this ep. from Macedonia on the third tour. This will take him back to Tarsus before coming to Antioch at the request of Barnabas, and so overlaps a bit the other "14" above, and includes the "3 years" at Ephesus. We cannot, therefore, add these figures together for the total. But some light may be obtained from further details from Acts and the Epp.

(1) The death of Stephen.—Saul is "a young man" (Acts 7 58) when this event occurs. Like other young Jews he entered upon his life as a rabbi at the age of thirty. He had probably been thus active several years, esp. as he was now in a position of leadership and may even have been a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 26 10). Pontius Pilate was not deposed from his procuratorship till 36 AD, but was in a state of uneasiness for a couple of years. It is more probable, therefore, that the stoning of Stephen would take place after his deposition in the interregnum, or not many years before, when he would be afraid to protest against the lawlessness of the Jewish leaders. He had shown timidity at the death of Jesus, 29 or 30 AD, but some of the forms of law were observed. So nothing decisive is here obtained, though 35 AD seems more probable than 32 or 33.

2. Crucial Points

(2) The flight from Damascus.—Paul locates this humiliating experience (2 Cor 11 32 f) when "the governor under Aretas the king guarded the city of the Damascenes." Aretas the Arabian, and not the Roman, has now control when Paul is writing. The likelihood is that Aretas did not get possession of Damascus till 37 AD, when Tiberius died and was succeeded by Caligula. It is argued by some that the expression "the city of the Damascenes" shows that the city was not under the control of Aretas, but was attacked by a Bedouin chieftain who lay in wait for Paul before the city. That to me seems forced. Jos (Ant., XVIII, v, 3; vi, 3) at any rate is silent concerning the authority of Aretas over Damascus from 35–37 AD, but no coins or inscriptions show Rom rule over the city between 35 and 62 AD. Ramsay, however ("The Pauline Chronology," Pauline and Other Studies, 364), accepts the view of Marquardt (Römische Staatsalterth., I, 404 f) that it was possible for Aretas to have had possession of Damascus before 37 AD. The flight from Damascus is the same year as the visit to Jerus, Paul's first after his conversion (Acts 9 26; Gal 1 18). If we knew the precise year of this event, we could subtract two or three years and reach the date of his conversion. Lightfoot in his Comm. on Gal gives 38 as the date of this first visit to Jerus, and 36 as the date of the conversion, taking "after 3 years" in a free way, but in his Bib. Essays, 221, he puts the visit in 37 and the conversion in 34, and says "'after 3 years' must mean three whole years, or substantially so." Thus we miss a sure date again.

(3) The death of Herod Agrippa I.—Here the point of contact between the Acts (12 1–4.19–23) and Jos (Ant., XIX, viii) is beyond dispute, since both record and describe in somewhat similar vein the death of this king. Jos says that at the time of his death he had already completed the 3d year of his reign over the whole of Judaea (Ant., XIX, viii, 2). He received this dignity soon after Claudius began to reign in 41 AD, so that makes the date 44 AD. He died after the Passover in that year (44), for Peter was imprisoned by him during that feast (Acts 12 3). But unfortunately Luke sandwiches the narrative about Herod Agrippa in between the visit of Barnabas and Saul to Jerus from Antioch (Acts 11 29 f) and their return to Antioch (12 25). He does not say that the events here recorded were exactly synchronous with this visit, for he says merely "about that time." We are allowed therefore to place this visit before 44 AD or after, just as the facts require. The mention of "elders" in Acts 11 30 instead of apostles (cf both in 15 4) may mean that the apostles are absent when the visit is made. After the death of James (12 1 f) and release of Peter we note that Peter "went to another place" (12 17). But the apostles are back again in Jerus in 15 4 ff. Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 216) therefore places the visit "at the end of 44, or in 45." Once more we slip the connection and fail to fix a firm date for Paul. It is disputed also whether this 2d visit to Jerus according to Acts (9 26; 11 29 f) is the same as the "again" in Gal 2 1. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 59) identifies the visit in Gal 2 1 with that in Acts 11 29 f, but Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 221) holds that it "must be identified with the third of the Acts" (15 4 ff). In Gal 1 and 2 Paul is not recording his visits to Jerus, but showing his independence of the apostles when he met them in Jerus. There is no proof that he saw the apostles on the occasion of the visit in Acts 11 29 f. The point of Lightfoot is well taken, but we have no point of contact with the outside history for locating more precisely the date of the visit of Gal 2 1 and Acts 15 4 ff, except that it was after the first missionary tour of Acts 13 and 14.

(4) The first missionary tour.—Sergius Paulus is proconsul of Cyprus when Barnabas and Saul visit the island (Acts 13 7). The proconsul Paulus is mentioned in a Gr inscription of Soloi (Hogarth, Devia Cypria, 1889, 114) and Lucius Sergius Paulus in CIL, VI, 31, 545, but, as no mention of his being proconsul is here made, it is probably earlier than that time. The Soloi inscription bears the date 53 AD, but Sergius Paulus was not proconsul in 51 or 52. Hence he may have been proconsul in 50 or the early part of 51 AD. It could not be later and may have been earlier.

(5) The first visit to Corinth.—The point to note here is that Gallio becomes proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18 12). Paul has been apparently in Corinth a year and six months when Gallio appears on the scene (Acts 18 11). Aquila and Priscilla had "lately come from Italy" (18 2) when Paul arrived there. They had been expelled from Rome by the emperor Claudius (18 2). On the arrival of Gallio the Jews at once accuse Paul before him; he refuses to interfere, and Paul stays on for a while and then leaves for Syria with Aquila and Priscilla (18 18). Deissmann (St. Paul, Appendix, I, "The Proconsulate of L. Junius Gallio") has shown beyond reasonable doubt that Gallio, the brother of Seneca, became proconsul of Achaia about July, 51 AD (or possibly 52). On a stone found at Delphi, Gallio is mentioned as proconsul of Achaia according to the probable restoration of part of the text. But the stone mentions the fact that Claudius had been acclaimed imperator 26 times. By means of another inscription we get the 27th proclamation as imperator in connection with the dedication of an aqueduct on August 1, 52 AD. So thus the 26th time is before this date, some time in the earlier part of the year. We need not follow in detail the turns of the argument (see Deissmann, op. cit.). Once more we do not get a certain date as to the year. It is either the summer of 51 or 52 AD, when Gallio comes. And Paul has already been in Corinth a year and a half. But the terminus ad quem for the close of Paul's two years' stay in Corinth would be the early autumn of 52 AD, and more probably 51 AD. Hence the 2 Thessalonian Epp. cannot be later than this date. Before the close of 52 AD, and probably 51, therefore must come the 2d missionary tour, the conference at Jerus, the first missionary tour, etc. Deissmann is justified in his enthusiasm on this point. He is positive that 51 AD is the date of the arrival of Gallio.

(6) Paul at Troas according to Acts 20 6 f.—On this occasion Luke gives the days and the time of year (Passover). Ramsay figures (St. Paul the Traveller, 289 f) that Paul had his closing service at Troas on Sunday evening and the party left early Monday morning. Hence he argues back to the Passover at Philippi and concludes that the days as given by Luke will not fit into 56, 58, or 59 AD, but will suit 57. If he is correct in this matter, then we should have a definite year for the last trip to Jerus. Lewin (Fasti Sacri, nos. 1856, 1857) reaches the same conclusion. The conclusion is logical if Luke is exact in his use of days in this passage. Yet Lightfoot insists on 58 AD, but Ramsay has the advantage on this point. See Pauline and Other Studies, 352 f.

(7) Festus succeeding Felix.—When was Felix recalled? He was appointed procurator in 52 AD (Schürer, Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I, ii, 174). He was already ruler "many years" (Acts 24 10) when Paul appears before him in Caesarea. He holds on "two years" when he is succeeded by Festus (Acts 24 27). But in the Chronicle of Eusebius (Armenian text) it is stated that the recall of Felix took place in the last year of Claudius, or 54 AD. But this is clearly an error, in spite of the support given to it by Harnack (Chronologie d. Paulus), since Jos puts most of the rule of Felix in the reign of Nero (Ant. XX, viii, 1-9; BJ. II, xii, 8-14), not to mention the "many years" of Paul in Acts 24 10. But the error of Eusebius has now been explained by Erbes in his Todestage Pauli und Petri, and is made perfectly clear by Ramsay in Pauline and Other Studies, 349 ff. Eusebius overlooked the interregnum of 6 years between the death of Herod Agrippa I in 44 AD and the first year of Herod Agrippa II in 50 AD. Eusebius learned that Festus came in the 10th year of Herod Agrippa II. Counting from 50 AD, that gives us 59 AD as the date of the recall of Felix. This date harmonizes with all the known facts. "The great majority of scholars accept the date 60 for Festus; but they confess that it is only an approximate date, and there is no decisive argument for it" (Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 351). For minute discussion of the old arguments see Nash, art. "Paul" in new Sch-Hez Enc; Schürer, Hist. of the Jewish People, I, ii, 182 ff. But if Erbes and Ramsay are correct, we have at last a date that will stand. So then Paul sails for Rome in the late summer of 59 AD and arrives at his destination in the early spring ("had wintered," Acts 28 11) of 60 AD. He had been "two whole years in his own hired dwelling" (28 30) when Luke closes the Acts. On the basis of his release in 63 or early 64 and the journeyings of the Pastoral Epp., Paul's death would come by early summer of 68 before Nero's death, and possibly in 67. On this point see later. We can now count back from 59 AD with reasonable clearness to 57 as the date of Paul's arrest in Jerus. Paul spent at least a year and three months (Acts 19 8.10) in Ephesus (called in round numbers three years in Acts 20 31). It took a year for him to reach Jerus, from Pentecost (1 Cor 16 8) to Pentecost (Acts 20 16). From the spring of 57 AD we thus get back to the end of 53 as the time of his arrival in Ephesus (Acts 19 1). We have seen that Gallio came to Corinth in the summer of 51 AD (or 52), after Paul had been there a year and a half (Acts 18 11), leaving ample time in either case for the journeys from Corinth to Ephesus, to Caesarea, to Jerus apparently (Acts 18 21 f), and to Ephesus (19 1) from the summer of 51 (or 52) we go back two years to the beginning of the 2d missionary tour (Acts 16 1-6) as 49 (or 50). The Jerus Conference was probably in the same year, and the first missionary tour would come in the two (or three) preceding years 47 and 48 (48-49). The stay at Antioch (Acts 14 28) may have been of some length. So we come back to the end of 44 or beginning of 45 for the visit to Jerus in Acts 11 29 f. Before that comes the year in Antioch with Barnabas (11 26), the years in Tarsus in Cilicia, the "three years" after the conversion spent mostly in Arabia (Gal 1 17 f), Paul's first appearance at the death of Stephen (Acts 7 58). These early dates are more conjectural, but even so the facts seem to indicate 35 AD as the probable year of Saul's conversion. The year of his birth would then be between 1 and 5 AD, probably nearer 1. If so, and if his death was in 67 or 68 AD, his age is well indicated. He was "Paul the Aged" (Philem ver 9) when he wrote to Philemon from Rome in 61-63 AD.

IV. His Equipment.—Ramsay chooses as the title of ch ii, in his St. Paul the Traveller, the words "The Origin of St. Paul." It is not possible to explain the work and teaching of Paul without a just conception of the forces that entered into his life. Paul himself is still woefully misunderstood by some. Thus A. Meyer (Jesus or Paul, 1909, 119) says: "In spite of all that has been said, there is no doubt that St. Paul, with his peculiar personality, with his tendency to recondite gnostic speculation and rabbinic argument, has heavily encumbered the cause of Christianity. For many simple souls, and for many natures that are otherwise constituted than himself, he has barred the way to the simple Christianity of Jesus." That is a serious charge against the man who claimed to have done more than all the other apostles, and rightly, so far as we can tell (1 Cor 15 10), and who claimed that his interpretation of Jesus was the only true one (Gal 1 7-9). Moffatt (Paul and Paulinism, 1910, 70) minimizes the effect of Paulinism: "The majority of Paul's distinctive conceptions were either misunderstood, or dropped, or modified, as the case might be, in the course of a few decades." "Paulinism as a whole stood almost as far apart from the Christianity that followed it as from that which preceded it" (ib, 73). "The aim of some scholars seems to be to rob every great thinker of his originality" (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1). Ramsay (Pauline and Other Studies, 3 f) boldly challenges the modern prejudice of some scholars against Paul by asking, "Shall we hear evidence or not?" Every successive age must study afresh the life and work of Paul (ib, 27) if it would understand him. Deissmann (St. Paul, 3 f) rightly sees that "St. Paul is spiritually the great power of the apostolic age." Hence "the historian, surveying the beginnings of Christianity, sees St. Paul as first after Jesus." Feine (Jesus Christus und Paulus, 1902, 298) claims that Paul grasped the essence of the ministry of Christ "auf das tiefste." I own myself a victim to "the charm of Paul," to use Ramsay's phrase (Pauline and Other Studies, 27). In seeking to study "the shaping influences" in Paul's career (Alexander, The Ethics of St. Paul, 1910, 27), we shall be in error if we seek to explain everything by heredity and environment and if we deny any influence from these sources. He is what he is because of original endowments, the world of his day, and his experience of Christ Jesus. He had both essential and accidental factors in his equipment (Fairbairn, Studies in Religion and Theology, 1910, 469 f). Let us note the chief factors in his religious development.

Geography plays an important part in any life. John the Baptist spent his boyhood in the hill country of Judaea in a small town

1. The City (Lk 1 39) and then in the wilderness. of Tarsus Jesus spent His boyhood in the town of Nazareth and the country round.

Both John and Jesus show fondness for Nature in all its forms. Paul grew up in a great city and spent his life in the great cities of the Rom empire. He makes little use of the beauties of Nature, but he has a keen knowledge of men (cf Robertson, Epochs in the Life of Paul, 12). Paul was proud of his great city (Acts 21 39). He was not merely a resident, but a "citizen" of this distinguished city. This fact shows that Paul's family had not just emigrated from Judaea to Tarsus a few years before his birth, but had been planted in Tarsus as part of a colony with full municipal rights (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 31 f). Tarsus was the capital of Cilicia, then a part of the province of Syria, but it had the title of metropolis and was a free city, urbs libera (Pliny, NH, v.27). To the ancient Gr the city was his "fatherland" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 1908, 90). Tarsus was situated on the river Cydnus, and in a wide plain with the hill country behind and the snow-covered Taurus Mountains in the distance. It was subject to malaria. Ramsay (ib, 117 ff) from Gen 10 4 f holds that the early inhabitants were Greeks mingled with Orientals. East and West flowed together here. It was a Rom town also with a Jewish colony (ib, 169 ff), constituting a city tribe to which Paul's family belonged. So then Tarsus was a typical city of the Gr-Rom civilization.

The religions of the times all met there in this great mart of business. But it was one of the great seats of culture also. Strabo (xiv.6.73) even says that "Tarsus surpassed all other universities, such as Alexandria and Athens, in the study of philosophy and educational literature in general." "Its great preëminence," he adds, "consists in this, that the men of learning here are all natives." Accordingly, he and others have made up a long list of distinguished men who flourished at Tarsus in the late autumn of Gr learning: philosophers—of the Academy, of the Epicurean and Stoic schools—poets, grammarians, physicians. At Tarsus, one might say, "you breathed the atmosphere of learning" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 205). But Ramsay (Cities of St. Paul, 231 f) cautions us not to misunderstand Strabo. It was not even one of the three great universities of the world in point of equipment, fame, students from abroad, or general standing. It was not on a par with Athens and Alexandria, except that "it was rich in what constitutes the true excellence and strength of a university, intense enthusiasm and desire for knowledge among the students and great ability and experience among some at least of the teachers" (ib, 233). Strabo was very fond of Athenodorus, for instance. No students from abroad came to Tarsus, but they went from Tarsus elsewhere. But Philostratus represents Apollonius of Tyana as disgusted with the university and the town, and Dio Chrysostom describes Tarsus as an oriental and non-Hellenic town.

Ramsay speaks of Tarsus in the reign of Augustus as "the one example known in history of a state ruled by a university acting through its successive principals." "It is characteristic of the general tendency of university life in a prosperous and peaceful empire, that the rule of the Tarsian University was marked by a strong reaction toward oligarchy and a curtailment of democracy; that also belongs to the oriental spirit, which was so strong in the city. But the crowning glory of Tarsus, the reason for its undying interest to the whole world, is that it produced the apostle Paul; that it was the one city which was suited by its equipoise between the Asiatic and the Western spirit to mold the character of the great Hellenist Jew; and that it nourished in him a strong source of loyalty and patriotism as the citizen of no mean city" (Ramsay, op. cit., 235). The city gave him a schooling in his social, political, intellectual, moral, and religious life, but in varying degrees, as we shall see. It was because Tarsus was a cosmopolitan city with "an amalgamated society" that it possessed the peculiar suitability "to educate and mold the mind of him who would in due time make the religion of the Jewish race intelligible to the Gr-Rom world" (ib, 88). As a citizen of Tarsus Paul was a citizen of the whole world.

It was no idle boast with Paul when he said, "But I am a Roman born" (Acts 22 28). The chief captain might well be "afraid when he

2. Roman knew that he was a Roman, and Citizenship because he had bound him" (22 29).

Likewise the magistrates at Philippi "feared when they heard that they were Romans" (Acts 16 39), and promptly released Paul and Silas and "asked them to go away from the city." "To the Roman his citizenship was his passport in distant lands, his talisman in seasons of difficulties and danger. It shielded him alike from the caprice of municipal law and the injustice of local magistrates" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 203). As a citizen of Rome, therefore, Paul stood above the common herd. He ranked with the aristocracy in any provincial town (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 31). He would naturally have a kindly feeling for the Rom government in return for this high privilege and protection. In its pessimism the Rom empire had come to be the world's hope, as seen in the Fourth Eclogue of Virgil (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 49). Paul would seize upon the Rom empire as a fit symbol of the kingdom of heaven. "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil 3 20); "Ye are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints" (Eph 2 19). So he interprets the church in terms of the body politic as well as in terms of the Israelite theocracy (Col 2 19). "All this shows the deep impression which the Rom institutions made on St. Paul" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 205). Ramsay draws a striking parallel under the heading, "Paulinism in the Rom Empire" (Cities of St. Paul, 70 ff). "A universal Paulinism and a universal Empire must either coalesce, or the one must destroy the other." It was Paul's knowledge of the Rom empire that gave him his imperialism and statesmanlike grasp of the problems of Christianity in relation to the Rom empire. Paul was a statesman of the highest type, as Ramsay has conclusively shown (Pauline and Other Studies, 49–100). Moffatt (Paul and Paulinism, 66) does say: "His perspective was not imperialistic," but he shows thereby a curious inability to understand Paul. The vision of Paul saw that the regeneration of the empire could come only through Christianity. Ramsay strikingly shows how the emperor dreaded the spiritual upheaval in Paulinism and fought it steadily till the time of Constantine, when "an official Christianity was victorious, but Pauline Christianity had perished, and Paul was now a mere saint, no longer Paul but St. Paul, forgotten as a man or a teacher, but remembered as a sort of revivification of the old pagan gods" (Cities of St. Paul, 78). But, as Ramsay says, "it was not dead; it was only waiting its opportunity; it revived when freedom of thought and freedom of life began to stir in Europe; and it guided and stimulated the Protestants of the Reformation."

Suffer Ramsay once more (Pauline and Other Studies, 100): "Barbarism proved too powerful for the Gr-Rom civilization unaided by the new religious bond; and every channel through which that civilization was preserved or interest in it maintained, either is now or has been in some essential part of its course Christian after the Pauline form." Paul would show the Rom genius for organizing the churches established by him. Many of his churches would be in Rom colonies (Antioch in Pisidia, Philippi, Corinth, etc.). He would address his most studied ep. to the church in Rome, and Rome would be the goal of his ministry for many years (Findlay, HDB). He would show his conversance with Rom law, not merely in knowing how to take advantage of his rights as a citizen, but also in the use of legal terms like "adoption" (Gal 4 5 f), where the adopted heir becomes son, and heir and son are interchangeable. This was the obsolete Rom law and the Gr law left in force in the provinces (cf Gal 3 15). But in Rom 8 16 f the actual revocable Rom law is referred to by which "heirship is now deduced from sonship, whereas in Gal sonship is deduced from heirship; for at Rome a son must be an heir, but an heir need not be a son (cf He 9 15 ff which presupposes Rom law and the revocability of a will)" (Maclean in 1-vol HDB). So in Gal 3 24 the tutor or pedagogue presents a Gr custom preserved by the Romans. This personal guardian of the child (often a slave) led him to school, and was not the guardian of the child's property in Gal 4 2. See Ramsay, Gal, 337-93; Ball, St. Paul and the Rom Law, 1901, for further discussion. As a Roman, Paul would have "nomen and praenomen, probably taken from the Rom officer who gave his family civitas; but Luke, a Greek, had no interest in Rom names. Paulus, his cognomen, was not determined by his nomen; there is no reason to think he was an Emilius" (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 31). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul spoke Latin (see Souter, Expos, April, 1911). He was at any rate a "Roman gentleman" (Findlay, HDB), as is shown by the dignity of his bearing before governors and kings and the respect accorded him by the proconsul Sergius Paulus, the procurator Porcius Festus, and the centurion Julius, whose prisoner he was in the voyage to Rome. His father, as a Rom citizen, probably had some means which may have come to Paul before the appeal to Rome, which was expensive (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 310 ff). Though a prisoner in Rome, he made Rome "his best vantage ground and his adoptive home," and it was here that he rose to "his loftiest conceptions of the nation and destiny of the universal church" (Findlay, HDB) as "an ambassador in chains" (Eph 6 20). As a Rom citizen, according to tradition, he was beheaded with the sword and not subjected to crucifixion, the traditional fate of Simon Peter. He saw the true pax Romana to be the peace that passeth all understanding (Phil 4 7; cf Rostron, The Christology of St. Paul, 1912, 19).

It is not possible "to specify all the influences that worked on Paul in his youth" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 79). We do not know all

3. Hellen-ism the life of the times. But he was subject to all that life in so far as any other Jewish youth was. "He was master of all the education and the opportunities of his time. He turned to his profit and to the advancement of his great purpose all the resources of civilization" (Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 285). I heartily agree with this conception of Paul's ability to assimilate the life of his time, but one must not be led astray so far as Schramm who, in 1710, wrote De stupenda eruditione Pauli ("On the Stupendous Erudition of Paul"). This is, of course, absurd, as Lightfoot shows (Bib. Essays, 206). But we must not forget Paul lived in a Gr city and possessed Gr citizenship also (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 33). Certainly the Gr traits of adaptability, curiosity, alertness, the love of investigation were marked features of his character, and Tarsus afforded wide opportunity for the acquiring of these qualities (The Ethics of St. Paul, 39). He learned to speak the vernacular koinē like a native and with the ease and swing displayed by no other NT writer save Luke and the author of He. He has a "poet's mastery of language," though with the passion of a soul on fire, rather than with the artificial rules of the rhetoricians of the day (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 239 f). Blass (Die Rhythmen der asiatischen und römischen Kunstprosa, 1905) holds that Paul wrote "rhythmically elaborated artistic prose—a singular instance of the great scholar's having gone astray" (Deissmann, Light, etc., 64). But there is evidence that Paul was familiar with the use of the diatribe and other common rhetorical devices, though he was very far from being tinged with Atticism or Asianism. It is certain that Paul did not attend any of the schools of rhetoric and oratory. Heinrici (Vorrede to 1 Cor in Meyer's Krit. exeget. Komm.) argues that Paul's methods and expressions conform more nearly to the cynic and Stoic diatribe than to the rabbinical dialectic; cf also Wendland und Kern, Philo u. d. kynisch-stoische Diatribe, and Hicks, "St. Paul and Hellenism" in Stud. Bib., IV. How extensive was his acquaintance with Gr lit. is in doubt. Lightfoot says: "There is no ground for saying that St. Paul was a very erudite or highly-cultivated man. An obvious maxim of practical life from Menander (1 Cor 15 33), a religious sentiment of Cleanthes repeated by Aratus, himself a native of Tarsus (Acts 17 28), a pungent satire of Epimenides (Tit 1 12), with possibly a passage here and there which dimly reflects some classical writer, these are very slender grounds on which to build the supposition of vast learning" (Bib. Essays, 206); but Lightfoot admits that he obtained directly or indirectly from contact with Gr thought and learning lessons far wider and more useful for his work than a perfect style or a familiar acquaintance with the classical writers of antiquity. Even so, there is no reason to say that he made his few quotations from hearsay and read no Gr books (cf Zahn, Intro to the NT, 52). Certainly he knew the Gr OT and the Jewish Apoc and apocalypses in Gr. Garvie is only willing to admit that Paul had such knowledge of Gr lit. and philosophy as any Jew, living among Greeks, might pick up (Life and Teaching of Paul, 2), and charges Ramsay with "overstating the influence of the gentile environment on Paul's development" (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 8). Ramsay holds that it is quite "possible that the philosophical school at Tarsus had exercised more influence on Paul than is commonly allowed" (St. Paul the Traveller, 354). Tarsus was the home of Athenodorus. It was a stronghold of Stoic thought. "At least five of the most eminent teachers of that philosophy were in the university" (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 47). It is not possible to say whether Paul attended these or any lectures at the university, though it is hard to conceive that a brilliant youth like Saul could grow up in Tarsus with no mental stimulus from such a university. Garvie (ib, 6) asks when Paul could have studied at the university of Tarsus. He was probably too young before he went to Jerus to study under Gamaliel. But it is not probable that he remained in Jerus continuously after completing his studies till we see him at the death of Stephen (Acts 7 58). He may have returned to Tarsus meanwhile and taken such studies. Another possibility is that he took advantage of the years in Tarsus after his conversion (Acts 9 30; Gal 1 21) to equip himself better for his mission to the Gentiles to which he had been called. There is no real difficulty on the score of time. The world was saturated with Gr ideas, and Paul could not escape them. He could not escape it unless he was innocent of all culture. Ramsay sees in Paul a love of truth and reality "wholly inconceivable in a more narrow Hebrew, and wholly inexplicable without an education in Gr philosophy" ("St. Paul and Hellenism," Cities of St. Paul, 34). Paul exhibited a freedom and universalism that he found in the Gr thought of the time which was not so decayed as some think. For the discussion between Garvie and Ramsay see Expos, April and December, 1911. Pfeiderer (Urchristenthum, Vorwort, 174-78) finds a "double root" of Paulinism, a Christianized Hellenism and a Christianized Pharisaism. Harnack is more nearly correct in saying that "notwithstanding Paul's Gr culture, his conception of Christianity is, in its deepest ground, independent of Hellenism." The Hellenistic influence on Paul was relative and subordinate (Wendland, Die hel.-röm. Kultur in ihren Beziehungen zu Judenthum und Christenthum, 3te Aufl, 1912, 245), but it was real, as Köhler shows (Zum Verständnis des Apostels Paulus, 9). He had a "Gr inheritance" beyond a doubt, and it was not all unconscious or subliminal as Rostrom argues (Christology of St. Paul, 17). It is true that in Athens the Stoics and Epicureans ridiculed Paul as a "picker up of learning's crumbs"—Browning's rendering (An Epistle) of σπερμαλόγος, spermologos. Paul shows a fine scorn of the sophistries and verbal refinements of the mere philosophers and orators in 1 Cor 1 and 2, but all the same he reveals a real apprehension of the true significance of knowledge and life. Dr. James Adam (The Religious Teachers of Greece, 360) shows instances of "the real kinship of thought between Plato and St. Paul." He does not undertake to say how it came about. He has a Platonic expression, τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, in 2 Cor 5 10, and uses a Stoic and cynic word in 2 Cor 9 8, αὐτάρκειαν, autárkeian. Indeed, there are so many similarities between Paul and Seneca in language and thought that some scholars actually predicate an acquaintance or dependence of the one on the other. It is far more likely that Paul and Seneca drew upon the common phrases of current Stoicism than that Seneca had seen Paul's Epp. or knew him personally. Lightfoot has a classic discussion of the matter in his essay on "St. Paul and Seneca" in the Comm. on Phil (see also Carr, "St. Paul's Attitude to Gr Philosophy," Expos, V, ix). Alexander finds four Stoic ideas (Divine Immanence, Wisdom, Freedom, Brotherhood) taken and glorified by Paul to do service for Christ (Ethics of St. Paul, 49-55). Often Paul uses a Stoic phrase with a Christian content. Lightfoot boldly argues (Bib. Essays, 207) that the later Gr lit. was a fitter handmaid for the diffusion of the gospel than the earlier.

Paul as the apostle to the Gr-Rom world had to "understand the bearings of the moral and religious life of Greece as expressed in her literature, and this lesson he could learn more impartially and more fully at Tarsus in the days of her decline than at Athens in the freshness of her glory" (ib). Ramsay waxes bold enough to discuss "the Pauline philosophy of history" (Cities of St. Paul, 10-13). I confess to sympathy with this notion and find it in all the Pauline epp., esp. in Rom. Moffatt (Paul and Paulinism, 66) finds "a religious philosophy of history" in Rom 9-11, throbbing with strong personal emotion. Paul rose to the height of the true Christian philosopher, though not a technical philosopher of the schools. Deissmann (St. Paul, 53) admits his language assigns him "to an elevated class," and yet he insists that he wrote "large letters" (Gal 6 11) because he had "the clumsy, awkward writing of a workman's hand deformed by toil" (p. 51). I cannot agree that here Deissmann understands Paul. He makes "the world of St. Paul" on too narrow a scale.

Was Paul influenced by Mithraism? H. A. A. Kennedy has given the subject very careful and thorough treatment in a series of papers in Expos for 1912-13, already mentioned (see II, 5, above). His arguments are conclusive on the whole against the wild notions of W. B.

Smith, Der vorchristliche Jesus; J. M. Robertson, Pagan Christs; A. Drews, Die Christus-Mythe; and Lublinski, Die Entstehung des Christentums aus der antiken Kultur. A magic papyrus about 300 AD has "I adjure thee by the god of the Hebrew Jesu" (ll. 3019 f), but Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 256) refuses to believe this line genuine: "No Christian, still less a Jew, would have called Jesus 'the god of the Hebrews.'" Clemen (Primitive Christianity and Its non-Jewish Sources, 1912, 336) indorses this view of Deissmann and says that in the 1st cent. AD "one cannot speak of non-Jewish influences on Christology." One may dismiss at once the notion that Paul "deified" Jesus into a god and made Him Christ under the influence of pagan myths. Certainly pagan idolatry was forced upon Paul's attention at every turn. It stirred his spirit at Athens to see the city full of idols (Acts 17 16), and he caught eagerly at the altar to an unknown god to give him an easy introduction to the true God (17 23); but no one can read Rom 1 and 2 and believe that Paul was carried away by the philosophy of vain deceit of his time. He does use the words "wisdom" and "mystery" often in 1 Cor, Col, and Eph, and in Phil 4 12, "I [have] learned the secret," he uses a word employed in the mystic cults of the time. It is quite possible that Paul took up some of the phrases of these mystery-religions and gave them a richer content for his own purposes, as he did with some of the gnostic phraseology (Plērōma, "fulness," for instance). But Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 191 f) deals a fatal blow against the notion that the mystery-religions had a formative influence on Paul. He urges, with point, that it is only in the 2d cent. that these cults became widely extended in the Rom empire. The dates and development are obscure, but it "is certain that Paul cannot have known the mystery-religions in the form in which they are known to us, because in this fully developed form they did not exist." Cumont (Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, 2d ed, 1909 [ET]) insists repeatedly on the difficulties in the way of assuming without proof that Mithraism had any influence on Paul. But in particular it is urged that Paul drew on the "mysteries" for his notions of baptism and the Lord's Supper as having magical effects. Appeal is made to the magical use of the name of Jesus by the strolling Jewish exorcists in Ephesus (Acts 18 13 ff). Kirsopp Lake (Earlier Epp. of St. Paul, 233) holds that at Corinth they all accepted Christianity as a mystery-religion and Jesus as "the Redeemer-God, who had passed through death to life, and offered participation in this new life to those who shared in the mysteries which He offered," viz. baptism and the Lord's Supper. But Kennedy (Expos, December, 1912, 548) easily shows how with Paul baptism and the Lord's Supper are not magical sacraments producing new life, but symbolic pictures of death to sin and new life in Christ which the believer has already experienced. The battle is still raging on the subject of the mystery-religions, but it is safe to say that so far nothing more than illustrative material has been shown to be true of Paul's teaching from this source.

There is nothing incongruous in the notion that Paul knew as much about the mystery-religions as he did about incipient Gnosticism. Indeed the two things may have been to some extent combined in some places. A passage in Col 2 18 has long bothered commentators: "dwelling in the things which he hath seen," or (m) "taking his stand upon the things," etc. Westcott and Hort even suspected an early error in the text, but the same word, ἐμβάτευσεν, embateuō, has been found by Sir W. M. Ramsay as a result of investigations by Makridi Bey, of the Turkish Imperial Museum, in the sanctuary of Apollo at Claros, a town on the Ionian coast. Some of the initiates here record the fact and say that being "enquirers, having been initiated, they entered" (embateuō). The word is thus used of one who, having been initiated, enters into the life of the initiate (cf Independent, 1913, 376). Clearly, then, Paul uses the word in that sense in Col 2 18.

For further discussion see Jacoby, Die antiken Mysterienreligionen und das Christentum; Glover, Conflict of Religions in the Early Rom Empire; Reitzenstein, Die hell. Mysterienreligionen; Friedländer, Rom Life and Manners under the Early Empire, III; Thorburn, Jesus Christ, Historical or Mythical.

M. Brückner (Der sterbende und auferstehende Gottheit in den orientalischen Religionen und ihr Verhältnis zum Christentum, 1908) says: "As in Christianity, so in many oriental religions, a belief in the death and resurrection of a Redeemer-God (sometimes as His Son) occupied a central place in the worship and cultus." To this Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 193) replies: "What manipulations the myths and rites of the cults in question must have undergone before this general statement could become possible! Where is there anything about dying and resurrection in Mithra?" There we may leave the matter.

Paul was Gr and Rom, but not "pan-Bab," though he was keenly alive to all the winds of doctrine that blew about him, as we see

5. Judaism in Col, Eph, and the Pastoral Epp.

But he was most of all the Jew, that is, before his conversion. He remained a Jew, even though he learned how to be all things to all men (1 Cor 9 22). Even though glorying in his mission as apostle to the Gentiles (Eph 3 8), he yet always put the Jew first in opportunity and peril (Rom 2 9 f). He loved the Jews almost to the point of death (Rom 9 3). He was proud of his Jewish lineage and boasted of it (2 Cor 11 16-22; Acts 22 3 f; 26 4 f; Phil 3 4-6). "His religious patriotism flickered up within his Christianity" (Moffatt, Paul and Paulinism, 66). Had he not been a Rom citizen with some Gr culture and his rich endowments of mind, he would probably not have been the "chosen vessel" for the work of Christ among the Gentiles (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 15). Had he not been the thorough Jew, he could not have mediated Christianity from Jew to Greek. "In the mind of Paul a universalized Hellenism coalesced with a universalized Hebraism" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 43). Ramsay strongly opposes the notion of Harnack and others that Paul can be understood "as purely a Hebrew." So in Paul both Hebraism and Hellenism meet, though Hebraism is the main stock. He is a Jew in the Gr-Rom world and a part of it, not a mere spectator. He is the Hellenistic Jew, not the Aram. Jew of Pal (cf Simon Peter's vision on the house-top at Joppa, for instance). But Paul is not a Hellenizing Jew after the fashion of Jason and Menelaus in the beginning of the Maccabean conflict. Findlay (HDB) tersely says: "The Jew in him was the foundation of everything that Paul became." But it was not the narrowest type of Judaism in spite of his persecution of the Christians. He belonged to the Judaism of the Dispersion. As a Rom citizen in a Gr city he had departed from the narrowest lines of his people (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 47). His Judaism was pure, in fact, as he gives it to us in Phil 3 5. He was a Jew of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was a Hebrew, of the seed of Abraham (2 Cor 11 22). He shared in full all the covenant blessings and privileges of his people (Rom 9 1-5), whose crowning glory was, that of them came Jesus the Messiah. He was proud of the piety of his ancestors (2 Tim 1 3), and made progress as a student of Judaism ahead of his fellows (Gal 1 14). His ancestry was pure, Hebrew of the Hebrews (Phil 3 5), and so his family preserved the native Palestinian traditions in Tarsus. His name Saul was a proof of loyalty to the tribe of Benjamin as his cognomen Paul was evidence of his Rom citizenship. In his home he would be taught the law by his mother (cf Gal 1 14), as was true of Timothy's mother and grandmother (2 Tim 1 5). In Tarsus he would go to the synagogue also. We know little of his father, save that he was a Rom citizen and so a man of position in Tarsus and possibly of some wealth; that he was a tent-maker and taught his son the same trade, as all Jewish fathers did, whatever their rank in life; that he was a Pharisee and brought up his son as a Pharisee (Acts 23 6), and that he sent the young Saul to Jerus to study at the feet of Gamaliel (Acts 22 3). Paul always considered himself a Pharisee as distinct from the Sadducaic scepticism (23 6). Many of the Pharisaic doctrines were identical with those of Christianity. That Paul did not consider himself a Pharisee in all respects is shown later by his conflict with the Judaizers (Gal 2; Acts 15; 2 Cor 10-13). Paul says that he was reared as a strict Pharisee (Acts 26 5), though the school of Gamaliel (grandson of Hillel) was not so hard and narrow as that of Shammai. But all Pharisees were stricter than the Sadducees. So Jerus played an important part in the training of Saul (Acts 22 3), as Paul recognized. He was known in Jerus as a student. He knew Aram, as well as Gr (and Lat), and could speak in it so as to attract the attention of a Jewish audience (Acts 22 2). Paul was fortunate in his great teacher Gamaliel, who was liberal enough to encourage the study of Gr lit. But his liberality in defending the apostles against the Sadducees in Acts 5 34-39 must not be misinterpreted in comparison with the persecuting zeal of his brilliant pupil against Stephen (7 58). Stephen had opened war on the Pharisees themselves, and there is no evidence that Gamaliel made a defence of Stephen against the lawless rage of the Sanhedrin. It is common for pupils to go farther than their teachers, but Gamaliel did not come to the rescue. Still Gamaliel helped Saul, who was undoubtedly his most brilliant pupil and probably the hope of his heart for the future of Judaism. Harnack (History of Dogma, I, 94) says: "Pharisaism had fulfilled its mission in the world when it produced this man." Unfortunately, Pharisaism did not die; in truth has never died, not even from Christianity. But young Saul was the crowning glory of Pharisaism. An effort has recently been made to restore Pharisaism to its former dignity. Herford (Pharisaism, Its Aim and Method, 1912) undertakes to show that the Gospels have slandered Pharisaism, that it was the one hope of the ancient world, etc. He has a chapter on "Pharisaism and Paul," in which he claims that Paul has not attacked the real Pharisaism, but has aimed his blows at an unreal creation of his own brain (p. 222). But, if Paul did not understand Pharisaism, he did not understand anything. He knew not merely the OT in the Heb and the LXX tr, for he quotes from both, though usually from the LXX, but he also knew the Jewish Apoc and apocalypses, as is shown in various ways in his writings (see arts. on these subjects). Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters) carries too far his idea that Paul and Jesus merely moved in the circle of Jewish eschatology. He makes it explain everything, and that it cannot do. But Paul does show acquaintance with some of these books. See Kennedy, St. Paul's Conception of the Last Things (1904), for a sane and adequate discussion of this phase of the subject. Pfeiderer pursues the subject in his Paulinism, as does Kabisch in his Eschatologie. So Sanday and Headlam use this source in their Comm. on Rom. Paul knew Wisd, also, a book from the Jewish-Alexandrian theology with a tinge of Gr philosophy (see Goodrick, Book of Wisd, 398-403; cf also Jowett's essay on "St. Paul and Philo" in his Epp. of St. Paul). Paul knew how to use allegory (Gal 4 24) in accord with the method of Philo. So then he knew how to use the Stoic diatribe, the rabbinical diatribe and the Alexandrian allegory. "In his cosmology, angelology, and demonology, as well as eschatology, he remains essentially Jewish" (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 17). When he becomes a Christian he will change many of his views, for Christ must become central in his thinking, but his method learned in the rabbinical schools remains with him (Köhler, Zum Verständnis, etc, 7). Here, then, is a man with a wonderfully rounded culture. What was his mental gifts?

Much as we can learn about the times of Paul (cf Selden, In the Time of Paul, 1900, for a brief sketch of Paul's world), we know something of the political structure of the Roman world, the social life of the 1st cent. AD, the religious condition of the age, the moral standards of the time, the intellectual tendencies of the period. New discoveries continue to throw fresh light on the life of the middle and lower classes among whom Paul chiefly labored. And, if Deissmann in his brilliant study (St. Paul, A Study in Social and Religious History) has pressed too far the notion that Paul the tent-maker ranks not with Origen, but with Amos the herdman (p. 6, on p. 52 he calls it a mistake "to speak of St. Paul the artisan as a proletarian in the sense which the word usually bears with us"), yet he is right in insisting that Paul is "a religious genius" and "a hero of piety" (p. 6). It is not possible to explain the personality and work of a man like Paul by his past and to refer with precision this or that trait to his Jewish or Gr training (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 58). "We must allow something to his native originality" (ib). We are all in a sense the children of the past, but some men have much more the power of initiative than others. Paul is not mere "eclectic patchwork" (Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 218). Even if Paul was acquainted with Philo, which is not certain, that fact by no means explains his use of Philo, the representative Jew of the Hellenistic age. "Both are Jews of the Dispersion, city-dwellers, with marked cosmopolitan traits. Both live and move in the LXX Bible. Both are capable of ecstatic and mystical experiences, and have many points of contact in detail. And yet they stand in very strong contrast to one another, a contrast which reminds us of the opposition between Seneca and St. Paul. . . . Philo is a philosopher, St. Paul the fool pours out the vials of his irony upon the wisdom of the world" (Deissmann, St. Paul, 110). Deissmann, indeed, cares most for "the living man, Paul, whom we hear speaking and see gesticulating, here playful, gentle as a father, and tenderly coaxing, so as to win the hearts of the infatuated children—there thundering and lightning with the passionate wrath of a Luther, with cutting irony and bitter sarcasm on his lips" (ib, 16 f).

(1) Personal appearance.—We have no reliable description of Paul's stature and looks. The Acts of Paul and Thecla (§3) have a protraiture thus: "Baldheaded, bowlegged, strongly built, a man small in size, with meeting eyebrows, with a rather large nose, full of grace, for at times he looked like a man and at times he had the face of an angel," and Ramsay (Church in the Rom Empire, 32) adds: "This plain and unflattering account of the apostle's personal appearance seems to embody a very early tradition," and in ch xvi he argues that this story goes back to a document of the 1st cent. We may not agree with all the details, but in some respects it harmonizes with what we gather from Paul's Epp. Findlay (HDB) notes that this description is confirmed by "the lifelike and unconventional figure of the Rom ivory diptych, 'supposed to date not later than the 4th cent.'" (Lewin's Life and Epp. of St. Paul, Frontispiece, and II, 211). At Lystra the natives took Barnabas for Jupiter and Paul for Hermes, "because he was the chief speaker" (Acts 14 12), showing that Barnabas had the more impressive appearance, while Paul was his spokesman. In Malta the natives changed their minds in the opposite direction, first thinking Paul a murderer and then a god because he did not die from the bite of the serpent (Acts 28 4-6). His enemies at Corinth sneered at the weakness of his bodily presence in contrast to the strength of his letters (2 Cor 10 9 f). The attack was really on the courage of Paul, and he claimed equal boldness when present (vs 11 f), but there was probably also a reflection on the insignificance of his physique. The terrible bodily sufferings which he underwent (2 Cor 11 23-26) left physical marks (στίγματα, stigmata, Gal 6 17) that may have disfigured him to some extent. Once his illness made him a trial to the Galatians to whom he preached, but they did not scorn him (Gal 4 14). He felt the frailty of his body as an earthen vessel (2 Cor 4 7) and as a tabernacle in which he groaned (5 4). But the effect of all this weakness was to give him a fresh sense of dependence on Christ and a new influx of Divine power (2 Cor 11 30; 12 9). But even if Paul was unprepossessing in appearance and weakened by illness, whether ophthalmia, which is so common in the East (Gal 4 15), or malaria, or recurrent headache, or epilepsy, he must have had a tough constitution to have endured such hardship to a good old age. He had one infirmity in particular that came upon him at Tarsus (2 Cor 12 1-9) in connection with the visions and revelations of the Lord then granted him. The affliction seems to have been physical (σκόλοψ τῇ σαρτί, skolops tē sarkē, "a stake in the flesh" or "for the flesh"), and it continued with him thereafter as a messenger of Satan to buffet Paul and to keep him humble. Some think that this messenger of Satan was a demon that haunted Paul in his nervous state. Others hold it to be epilepsy or some form of hysteria superinduced by the visions and revelations which he had had. Cf Krenkel, Beiträge (pp. 47-125), who argues that the ancients looked with such dread on epilepsy that those who beheld such attacks would "spit out" so as to escape the evil (cf modern "knocking on wood"); cf qui sputatur morbus in Plautus (Captivi, iii.4, 17). Reference is made to Gal 4 14, οὐδὲ ἐξερρώσασε, οὐδὲ ἐξεψήσασε, "nor did ye spit out," as showing that this was the affliction of Paul in Galatia. But epilepsy often affects the mind, and Paul shows no sign of mental weakness, though his enemies charged him with insanity (Acts 26 24; 2 Cor 5 13; 12 11). It is urged in reply that Julius Caesar, Alfred the Great, Peter the Great, and Napoleon all had epilepsy without loss of mental force. It is difficult to think headache or malaria could have excited the disgust indicated in Gal 4 14, where some trouble with the eyes seems to be indicated. The ministers of Satan (2 Cor 11 15) do not meet the requirements of the case, nor mere spiritual sins (Luther), nor struggle with lust (Roman Catholic, stimulus carnis). Garvie (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 65, 80) thinks it not unlikely that "it was the recurrence of an old violent temptation," rather than mere bodily disease. "Can there be any doubt that this form of temptation is more likely to assail the man of intense emotion and intense affection, as Paul was?" But enough of what can never be settled. "St. Paul's own scanty hints admonish to caution" (Deissmann, St. Paul, 63). It is a blessing for us not to know, since we can all cherish a close bond with Paul. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 37 ff) calls special attention to the look of Paul. He "fastened his eyes on" the man (Acts 13 9; 14 9). He argues that Paul had a penetrating, powerful gaze, and hence no eye trouble. He calls attention also to gestures of Paul (Acts 20 24; 26 2). There were artists in marble and color at the court of Caesar, but no one of them cared to preserve a likeness of the poor itinerant preacher who turned out to be the chief man of the age (Deissmann, St. Paul, 58). "We are like the Christians of Colossae and Laodicea, who had not seen his face in the flesh" (Col 2 1).

(2) His natural endowments.—In respect to his natural endowments we can do much better, for his epp. reveal the mind and soul of the man. He is difficult to comprehend, not because he conceals himself, but because he reveals so much of himself in his epp. He seems to some a man of contradictions. He had a many-sided nature, and his very humanness is in one sense the greatest thing about him. There are "great polar contradictions" in his nature. Deissmann (St. Paul, 62 ff) notes his ailing body and his tremendous powers for work, his humility and his self-confidence, his periods of depression and of intoxication with victory, his tenderness and his sternness; he was ardently loved and furiously hated; he was an ancient man of his time, but he is cosmopolitan and modern enough for today. Findlay (HDB) adds that he was a man possessed of dialectical power and religious inspiration. He was keenly intellectual and profoundly mystical (cf Campbell, Paul the Mystic, 1907). He was a theologian and a man of affairs. He was a man of vision with a supreme task to which he held himself. He was a scholar, a sage, a statesman, a seer, a saint (Garvie, Studies in Paul and His Gospel, 68-84). He was a man of heart, of passion, of imagination, of sensibility, of will, of courage, of sincerity, of vivacity, of subtlety, of humor, of adroitness, of tact, of genius for organization, of power for command, of gift of expression, of leadership—"All these qualities and powers went to the making of Jesus Christ's apostle to the nations, the master-builder of the universal church and of Christian theology" (Findlay, HDB; see Lock, St. Paul the Master Builder, 1905; and M. Jones, St. Paul the Orator, 1910).

I cannot agree with Garvie's charge of cowardice (Life and Teaching of Paul, 173) in the matter of the purifying rites (Acts 21 23) and the dividing of the Sanhedrin (23 6). The one was a mere matter of prudence in a nonessential detail, the other was justifiable skill in resisting the attack of unscrupulous enemies. One does not understand Paul who does not understand his emotional nature. He was "quick, impetuous, strenuous, impassioned" (Bevan, St. Paul in the Light of Today, 1912, 26). His heart throbs through his epp., and he loves his converts like a mother or a lover (Findlay, HDB) rather than a pastor. We feel the surging emotion of his great spirit in 1 Thess, 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, Rom, Phil, 2 Tim in particular. He had the spiritual temperament and reaches his highest flights in his moments of rhapsody. He has elasticity and rebound of spirit, and comes up with the joy of victory in Christ out of the severest trials and disappointments. His ambition is great, but it is to serve Christ his Lord. He is a man of faith and a man of prayer. For him to live is Christ. He has a genius for friendship and binds men to him with hooks of steel—men like Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, Luke, Titus (Speer, The Man Paul, 1900, 111 ff). He is not afraid to oppose his friends when it is necessary for the sake of truth, as with Peter (Gal 2 11 ff) and with Barnabas (Acts 15 35 ff). "While God made Paul like the other apostles out of the clay whereof ordinary men are fashioned, yet we may say that He took extraordinary pains with his education" (Fairbairn, Studies in Religion and Theology, 471). If ever a man, full-blooded and open-eyed, walked the earth, it was Paul. It is a debatable question whether Paul was married or not. He certainly was not when he wrote (1 Cor 7 7; 9 5). But, if he was a member of the Sanhedrin when he cast his vote against the disciples (Acts 26 10), as his language naturally means, then he had been married.

There is in Paul the gift of leadership in a marked degree. He, though young, is already at the head of the opposition to Stephen (Acts 7 58), and soon drives the disciples out of Jerus.

(3) His supernatural gifts.—He had his share of them. He had all the gifts that others could boast of at Corinth, and which he lightly esteemed except that of prophecy (1 Cor 14 18-29). He had his visions and revelations, but would not tell what he had seen (2 Cor 12 1-9). He did the signs of an apostle (2 Cor 12 12-14). He had the power to work miracles (1 Cor 4 19-21) and to exercise discipline (1 Cor 5 4 f; 2 Cor 13 1-3). But what he cared for most of all was the fact that Jesus had appeared to him on the road to Damascus and had called him to the work of preaching to the Gentiles (1 Cor 15 8).

No other element in the equipment of Paul is comparable in importance to his conversion.

(1) Preparation.—It was sudden, and yet God had led Saul to the state of mind when it could more easily happen. True, Saul was engaged in the very act of persecuting the believers in Jerus. His mind was flushed with the sense of victory. He was not conscious of any lingering doubts about the truth of his position and the justice of his conduct till Jesus abruptly told him that it was hard for him to kick against the goad (Acts 26 14). Thus suddenly brought to bay, the real truth would flash upon his mind. In later years he tells how he had struggled in vain against the curse of the Law (Rom 7 7 f). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul here has in mind his experience before his conversion, though the latter part of the chapter may refer to a period later. There is difficulty in either view as to the "body of this death" that made him so wretched (Rom 7 24). The Christian keeps up the fight against sin in spite of defeat (7 23), but he does not feel that he is "carnal, sold under sin" (7 14). But when before his conversion did Paul have such intensity of conviction? We can only leave the problem unanswered. His reference to it at least harmonizes with what Jesus said about the goad. The words and death of Stephen and the other disciples may have left a deeper mark than he knew. The question might arise whether after all the Nazarenes were right. His plea for his conduct made in later years was that he was conscientious (Acts 26 9) and that he did it ignorantly in unbelief (1 Tim 1 13). He was not wilfully sinning against the full light as he saw it. It will not do to say with Holsten that Saul was half-convinced to join the disciples, and only needed a jolt to turn him over. He was "yet breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord" (Acts 9 1), and went to the high priest and asked for letters to Damascus demanding the arrest of the disciples there. His temper on the whole is distinctly hostile to Christ, and the struggle against his course was in the subconscious mind. There a volcano had gathered ready to burst out.

It is proper to ask whether Paul had known Jesus in the flesh, but it is not easy to give a categorical reply. It is possible, though hardly likely, that Paul had come to Jerus to study when Jesus as a boy of 12 visited the temple, and so heard Jesus and the doctors. That could be true only in case Paul was born 5 or 6 BC, which is quite unlikely. It is possible again that Paul may have remained in Jerus after his graduation at the school of Gamaliel and so was present in Jerus at the trial and death of Jesus. Some of the ablest of modern scholars hold that Paul knew Jesus in the flesh. It will at once seem strange that we have no express statement to this effect in the letters of Paul, when he shows undoubted knowledge of various events in the life of Christ (cf Wynne, Fragmenary Records of Jesus of Nazareth, 1887). It is almost certain, as J. Weiss admits (Paul and Jesus, 41), that in 1 Cor 9 1 Paul refers to the Risen Jesus. The passage in 2 Cor 5 16 is argued both ways: "Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh: even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more." J. Weiss (ib. 41-55) argues strongly for the view that he knew Jesus in the flesh. But in the first clause of the sentence above Paul means by "after the flesh," not acquaintance, but standpoint. It is natural to take it in the same way as applied to Christ. He has changed his viewpoint of Christ and so of all men. Weiss pleads (ib. p. 40), at any rate, that we have no word saying that "Paul had not seen Jesus in person." It may be said in reply that the fact that Jesus has to tell Paul who He is (Acts 9 5) shows that Paul did not have personal acquaintance with Him. But the question may be left in abeyance as not vitally important. He certainly had not understood Jesus, if he knew Him.

(2) Experience.—Space does not permit a discussion of this great event of Paul's conversion at all commensurate with its significance. A literature of importance has grown up around it besides the lengthy discussions in the lives and theologies of Paul (see e.g. Lord Lyttleton's famous Observations on Saul's Conversion, 1774; Fletcher's A Study of the Conversion of St. Paul, 1910; Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul, 1911; Maggs, The Spiritual Experience of St. Paul). All sorts of theories have been advanced to explain on naturalistic grounds this great experience of Christ in the life of Paul. It has been urged that Paul had an epileptic fit, that he had a sunstroke, that he fell off his horse to the ground, that he had a nightmare, that he was blinded by a flash of lightning, that he imagined that he saw Jesus as a result of his highly wrought nervous state, that he deliberately renounced Judaism because of the growing conviction that the disciples were right. But none of these explanations explains. Mere prejudice against the supernatural, such as is shown by Weinel in his Paulus, and by Holsten in his able book (Zum Evangelium d. Paulus und Petrus), cannot solve this problem. One must be willing to hear the evidence. There were witnesses of the bright light (Acts 26 13) and of the sound (9 7) which only Paul understood (22 9), as he alone beheld Jesus. It is claimed by some that Paul had a trance or subjective vision, and did not see Jesus with his eyes. Denney (Standard Bible Dict.) replies that it is not a pertinent objection. Jesus (Jn 21 1) "manifested" Himself, and Paul says that he "saw" Jesus (1 Cor 9 1), that Jesus "appeared" (1 Cor 15 8) to him. Hence it was both subjective and objective. But the reality of the event was as clear to Paul as his own existence. The account is given 3 t in Acts (chs 9, 22, 26) in substantial agreement, with a few varying details. In ch 9 the historical narrative occurs, in ch 22 Paul's defence before the mob in Jerus is given, and in ch 26 we have the apology before Agrippa. There are no contradictions of moment, save that in ch 26 Jesus Himself is represented as giving directly to Paul the call to the Gentiles while in chs 9 and 22 it is conveyed through Ananias (the fuller and more accurate account). There is no need to notice the apparent contradiction between 9 7 and 22 9, for the difference in case in the Gr gives a difference in sense, hearing the sound, with the genitive, and not understanding the sense, with the accusative. Findlay (HBD) remarks that the conversion of Paul is a psychological and ethical problem which cannot be accounted for save by Paul's own interpretation of the change wrought in him. He saw Jesus and surrendered to Him.

(3) Effect on Paul.—His surrender to Jesus was instantaneous and complete: "What shall I do, Lord?" (Acts 22 10). He could not see for the glory of that light (22 11), but he had already seen "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4 6). The god of this world could blind him no longer. He had seen Jesus, and all else had lost charm for Paul. There is infinite pathos in the picture of the blind Saul led by the hand (Acts 9 8) into Damascus. All the pride of power is gone, all the lust for vengeance. The fierceness of the name of Saul is well shown in the dread that Ananias has and the protest that he makes to the Lord concerning him (9 10-14). Ananias doubtless thought that the Lord had made a strange choice of a vessel to bear the message of Christ to the Gentiles, kings, and the children of Israel (9 15), but there was hope in the promise of chastisement to him (9 16). So he went, and calls him "Brother Saul." Saul was filled with the Holy Spirit, the scales fell from his eyes, he was baptized. And now what next? What did the world hold in store for the proud scion of Judaism who had renounced power, place, pride for the lowly Nazarene? He dared not go back to Jerus. The Jews in Damascus would have none of him now. Would the disciples receive him? They did. "And he was certain days with the disciples that were at Damascus" (9 19). Ananias vouched for him by his vision. Then Saul took his courage in his hands and went boldly into the synagogues and "proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God" (9 20). This was a public committal and a proclamation of his new creed. There was tremendous pith and point in this statement from Saul. The Jews were amazed (Acts 9 21). This is the core of Paul's message as we see in his later ministry (Acts 13; 17 3). It rests at bottom on Paul's own experience of grace. "His whole theology is nothing but the explanation of his own conversion" (Stalker, Life of St. Paul, 45). We need not argue (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 51) that Paul understood at once the full content of the new message, but he had the heart of it right.

V. Work.—There was evidently a tumult in Paul's soul. He had undergone a revolution, both intellectual and spiritual. Before he proceeded farther it was wise to think through the most important implications of the new standpoint. Luke gives no account of this personal phase of Paul's career, but he allows room for it between Acts 9 21 and 22. It is Paul who tells of his retirement to Arabia (Gal 1 17 f) to prove his independence of the apostles in Jerus. He did not go to them for instruction or for ecclesiastical authority. He did not adopt the merely traditional view of Jesus as the Messiah. He knew, of course, the Christian contention well enough, for he had answered it often enough. But now his old arguments were gone and he must work his way round to the other side, and be able to put his new gospel with clearness and force. He was done with calling Jesus anathema (1 Cor 12 3). Henceforth to him Jesus is Lord. We know nothing of Paul's life in Arabia nor in what part of Arabia he was. He may have gone to Mt. Sinai and thought out grace in the atmosphere of law, but that is not necessary. But it is clear that Paul grew in apprehension of the things of Christ during these years, as indeed he grew to the very end. But he did not grow away from the first clear vision of Christ. He claimed that God had revealed His Son in him that he might preach to the Gentiles (Gal 1 16). He claimed that from the first and to the very last. The undoubted development in Paul's Epp. (see Matheson, Spiritual Development of St. Paul, and Sabatier, The Apostle Paul) is, however, not a changing view of Christ that nullifies Paul's "original Christian inheritance" (Köhler, Zum Verständnis des Apostels Paulus, 13). Pfeiderer (Influence of the Apostle Paul on the Development of Christianity, 3d ed, 1897, 217) rejects Col because of the advanced Christology here found. But the Christology of Col is implicit in Paul's first sermon at Damascus. "It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the significance and value of the Cross became clear to him almost simultaneously with the certainty of the resurrection and of the Messiahship of Jesus" (Garvie, Studies, etc, 57). The narrow Jew has surrendered to Christ who died for the sins of the world. The universal gospel has taken hold of his mind and heart, and it will work out its logical consequences in Paul. The time in Arabia is not wasted. When he reappears in Damascus (Acts 9 22) he has "developed faith" (Findlay, HDB) and energy that bear instant fruit. He is now the slave of Christ. For him henceforth to live is Christ. He is crucified with Christ. He is in Christ. The union of Paul with Christ is the real key to his life. It is far more than a doctrine about Christ. It is real fellowship with Christ (Deissmann, St. Paul, 123). Thus it is that the man who probably never saw Christ in the flesh understands him best (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, I, 159).

Saul had "increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews that dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the Christ" (Acts 9 22). Now he not merely "proclaims" as before (9 20); he "proves." He does it with such marvelous skill that the Jews are first confounded, then enraged to the point of murder. Their former hero was now their foe. The disciples had learned to run from Saul. They now let him down in a basket through the wall by night and he is gone (Acts 9 23 ff). This then is the beginning of the active ministry of the man who was called to be a chosen vessel to Gentiles, kings, and Jews. There was no need to go back to the wilderness. He had gotten his bearings clearly now. He had his message and it had his whole heart. He had not avoided Jerus because he despised flesh and blood, but because he had no need of light from the apostles since "the Divine revelation so completely absorbed his interest and attention" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, 33). No door was open as yet among the Gentiles. Sooner or later he must go to Jerus and confer with the leaders there if he was to cooperate with them in the evangelization of the world. Saul knew that he would be an object of suspicion to the disciples in Jerus. That was inevitable in view of the past. It was best to go, but he did not wish to ask any favors of the apostles. Indeed he went in particular "to visit Cephas" (in to "become acquainted with," Gal 1 18). They knew each other, of course, as opponents. But Saul comes now with the olive branch to his old enemy. He expressly explains (Gal 1 19) that he saw no other apostle. He did see James, the Lord's brother, who was not one of the Twelve. It seems that at first Peter and James were both afraid of Saul (Acts 9 26), "not believing that he was a disciple." If a report came 3 years before of the doings at Damascus, they had discounted it. All had been quiet, and now Saul suddenly appears in Jerus in a new rôle. It was, they feared, just a ruse to complete his work of old. But for Barnabas, Saul might not have had that visit of 15 days with Peter. Barnabas was a Hellenist of Cyprus and believed Saul's story and stood by him. Thus he had his opportunity to preach the gospel in Jerus, perhaps in the very synagogues in which he had heard Stephen, and now he is taking Stephen's place and is disputing against the Grecian Jews (Acts 9 29). He had days of blessed fellowship (9 28) with the disciples, till the Grecian Jews sought to kill him as Saul had helped to do to Stephen (9 29). It was a repetition of Damascus, but Saul did not wish to run again so soon. He protested to the Lord Jesus, who spoke in a vision to him, and recalls the fate of Stephen, but Jesus bids him go: "For I will send thee forth far hence unto the Gentiles" (Acts 22 17-21). One martyr like Stephen is enough. So the brethren took him down to Caesarea (Acts 9 30). It was an ominous beginning for a ministry with so clear a call. Where can he go now?

2. Opposition

They "sent him forth to Tarsus" (Acts 9 30). Who would welcome him there? At Jerus he apparently avoided Gamaliel and the

3. Waiting Sanhedrin.

He was with the Christians and preached to the Hellenistic Jews. The Jews regarded him as a turncoat, a renegade Jew. There were apparently no Christians in Tarsus, unless some of the disciples driven from Jerus by Saul himself went that far, as they did go to Antioch (Acts 11 19 f). But Saul was not idle, for he speaks himself of his activity in the regions of Syria and Cilicia during this "period of obscurity" (Denney, Standard Bible Dict.) as a thing known to the churches of Judaea (Gal 1 21 f). He was not idle then. The way was not yet opened for formal entrance upon the missionary enterprise, but Saul was not the man to do nothing at home because of that. If they would not hear him at Damascus and Jerus, they would in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, his home province. We are left in doubt at first whether Paul preached only to Jews or to Gentiles also. He had the specific call to preach to the Gentiles, and there is no reason why he should not have done so in this province, preaching to the Jews first as he did afterward. He did not have the scruples of Simon Peter to overcome. When he appears at Antioch with Barnabas, he seems to take hold like an old hand at the business. It is quite probable, therefore, that this obscure ministry of some 8 or 10 years may have had more results than we know. Paul apparently felt that he had done his work in that region, for outside of Antioch he gives no time to it except that in starting out on the second tour from Antioch "he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (Acts 15 41), churches probably the fruit of this early ministry and apparently containing Gentiles also. The letter from the Jerus conference was addressed to "the brethren who are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia" (Acts 15 23). Cilicia was now part of the Rom province of Syria. So then we conclude that Saul had a gentile ministry in this region. "Independently, under no human master, he learned his business as a missionary to the heathen" (Findlay, HDB). One can but wonder whether Saul was kindly received at home by his father and mother. They had looked upon him with pride as the possible successor of Gamaliel, and now he is a follower of the despised Nazarene and a preacher of the Cross. It is possible that his own exhortations to fathers not to provoke their children to wrath (Eph 6 4) may imply that his own father had cast him out at this time. Findlay (HDB) argues that Saul would not have remained in this region so long if his home relations had been altogether hostile. It is a severe test of character when the doors close against one. But Saul turned defeat to glorious gain.

Most scholars hold that the ecstatic experience told by Paul in 2 Cor 12 1-9 took place before he came to Antioch. If we count the years strictly, 14 from 56 AD would bring us to 42 AD. Paul had spent a year in Antioch before going up to Jerus (Acts 11 29 f). Findlay (HDB) thinks that Paul had the visions before he received the call to come to Antioch. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 41) holds he received the call first. "Such a mood of exaltation would account for the vision to which he refers in 2 Cor 12 1-4." At any rate he had the vision with its exaltation and the thorn in the flesh with its humiliation before he came to Antioch in response to the invitation of Barnabas. He had undoubtedly had a measure of success in his work in Cilicia and Syria. He had the seal of the Divine blessing on his work among the Gentiles. But there was a pang of disappointment over the attitude of the Jerus church toward his work. He was apparently left alone to his own resources. "Only such a feeling of disappointment can explain the tone of his references to his relations to the apostles (Gal 1 11-24)" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, 41). There is no bitterness in this tone—but puzzled surprise. It seems that the 12 apostles are more or less absent from Jerus during this period with James the brother of the Lord Jesus as chief elder. A narrow Pharisaic element in the church was active and sought to shape the policy of the church in its attitude toward the Gentiles. This is clear in the treatment of Peter, when he returned to Jerus after the experience at Caesarea with Cornelius (Acts 11 1-18). There was acquiescence, but with the notion that this was an exceptional case of the Lord's doing. Hence they show concern over the spread of the gospel to the Greeks at Antioch, and send Barnabas to investigate and report (Acts 11 19-22). Barnabas was a Hellenist, and evidently did not share the narrow views of the Pharisaic party in the church at Jerus (11 2), for he was glad (11 23 f) of the work in Antioch. Probably mindful of the discipline attempted on Simon Peter, he refrained from going back at once to Jerus. Moreover, he believed in Saul and his work, and thus he gave him his great opportunity at Antioch. They had there a year's blessed work together (11 25 ff). So great was the outcome that the disciples received a new name to distinguish them from the Gentiles and the Jews. But the term "Christian" did not become general for a long time. There was then a great Gr church at Antioch, possibly equal in size to the Jewish church in Jerus. The prophecy by Agabus of a famine gave Barnabas and Saul a good excuse for a visit to Jerus with a general collection—"every man according to his ability"—from the Gr church for the relief of the poverty in the Jerus church. Barnabas had assisted generously in a similar strain in the beginning of the work there (Acts 4 36 f), unless it was a different Barnabas, which is unlikely. This contribution would help the Jerus saints to understand now that the Greeks were really converted. It was apparently successful according to the record in Acts. The apostles seem to have been absent, since only "elders" are mentioned in 11 30.

The incidents in ch 12, as already noted, are probably not contemporaneous with this visit, but either prior or subsequent to it. However, it is urged by some scholars that this visit is the same as that of Gal 2 1-10, since Paul would not have omitted it in his list of visits to Jerus. But then Paul is not giving a list of visits, but is only showing his independence of the apostles. If they were absent from Jerus at that time, there would be no occasion to mention it. Besides, Luke in Acts 15 does recount the struggle in Jerus over the problem of gentile liberty. If that question was an issue at the visit in Acts 11 30, it is quite remarkable that he should have passed it by, esp. if the matter caused as much heat as is manifest in Gal 2, both in Jerus and Antioch. It is much simpler to understand that in Acts 15 and Gal 2 1-10 we have the public and the private aspects of the same issue, than to suppose that Luke has slurred the whole matter over in Acts 11 30. The identification of the visit of Gal 2 with that in Acts 11 30 makes it possible to place Gal before the conference in Jerus in Acts 15 and implies the correctness of the South-

Galatian theory of the destination of the ep. and of the work of Paul, a theory with strong advocates and arguments, but which is by no means established (see below for discussion at more length). So far as we can gather from Luke, Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerus with John Mark (Acts 12 25) "when they had fulfilled their ministration" with satisfaction. The Pharisaic element was apparently quiescent, and the outlook for the future work among the Gentiles seemed hopeful. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 62 ff) argues strongly for identifying the revelation mentioned in Paul's speech in Acts 22 20 f with this visit in 11 30 (12 25), rather than with the one in Acts 9 29 f. There is a textual problem in 12 25, but I cannot concur in the solution of Ramsay.

Paul had already preached to the Gentiles in Cilicia and Syria for some 10 years. The work was not new to him. He had had his specific call from Jerus long ago and had

5. The First Great Mission Campaign: answered it. But now an entirely new situation arises. His work had been individual in Cilicia. Now the Spirit Acts 13 and specifically directs the separation of 14, 47 and Barnabas and Saul to this work (Acts 48 AD 13 2). They were to go together, and they had the sympathy and prayers of a great church. The endorsement was probably not "ordination" in the technical sense, but a farewell service of blessing and good will as the missionaries went forth on the world-campaign (13 3). No such unanimous endorsement could have been obtained in Jerus to this great enterprise. It was momentous in its possibilities for Christianity. Hitherto work among the Gentiles had been sporadic and incidental. Now a determined effort was to be made to evangelize a large section of the Rom empire. There is no suggestion that the church at Antioch provided funds for this or for the two later campaigns, as the church at Philippi came to do. How that was managed this time we do not know. Some individuals may have helped. Paul had his trade to fall back on, and often had resort to it later. The presence of John Mark "as their attendant" (13 5) was probably due to Barnabas, his cousin (Col 4 10). The visit to Cyprus, the home of Barnabas, was natural. There were already some Christians there (Acts 11 20), and it was near. They preach first in the synagogues of the Jews at Salamis (13 5). We are left to conjecture as to results there and through the whole island till Paphos is reached. There they meet a man of great prominence and intelligence, Sergius Paulus, the Rom proconsul, who had been under the spell of a sorcerer with a Jewish name—Elymas Bar-jesus (of Peter's encounter with Simon Magus in Samaria). In order to win and hold Sergius Paulus, who had become interested in Christianity, Paul has to punish Bar-jesus with blindness (13 10 ff) in the exercise of that apostolic power which he afterward claimed with such vigor (1 Cor 5 4 f; 2 Cor 13 10). He won Sergius Paulus, and this gave him cheer for his work. From now on it is Paul, not Saul, in the record of Luke, perhaps because of this incident, though both names probably belonged to him from the first. Now also Paul steps to the fore ahead of Barnabas, and it is "Paul's company" (13 13) that sets sail from Paphos for Pamphylia. There is no evidence here of resentment on the part of Barnabas at the leadership of Paul. The whole campaign may have been planned from the start by the Holy Spirit as the course now taken may have been due to Paul's leadership. John Mark deserts at Perga and returns to Jerus (his home), not to Antioch (13 13). Paul and Barnabas push on to the tablelands of Pisidia. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 93) thinks that Paul had malaria down at Perga and hence desired to get up into higher land. That is possible. The places mentioned in the rest of the tour are Antioch in Pisidia (13 14), and Iconium (13 51), Lystra (14 8), and Derbe (14 20), cities of Lycaonia. These terms are ethnographic descriptions of the southern divisions of the Rom province of Galatia, the northern portion being Galatia proper or North Galatia. So then Paul and Barnabas are now at work in South Galatia, though Luke does not mention that name, using here only the popular designations. The work is wonderfully successful. In these cities, on one of the great Rom roads east and west, Paul is reaching the centers of provincial life as will be his custom. At Antioch Paul is invited to repeat his sermon on the next Sabbath (13 42), and Luke records at length the report of this discourse which has the characteristic notes of Paul's gospel as we see it in his epp. Paul may have kept notes of the discourse. There were devout Gentiles at these services. These were the first to be won, and thus a wider circle of Gentiles could be reached. Paul and Barnabas were too successful at Antioch in Pisidia. The jealous Jews opposed, and Paul and Barnabas dramatically turned to the Gentiles (13 45 ff). But the Jews reached the city magistrate through the influential women, and Paul and Barnabas were ordered to leave (13 50 ff). Similar success brings like results in Iconium. At Lystra, before the hostile Jews come, Paul and Barnabas have great success and, because of the healing of the impotent man, are taken as Mercury and Jupiter respectively, and worship is offered them. Paul's address in refusal is a fine plea on the grounds of natural theology (14 15-18). The attempt on Paul's life after the Jews came seemed successful. In the band of disciples that "stood round about him," there may have been Timothy, Paul's son in the gospel. From Derbe they retrace their steps to Perga, in order to strengthen the churches with officers, and then sail for Seleucia and Antioch. They make their report to the church at Antioch. It is a wonderful story. The door of faith is now wide open for the Gentiles who have entered in great numbers (14 27). No report was sent to Jerus. What will the Pharisaic party do now?

The early date of Gal, addressed to these churches of Pisidia and Lycaonia before the Conference in

6. The Conflict at Jerusalem AD 49
 Gal 2, 49 AD Jerus does not allow time for a second visit there (Gal 4 13), and requires that the Judaizers from Jerus followed close upon the heels of Paul and Barnabas (Gal 1 6; 3 1) in South Galatia. Besides, there is the less likelihood that the matter would have been taken a second time to Jerus (Acts 15 2 f) if already the question had been settled in Paul's favor (Acts 11 30). It is strange also that no reference to this previous conference on the same subject is made in Acts 15, since Peter does refer to his experience at Caesarea (15 9) and since James in Acts 21 25 specifically ("we wrote") mentions the letter of Acts 15 in which full liberty was granted to the Gentiles. Once more, the attack on the position of Paul and Barnabas in Acts 15 1 is given as a new experience, and hence the sharp dissension and tense feeling. The occasion for the sudden outbreak at Antioch on the part of the self-appointed (Acts 15 24) regulators of Paul and Barnabas lay in the reports that came to Jerus about the results of this campaign on a large scale among the Gentiles. There was peril to the supremacy of the Jewish element. They had assumed at first, as even Peter did who was not a Judaizer (Acts 10), that the Gentiles who became disciples would also become Jews. The party of the circumcision had made protest against the conduct of Peter at Caesarea (11 1 f) and had reluctantly acquiesced in the plain work of God (11 18). They had likewise yielded in the matter of the Greeks at Antioch (11 19 ff) by the help of the contribution (11 29 f). But they had not agreed to a campaign to Hellenize Christianity.

The matter had to stop. So the Judaizers came up to Antioch and laid down the law to Paul and Barnabas. They did not wait for them to come to Jerus. They might not come till it was too late (cf Barnabas in Acts 11). Paul and Barnabas had not sought the controversy. They had both received specific instructions from the Holy Spirit to make this great campaign among the Gentiles. They would not stultify themselves and destroy the liberty of the Gentiles in Christ by going back and having the Mosaic Law imposed on them by the ceremony of circumcision. They saw at once the gravity of the issue. The very essence of the gospel of grace was involved. Paul had turned away from this yoke of bondage. He would not go back to it nor would he impose it on his converts. The church at Antioch stood by Paul and Barnabas. Paul (Gal 2 2) says that he had a revelation to go to Jerus with the problem. Luke (Acts 15 3) says that the church sent them. Surely there is no inconsistency here. It is not difficult to combine the personal narrative in Gal 2 with the public meetings recorded in Acts 15. We have first the general report by Paul and Barnabas to the church in Jerus (Acts 15 4 f) to which instant exception was made by the Judaizing element. There seems to have come an adjournment to prepare for the conflict, since in ver 6 Luke says again that "the apostles and the elders were gathered together to consider of this matter." Between these two public meetings we may place the private conference of Paul and Barnabas with Peter, John and James and other teachers (Gal 2 1-10). In this private conference some of the timid brethren wished to persuade Paul to have Titus, a Gr Christian whom Paul had brought down from Antioch (a live specimen!), offered as a sacrifice to the Judaizers ("false brethren") and circumcised. But Paul stood his ground for the truth of the gospel and was supported by Peter, John and James. They agreed all around for Paul and Barnabas to go on with their work to the Gentiles, and Peter, John and James would push the work among the Jews (a division in sphere of work, like home and foreign missions, not a denominational cleavage). Here, then, for the first time, Paul has had an opportunity to talk the matter over with the apostolic teachers, and they agree. The Judaizers will have no support from the apostles. The battle was really won in their private conference. In the second public meeting (Acts 15 6-29) all goes smoothly enough. Ample opportunity for free discussion is offered. Then Peter shows how God had used him to preach to the Romans, and how the Jews themselves had to believe on Christ in order to be saved. He opposed putting a yoke on the Gentiles that the Jews could not bear. There was a pause, and then Barnabas and Paul (note the order here: courtesy to Barnabas) spoke again. After another pause, James, the president of the conference, the brother of the Lord Jesus, and a steadfast Jew, spoke. He cited Am 9 11 f to show that God had long ago promised a blessing to the Gentiles. He suggests liberty to the Gentiles with the prohibition of pollution of idols, of fornication, things strangled, and blood. His ideas are embodied in a unanimous decree which strongly commends "our beloved Barnabas and Paul," and disclaims responsibility for the visit of the Judaizers to Antioch. The Western text omits "things strangled" from the decree. If this is correct, the decree prohibits idolatry, fornication and murder (Wilson, Origin and Aim of the Acts of the Apostles, 1912, 55). At any rate, the decision is a tremendous victory for Paul and Barnabas. If the other reading is correct, Jewish feelings about things strangled and blood are to be respected. The decision was received with great joy in Antioch (Acts 15 30-35).

Some time later Peter appears at Antioch in the fullest fellowship with Paul and Barnabas in their work, and joins them in free social intercourse with the Gentiles, as he had timidly done in the home of Cornelius, till "certain came from James" (Gal 2 11 f), and probably threatened to have Peter up before the church again (Acts 11 2) on this matter, claiming that James agreed with them on the subject. This I do not believe was true in the light of Acts 15 24, where a similar false claim is discredited, since James had agreed with Paul in Jerus (Acts 15 19 ff; Gal 2 9 f). The new ground for complaint was that they had not settled the question of social relations with the Gentiles in the Jerus conference and that Peter had exceeded the agreement there reached. Peter quailed before the accusation, "fearing them that were of the circumcision" (Gal 2 12). To make it worse, "even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation" (2 13). Under this specious plea Paul was about to lose the fruit of the victory already won, and charged Peter to his face with Judaizing hypocrisy (2 11-14). It was a serious crisis. Peter had not changed his convictions, but had once more cowered in an hour of peril. Paul won both Barnabas and Peter to his side and took occasion to show how useless the death of Christ was if men could be saved by mere legalism (2 21). But the Judaizers had renewed the war, and they would keep it up and harry the work of Paul all over the world. Paul had the fight of his life upon his hands.

The impulse to go out again came from Paul. Despite the difference in Gal 2 13, he wished to go again with Barnabas (Acts 15 36), but Barnabas insisted on taking along John Mark, which Paul was not willing to do because of his failure to stick to the work at Perga. So they agreed Acts 15: 36 to disagree after "sharp contention" —18: 22; 1 (15 39 f). Barnabas went with Mark and 2 Thess, to Cyprus, while Paul took Silas, 49-51 (or "being commended by the brethren to the grace of the Lord." Luke 52) AD follows the career of Paul, and so Barnabas drops out of view (cf later 1 Cor 9 6). Paul and Silas go "through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (Acts 15 41). They pass through the Cilician gates to Derbe, the end of the first tour, and go to Lystra. Here they pick up Timothy, who more than takes Mark's place in Paul's life. Timothy's mother was a Jewess and his father a Greek. Paul decided therefore to have him circumcised since, as a half-Jew, he would be esp. obnoxious to the Jews. This case differed wholly from that of Titus, a Greek, where principle was involved. Here it was a matter merely of expediency. Paul had taken the precaution to bring along the decrees of the Conference at Jerus in case there was need of them. He delivered them to the churches. It has to be noted that in 1 Cor 8-10 and in Rom 14 and 15, when discussing the question of eating meats offered to idols, Paul does not refer to these decrees, but argues the matter purely from the standpoint of the principles involved. The Judaizers anyhow had not lived up to the agreement, but Paul is here doing his part by the decision. The result of the work was good for the churches (Acts 16 4).

When we come to Acts 16 6, we touch a crucial passage in the South-Galatian controversy. Ramsay (Christianity in the Rom. Empire, chs iii-vi; Hist and Geography of Asia Minor; St. Paul the Traveller, chs v, vi, viii, ix; Expos, IV, viii, ix, "replies to Chase"; "Galatia," HDB; Comm. on Gal; The Cities of St. Paul; Expos T, 1912, 1913) has become by his able advocacy the chief champion of the view that Paul never went to Galatia proper or North Galatia, and that he addressed his ep. to South Galatia, the churches visited in the first tour. For a careful history of the whole controversy in detail, see Moffatt, Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 90-106, who strongly supports the view of Lightfoot, H. J. Holtz-mann, Blass, Schürer, Denney, Chase, Mommsen, Steinmann, etc. There are powerful names with Ramsay, like Hausrath, Zahn, Bartlet, Garvie, Weizsäcker, etc. The arguments are too varied and minute for complete presentation here. The present writer sees some very attractive features in the South-Galatian hypothesis, but as a student of language finds himself unable to overcome the syntax of Acts 16 6. The minor difficulty is the dropping of καὶ, καὶ, between "Phrygia" and "Galatic region" by Ramsay. It is by no means certain that this is the idea of Luke. It is more natural to take the terms as distinct and coördinated by καὶ. In St. Paul the Traveller, 212, Ramsay pleads for the aorist of subsequent time, but Moulton (Prolegomena, 133) will have none of it. With that I agree. The aorist participle must give something synchronous with or antecedent to the principal verb. In Expos T for February, 1913, 220 f, Ramsay comes back to the "construction of 16 6." He admits that the weight of authority is against the TR and in favor of διήλθον . . . καλυθέντες, διήλθον . . . κόλυθέντες. He now interprets the language thus: "Paul, having in mind at Lystra his plan of going on to Asia from Galatia, was ordered by the Spirit not to preach in Asia. He therefore made a tour through the Phrygio-Galatic region, which he had already influenced so profoundly from end to end (13 49)." But there is grave difficulty in accepting this interpretation as a solution of the problem. Ramsay here makes the narrative in ver 6 resumptive and takes us back to the standpoint of ver 1 at Lystra. The proper place for such a forecast was in ver 1, or at most before ver 4, which already seems to mark an advance beyond Lystra to Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia: "and as they went on their way through the cities."

Besides, "the Phrygio-Galatic region" lay between Lystra and Asia, and, according to Ramsay, after the prohibition in Lystra, he went straight on toward Asia. This is certainly very artificial and unlike the usual procedure. According to the other view, Paul had already visited the churches in Lycaonia and Pisidia on his former visit. He wished to go on west into Asia, probably to Ephesus, but was forbidden by the Holy Spirit, and as a result turned northward through Phrygia and the regions of Galatia, using both terms in the ethnographic sense. Paul was already in the province of Galatia at Derbe and Lystra. The matter has many "ins and outs" and cannot be argued further here. It is still in debate, but the present interpretation is in harmony with the narrative in Acts. See also GALATIA; GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

By this view Paul had not meant to stop in Galatia proper and did so only because of an attack of illness (Gal 4 13). It is possible that Luke may have come to his rescue here. At any rate, he finally pushes on opposite Mysia and Bithynia in the extreme north and was forbidden by the Spirit from going on into Bithynia. So they came down to Troas (Acts 16 7 f) when Luke ("we," 16 10) appears on the scene and the Macedonian call comes to Paul. Thus Paul is led out of Asia into Europe and carries the gospel successively to Philippi, Thessalonica, Beroea, Athens, and Corinth. The gospel is finally planted in the great provinces of Macedonia and Achaia. In Philippi, a Rom colony and military outpost, Paul finds few Jews and has to go out to a prayer-place to find a few Jewish women to whom he can tell the story of Jesus. But he gains a start with Lydia and her household, and soon arouses the hostility of a company of men who were making money out of a poor girl's powers of divination. But before Paul and Silas leave the jail, the jailer is himself converted, and a good church is established. At Thessalonica Paul has great success and arouses the jealousy of the Jews who gather a rabble and raise a disturbance and charge it up to Paul. At Philippi appeal was made to prejudice against Jews. At Thessalonica the charge is made that Paul preaches Jesus as a rival king to Caesar. In Beroea Paul and Silas have even more success till the Jews come from Thessalonica and drive Paul out again. Timothy, who has come out from Philippi where Luke has remained, and Silas stay in Beroea while Paul hurries on to Athens with some of the brethren, who return with the request for Timothy and Silas "to come to him with all speed." Apparently Timothy did come (1 Thess 3 1 f), but Paul soon sent him back to Thessalonica because of his anxiety about conditions there. Left alone in Athens, Paul's spirit was stirred over the idolatry before his eyes. He preaches in the synagogues and argues with the Stoics and Epicureans in the Agora who make light of his pretensions to philosophy as a "babbler" (Acts 17 18). But curiosity leads them to invite him to speak on the Areopagus. This notable address, all alive to his surroundings, was rather rudely cut short by their indifference and mockery, and Paul left Athens with small results for his work. He goes over to Corinth, the great commercial city of the province, rich and with bizarre notions of culture. Paul determined (1 Cor 2 1-5) to be true to the cross, even after his experience in Athens. He gave them, not the flashy philosophy of the sophists, but the true wisdom of God in simple words, the philosophy of the cross of Christ (1 Cor 1 17-3 4). In Corinth Paul found fellow-helpers in Aquila and Priscilla, just expelled from Rome by Claudius. They have the same trade of tent-makers and live together (Acts 18 1-4), and Paul preached in the synagogues. Paul is cheered by the coming of Timothy and Silas from Thessalonica (18 5) with supplies from Philippi, as they had done while in Thessalonica (Phil 4 15 f). This very success led to opposition, and Paul has to preach in the house of Titus Justus. But the work goes on till Gallio comes and a renewed effort is made to have it stopped, but Gallio declines to interfere and thus practically makes Christianity a religio licita, since he treats it as a variety of Judaism. While here, after the arrival of Timothy and Silas, Paul writes the two letters to Thessalonica, the first of his 13 epp. They are probably not very far apart in time, and deal chiefly with a grievous misunderstanding on their part concerning the emphasis placed by him on the Man of Sin and the Second Coming. Paul had felt the power of the empire, and his attention is sharply drawn to the coming conflict between the Rom empire and the kingdom of God. He treats it in terms of apocalyptic eschatology. When he leaves Corinth, it is to go by Ephesus, with Aquila and Priscilla whom he leaves there with the promise to return. He goes down to Caesarea and "went up and saluted the church" (Acts 18 22), probably at Jerus (fourth visit), and "went down to Antioch." If he went to Jerus, it was probably incidental, and nothing of importance happened. He is back once again in Antioch after an absence of some 3 or 4 years.

The stay of Paul at Antioch is described as "some time" (Acts 18 23). Denney (Standard Bible Dict.) conjectures that Paul's brief stay at Jerus (see above) was due to

8. The Third Mission Campaign, Acts 18: 23-21: apostles, and it was so unpleasant that 14; 1 and 2 he did not stay. He suggests also that Cor; Gal; the Judaizers had secured letters of Rom, 52 (or commendation from the church for 53)-57 (or their emissaries (2 Cor 3 1) to Corinth and Galatia, who were preaching "another Jesus" of nationalism and narrowness, whom Paul did not preach (Gal 1 6; 2 Cor 11 4). Both Denney and Findlay follow Neander, Wieseler, and Sabatier in placing here, before Paul starts out again from Antioch, the visit of certain "from James" (Gal 2 12), who overpowered Peter for the moment. But I have put this incident as more probably before the disagreement with Barnabas over Mark, and as probably contributing to that breach at the beginning of the second tour. It is not necessary to suppose that the Judaizers remained acquiescent so long.

Paul seems to have set out on the third tour alone—unless Timothy came back with him, of which there is no evidence save that he is with Paul again in Ephesus (Acts 19 22). What became of Silas? Paul "went through the region of Galatia, and Phrygia, in order, establishing all the disciples" (Acts 18 23), the opposite order to 16 6, "through the region of Phrygia and Galatia." According to the North-Galatian view, here followed, he went through the northern part of the province, passing through Galatia proper and Phrygia on his way west to Ephesus. Luke adds, "Paul having passed through the upper country came to Ephesus" (19 1). The ministry of Apollos in Ephesus (18 24-28) had taken place before Paul arrived, though Aquila and Priscilla were still on hand. Apollos passed over to Corinth and innocently became the occasion of such strife there (1 Cor 1-4) that he left and refused to return at Paul's request (1 Cor 16 12). Paul has a ministry of 3 years, in round numbers, in Ephesus, which is full of excitement and anxiety from the work there and in Corinth. He finds on his arrival some ill-informed disciples of John the Baptist who are ignorant of the chief elements of John's teaching about repentance, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit (Acts 19 2-7), matters of which Apollos had knowledge, though he learned more from Priscilla and Aquila, but there is no evidence that he was rebaptized as was true of the 12 disciples of John (Robertson, John the Loyal, 290-303). The boldness of Paul in Ephesus led in 3 months to his departure from the synagogue to the schoolhouse of Tyrannus, where he preached for 2 years (Acts 19 8-10) with such power that "all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord." It is not strange later to find churches at Colossae and Hierapolis in the Lycus Valley (cf also Rev 1 11). Paul has a sharp collision with the strolling Jewish exorcists that led to the burning of books of magic by the wholesale (19 11-20), another proof of the hold that magic and the mysteries had upon the Orient. Ephesus was the seat of the worship of Diana whose wonderful temple was their pride. A great business in the manufacture of shrines of Diana was carried on here by Demetrius, and "this Paul" had hurt his trade so much that he raised an insurrection under the guise of piety and patriotism and might have killed Paul with the mob, if he could have got hold of him (19 23-41). It was with great difficulty that Paul was kept from going to the amphitheater, as it was. But here, as at Corinth, the Rom officer (the town clerk) defended Paul from the rage of his enemies (there the jealous Jews, here the tradesmen whose business suffered). He was apparently very ill anyhow, and came near death (2 Cor 1 9). All this seems to have hastened his departure from Ephesus sooner than Pentecost, as he had written to the Corinthians (1 Cor 16 8). His heart was in Corinth because of the discussions there over him and Apollos and Peter, by reason of the agitation of the Judaizers (1 Cor 1 10-17). The household of Chloe had brought word of this situation to Paul. He had written the church a letter now lost (1 Cor 5 9). They had written him a letter (1 Cor 7 1). They sent messengers to Paul (1 Cor 16 17). He had sent Timothy to them (1 Cor 4 17; 16 10), who seems not to have succeeded in quieting the trouble. Paul wrote 1 Cor (spring of 56), and then sent Titus, who was to meet him at Troas and report results (2 Cor 2 12 f). He may also have written another letter and sent it by Titus (2 Cor 2 3 f). The sudden departure from Corinth brought Paul to Troas ahead of time, but he could not wait for Titus, and so pushed on with a heavy heart into Macedonia, where he met him, and he had good and bad news to tell (2 Cor 2 12 ff; 7 5-13). The effect on Paul was instantaneous. He rebounded to hope and joy (2 Cor 2 14 f) in a glorious defence of the ministry of Jesus (cf Robertson, The Glory of the Ministry; Paul's Exultation in Preaching), with a message of cheer to the majority of the church that had sustained Paul and with instructions (chs 8 and 9) about the collection for the poor saints in Jerus, which must be pushed to a completion by Titus and two other brethren (possibly also Luke, brother of Titus, and Erastus). Timothy and Erastus had been sent on ahead to Macedonia from Ephesus (Acts 19 22), and Timothy sends greetings with Paul to the Corinthians in a letter (2 Cor) which Paul now forwards, possibly by Titus. The latter part of the ep. (chs 10-13) deals with the stubborn minority who still resist the authority of Paul as an apostle. On the proposed treatment of these chapters as a separate ep. see the earlier part of this art. Paul seems to wait a while before going on to Corinth. He wishes the opposition to have time to repent. During this period he probably went round about to Illyricum (Rom 15 19). He spent three months in Greece (Acts 20 2 f), probably the winter of 56 and 57.

We have placed Gal in the early part of this stay in Corinth, though it could have been written while at Ephesus. Rom was certainly written while here, and they both treat the same general theme of justification by faith. Ramsay (Expos, February, 1913, 127-45) has at last come to the conclusion that Gal belongs to the date of Acts 15 1 f. He bases this conclusion chiefly on the "absolute independence" of his apostleship claimed in Gal 1 and 2, which, he holds, he would not have done after the conference in Acts 15, which was "a sacrifice of complete independence." This is a curious interpretation, for in Gal 2 1-10 Paul himself tells of his recognition on terms of equality by Peter, John, and James, and of his going to Jerus by "revelation," which was just as much "a sacrifice of complete independence" as we find in Acts 15. Besides, in 2 Cor 11 5 and 12 11 Paul expressly asserts his equality (with all humility) with the very chiefest apostles, and in 1 Cor 15 10 he claims in so many words to have wrought more than all the apostles. Perhaps messengers from Galatia with the contributions from that region report the havoc wrought there by the Judaizers. Gal is a tremendous plea for the spiritual nature of Christianity as opposed to Jewish ceremonial legalism.

Paul had long had it in mind to go to Rome. It was his plan to do so while at Ephesus (Acts 19 21) after he had gone to Jerus with the great collection from the churches of Asia, Galatia, Achaia, and Macedonia. He hoped that this collection would have a mollifying effect on the Jerus saints as that from Antioch had (Acts 11 29 f). He had changed some details in his plans, but not the purpose to go to Jerus and then to Rome. Meanwhile, he writes the longest and most important letter of all to the Romans, in which he gives a fuller statement of his gospel, because they had not heard him preach, save his various personal friends who had gone there from the east (ch 16). But already the shadow of Jerus is on his heart, and he asks their prayers in his behalf, as he faces his enemies in Jerus (Rom 15 30-32). He hopes also to go on to Spain (15 24), so as to carry the gospel to the farther west also. The statesmanship of Paul comes out now in great clearness. He has in his heart always anxiety for the churches that consumes him (2 Cor 11 28 f). He was careful to have a committee of the churches go with him to report the collection (2 Cor 8 19 f). Paul had planned to sail direct for Syria, but a plot on his life in Corinth led him to go by land via Macedonia with his companions (Acts 20 2-4). He tarried at Philippi while the rest went on to Troas. At Philippi Paul is joined again by Luke, who stays with him till Rome is reached. They celebrate the Passover (probably the spring of 57) in Philippi (Acts 20 6). We cannot follow the details in Acts at Troas, the voyage through the beautiful Archipelago, to Miletus. There Paul took advantage of the stop to send for the elders of Ephesus to whom he gave a wonderful address (Acts 20 17-38). They change ships at Patara for Phoenicia and pass to the right of Cyprus with its memories of Barnabas and Sergius Paulus and stop at Tyre, where Paul is warned not to go on to Jerus. The hostility of the Judaizers to Paul is now common talk everywhere. There is grave peril of a schism in Christianity over the question of gentile liberty, once settled in Jerus, but unsettled by the Judaizers. At Caesarea Paul is greeted by Philip the evangelist and his four daughters (prophetesses). At Caesarea Paul is warned in dramatic fashion by Agabus (cf Acts 11 28) not to go on to Jerus (21 9 ff), but Paul is more determined than ever to go, even if he die (20 13). He had had three premonitions for long (20 22 ff), but he will finish his course, cost what it may. He finds a friend at Caesarea in Mnason of Cyprus, an early disciple, who was to be the host of Paul in Jerus (21 16).

Paul had hoped to reach Jerus by Pentecost (Acts 20 16). He seems to have done so. Luke gives the story of Paul in Jerus, Caesarea, and the voyage to Rome in much detail. He was with him and considered this period of his ministry very important. The welcome from the brethren in Jerus was surprisingly cordial (Acts 21 17). On the very next day Paul and his party made a formal call on James and all the elders (21 18 f), who gave a sympathetic hearing to the narrative of God's dealings with Paul and the Gentiles. He presented the alms (collection) in due form (24 17), though some critics have actually suggested that Paul used it to defray the expenses of the appeal to Caesar. Ramsay's notion that he may have fallen heir by now to his portion of his father's estate is quite probable. But the brethren wish to help Paul set himself right before the rank and file of the church in Jerus, who have been imposed upon by the Judaizers who have misrepresented Paul's real position by saying that he urged the Jewish Christians to give up the Mosaic customs (21 21). The elders understand Paul and recall the decision of the conference at which freedom was guaranteed to the Gentiles, and they have no wish to disturb that (21 25). They only wish Paul to show that he does not object to the Jewish Christians keeping up the Mosaic regulations. They propose that Paul offer sacrifice publicly in the temple and pay the vows of four men, and then all will know the truth (21 23 f). Paul does not hesitate to do that (21 26 ff). He had kept the Jewish feasts (cf 20 6) as Jesus had done, and the early disciples in Jerus. He was a Jew. He may have had a vow at Corinth (18 18). He saw no inconsistency in a Jew doing thus after becoming a Christian, provided he did not make it obligatory on Gentiles. The real efficacy of the sacrifices lay in the death of Jesus for sin. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 173) calls this act of Paul "scarcely worthy of his courage as a man or his faith in God." I cannot see it in that light. It is a matter of practical wisdom, not of principle. To have refused would have been to say that the charge was true, and it was not. So far as the record goes, this act of Paul accomplished its purpose in setting Paul in a right light before the church in Jerus. It took away this argument from the Judaizers. The trouble that now comes to Paul does not come from the Judaizers, but from "the Jews from Asia" (21 27). If it be objected that the Jerus Christians seem to have done nothing to help Paul during his years of imprisonment, it can be said that there was little to be done in a legal way, as the matter was before the Rom courts very soon. The attack on Paul in the temple was while he was doing honor to the temple, engaged in actual worship offering sacrifices. But then Jews from Ephesus hated him so that they imagined that he had Greeks with him in the Jewish court, because they had seen him one day with Trophimus in the city (21 27 ff.). It is a splendid illustration of the blindness of prejudice and hate. It was absolutely untrue, and the men who raised the hue and cry in the temple against Paul as the desecrator of the holy place and the Law and the people disappear, and are never heard of more (24 18 f.). But it will take Paul five years or more of the prime of his life to get himself out of the tangled web that will be woven about his head. Peril follows peril. He was almost mobbed, as often before, by the crowd that dragged him out of the temple (21 30 f.). It would remind Paul of Stephen's fate. When the Rom captain rescued him and had him bound with two chains as a dangerous bandit, and had him carried by the soldiers to save his life, the mob yelled "Away with him" (21 36 f.), as they had done to Jesus. After the captain, astonished that "Paul the Egypt assassin" can speak Gr, grants him permission to stand on the steps of the tower of Antonia to speak to the mob that clamored for his blood, he held their rapt attention by an address in Aram. (22 2) in which he gave a defence of his whole career. This they heard eagerly till he spoke the word "Gentiles," at which they raged more violently than ever (22 21 ff.). At this the captain has Paul tied with thongs, not understanding his Aram. speech, and is about to scourge him when Paul pleads his Rom citizenship, to the amazement of the centurion (22 24 ff.). Almost in despair, the captain, wishing to know the charge of the Jews against Paul, brings him before the Sanhedrin. It is a familiar scene to Paul, and it is now their chance for settling old scores. Paul makes a sharp retort in anger to the high priest Ananias, for which he apologizes as if he was so angry that he had not noticed, but he soon divides the Sanhedrin hopelessly on the subject of the resurrection (of the immunity of the disciples on that issue when Gamaliel scored the Sadducees in Acts 5). This was turning the tables on his enemies, and was justifiable as war. He claimed to be a Pharisee on this point, as he was still, as opposed to the Sadducees. The result was that Paul had to be rescued from the contending factions, and the captain knew no more than he did before (23 1-10). That night "the Lord stood by him" and promised that he would go to Rome (23 11). That was a blessed hope. But the troubles of Paul are by no means over. By the skill of his nephew he escaped the murderous plot of 40 Jews who had taken a vow not to eat till they had killed Paul (23 12-24). They almost succeeded, but Claudius Lysias sent Paul in haste with a band of soldiers to Caesarea to Felix, the procurator, with a letter in which he claimed to have rescued Paul from the mob, "having learned that he was a Roman" (23 26-30). At any rate he was no longer in the clutches of the Jews. Would Rom provincial justice be any better? Felix follows a perfunctory course with Paul and shows some curiosity about Christianity, till Paul makes him tremble with terror, a complete reversal of situations (cf Pilate's meanness before Jesus). But love of money from Paul or the Jews leads Felix to keep Paul a prisoner for two years, though convinced of his innocence, and to hand him over to Festus, his successor, because the Jews might make things worse for him if he released him (ch 24). The case of the Sanhedrin, who have now made it their own (or at least the Sadducean section), though pleaded by the Rom orator Tertullus, had fallen through as Paul calmly riddled their charges. Festus is at first at a loss how to proceed, but he soon follows the steps of Felix by offering to play into the hands of the Jewish leaders by sending Paul back to Jerus, whereupon Paul abruptly exercises his right of Rom citizenship by appealing to Caesar (25 1-12). This way, though a long one, offered the only ray of hope. The appearance of Paul before Agrippa and Bernice was simply by way of entertainment arranged by Festus to relieve his guests of ennui, but Paul seized the opportunity to make a powerful appeal to Agrippa that put him in a corner logically, though he wriggled out and declined to endorse Christianity, though confirming Paul's innocence, which Festus also had admitted (25 13-26 32). Paul was fortunate in the centurion Julius who took him to Rome, for he was kindly disposed to him at the start, and so it was all the way through the most remarkable voyage on record. Luke has surpassed his own record in ch 27, in which he traces the voyage, stage by stage, with change of ship at Myra, delay at Fair Havens, Crete, and shipwreck on the island of Malta. More is learned about ancient seafaring from this chapter than from any other source (see art. PHOENIX, and Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1866). In it all Paul is the hero, both on the ships and in Malta. In the early spring of 60 another ship takes Paul and the other prisoners to Puteoli. Thence they go on to Rome, and enter by the Appian Way. News of Paul's coming had gone on before (his ep. had come 3 years ago), and he had a hearty welcome. But he is now an imperial prisoner in the hands of Nero. He has more liberty in his own hired house (28 16,30), but he is chained always to a Rom soldier, though granted freedom to see his friends and to preach to the soldiers. Paul is anxious to remove any misapprehensions that the Jews in Rome may have about him, and tries to win them to Christ, and with partial success (28 17-28). And here Luke leaves him a prisoner for 2 years more, probably because at this point he finishes the Book of Acts. But, as we have seen, during these years in Rome, Paul wrote Phil, Philem, Col, and Eph. He still has the churches on his heart. They send messengers to him, and he writes back to them. The incipient Gnosticism of the East has pressed upon the churches at Colossae and Laodicea, and a new peril confronts Christianity. The Judaizing controversy has died away with these years (cf Phil 3 1 ff for an echo of it), but the dignity and glory of Jesus are challenged. In the presence of the power of Rome Paul rises to a higher conception than even that of the person of Christ and the glory of the church universal. In due time Paul's case was disposed of and he was once more set free. The Romans were proverbially dilatory. It is doubtful if his enemies ever appeared against him with formal charges.

The genuineness of the Pastoral Epp. is here assumed. But for them we should know nothing further, save from a few fragments.

10. Further in the early Christian writings. As it is, some few who accept the Pastoral Epp. seek to place them before 64 AD, so as to allow for Paul's death in that year from the Neronian persecution. In that case, he was not released. There is no space here to argue the question in detail. We can piece together the probable course of events. He had expected when in Corinth last to go on to Spain (Rom 15 28), but now in Rome his heart turns back to the east again. He longs to see the Philippians (1 23 ff) and hopes to see Philemon in Colossae (Philem ver 22). But he may have gone to Spain also, as Clement of Rome seems to imply (Clement ad Cor 5), and as is stated in the Canon of Muratori. He may have been in Spain when Rome was burned July 19, 64 AD. There is no evidence that Paul went as far as Britain. On his return east he left Titus in Crete (Tit 1 5). He touched at Miletus when he left Trophimus sick (2 Tim 4 20) and when he may have met Timothy, if he did not go on to Ephesus (1 Tim 1 3). He stopped at Troas and apparently expected to come back here, as he left his cloak and books with Carpus (2 Tim 4 13). He was on his way to Macedonia (1 Tim 1 3), whence he writes Timothy in 65-67 a letter full of love and counsel for the future. Paul is apprehensive of the grave perils now confronting Christianity. Besides the Judaizers, the Gnostics, the Jews and the Romans, he may have had dim visions of the conflict with the mystery-religions. It was a syncretistic age, and men had itching ears. But Paul is full of sympathy and tender solicitude for Timothy, who must push on the work and get ready for it. Paul expects to spend the winter in Nicopolis (Tit 3 12), but is apparently still in Macedonia when he writes to Titus a letter on lines similar to those in 1 Tim, only the note is sharper against Judaism of a certain type. We catch another glimpse of Apollos in 3 13. Paul hits off the Cretans in 1 10 with a quotation from Epimenides, one of their own poetic prophets.

When Paul writes again to Timothy he has had a winter in prison, and has suffered greatly from the cold and does not wish to spend another winter in the Mamertine (probably) prison (2 Tim 4 13.21). We do not know what the charges now are. They may have been connected with the burning of Rome. There were plenty of informers eager to win favor with Nero. Proof was not now necessary.

Christianity is no longer a religio licita under the shelter of Judaism. It is now a crime to be a Christian. It is dangerous to be seen with Paul now, and he feels the desertion keenly (2 Tim 1 15 ff; 4 10). Only Luke, the beloved physician, is with Paul (4 11), and such faithful ones as live in Rome still in hiding (4 21). Paul hopes that Timothy may come and bring Mark also (4 11). Apparently Timothy did come and was put into prison (He 13 23). Paul is not afraid. He knows that he will die. He has escaped the mouth of the lion (2 Tim 4 17), but he will die (4 18). The Lord Jesus stood by him, perhaps in visible presence (4 17). The tradition is, for now Paul fails us, that Paul, as a Rom citizen, was beheaded on the Ostian Road just outside of Rome. Nero died June, 68 AD, so that Paul was executed before that date, perhaps in the late spring of that year (or 67). Perhaps Luke and Timothy were with him. It is fitting, as Findlay suggests, to let Paul's words in 2 Tim 4 6-8 serve for his own epitaph. He was ready to go to be with Jesus, as he had long wished to be (Phil 1 23).

VI. Gospel.—I had purposed to save adequate space for the discussion of Paul's theology, but that is not now possible. A bare sketch must suffice. Something was said (see above on his epp. and equipment) about the development in Paul's conception of Christ and his message about Him. Paul had a gospel which he called his own (Rom 2 16). I cannot agree with the words of Deissmann (St. Paul, 6): "St. Paul the theologian looks backward toward rabbinism. As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." He did continue to use some rabbinical methods of argument, but his theology was not rabbinical. And he had a theology. He was the great apostle and missionary to the heathen. He was a Christian statesman with far-seeing vision. He was the loving pastor with the shepherd heart. He was the great martyr for Christ. He was the wonderful preacher of Jesus. But he was also "Paul the theologian" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, ch v). There are two ways of studying his teaching. One is to take it by groups of the epp., the purely historical method, and that has some advantages (cf Sabatier, The Apostle Paul). But at bottom Paul has the same message in each group, though with varying emphasis due to special exigencies. The same essential notes occur all through. The more common method, therefore, is to study his gospel topically, using all the epp. for each topic. A measure of historical development may still be observed. Only the chief notes in Paul's gospel can be mentioned here. Even so, one must not turn to his epp. for a complete system of doctrine. The epp. are "occasional letters, pièces de circonstance" (Findlay, HDB), and they do not profess, not even Rom, to give a full summary of Christian doctrine. They are vital documents that throb with life. There is no theological manual in them. But Paul's message is Christocentric. Jesus as Messiah he preached at once on his conversion (Acts 9 20.22). He knew already the current Jewish Messianism to which Jesus did not correspond. The acceptance of Jesus as He was (the facts about Him and teachings) revolutionized his Messianic conceptions, his view of God, and his view of man. "When he takes and uses the Messianic phraseology of his day, he fills it with a meaning new and rich" (Rostren, Christology of St. Paul, 31). Paul was not merely a new creature himself, but he had a new outlook: "Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh: even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more. Wherefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creature: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new. But all things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses, and having committed unto us the word of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5 16-19). Perhaps no single passage in Paul's Epp. tells us more than this one of the change in Paul's theological conceptions wrought by his conversion. His view of Christ as the revealer of God (God in Christ) and the manifestation of love for men (of God, who reconciled us to Himself, reconciling the world to Himself) and the means (through Christ) by whom God is able to forgive our sins ("not reckoning unto them their trespasses") on the basis of the atoning death of Christ ("wherefore"; for this see vs 14 f just before ver 16) with whom the believer has vital union ("in Christ") and who transforms the nature and views of the believer, is here thoroughly characteristic. Paul's passion is Christ (2 Cor 5 14; Phil 1 21). To gain Christ (3 8), to know Christ (3 10), to be found in Christ (3 9), to know Christ as the mystery of God (Col 2 2 f), to be hid with Christ in God (3 3)—this with the new Paul is worth while. Thus Paul interprets God and man, by his doctrine of Christ. To him Jesus is Christ and Christ is Jesus. He has no patience with the incipient Cerinthian Gnosticism, nor with the docetic Gnosticism that denied the true humanity of Jesus. The real mystery of God is Christ, not the so-called mystery-religions. Christ has set us free from the bondage of ceremonial legalism. We are free from the curse of the law (Gal 3 13). Grace is the distinctive word for the gospel (Rom 3-5), but it must lead to sanctification (Rom 6-8), not license (Col 3). Paul's Christology is both theocentric and anthropocentric, but it is theocentric first. His notion of redemption is the love of God seeking a world lost in sin and finding love's way, the only way consonant with justice, in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ His Son (Rom 3 21-31). The sinner comes into union with God in Christ by faith in Christ as Redeemer and Lord. Henceforth he lives to God in Christ by the help of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8; Gal 5). Paul presents God as

Father of all in one sense (Eph 4 6), but in a special sense of the believers in Christ (Rom 8 15 f). Jesus Christ is the Incarnation of the Pre-incarnate Son of God (2 Cor 8 9; Phil 2 5-10), who is both God and man (Rom 1 3 f). With Paul the agent of creation is Jesus (Col 1 15 f), who is also the head of the church universal (Col 1 18; Eph 1 22 f). In the work of Christ Paul gives the central place to the cross (1 Cor 1 17 f; 2 2; Col 2 20; Eph 2 13-18). Sin is universal in humanity (Rom 1 18-3 20), but the vicarious death of Christ makes redemption possible to all who believe (Rom 3 21 ff; Gal 3 6-11). The redeemed constitute the kingdom of God or church universal, with Christ as head. Local bodies (churches) are the chief means for pushing the work of the kingdom. Paul knows two ordinances, both of which present in symbolic form the death of Christ for sin and the pledge of the believer to newness of life in Christ. These ordinances are baptism (Rom 6 1-11) and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11 17-34). If he knew the mystery-religions, they may have helped him by way of illustration to present his conception of the mystic union with Christ. Paul is animated by the hope of the second coming of Christ, which will be sudden (1 Thess 5 1-11) and not probably at once (2 Thess 2), but was to be considered as always imminent (1 Thess 5 2 f). Meanwhile, death brings us to Christ, which is a glorious hope to Paul (2 Cor 5 1-10; Phil 1 21 ff; 2 Tim 4 18). But, while Paul was a theologian in the highest and best sense of the term, the best interpreter of Christ to men, he was also an ethical teacher. He did not divorce ethics from religion. He insisted strongly on the spiritual experience of Christ as the beginning and the end of it all, as opposed to mere ritualistic ceremonies which had destroyed the life of Judaism. But all the more Paul demanded the proof of life as opposed to mere profession. See Rom 6-8 in particular. In most of the epp. the doctrinal section is followed by practical exhortations to holy living. Mystic as Paul was, the greatest of all mystics, he was the sanest of moralists and had no patience with hypocrites or licentious pietists or idealists who allowed sentimentalism and emotionalism to take the place of righteousness. His notion of the righteousness demanded by God and given by God included both sanctification and justification. In the end, the sinner who for Christ's sake is treated as righteous must be righteous. Thus the image of God is restored in man by the regenerating work of the Spirit of God (2 Cor 3 18). Paul sees God in the face of Christ (2 Cor 4 6), and the vision of Christ brings God to all who see.

I. The Preparation.—In order to understand the development of St. Paul's theological system, it is necessary to begin with his beliefs as a Pharisee. The full extent of these beliefs, to be sure, is not now ascertainable, for Pharisaism was a rule of conduct rather than a system of dogmas, and great diversity of opinions existed among Pharisees. Yet there was general concurrence in certain broad principles, while some of St. Paul's own statements enable us to specify his beliefs still more closely.

Saul the Pharisee believed that God was One, the Creator of all things. In His relation to His world

He was transcendent, and governed 1. The it normally through His angels. Certain of these angelic governors had been unfaithful to their trust and had wrought evil, although God still permitted them to bear rule for a time (Col 2 15; cf En 89 65). And evil had come into humanity through the transgression of the first man (Rom 5 12; cf 2 Esd 7 118). To lead men away from this evil God gave His Law, which was a perfect revelation of duty (Rom 7 12), and this Law was illumined by the traditions of the Fathers, which the Pharisees felt to be an integral part of the Law itself. God was merciful and would pardon the offender against the Law, if he completely amended his ways. But imperfect reformation brought no certain hope of pardon. To a few specially favored individuals God had given the help of His Spirit, but this was not for the ordinary individual. The great majority of mankind (cf 2 Esd 7 49-57), including all Gentiles, had no hope of salvation. In a very short time the course of the world would be closed. With God, from before the beginning of creation, there was existing a heavenly being, the Son of man of Dnl 7 13, and He was about to be made manifest. (That Saul held the transcendental Messianic doctrine is not to be doubted.) As the world was irredeemably bad, this Messiah would soon appear, cause the dead to rise, hold the Last Judgment and bring from heaven the "Jerusalem that is above" (Gal 4 26), in which the righteous would spend a blessed eternity. See PHARISEES; MESSIAH; PAROUSIA.

Rom 7 7-25 throws a further light on Saul's personal beliefs. The OT promised pardon to the sinner who amended his ways, but the acute moral sense of Saul taught him that he could never expect perfectly to amend his ways. The 10th Commandment was the stumbling-block. Sins of deed and of word might perhaps be overcome, but sins of evil desires stayed with him, despite his full knowledge of the Law that branded them as sinful. Indeed, they seemed stimulated rather than suppressed by the Divine precepts against them. With the best will in the world, Saul's efforts toward perfect righteousness failed continually and gave no promise of ever succeeding. He found himself thwarted by something that he came to realize was ingrained in his very nature and from which he could never free himself. Human nature as it is, the flesh (not "the material of the body"), contains a taint that makes perfect reformation impossible (7 18; cf 8 3, etc). Therefore, as the Law knows no pardon for the imperfectly reformed, Saul felt his future to be absolutely black. What he longed for was a promise of pardon despite continued sin, and that the Law precluded. (Any feeling that the temple sacrifices would bring forgiveness had long since been obsolete in educated Judaism.)

There is every reason to suppose that Saul's experience was not unique at this period. Much has been written in recent years about the Jews' confidence in God's mercy, and abundant quotations are brought from the Talm in support of this. But the surviving portions of the literature of the Daniel-Akiba period (165 BC-135 AD) give a different impression, for it is predominantly a literature of penitential prayers and confessions of sin, of pessimism regarding the world, the nation and one's self. In 2 Esd, in particular, Saul's experience is closely paralleled, and 2 Esd 7 (of course not in AV) is one of the best comms. ever written on Rom 7.

Saul must have come in contact with Christianity very soon after Pentecost, at the latest. Some personal acquaintance with Christ is

3. Primitive in no way impossible, irrespective of Christianity the meaning of 2 Cor 5 16. But no one in Jerusalem, least of all a man like Saul, could have failed to learn very early that there was a new "party" in Judaism. To his eyes this "party" would have about the following appearance: Here was a band of men proclaiming that the Messiah, whom all expected, would be the Jesus who had recently been crucified. Him the disciples were preaching as risen, ascended and sitting on God's right hand. They claimed that He had sent on all His followers the coveted gift of the Spirit, and they produced miracles in proof of their claim. A closer investigation would show that the death of Jesus was being interpreted in terms of Isa 53, as a ransom for the nation. The inquirer would learn also that Jesus had given teaching that found constant and relentless fault with the Pharisees. Moreover, He had swept aside the tradition of the Fathers as worthless and had given the Law a drastic reinterpretation on the basis of eternal spiritual facts.

This inwardness must have appealed to Saul and he must have envied the joyous enthusiasm of the disciples. But to him Pharisaism was Divine, and he was in a spiritual condition that admitted of no compromises. Moreover, the Law (Gal 3 13; cf Dt 21 23) cursed anyone who had been hanged on a tree, and the new party was claiming celestial Messiahship for a man who had met this fate. The system aroused Saul's burning hatred; he appointed himself (perhaps stimulated by his moral desperation) to exterminate the new religion, and in pursuit of his mission he started for Damascus.

Saul must have gained a reasonable knowledge of Christ's teachings in this period of antagonism. He certainly could not have begun to persecute the faith without learning what it was, and in the inevitable discussions with his victims he must have learned still more, even against his will. This fact is often overlooked.

II. The Conversion.—The immediate content of St. Paul's conversion was the realization that the celestial Messiah was truly Jesus of Nazareth. This was simply the belief of the primitive church and was the truth for which Christ had died (Mk 14 62). But it involved much. It made Christ the Son of God (Rom 8 32; Gal 4 4, etc), "firstborn of [i.e. "earlier than"] all creation" (Col 1 15), "existing in the form of God" (Phil 2 6) and "rich" (2 Cor 8 9). In the Messiah are "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden" (Col 2 3), to be manifested at the end of time when the Messiah shall appear as the Judge of all (2 Cor 5 10, etc), causing the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15 45, etc). All this was given by St. Paul's former beliefs and had been claimed by Christ for Himself. That this Messiah had become man was a fact of the immediate past (the reality of the manhood was no problem at this period). As Messiah His sinlessness was unquestioned, while the facts of His life proved this sinlessness also. His teaching was wholly binding (1 Cor 7 10.11; that the writer of these words could have spared any effort to learn the teaching fully is out of the question). The conversion experience was proof sufficient of the resurrection, although for missionary purposes St. Paul used other evidence as well (1 Cor 15 1-11).

Faith in this Messiah brought the unmistakable experience of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8 2; Gal 3 2, etc; cf Acts 9 17), demonstrating Christ's Lordship (1 Cor 12 3; cf Acts 2 33). So "the head of every man is Christ" (1 Cor 11 3; cf Col 1 18; Eph 1 22; 4 15), with complete control of the future (1 Cor 15 25), and all righteous men are His servants ("slaves," Rom 1 1, etc). To Him men may address their prayers (2 Cor 12 8; 1 Cor 1 2, etc; cf Acts 14 23).

Further reflection added to the concepts. As the Lordship of Christ was absolute, the power of all hostile beings must have been broken also (Rom 8 38; Phil 2 9-11; Col 2 15; Eph 1 21-23, etc). The Being who had such significance for the present and the future could not have been without significance for the past. "In all things" He must have had "the preeminence" (Col 1 18). It was He who ministered to the Israelites at the Exodus (1 Cor 10 4.9). In fact He was not only "before all things" (Col 1 17), but "all things have been created through him" (ver 16). Wisdom and Logos concepts may have helped St. Paul in reaching these conclusions, which in explicit statement are an advance on Christ's own words. But the conclusions were inevitable.

Fitting these data of religious fact into the metaphysical doctrine of God was a problem that occupied the church for the four following centuries. After endless experimenting the only conclusion was shown to be that already reached by St. Paul in Rom 9 5 (cf Tit 2 13, ERV, ARVm), that Christ is God. To be sure, St. Paul's terminology, carried over from his pre-Christian days, elsewhere reserves "God" for the Father (and cf 1 Cor 15 28). But the fact of this theology admits only of the conclusion that was duly drawn.

A second fact given directly by the conversion was the presence of the Spirit, where the actual experience transcended anything that had been dreamed of. Primarily the operation of the Spirit was recognized in vividly supernatural effects (Rom 15 19; 1 Cor 12 5-11, etc; cf 2 Cor 12 12; Acts

2 4), but St. Paul must at first have known the presence of the Spirit through the assurance of salvation given him, a concept that he never wearies of expressing (Rom 8 16.23; Gal 4 6, etc). The work of the Spirit in producing holiness in the soul needs no comment (see HOLY SPIRIT; SANCTIFICATION), but it is characteristic of St. Paul that it is on this part of the Spirit's activity, rather than on the miraculous effects, that he lays the emphasis. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace," etc (Gal 5 22); the greatest miracles without love are more than useless (1 Cor 13 1-3); in such sayings St. Paul touched the depths of the purest teaching of Christ. To be sure, in the Synoptic Gospels the word "Spirit" is not often on Christ's lips, but there is the same conception of a life proceeding from a pure center (Mt 6 22; 7 17, etc) in entire dependence on God.

Further reflection and observation taught St. Paul something of the greatest importance for Christian theology. In prayer the Spirit appeared distinguished from the Father as well as from the Son (Rom 8 26 f; cf 1 Cor 2 10 f), giving three terms that together express the plenitude of the Deity (2 Cor 13 14; Eph 1 3.6.13, etc), with no fourth term ever similarly associated. See TRINITY.

The indwelling of the Divine produced by the Spirit is spoken of indifferently as the indwelling of the Spirit, or of the Spirit of Christ,

3. The or of Christ Himself (all three terms in Unio Rom 8 9-11; cf 1 Cor 2 12; Gal Mystica 4 6; Eph 3 17, etc). The variations are in part due to the inadequacy of the old terminology (so 2 Cor 3 17), in part to the nature of the subject. Distinctions made between the operations of the persons of the Trinity on the soul can never be much more than verbal, and the terms are freely interchangeable. At all events, through the Spirit Christ is in the believer (Rom 8 10; Gal 2 20; 4 19; Eph 3 17), or, what is the same thing, the believer is in Christ (Rom 6 11; 8 1; 16 7, etc). "We have become united with him" (Rom 6 5, σύνϕυτοι, "grown together with") in a union once and for all effected (Gal 3 27) and yet always to be made more intimate (Rom 13 14). The union so accomplished makes the man "a new creature" (2 Cor 5 17).

St. Paul now saw within himself a dual personality. His former nature, the old man, still persisted, with its impulses, liability

4. Salvation to temptation, and inertnesses. The "flesh" still existed (Gal 5 17; Rom 8 12; 13 14; Eph 4 22; Phil 3 12, etc). On the other hand there was fighting in him against this former nature nothing less than the whole power of Christ, and its final victory could not be uncertain for a moment (Rom 6 12; 8 2.10; Gal 5 16, etc). Indeed, it is possible to speak of the believer as entirely spiritual (Rom 6 11.22; 8 9, etc), as already in the kingdom (Col 1 13), as already sitting in heavenly places (Eph 2 6). Of course St. Paul had too keen an appreciation of reality to regard believers as utterly sinless (Phil 3 12, etc), and his pages abound in reproofs and exhortations. But the present existence of remnants of sin had no final terrors, for the ultimate victory over sin was certain, even if it was not to be complete until the last day when the power of God would redeem even the present physical frame (Rom 8 11; Phil 3 21, etc).

As the first man to belong to the higher order, and as the point from which the race could take a fresh start, Christ could justly be termed a new Adam (1 Cor 15 45-49; cf Rom 5 12-21). If Cor 15 46 has any relation to the Philonic doctrine of the two Adams, it is a polemic against it. Such a polemic would not be unlikely.

A most extraordinary fact, to the former Pharisee, was that this experience had been gained without conscious effort and even against conscious effort (Phil 3 7f). After years of fruitless striving a single act of self-surrender had brought him an assurance that he had despaired of ever attaining. And this act of self-surrender is what St. Paul means by "faith," "faith without works." This faith is naturally almost anything in the world rather than a mere intellectual acknowledgment of a fact (Jas 2 19), and is an act of the whole man, too complex for simple analysis. It finds, however, its perfect statement in Christ's reference to 'receiving the kingdom of God as a little child' (Mk 10 15). By an act of simple yielding St. Paul found himself no longer in dread of his sins; he was at peace with God, and confident as to his future; in a word, "justified." In one sense, to be sure, "works" were still involved, for without the past struggles the result would never have been attained. A desire, however imperfect, to do right is a necessary preparation for justification, and the word has no meaning to a man satisfied to be sunk in complete selfishness (Rom 6 2; 3 8, etc.). This desire to do right, which St. Paul always presupposes, and the content given "faith" are sufficient safeguards against antinomianism. But the grace given is in no way commensurate with past efforts, nor does it grow out of them. It is a simple gift of God (Rom 6 23).

5. Justification

III. Further Developments.—The adoption by St. Paul of the facts given by his conversion (and the immediate conclusions that followed from them) involved, naturally, a readjustment and a reformation of the other parts of his belief. The process must have occupied some time, if it was ever complete during his life, and must have been affected materially by his controversies with his former coreligionists and with very many Christians.

Fundamental was the problem of the Law. The Law was perfectly clear that he—and only he—who performed it would live. But life was found through faith in Christ, while the Law was not fulfilled. There could be no question of compromise between the two positions; they were simply incompatible (Rom 10 5f; Gal 2 16; 3 11f; Phil 3 7). One conclusion only was possible: "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom 10 4). As far as concerned the believer, the Law was gone. Two tremendous results followed. One was the immense simplification of what we call "Christian ethics," which were now to be determined by the broadest general principles of right and wrong and no longer by an elaborate legalistic construing of God's commands (Rom 13 8-10; Gal 5 22f, etc; cf Mk 12 29-31). To be sure, the commandments might be quoted as convenient expressions of moral duty (Eph 6 2; 1 Cor 9 9, etc; cf Mk 10 19), but they are binding because they are right, not because they are commandments (Col 2 16). So, in St. Paul's moral directions, he tries to bring out always the principle involved, and Rom 14 and 1 Cor 8 are masterpieces of the treatment of concrete problems by this method.

1. Abolition of the Law

The second result of the abolition of the Law was overwhelming. Gentiles had as much right to Christ as had the Jews, barring per-

2. Gentiles haps the priority of honor (Rom 3 2, etc) possessed by the latter. It is altogether conceivable, as Acts 22 21 implies, that St. Paul's active acceptance of this result was long delayed and reached only after severe struggles. The fact was utterly revolutionary, and although it was prophesied in the OT (Rom 9 25f), yet 'the Messiah among you Gentiles' remained the hidden mystery that God had revealed only in the last days (Col 1 26f; Eph 3 3-6, etc). The struggles of the apostle in defence of this principle are the most familiar part of his career.

This consciousness of deliverance from the Law came to St. Paul in another way. The Law was meant for men in this world, but the union with Christ had raised him out of this world and so taken him away from the Law's control. In the Epp. this fact finds expression in an elaborately reasoned form. As Christ's nature is now a vital part of our nature, His death and resurrection are facts of our past as well. "Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God" (Col 3 3). But "the law hath dominion over a man" only "for so long time as he liveth" (Rom 7 1). "Wherefore, my brethren, ye also were made dead to the law through the body of Christ" (ver 4). Cf Col 2 11-13, 20, where the same argument is used to show that ritual observance is no longer necessary. In Rom 6 1-14 this argument is made to issue in a practical exhortation. Through the death of Christ, which is our death (ver 4), we, like Him, are placed in a higher world (ver 5) where sin has lost its power (ver 7), a world in which we are no longer under Law (ver 14). Hence the intensest moral effort becomes our duty (ver 13; cf 2 Cor 5 14f).

This release from the Law, however, does not solve the whole problem. Evil, present and past, is a fact, Law or no Law (on Rom 4 15b; 5 13b; see the comms.), and a forbearance of God that simply "passes over" sins is disastrous for man as well as contrary to the righteous nature of God (Rom 3 25f). However inadequate the OT sacrifices were felt to have been (and hence, perhaps, St. Paul's avoidance of the Levitical terms except in Eph 5 2), yet they offered the only help possible for the treatment of this most complex of problems. The guilt of our sins is "covered" by the death of Christ (1 Cor 15 3, where this truth is among those which were delivered to converts "first of all"; Rom 3 25; 4 25; 5 6, etc). This part of his theology St. Paul leaves in an incomplete form. He was accustomed, like any other man of his day, whether Jew or Gentile, to think naturally in sacrificial terms, and neither he nor his converts were conscious of any difficulty involved. Nor has theology since his time been able to contribute much toward advancing the solution of the problem. The fatal results of unchecked evil, its involving of the innocent with the guilty, and the value of vicarious suffering, are simple facts of our experience that defy our attempts to reduce them to intellectual formulas. In St. Paul's case it is to be noted that he views the incentive as coming from God (Rom 3 25; 5 8; 8 32, etc), because of His love toward man, so that a "gift-propitiation" of an angry deity is a theory the precise opposite of the Pauline. Moreover, Christ's death is not a mere fact of the past, but through the "mystical union" is incorporated into the life of every believer.

4. Atonement

Further developments of this doctrine about Christ's death find in it the complete destruction of whatever remained of the Law (Col 2 14), esp. as the barrier between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2 15f). The extension of the effects of the death to the unseen world (Col 2 15; cf Gal 4 9; Eph 4 8) was of course natural.

The death of Christ as producing a subjective moral power in the believer is appealed to frequently (cf Rom 8 3; Gal 2 20; Eph

5. Moral Example

5 2, 25; Phil 2 5, etc), while the idea is perhaps present to some degree even in Rom 3 26. From a different point of view, the Cross as teaching the vanity of worldly things is a favorite subject with St. Paul (1 Cor 1

22-25; 2 Cor 13 4; Gal 5 11; 6 14, etc). These aspects require no explanation.

There are, accordingly, in St. Paul's view of the death of Christ at least three distinct lines, the "mystical," the "juristic," and the "ethical." But this distinction is largely only genetic and logical, and the lines tend to blend in all sorts of combinations. Consequently, it is frequently an impossible exegetical problem to determine which is most prominent in any given passage (e.g. 2 Cor 5 14 f).

Regarding the Law a further question remained, which had great importance in St. Paul's controversies. If the Law was useless for

6. Function of the Law salvation, why was it given at all? St. Paul replies that it still had its purpose. To gain righteousness one must desire it and this desire the Law taught (Rom 7 12, 16; 2 18), even though it had no power to help toward fulfilment. So the Law gave knowledge of sin (Rom 3 20; 7 7). But St. Paul did not hesitate to go beyond this. Familiar in his own experience with the psychological truth that a prohibition may actually stimulate the desire to transgress it, he showed that the Law actually had the purpose of bringing out all the dormant evil within us, that grace might deal with it effectually (Rom 5 20 f; 7 8, 25; cf 1 Cor 15 56). Thus the Law became our paidagōgōs "to bring us unto Christ" (Gal 3 24; see SCHOOLMASTER), and came in "besides" (Rom 5 20), i.e. as something not a primary part of God's plan. Indeed, this could be shown from the Law itself, which proved that faith was the primary method of salvation (Rom 4; cf Gal 3 17) and which actually prophesied its own repeal (Gal 4 21-31). With this conclusion, which must have required much time to work out, St. Paul's reversal of his former Pharisaic position was complete.

IV. Special Topics.—As Christ is the central element in the life of the believer, all believers have this element in common and are so united with each other (Rom 12 5). This is the basis of the Pauline doctrine of the church. The use of the word "church" to denote the whole body of believers is not attained until the later Epp. (Col 1 18; Phil 3 6; Eph 1 22, etc)—before that time the word is in the pl. when describing more than a local congregation (2 Thess 1 4; 1 Cor 7 17; Rom 16 16, etc)—but the idea is present from the first. Indeed, the only terms in Judaism that were at all adequate were "the nation" or "Israel." St. Paul uses the latter term (Gal 6 16) and quite constantly expresses himself in a manner that suggests the OT figures for the nation (e.g. cf Eph 5 25 with Hos 2 19 f), and time was needed in order to give ekklēsia (properly "assembly") the new content.

The church is composed of all who have professed faith in Christ and the salvation of its members St. Paul takes generally for granted (1 Thess 1 4; Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 8, etc), even in the case of the incestuous person of 1 Cor 5 5 (cf 3 15; 11 32). To be sure, 1 Cor 5 11-13 makes it clear that the excommunication of grave sinners had been found necessary, and one may doubt if St. Paul had much hope for the "false brethren" of 2 Cor 11 26; Gal 2 4 (cf 1 Cor 3 17, etc). But on the whole St. Paul's optimism has little doubt that every member of the church is in right relations with God. These members, through their union with Christ, form a corporate, social organism of the greatest possible solidarity (1 Cor 12 26, etc) and have the maximum of responsibility toward one another (Rom 14 15; 1 Cor 8 11; 2 Cor 8 13-15; Gal 6 2; Eph 4 25; Col 1 24, etc). They are utterly distinct from the world around them (2 Cor 6 14-18; 1 Cor 5 12, etc), although in constant intercourse with it (1 Cor 5 10; 10 27, etc). It was even desirable, in the conditions of the times, that the church should have her own courts like Jews in gentile cities (1 Cor 6 5 f). The right of the church to discipline her members is taken for granted (1 Cor 5; 2 Cor 2 5-11). According to Acts 14 23 St. Paul made his own appointments of church officers, but the Epp. as a whole would suggest that this practice did not extend beyond Asia Minor. For further details see CHURCH GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY. A general obedience to St. Paul's own authority is presupposed throughout.

The church is, of course, the object of Christ's sanctifying power (Eph 5 25-30) and is so intimately united with Him as to be spoken of as His "body" (1 Cor 12 27; Col 1 18; Eph 1 23, etc), or as the "complement" of Christ, the extension of His personality into the world (Eph 1 22 f). As such, its members have not only their duty toward one another, but also the responsibility of carrying Christ's message into the world (Phil 2 15 f, and presupposed everywhere). And to God shall "be the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever" (Eph 3 21).

As the union with Christ's death is something more than a subjective impression made on the mind by the fact of that death, the references to the union with the death accomplished in baptism in Rom 6 1-7 and Col 2 11 f are not explained by supposing them to describe a mere dramatic ceremony. That

2. The Sacraments

St. Paul was really influenced by the mystery-religion concepts has not been made out. But his readers certainly were so influenced and tended to conceive very materialistic views of the Christian sacraments (1 Cor 10 5; 15 29). And historic exegesis is bound to construe St. Paul's language in the way in which he knew his readers would be certain to understand it, and no ordinary gentile reader of St. Paul's day would have seen a purely "symbolic" meaning in either of the baptismal passages. Philo would have done so, but not the class of men with whom St. Paul had to deal. Similarly, with regard to the Lord's Supper, in 1 Cor 10 20 St. Paul teaches that through participation in a sacrificial meal it is possible to be brought into objective relations with demons of whom one is wholly ignorant. In this light it is hard to avoid the conclusion that through participation in the Lord's Supper the believer is objectively brought into communion with the Lord (1 Cor 10 16), a communion that will react for evil on the believer if he approach it in an unworthy manner (11 29-32): i.e. the union with Christ that is the center of St. Paul's theology he teaches to be established normally through baptism. And in the Lord's Supper this union is further strengthened. That faith on the part of the believer is an indispensable prerequisite for the efficacy of the sacraments need not be said.

PAULUS, pō'lus, SERGIUS, sūr'ji-us (Σέργιος Παῦλος, Sérgios Paúlos): The Rom "proconsul" (RV) or "deputy" (AV) of Cyprus when Paul, along with Barnabas, visited that island on his first missionary journey (Acts 13 4, 7). The official title of Sergius is accurately given in Acts. Cyprus was originally an imperial province, but in 22 BC it was transferred by Augustus to the Senate, and was therefore placed under the administration of proconsuls, as is attested by extant Cyprian coins of the period. When the two missionaries arrived at Paphos, Sergius, who was a "prudent man" (AV) or "man of understanding" (RV), i.e. a man of practical understanding, "sought to hear the word of God" (Acts 13 7). Bar-Jesus, or Elymas, a sorcerer at the court of Sergius, fearing the influence of the apostles, sought, however, "to turn aside the proconsul from the faith," but was struck with blindness (vs 8-11); and the deputy, "when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the teaching of the Lord" (ver 12). The narrative indicates that not only the miracle, but also the attention with which Sergius listened to the teaching of Paul (cf ver 7) conduced to his conversion (Bengel). Attempts have been made to trace some connection between the name Sergius Paulus and the fact that Saul is first called Paul in ver 9, but the joint occurrence of the two names is probably to be set down as only a coincidence.

PAVEMENT, pāv'ment: In the OT, with the exception of 2 K 16 17, the Heb word is רֹמֶשׁ, riṣpāh (2 Ch 7 3; Est 1 6; Ezk 40 17, etc); in Sir 20 18 and Bel ver 19 the word is ἑδάφος, édaphos; in Jn 19 13, the name "The Pavement" (λιθόστρωτος, lihóstrōtos, "paved with stone") is given to the place outside the Praetorium on which Pilate sat to give judgment upon Jesus. Its Heb (Aram.) equivalent is declared to be GABBATHA (q.v.). The identification of the place is uncertain.

PAVILION, pa-vil'yun: A covered place, booth, tent, in which a person may be kept hid or secret (סֹכֶה, sōkh, Ps 27 5; סֻכָּה, shukkah—the usual term—Ps 31 20), or otherwise be withdrawn from view.

The term is used with reference to God (2 S 22 12; Ps 18 11); to kings drinking in privacy (1 K 20 12.16); RV gives "pavilion" for AV "tabernacle" in Job 36 29; Isa 4 6; while in Nu 25 8 it substitutes this word, with m "alcove," for AV "tent" (kubbāh), and Jer 43 10, for "royal pavilion" (shaphrūr), reads in m "glittering pavilion."

PAW, pō (פֶּה, kaph, lit. "palm," יָד, yādh, lit. "hand"): The former (kaph) is applied to the soft paws of animals in contradistinction to the hoofs (Lev 11 27); the latter is thrice used in 1 S 17 37: "Jeh that delivered me out of the paw [yādh] of the lion, and out of the paw [yādh] of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand [yādh] of this Philistine." The vb. "to paw" (פָּרַץ, hāphar) is found in the description of the horse: "He paweth [m "they paw"] in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth out to meet the armed men [m "the weapons"]" (Job 39 21). The word is usually tr^d "to delve into," "to pry into," "to explore."

PÊ, pā (פֶּה, pā): The 17th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as p with daghesh and ph (=f) without. It came also to be used for the number 80. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

PEACE, pēs (שָׁלוֹם, shālōm; εἰρήνη, eirēnē): Is a condition of freedom from disturbance, whether outwardly, as of a nation from war or enemies, or inwardly, within the soul. The Heb word is shālōm (both adj. and subst.), meaning, primarily, "soundness," "health," but coming also to signify "prosperity," well-being in general, all good in relation to both man and God. In early times, to a people harassed by foes, peace was the primary blessing. In Ps 122 7, we have "peace" and "prosperity," and in 35 27; 73 3, shālōm is tr^d "prosperity." In 2 S 11 7 AV, David asked of Uriah "how Joab did" (m "of the peace of Joab"), "and how the people did" [RV "fared," lit. "of the peace of the people"], and how the war prospered" (lit. "and of the peace [welfare] of the war").

(1) Shālōm was the common friendly greeting, used in asking after the health of anyone; also in farewells (Gen 29 6, "Is it well with him?") ["Is there peace to him?"]; 43 23, "Peace be to you"; ver 27, "He asked them of their welfare [of their peace]"; Jgs 6 23, "Jeh said unto him, Peace be unto thee"; 18 15 [AV "saluted him," m "Heb asked him of peace," RV "of his welfare"]; 19 20, etc). See also GREETING. (2) Peace from enemies (implying prosperity) was the great desire of the nation and was the gift of God to the people if they walked in His ways (Lev 26 6; Nu 6 26, "Jeh lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace"; Ps 29 11; Isa 26 12, etc). To "die in peace" was greatly to be desired (Gen 15 15; 1 K 2 6; 2 Ch 34 28, etc). (3) Inward peace was the portion of the righteous who trusted in God (Job 22 21, "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace [shālōm"]; Ps 4 8; 85 8, "He will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints"; 119 165; Prov 3 2. 17; Isa 26 3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace [Heb "peace, peace"], whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee"; Mal 2 5); also outward peace (Job 5 23.24; Prov 16 7, etc). (4) Peace was to be sought and followed by the righteous (Ps 34 14, "Seek peace, and pursue it"; Zec 8 16.19, "Love truth and peace"). (5) Peace should be a prominent feature of the Messianic times (Isa 2 4; 9 6, "Prince of Peace"; 11 6; Ezk 34 25; Mic 4 2-4; Zec 9 10).

In the NT, where eirēnē has much the same meaning and usage as shālōm (for which it is employed in the LXX; cf Lk 19 42, RV "If thou hadst known . . . the things which belong unto peace"), we have still the expectation of "peace," 2. In the through the coming of the Christ (Lk NT 1 74.79; 12 51) and also its fulfilment in the higher spiritual sense.

(1) The gospel in Christ is a message of peace from God to men (Lk 2 14; Acts 10 36, "preaching . . . peace by Jesus Christ"). It is "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," in Rom 5 1; AV 10 15; peace between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2 14.15); an essential element in the spiritual kingdom of God (Rom 14 17). (2) It is to be cherished and followed by Christians. Jesus exhorted His disciples, "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mk 9 50); Paul exhorts, "Live in peace: and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (2 Cor 13 11; cf Rom 12 18; 1 Cor 7 15). (3) God is therefore "the God of peace," the Author and Giver of all good ("peace" including every blessing) very frequently (e.g. Rom 15 33; 16 20; 2 Thess 3 16, etc, "the Lord of peace"). "Peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" is a common apostolic wish or salutation (cf 1 Cor 1 3; 2 Cor 1 2, etc). (4) We have also "peace" as a greeting (Mt 10 13; Lk 10 5); "a son of peace" (10 6) is one worthy of it, in sympathy with it; the Lord's own greeting to His disciples was "Peace be unto you" (Lk 24 36; Jn 20 19.21.26), and ere He left them He gave them specially His blessing of "Peace" (Jn 14 27); we have also frequently "Go in peace" (Mk 5 34; Lk 7 50). In Lk 19 38, we have "peace in heaven" (in the acclamation of Jesus on His Messianic entry of Jerus). (5) The peace that Christ brought is primarily spiritual peace from and with God, peace in the heart, peace as the disposition or spirit. He said that He did not come "to send peace on the earth, but a sword," referring to the searching nature of His call and the divisions and clearances it would create. But, of course, the spirit of the gospel and of the Christian is one of peace, and it is a Christian duty to seek to bring war and strife everywhere to an end. This is represented as the ultimate result of the gospel and Spirit of Christ; universal and permanent peace can come only as that Spirit rules in men's hearts.

"Peace" in the sense of silence, to hold one's peace, etc, is in the OT generally the tr of hārash, "to be still, or silent" (Gen 24 21; 34 5; Job 11 3); also of hāshāh, "to hush," "to be silent" (2 K 2 3.5; Ps 39 2), and of other words. In Job 29 10 ("The nobles held their peace," AV), it is kāl, "voice."

In the NT we have σιᾱπάω, "to be silent," "to cease speaking" (Mt 20 31; 26 63; Acts 18 9, etc); σιγάω, "to be silent," "not to speak" (Lk 20 26; Acts 12 17); ἡσυχάζω, "to be quiet" (Lk 14 4; Acts 11 18); φειμάω, "to muzzle or gag" (Mk 1 25; Lk 4 35).

In Apoc eirēnē is frequent, mostly in the sense of peace from war or strife (Tob 13 14; Jth 3 1; Eccles 13 18; 1 Macc 5 54; 6 49; 2 Macc 14 6, eustátheta = "tranquility").

RV has "peace" for "tongue" (Est 7 4; Job 6 24; Am 6 10; Hab 1 13); "at peace with me" for "perfect" (Isa 42 19, m "made perfect" or "recompensed"); "security" instead of "peaceably" and "peace" (Dnl 8 25; 11 21.24); "came in peace to the city," for "came to Shalem, a city" (Gen 33 18); "it was for my peace" instead of "for peace" (Isa 38 17); "when they are in peace," for "and that which should have been for their welfare" (Ps 69 22).

PEACE OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

PEACEMAKER, pēs'māk-ēr: Occurs only in the pl. (Mt 5 9, "Blessed are the peacemakers [eirēnopoioi]: for they shall be called sons of God" [who is "the God of peace"]). We have also what seems to be a reflection of this saying in Jas 3 18, "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace for [RV m "by"] them that make peace" (tois poiouisin eirēnēn). In classical Gr a "peacemaker" was an ambassador sent to treat of peace. The word in Mt 5 9 would, perhaps, be better rendered "peace-workers," implying not merely making peace between those who are at variance, but working peace as that which is the will of the God of peace for men.

PEACOCK, pē'kok (פֶּקֶחַ, tukkīyīm [pl.]; Lat Pavo cristatus): A bird of the genus Pavo. Japan is the native home of the plainer peafowl; Siam, Ceylon and India produce the commonest and most gorgeous. The peacock has a bill of moderate size with an arched tip, its cheeks are bare, the eyes not large, but very luminous, a crest of 24 feathers 2 in. long, with naked shafts and broad tips of blue, glancing to green. The neck is not long but proudly arched, the breast full, prominent and of bright blue green, blue predominant. The wings are short and ineffectual, the feathers on them made up of a surprising array of colors. The tail consists of 18 short, stiff, grayish-brown feathers. Next is the lining of the train, of the same color. The glory of this glorious bird lies in its train. It begins on the back between the wings in tiny feathers not over 6 in. in length, and extends backward. The quills have thick shafts of purple and green shades, the eye at the tip of each feather from one-half to 2 in. across, of a deep peculiar blue, surrounded at the lower part by two half-moon-shaped crescents of green. Whether the train lies naturally, or is spread in full glory, each eye shows encircled by a marvel of glancing shades of green, gold, purple, blue and bronze. When this train is spread, it opens like a fan behind the head with its sparkling crest, and above the wondrous blue of the breast. The bird has the power to contract the muscles at the base of the quills and play a peculiar sort of music with them. It loves high places and cries before a storm in notes that are startling to one not familiar with them. The bird can be domesticated and will become friendly enough to take food from the hand. The peahen is smaller than the cock, her neck green, her wings gray, tan and brown—but she has not the gorgeous train. She nests on earth and breeds with difficulty when imported, the young being delicate and tender. The grown birds are hardy when acclimated, and live to old age. By some freak of nature, pure white peacocks are at times produced. Aristophanes mentioned peafowl in his Birds, II. 102, 269. Alexander claimed that he brought them into Greece from the east, but failed to prove his contention. Pliny wrote that Hortensius was the first to serve the birds for food, and that Aufidius Lurco first fattened and sold them in the markets. It was the custom to skin the bird, roast and recover it and send it to the table, the gaudy feathers showing.

The first appearance of the bird in the Bible occurs in a summing-up of the wealth and majesty of Solomon (1 K 10 22: "For the king had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks"). (Here LXX translates πελεκητοί [s.c. λίθοι], pelekētoi [lithoi] = "[stones] carved with an ax.") The same statement is made in 2 Ch 9 21: "For the king had ships that went to Tarshish with the servants of Hiram; once every three years came the ships of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks" (LXX omits). There is no question among scholars and scientists but that these statements are true, as the ships of Solomon are known to have visited the coasts of India and Ceylon, and Tarshish was on the Malabar coast of India, where the native name of the peacock was toket, from which tukkīyīm undoubtedly was derived (see GOLD, and Expos T, IX, 472). The historian Tennant says that the Heb names for "ivory" and "apes" were also the same as the Tamil. The reference to the small, ineffectual wing of the peacock which scarcely will lift the weight of the body and train, that used to be found in Job, is now applied to the ostrich, and is no doubt correct:

"The wings of the ostrich wave proudly;
But are they the pinions and plumage of love?"
(Job 39 13).

While the peacock wing seems out of proportion to the size of the bird, it will sustain flight and bear the body to the treetops. The wing of the ostrich is useless for flight. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

PEARL, pūrl. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

PECULIAR, pē-kūl'yar: The Lat peculium means "private property," so that "peculiar" properly = "pertaining to the individual." In modern Eng. the word has usually degenerated into a half-colloquial form for "extraordinary," but in Bib. Eng. it is a thoroughly dignified term for "esp. one's own"; cf the "peculiar treasure" of the king in Eccl 2 8 (AV). Hence "peculiar people" (AV Dt 14 2, etc) means a people esp. possessed by God and particularly prized by Him. The word in the OT (AV Ex 19 5; Dt 14 2; 26 18; Ps 135 4; Eccl 2 8) invariably represents פָּקֻדָּה, s'ghullāh, "property," an obscure word which LXX usually rendered by the equally obscure περιούσιος, periouísios (apparently meaning "superabundant"), which in turn is quoted in Tit 2 14. In Mal 3 17, however, LXX has περιποίησις, peripoiēsis, quoted in 1 Pet 2 9. EERV in the NT substituted "own possession" in the two occurrences, but in the OT kept "peculiar" and even extended its use (Dt 7 6; Mal 3 17) to cover every occurrence of s'ghullāh except in 1 Ch 29 3 ("treasure"). ARV, on the contrary, has dropped "peculiar" altogether, using "treasure" in 1 Ch 29 3; Eccl 2 8, and "own possession" elsewhere. AV also has "peculiar commandments" (idios, idios, "particular," RV "several") in Wisd 19 6, and RV has "peculiar" where AV has "special" in Wisd 3 14 for ἐκλεκτή, eklektē, "chosen out."

PEDAHHEL, ped'a-hel, pē-dā'el (פְּדַהֵל, p'dhah'el, "whom God redeems"): A prince of Naphthali; one of the tribal chiefs who apportioned the land of Canaan (Nu 34 28; cf ver 17).

PEDAHZUR, pē-dā'zur (פְּדַחְצֹר, p'dhāhçur): Mentioned in Nu 1 10; 2 20; 7 54, 59; 10 23 as the father of Gamaliel, head of the tribe of Manasseh, at the time of the exodus. See Expos T, VIII, 555ff.

PEDIAIAH, pē-dā'ya, pē-dī'a (פְּדִיָּה, p'dhā-yāhū, "Jeh redeems"):

(1) Father of Joel, who was ruler of Western Manasseh in David's reign (1 Ch 27 20). Form פְּדִיָּה, p'dhāyāh (see above).

(2) Pedaiiah of Rumah (2 K 23 36), father of Zebudah, Jehoiaakim's mother.

(3) A son of Jeconiah (1 Ch 3 18); in ver 19 the father of Zerubbabel. Pedaiiah's brother, Shealtiel, is also called father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3 2; but in 1 Ch 3 17 AV spelled "Salathiel"). There may have been two cousins, or even different individuals may be referred to under Shealtiel and Salathiel respectively.

(4) Another who helped to repair the city wall (Neh 3 25), of the family of PAROSH (q.v.). Perhaps this is the man who stood by Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4; 1 Esd 9 44, called "Phal-deus").

(5) A "Levite," appointed one of the treasurers over the "treasuries" of the Lord's house (Neh 13 13).

(6) A Benjamite, one of the rulers residing in Jerus under the "return" arrangements (Neh 11 7).

PEDESTAL, ped'es-tal (קֶדֶשׁ, kēn): In two places (1 K 7 29.31) RV gives this word for AV "base" (in Solomon's "Sea").

PEDIAS, ped'i-as, pē-di'as (Πεδίας, Pedias, Α, Παιδίας, Paidēias; AV by mistake Pelias): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34) = "Bedeiah" of Ezr 10 35.

PEDIGREE, ped'i-grē (הִיחַלְלֵדָה, hihyallēdh, "to show one's birth"): The Eng. word "pedigree" occurs only once in the Bible, according to the concordance. In Nu 1 18, it is said: "They declared their pedigrees"; that is, they enrolled or registered themselves according to their family connections. The same idea is expressed frequently, employing a different term in the Heb, by the common phrase of Ch, Ezr and Neh, "to reckon by genealogy," "to give genealogy," etc (cf 1 Ch 7 5.9; Ezr 2 62 ff; Neh 7 64). These last passages indicate the importance of the registered pedigree or genealogy, esp. of the priests in the post-exilic community, for the absence of the list of their pedigrees, or their genealogical records, was sufficient to cause the exclusion from the priesthood of certain enrolled priests.

PEEL, pēl, PILL, pil: "Pill" (Gen 30 37.38; Tob 11 13 [RV "scaled"]) and "peel" (Isa 18 2.7 [AV and RVm]; Ezk 29 18 [AV and ERV]) are properly two different words, meaning "to remove the hair" (pilus) and "to remove the skin" (pellis), but in Elizabethan Eng. the two were confused. In Isa 18 2.7, the former meaning is implied, as the Heb word here (מָרַץ, māraṣ) is rendered "pluck off the hair" in Ezr 9 3; Neh 13 25; Isa 50 6. The word, however, may also mean "make smooth" (so RVm) or "bronzed." This last, referring to the dark skins of the Ethiopians, is best here, but in any case AV and RVm are impossible. In the other cases, however, "remove the skin" (cf "scaled," Tob 11 13 RV) is meant. So in Gen 30 37.38, Jacob "peels" (so RV) off portions of the bark of his rods, so as to give alternating colors (cf ver 39). And in Ezk 29 18, the point is Nebuchadrezzar's total failure in his siege of Tyre, although the soldiers had carried burdens until the skin was peeled from their shoulders (cf ARV "worn").

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PEEP, pēp (צִפְצִף, ṣāphaph; AV Isa 8 19; 10 14 [RV "chirp"]): In 10 14, the word describes the sound made by a nestling bird; in 8 19, the changed (ventriloquistic?) voice of necromancers uttering sounds that purported to come from the feeble dead. The modern use of "peep" = "look" is found in Sir 21 23, as the tr of παρακύπτω, parakúptō: "A foolish man peepeth in from the door of another man's house."

PEKAH, pē'kā (פֶּקַח, pekah, "opening" [of the eyes] [2 K 15 25-31]; Φάκεε, Phákee): Son of Remaliah, and 18th king of Israel.

1. Accession Pekah murdered his predecessor, Pekahiah, and seized the reins of power (ver 25). His usurpation of the throne is said to have taken place in the 52d year of Uzziah, and his reign to have lasted for 20 years (ver 27). His accession, therefore, may be placed in 748 BC (other chronologies place it later, and make the reign last only a few years).

Pekah came to the throne with the resolution of assisting in forming a league to resist the westward advance of Assyria. The memory of defeat by Assyria at the battle of Karkar in 753, more than 100 years before, had never died out.

2. Attitude of Assyria Tiglath-pileser III was now ruler of Assyria, and in successive campaigns since 745 had proved himself a restless conqueror. His lust for battle was not yet satisfied, and the turn of Philistia and Syria was about to come. In 735, a coalition, of which Pekah was a prominent member, was being formed to check his further advance. It comprised the princes of Comagene, Gebal, Hamath, Arvad, Ammon, Moab, Edom, Gaza, Samaria, Syria, and some minor potentates, the list being taken from a roll of the subject-princes who attended a court and paid tribute after the fall of Damascus. Ahaz likewise attended as a voluntary tributary to do homage to Tiglath-pileser (2 K 16 10).

While the plans of the allies were in course of formation, an obstacle was met with which proved insurmountable by the arts of diplomacy. This was the refusal of Ahaz, Recalcitrant then on the throne of David, to join the confederacy. Arguments and threats having failed to move him, resort was had to force, and the troops of Samaria and Damascus moved on Jerus (2 K 16 5). Great alarm was felt at the news of their approach, as seen in the 7th and 8th chapters of Isa. The allies had in view to dispossess Ahaz of his crown, and give it to one of their own number, a son of Tabeel. Isaiah himself was the mainstay of the opposition to their projects. The policy he advocated, by Divine direction, was that of complete neutrality. This he urged with passionate earnestness, but with only partial success. Isaiah (probably) had kept back Ahaz from joining the coalition, but could not prevent him from sending an embassy, laden with gifts to Tiglath-pileser, to secure his intervention. On the news arriving that the Assyrian was on the march, a hasty retreat was made from Jerus, and the blow soon thereafter fell, where Isaiah had predicted, on Rezin and Pekah, and their kingdoms.

The severely concise manner in which the writer of K deals with the later sovereigns of the Northern

4. Chronicles Ancillary to Kings Kingdom is, in the case of Pekah, supplemented in Ch by further facts as to this campaign of the allies. The Chronicler states that "a great multitude of captives" were taken to Damascus and many others to Samaria.

These would be countrymen and women from the outlying districts of Judah, which were ravaged. Those taken to Samaria were, however, returned, unhurt, to Jericho by the advice of the prophet Oded (2 Ch 28 5-15).

The messengers sent from Jerus to Nineveh appear to have arrived when the army of Tiglath-pileser was already prepared to march.

5. Fall of Damascus; Northern Palestine Overrun The movements of the Assyrians being expedited, they fell upon Damascus before the junction of the allies was accomplished. Rezin was defeated in a decisive battle, and took refuge in his capital, which was closely invested. Another part of the invading army descended on the upper districts of Syria and Samaria. Serious resistance to the veteran troops of the East could hardly be made, and city after city fell. A list of districts and cities that were overrun is given in 2 K 15 29. It comprises Gilead beyond Jordan—already partly depopulated (1 Ch 5 26); the tribal division of Naphtali, lying to the W. of the lakes of Galilee and Merom, and all Galilee, as far S. as the plain of Esdraelon and the Valley of Jezreel. Cities particularly mentioned are Ijon (now 'Ayūn), Abel-beth-maacah (now 'Abi), Janoah (now Yānān), Kedesh (now Kados) and Hazor (now Hadīreh).

These places and territories were not merely attacked and plundered. Their inhabitants were removed, with indescribable loss and

6. Deportation of the given of Halah, Habor, Hara, and both sides of the river Gozan, an affluent of the Euphrates. The transplantation of these tribes to a home beyond the great river was a new experiment in political geography, devised with the object of welding the whole of Western Asia into a single empire. It was work of immense difficulty and must have taxed the resources of even so great an organizer as Tiglath-pileser. The soldiers who had conquered in the field were, of course, employed to escort the many thousands of prisoners to their new locations. About two-thirds of the Sam kingdom, comprising the districts of Samaria, the two Galilees, and the trans-Jordanic region, was thus denuded of its inhabitants.

Left with but a third of his kingdom—humbled but still defiant—Pekah was necessarily unpopular with his subjects. In this extremity

7. Death of —the wave of invasion from the N. Pekah having spent itself—the usual solution occurred, and a plot was formed by which the assassination of Pekah should be secured, and the assassin should take his place as a satrap of Assyria. A tool was found in the person of Hoshea, whom Tiglath-pileser claims to have appointed to the throne. The Bib. narrative does not do more than record the fact that "Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, and smote him, and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 K 15 30). The date given to this act is the 20th year of Jotham. As Jotham's reign lasted but 16 years, this number is evidently an error.

For the first time, the historian makes no reference to the religious conduct of a king of Israel.

8. References in Isaiah The subject was beneath notice. The second section of Isaiah's prophecies (7 1—10 4) belongs to the reign of Ahaz and thus to the time of Pekah, both of whom are named in it. Pekah is named in 7 1, and is often, in this and the next chapter, referred to as "the son of Remaliah." His loss of the territorial divisions of Zebulun and Naphtali is referred to in 9 1, and is followed by a prophecy of their future glory as the earthly home of the Son of Man. The wording of Isa 9 14 shows that it was written before the fall of Samaria, and that of Isa 10 9—11 that Damascus and Samaria had both fallen and Jerus was expected to follow. This section of Isaiah may thus be included in the literature of the time of Pekah.

PEKAHIAH, pek-a-hi'a, pē-kā'ya (פְּקַחְיָהּ, p'kahyāh, "Jeh hath opened" [the eyes] [2 K 15 23—26]; Phakesias, Phakesias, A, Phakel-

1. Accession as, Phaketas): Son of Menahem, and 17th king of Israel. He is said to have succeeded his father in the "50th year of Azariah" (or Uzziah), a synchronism not free from difficulty if his accession is placed in 750—749 (see MENAHEM; UZZIAH). Most date lower, after 738, when an Assyrian inscription makes Menahem pay tribute to Tiglath-pileser (cf 2 K 15 19—21).

Pekahiah came to the throne enveloped in the danger which always accompanies the successor of an exceptionally strong ruler, in a

2. Regicide country where there is not a settled law of succession. Within two years of his accession he was foully murdered—the 7th king of Israel who had met his death by violence (the others were Nadab, Elah, Tibni, Jehoram, Zechariah and Shallum). The chief conspirator was Pekah, son of Remaliah, one of his captains, with whom, as agent in the crime, were associated 50 Gileadites. These penetrated into the palace (RV "castle") of the king's house, and put Pekahiah to death, his bodyguards, Argob and Arieah, dying with him. The record, in its close adherence to fact, gives no reason for the king's removal, but it may reasonably be surmised that it was connected with a league which was at this time forming for opposing resistance to the power of Assyria. This league, Pekahiah, preferring his father's policy of tributary vassalage, may have refused to join. If so, the decision cost him his life. The act of treachery and violence is in accordance with all that Hosea tells us of the internal condition of Israel at this time: "They . . . devour their judges; all their kings are fallen" (Hos 7 7).

The narrative of Pekahiah's short reign contains but a brief notice of his personal character. Like his predecessors, Pekahiah did not depart from the system of worship introduced by Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin."

3. Peka- Character Despite the denunciations of the prophets of the Northern Kingdom (Am 5 21—27; Hos 8 1—6), the worship of the calves remained, till the whole was swept away, a few years later, by the fall of the kingdom.

After Pekahiah's murder, the throne was seized by the regicide Pekah. W. SHAW CALDECOTT

PEKOD, pē'kod (פְּקֹד, p'kōdh): A name applied in Jer 50 21 and Ezk 23 23 to the Chaldeans. EVm in the former passage gives the meaning as "visitation."

PELALIAH, pē-lā'ya, pē-lī'a (פְּלִלְיָהּ, p'lā'yāh):

(1) A son of Elioenai, of the royal house of Judah (1 Ch 3 24).

(2) A Levite who assisted Ezra by expounding the Law (Neh 8 7), and was one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10 10). He is called "Phalias" in 1 Esd 9 48 (RV).

PELALIAH, pel-a-lī'a (פְּלִלְיָהּ, p'lalyāh, "Jeh judges"): A priest, father of Jeroham, one of the "workers" in the Lord's house (Neh 11 12).

PELATIAH, pel-a-tī'a (פְּלַטְיָהּ, p'lalyāh, "Jeh delivers"):

(1) One who "sealed" the covenant (Neh 10 22).

(2) A descendant of Solomon, grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 21).

(3) A Simeonite, one of the captains who cleared out the Amalekites and dwelt on the captured land (1 Ch 4 42.43).

(4) A prince of the people whom Ezekiel (in Babylon) pictures as 'devising mischief' and giving 'wicked counsel' in Jerus: He is represented as falling dead while Ezekiel prophesies (Ezk 11 1.13). His name has the ḥ, u, ending.

PELEG, pē'lēg (פֶּלֶג, pelegh, "watercourse," "division"): A son of Eber, and brother of Joktan. The derivation of the name is given: "for in his days was the earth divided" (niphlagāh) (Gen 10 25; cf Lk 3 35, AV "Phalec"). This probably refers to the scattering of the world's population and the confounding of its language recorded in Gen 11 1—9. In Aram. p'lagh and Arab. phalaj mean "division"; in Heb. pelegh means "watercourse." The name may really be due to the occupation by this people of some well-watered (furrowed), district (e.g. in Babylonia), for these patronymics represent races, and the derivation in Gen 10 25 is a later editor's remark. S. F. HUNTER

PELET, pē'let (פֶּלֶט, pelet, "deliverance"):

- (1) Son of Iahdai (1 Ch 2 47).
- (2) Son of Aznaveth, one of those who resorted to David at Ziklag while he was hiding from Saul (1 Ch 12 3).

PELETH, pē'leth (פֶּלֶת, peleth, "swiftness"):

- (1) Father of On, one of the rebels against Moses and Aaron (Nu 16 1); probably same as PALLU (q.v.).
- (2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 33).

PELETHITES, pel'ē-thīts, pē'leth-its (פֶּלֶתִּים, p'lēthī): A company of David's bodyguard, like the CHERETHITES (q.v.) (2 S 8 18; 15 18); probably a corrupt form of "Philistines."

PELIAS, pē-lī'as: AV=RV "Pediais."

PELICAN, pel'i-kan (פֶּלִיקָן, kā'ath; Lat Pelecanus onocrotalus [LXX reads πελεκάν, pelekán, in Lev and Pss, but has 3 other readings, that are rather confusing, in the other places]): Any bird of the genus Pelecanus. The Heb kā' means "to vomit." The name was applied to the bird because it swallowed large quantities of fish and then disgorged them to its nestlings. In the performance of this act it pressed the large beak, in the white species, tipped with red, against the crop and slightly lifted the wings. In ancient times, people, seeing this, believed that the bird was puncturing its breast and feeding its young with its blood. From this idea arose the custom of using a pelican with lifted wings in heraldry or as a symbol of Christ and of charity. (See Fictitious Creatures in Art, 182-86, London, Chapman and Hall, 1906.) Pal knew a white and a brownish-gray bird, both close to 6 ft. long and having over a 12 ft. sweep of wing. They lived around the Dead Sea, fished beside the Jordan and abounded in greatest numbers in the wildernesses of the Mediterranean shore. The brown pelicans were larger than the white. Each of them had a long beak, peculiar throat pouch and webbed feet. They built large nests, 5 and 6 ft. across, from dead twigs of bushes, and laid two or three eggs. The brown birds deposited a creamy-white egg with a rosy flush; the white, a white egg with bluish tints. The young were naked at first, then covered with down, and remained in the nest until full feathered and able to fly. This compelled the parent birds to feed them for a long time, and they carried such quantities of fish to a nest that the young could not consume all of them and many were dropped on the ground. The tropical sun soon made the location unbearable to mortals. Perching pelicans were the ugliest birds imaginable, but when their immense brown or white bodies swept in a 12 ft. spread across the land and over sea, they made an impressive picture. They are included, with good reason, in the list of abominations (see Lev 11 18; Dt 14 17). They are next mentioned in Ps 102 6:

"I am like a pelican of the wilderness;
I am become as an owl of the waste places."

Here David from the depths of affliction likened himself to a pelican as it appears when it perches in the wilderness. See Isa 34 11: "But the pelican and the porcupine shall possess it; and the owl and the raven shall dwell therein: and he will stretch over it the line of confusion, and the plummet of emptiness." Here the bird is used to complete the picture of desolation that was to prevail after the destruction of Edom. The other reference concerns the destruction of Nineveh and is found in Zeph 2 14: "And herds shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the pelican and the porcupine shall lodge in the capitals thereof; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds: for he hath laid bare the cedar-work." GENE STRATTON-PORTER

PELISHTIM, pel'ish-tim, pe-lish'tim (פִּלִּשְׁתִּים, p'lishtīm [RVm of Gen 10 14]). See PHILISTINES.

PELONITE, pel'ō-nīt, pē'lō-nīt, pē-lō'nīt (פֶּלֹנִי, p'lonī, a place-name): Two of David's heroes are thus described: (1) "Helez the Pelonite" (1 Ch 11 27) (see PALTITE); and (2) "Ahiyah the Pelonite" (1 Ch 11 36).

PEN, (פֶּן, 'et, פֶּנ, heret; κάλαμος, kálamos): The first writing was done on clay, wax, lead or stone tablets by scratching into the material with some hard pointed instrument. For this purpose bodkins of bronze, iron, bone or ivory were used (Job 19 24; Isa 8 1; Jer 17 1). In Jer 17 1 a diamond is also mentioned as being used for the same purpose. In Jer 36 Baruch, the son of Neriah, declares that he recorded the words of the prophet with ink in the book. In ver 23 it says that the king cut the roll with the penknife (lit. the scribe's knife). This whole scene can best be explained if we consider that Baruch and the king's scribes were in the habit of using reed pens. These pens are made from the hollow jointed stalks of a coarse grass growing in marshy places. The dried reed is cut diagonally with the penknife and the point thus formed is carefully shaved thin to make it flexible and the nib split as in the modern pen. The last operation is the clipping off of the very point so that it becomes a stub pen. The Arab scribe does this by resting the nib on his thumb nail while cutting, so that the cut will be clean and the pen will not scratch. The whole procedure requires considerable skill. The pupil in Heb or Arab. writing learns to make a pen as his first lesson. A scribe carries a sharp knife around with him for keeping his pen in good condition, hence the name penknife. The word used in 3 Jn ver 13 is kalamos, "reed," indicating that the pen described above was used in John's time (cf kalam, the common Arab. name for pen). See INK; INK-HORN; WRITING.

Figurative: "Written with a pen of iron," i.e. indelibly (Jer 17 1). "My tongue is the pen of a ready writer" (Ps 45 1; cf Jer 36 18). As the trained writer records a speech, so the Psalmist's tongue impresses or engraves on his hearers' minds what he has conceived.

PENCIL, pen'sil (Isa 44 13, m "red ochre," AV "line"). See LINE; OCHRE, RED.

PENDANT, pen'dant (from Fr. from Lat pendeo, "to hang"): Not in AV. Twice in RV. (1) נִסְפָּרוֹת, nîsphôth (AV "collars"), ornaments of the Midianites captured by Gideon (Jgs 8 26). (2) נִסְפָּרוֹת, nîsphôth (AV "chains"), an article of feminine apparel (Isa 3 19). The reference seems to be (Cheyne, "Isaiah" Polychrome Bible [HDB, III, 739]) to ear-drops, pearl or gold ornaments resembling a drop of water, fastened, probably, to the lobe of the ear.

PENIEL, pê-nî'el, pen'i-el, pē'ni-el (פְּנִיֵּאל, pēnî'ēl, "face of God"; Εἶδος θεοῦ, Eidos theou): This is the form of the name in Gen 32 30. In the next verse and elsewhere it appears as "Penuel." The name is said to have been given to the place by Jacob after his night of wrestling by the Jabbok, because, as he said, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved." It was a height evidently close by the stream over which Jacob passed in the morning. Some have thought it might be a prominent cliff, the contour of which resembled a human face. Such a cliff on the seashore to the S. of Tripoli was called theou prōsōpon, "face of God" (Strabo xvi.2.15f). In later times a city with a strong tower stood upon it. This lay in the line of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites. When he returned victorious, he beat down the place because of the churlishness of the inhabitants (Jgs 8 8.9.17). It was one of the towns "built" or fortified by Jeroboam (1 K 12 25). Merrill would identify it with Tebul edh-Dhahab, "hills of gold," two hills with ruins that betoken great antiquity, and that speak of great strength, on the S. of the Jabbok, about 10 miles E. of Jordan (for description see Merrill, East of the Jordan, 390 ff). A difficulty that seems fatal to this identification is that here the banks of the Jabbok are so precipitous as to be impassable. Conder suggests Jebel 'Osha. The site was clearly not far from Succoth; but no certainty is yet possible. W. EWING

PENINNAH, pê-nin'a (פְּנִינָה, pēninnāh, "coral," "pearl"): Second wife of Elkanah, father of Samuel (1 S 1 2.4).

PENKNIFE, pen'nif (Jer 36 23). See PEN.

PENNY, pen'i (δηνάριον, dēnāriōn; Lat denarius [q.v.]): ARV (Mt 18 28; 20 2.9.10.13, etc) renders it by "shilling" except in Mt 22 19; Mk 12 15 and Lk 20 24, where it retains the original term as it refers to a particular coin. See DENARIUS; MONEY.

PENSION, pen'shun (1 Esd 4 56, AV "and he commanded to give to all that kept the city pensions and wages"; κλήρος, klēros, "allotted portion," usually [here certainly] of lands [RV "lands"]): Literally means simply "payment," and AV seems to have used the word in order to avoid any specialization of klēros. There is no reference to payment for past services. See LOT.

LITERATURE

I. Title, Division, Contents (תּוֹרָה, tōrāh, "law" or "teaching").—It has recently been argued that the Heb word is really the Bab tertu, "divinely revealed law" (e.g. Sayce, Churchman, 1909, 728 ff), but such passages as Lev 14 54-57; Dt 17 11 show that the legislator connected it with תּוֹרָה, tōrāh (from yārāh), "to teach." Also called by the Jews חֲמִישָׁה חֻמְשֵׁי תּוֹרָה, hāmishshāh hūm'shī tōrāh, "the five-fifths of the law": ὁ νόμος, ho nōmos, "the Law." The word "Pentateuch" comes from πεντάτευχος, pentáteuchos, lit. "5-volumed [sc. book]." The Pent consists of the first five books of the Bible, and forms the first division of the Jewish Canon, and the whole of the Sam Canon. The 5-fold division is certainly old, since it is earlier than the LXX or the Sam Pent. How much older it may be is unknown. It has been thought that the 5-fold division of the Psalter is based on it.

The five books into which the Pent is divided are respectively Gen, Ex, Lev, Nu, and Dt, and the separate arts. should be consulted for information as to their nomenclature.

The work opens with an account of the Creation, and passes to the story of the first human couple. The narrative is carried on partly by genealogies and partly by fuller accounts to Abraham. Then comes a history of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the collateral lines of descendants being rapidly dismissed. The story of Joseph is told in detail, and Gen closes with his death. The rest of the Pent covers the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt, their exodus and wanderings, the conquest of the trans-Jordanic lands and the fortunes of the people to the death of Moses. The four concluding books contain masses of legislation mingled with the narrative (for special contents, see arts. on the several books).

II. Authorship, Composition, Date.—The view that Moses was the author of the Pent, with the exception of the concluding vs of Dt, was once held universally. It is still believed by the great mass of Jews and Christians, but in most universities of Northern Europe and North America other theories prevail. An application of what is called "higher" or "documentary criticism" (to distinguish it from lower or textual criticism) has led to the formation of a number of hypotheses. Some of these are very widely held, but unanimity has not been attained, and recent investigations have challenged even the conclusions that are most generally accepted. In the Eng-speaking countries the vast majority of the critics would regard Driver's LOT and Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's Hexateuch as fairly representative of their position, but on the Continent of Europe the numerous school that holds some such position is dwindling alike in numbers and influence, while even in Great Britain and America some of the ablest critics are beginning to show signs of being shaken in their allegiance to cardinal points of the higher-critical case. However, at the time of writing, these latter critics have not put forward any fresh formulation of their views, and accordingly the general positions of the works named may be taken as representing with certain qualifications the general critical theory. Some of the chief stadia in the development of this may be mentioned.

After attention had been drawn by earlier writers to various signs of post-Mosaic date and extraordinary perplexities in the Pent, the first real step toward what its advocates have, till within the last few years, called "the modern position" was taken by J. Astruc (1753). He propounded what Carpenter terms "the clue to the documents," i.e. the difference of the Divine appellations in Gen as a test of authorship. On this view the word 'Elohim' ("God") is characteristic of one principal source and the Tetragrammaton, i.e. the Divine name YHWH represented by the "LORD" or "GOD" of AV and RV, shows the presence of another. Despite occasional warnings, this clue was followed in the main for 150 years. It forms the starting-point of the whole current critical development, but the most recent investigations have successfully proved that it is unreliable (see below, 3, [2]). Astruc was followed by Eichhorn (1780), who made a more thorough examination of Gen, indicating numerous differences of style, representation, etc.

Geddes (1792) and Vater (1802-5) extended the method applied to Gen to the other books of the Pent.

In 1798 Ilgen distinguished two Elohist in Gen, but this view did not find followers for some time. The next step of fundamental importance was the assignment of the bulk of Dt to the 7th cent. BC. This was due to De Wette (1806). Hupfeld (1853) again distinguished a second Elohist, and this has been accepted by most critics. Thus there are four main documents at least: D (the bulk of Dt), two Elohist (P and E) and one document (J) that uses the Tetragrammaton in Gen. From 1822 (Bleek) a series of writers maintained that the Book of Josh was compounded from the same documents as the Pent (see HEXATEUCH).

Two other developments call for notice: (1) there has been a tendency to subdivide these documents further, regarding them as the work of schools rather than of individuals, and resolving them into different strata (P₁, P₂, P₃, etc., J₁, J₂, etc., or in the notation of other writers J₁Je, etc.); (2) a particular scheme of dating has found wide acceptance. In the first period of the critical development it was assumed that the principal Elohist (P) was the earliest document. A succession of writers of whom Reuss, Graf, Kuenen and Wellhausen are the most prominent have, however, maintained that this is not the first but the last in point of time and should be referred to the exile or later. On this view the theory is in outline as follows: J and E (so called from their respective Divine appellations)—on the relative dates of which opinions differ—were composed probably during the early monarchy and subsequently combined by a redactor (R^{ie}) into a single document JE. In the 7th cent. D, the bulk of Dt, was composed. It was published in the 18th year of Josiah's reign. Later it was combined with JE into JED by a redactor (R^{ied}). P or PC, the last of all (originally the first Elohist, now the PC) incorporated an earlier code of uncertain date which consists in the main of most of Lev 17-26 and is known as the Law of Holiness (H or Ph). P itself is largely post-exilic. Ultimately it was joined with JED by a priestly redactor (R^p) into substantially our present Pent. As already stated, the theory is subject to many minor variations. Moreover, it is admitted that not all its portions are equally well supported. The division of JE into J and E is regarded as less certain than the separation of P. Again, there are variations in the analysis, differences of opinion as to the exact dating of the documents, and so forth. Yet the view just sketched has been held by a very numerous and influential school during recent years, nor is it altogether fair to lay stress on minor divergences of opinion. It is in the abstract conceivable that the main positions might be true, and that yet the data were inadequate to enable all the minor details to be determined with certainty (see CRITICISM OF THE BIBLE).

This theory will hereafter be discussed at length for two reasons: (1) while it is now constantly losing ground, it is still more widely held than any other; and (2) so much of the modern lit. on the OT has been written from this standpoint that no intelligent use can be made of the most ordinary books of reference without some acquaintance with it.

Before 1908 the conservative opposition to the dominant theory had exhibited two separate tendencies. One school of conservatives rejected the scheme in toto; the other accepted the analysis with certain modifications, but sought to throw back the dating of the documents. In both these respects it had points of contact with dissentient critics (e.g. Delitzsch, Dillmann, Baudissin, Kittel, Strack, Van Hoonacker), who sought to save for conservatism any spars they could from the general wreckage. The former school of thought was most prominently represented by the late W. H. Green, and J. H. Raven's OT Intro may be regarded as a typical modern presentation of their view; the latter esp. by Robertson and Orr. The scheme put forward by the last named has found many adherents. He refuses to regard J and E as two separate documents, holding that we should rather think (as in the case of the || Pss) of two recensions of one document marked by the use of different Divine appellations. The critical P he treats as the work of a supplementer, and thinks it never had an independent existence, while he considers the whole Pent as early. He holds that the work was done by "original composers, working with a common aim, and toward a common end, in contrast with the idea of late irresponsible redactors, combining, altering, manipulating, enlarging at pleasure" (POT, 375).

While these were the views held among OT critics, a separate opposition had been growing up among archaeologists. This was of course utilized to the utmost by the conservatives of both wings. In some ways archaeology undoubtedly has confirmed the traditional view as against the critical (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND CRITICISM); but a candid survey leads to the belief that it has not yet dealt a mortal blow, and here again it must be remembered that the critics may justly plead that they must not be judged on mistakes that they made in their earlier investigations or on refutations of the more uncertain portions of their theory, but rather on the main completed result. It may indeed be said with confidence that there are certain topics to which archaeology can never supply any conclusive answer. If it be the case that the Pent contains hopelessly contradictory laws, no archaeological discovery can make them anything else; if the numbers of the Israelites are original and impossible, archaeology cannot make them possible. It is fair and right to lay stress on the instances in which archaeology has confirmed the Bible as against the critics; it is neither fair nor right to speak as if archaeology had done what it never purported to do and never could effect.

The year 1908 saw the beginning of a new critical development which makes it very difficult to speak positively of modern critical views. Kuenen has been mentioned as one of the ablest and most eminent of those who brought the Graf-Wellhausen theory into prominence. In that year B. D. Eerdmans, his pupil and successor at Leyden, began the publication of a series of OT studies in which he renounces his allegiance to the line of critics that had extended from Astruc to the publications of our own day, and entered on a series of investigations that were intended to set forth a new critical view. As his labors are not yet complete, it is impossible to present any account of his scheme; but the volumes already published justify certain remarks. Eerdmans has perhaps not converted any member of the Wellhausen school, but he has made many realize that their own scheme is not the only one possible. Thus while a few years ago we were constantly assured that the "main results" of OT criticism were unalterably settled, recent writers adopt a very different tone: e.g. Sellin (1910) says, "We stand in a time of fermentation and transition, and in what follows we present our own opinion merely as the hypothesis which appears to us to be the best founded" (Einleitung, 18). By general consent Eerdmans' work contains a number of isolated shrewd remarks to which criticism will have to attend in the future; but it also contains many observations that are demonstrably unsound (for examples see BS, 1909, 744-48; 1910, 549-51). His own reconstruction is in many respects so faulty and blurred that it does not seem likely that it will ever secure a large following in its present form. On the other hand he appears to have succeeded in inducing a large number of students in various parts of the world to think along new lines and in this way may exercise a very potent influence on the future course of OT study. His arguments show increasingly numerous signs of his having been influenced by the publications of conservative writers, and it seems certain that criticism will ultimately be driven to recognize the essential soundness of the conservative position. In 1912 Dahse (TMH, I) began the publication of a series of volumes attacking the Wellhausen school on textual grounds and propounding a new pericope hypothesis. In his view many phenomena are due to the influence of the pericopes of the synagogue service or the form of the text and not to the causes generally assigned.

The examination of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must now be undertaken, and attention must first be directed to the evidence which is adduced in its support. Why should it be held that the Pent is composed mainly of excerpts from certain documents designated as J and E and P and D? Why is it believed that these documents are of very late date, in one case subsequent to the exile?

(1) Astruc's clue.—It has been said above that Astruc propounded the use of the Divine appellations in Gen as a clue to the dissection of that book. This is based on Ex 6 3, "And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, as 'El Shaddai' [God Almighty]; but by my name YHWH I was not known to them." In numerous passages of Gen this name is represented as known, e.g. 4 26, where we read of men beginning to call on it in the days of Enosh. The discrepancy here is very obvious, and in the view of the Astruc school can be satisfactorily removed by postulating different sources. This clue, of course, fails after Ex 6 3, but other difficulties are found, and moreover the sources already distinguished in Gen are, it is claimed, marked by separate styles and other characteristics which enable them to be identified when they occur in the narrative of the later books (see CRITICISM OF THE BIBLE).

(2) Signs of post-Mosaic date.—Close inspection of the Pent shows that it contains a number of passages which, it is alleged, could not have proceeded from the pen of Moses in their present form. Probably the most familiar instance is the account of the death of Moses (Dt 34). Other examples are to be found in seeming allusions to post-Mosaic events, e.g. in Gen 22 we hear of the Mount of the Lord in the land of Moriah; this apparently refers to the Temple Hill, which, however, would not have been so designated before Solomon. So too the list of kings who reigned over Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (36 31) presumes the existence of the monarchy. The Canaanites who are referred to as being "then in the land" (Gen 12 6; 13 7) did not disappear till the time of Solomon, and, accordingly, if this expression means "then still" it cannot antedate his reign. Dt 3 11 (Og's bedstead) comes unnaturally from one who had vanquished Og but a few weeks previously, while Nu 21 14 (AV) contains a reference to "the book of the Wars of the Lord" which would hardly have been quoted in this way by a contemporary. Ex 16 35 refers to the cessation of the manna after the death of Moses. These passages, and more like them, are cited to disprove Mosaic authorship; but the main weight of the critical argument does not rest on them.

(3) Narrative discrepancies.—While the Divine appellations form the starting-point, they do not even in Gen constitute the sole test of different documents. On the contrary, there are other narrative discrepancies, antinomies, differences of style, duplicate narratives, etc., adduced to support the critical theory. We must now glance at some of these.

In Gen 21 14 f Ishmael is a boy who can be carried on his mother's shoulder, but from a comparison of 16 3.16; 17, it appears that he must have been 14 when Isaac was born, and, since weaning sometimes occurs at the age of 3 in the East, may have been even as old as 17 when this incident happened. Again, "We all remember the scene (Gen 27) in which Isaac in extreme old age blesses his sons; we picture him as lying on his deathbed. Do we, however, all realize that according to the chronology of the Book of Gen he must have been thus lying on his deathbed for eighty years (cf 25 26; 26 34; 35 28)? Yet we can only diminish this period by extending proportionately the interval between Esau marrying his Hittite wives (26 34) and Rebekah's suggestion to Isaac to send Jacob away, lest he should follow his brother's example (27 46); which, from the nature of the case, will not admit of any but slight extension. Keil, however, does so extend it, reducing the period of Isaac's final illness by 43 years, and is conscious of no incongruity in supposing that Rebekah, 30 years after Esau had taken his Hittite wives, should express her fear that Jacob, then aged 77, will do the same" (Driver, Contemporary Review, LVII, 221).

An important instance occurs in Nu. According to 33 38, Aaron died on the 1st day of the 5th month. From Dt 1 3 it appears that 6 months later Moses delivered his speech in the plains of Moab. Into those 6 months are compressed one month's mourning for Aaron, the Arad campaign, the wandering round by the Red Sea, the campaigns against Sihon and Og, the missions to Balaam and the whole episode of his prophecies, the painful occurrences of Nu 25, the second census, the appointment of Joshua, the expedition against Midian, besides other events. It is clearly impossible to fit all these into the time.

Other discrepancies are of the most formidable character. Aaron dies now at Mt. Hor (Nu 20 28; 33 38), now at Moserah (Dt 10 6). According to Dt 1; 2 1.14, the children of Israel left Kadesh-barnea in the 3d year and never subsequently returned to it, while in Nu they apparently remain there till the journey to Mt. Hor, where Aaron dies in the 40th year. The Tent of Meeting perhaps provides some of the most perplexing of the discrepancies, for while according to the well-known scheme of Ex 25 ff and many other passages, it was a large and heavy erection standing in the midst of the camp, Ex 33 7-11 provides us with another Tent of Meeting that stood outside the camp at a distance and could be carried by Moses alone. The vbs. used are frequentative, denoting a regular practice, and it is impossible to suppose that after receiving the commands for the Tent of Meeting Moses could have instituted a quite different tent of the same name. Joseph again is sold, now by Ishmaelites (Gen 37 27.28b; 39 1), anon by Midianites (37 28a.36). Sometimes he is imprisoned in one place, sometimes apparently in another. The story of Korah, Dathan and Abiram in Nu 16 is equally full of difficulty. The enormous numbers of the Israelites given in Nu 1-4, etc. are in conflict with passages that regard them as very few.

(4) Doublets.—Another portion of the critical argument is provided by doublets or duplicate narratives of the same event, e.g. Gen 16 and 21. These are particularly numerous in Gen, but are not confined to that book. "Twice do quails appear in connection with the daily manna (Nu 11 4-6.31 ff; Ex 16 13). Twice does Moses draw water from the rock, when the strife of Israel begets the name Meribah ('strife') (Ex 17 1-7; Nu 20 1-13)" (Carpenter, Hexateuch, I, 30).

(5) The laws.—Most stress is laid on the argument from the laws and their supposed historical setting. By far the most important portions of this are examined in SANCTUARY and PRIESTS (q.v.). These subjects form the two main pillars of the Graf-Wellhausen theory, and accordingly the arts. in question must be read as supplementing the present article. An illustration may be taken from the slavery laws. It is claimed that Ex 21 1-6; Dt 15 12 ff permit a Hebrew to contract for life slavery after 6 years' service, but that Lev 25 39-42 takes no notice of this law and enacts the totally different provision that Hebrews may remain in slavery only till the Year of Jubilee. While these different enactments might proceed from the same hand if properly coördinated, it is contended that this is not the case and that the legislator in Lev ignores the legislator in Ex and is in turn ignored by the legislator in Dt, who only knows the law of Ex.

(6) The argument from style.—The argument from style is less easy to exemplify shortly, since it depends so largely on an immense mass of details. It is said that each of the sources has certain characteristic phrases which either occur nowhere else or only with very much less frequency. For instance in Gen 1, where Ēlōhīm is used throughout, we find the word "create," but this is not employed in 2 4b ff, where the Tetragrammaton occurs. Hence it is argued that this word is peculiarly characteristic of P as contrasted with the other documents, and may be used to prove his presence in e.g. 5 1 f.

(7) Props of the development hypothesis.—While the main supports of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must be sought in the arts. to which reference has been made, it is necessary to mention briefly some other phenomena to which some weight is attached. Jer displays many close resemblances to Dt, and the framework of K is written in a style that has marked similarities to the same book. Ezk again has notable points of contact with P and esp. with H; either he was acquainted with these portions of the Pent or else he must have exercised considerable influence on those who composed them. Lastly the Chronicler is obviously acquainted with the completed Pent. Accordingly, it is claimed that the literature provides a sort of external standard that confirms the historical stages which the different Pentateuchal sources are said to mark. Dt influences Jer and the subsequent literature. It is argued that it would equally have influenced the earlier books, had it then existed. So too the completed Pent should have influenced K as it did Ch, if it had been in existence when the earlier history was composed.

(1) The veto of textual criticism.—The first great objection that may be made to the higher criticism is that it starts from the Massoretic text (MT) without investigation. This to the is not the only text that has come down Critical to us, and in some instances it can be Analysis shown that alternative readings that have been preserved are superior to those of the MT. A convincing example occurs in Ex 18. According to the Heb, Jethro comes to Moses and says "I, thy father-in-law . . . am come," and subsequently Moses goes out to meet his father-in-law. The critics here postulate different sources, but some of the best authorities have preserved a reading which (allowing for ancient differences of orthography) supposes an alteration of a single letter. According to this reading the text told how one (or they) came to Moses and said "Behold thy father-in-law . . . is come." As the result of this Moses went out and met Jethro. The vast improvement in the sense is self-evident. But in weighing the change other considerations must be borne in mind. Since this is the reading of some of the most ancient authorities, only two views are possible. Either the MT has undergone a corruption of a single letter, or else a redactor made a most improbable cento of two documents which gave a narrative of the most doubtful sense. Fortunately this was followed by textual corruption of so happy a character as to remove the difficulty by the change of a single letter; and this corruption was so widespread that it was accepted as the genuine text by some of our best authorities. There can be little doubt which of these two cases is the more credible, and with the recognition of the textual solution the particular bit of the analysis that depends on this corruption falls to the ground. This instance illustrates one branch of textual criticism; there are others. Sometimes the narrative shows with certainty that in the transmission of the text transpositions have taken place; e.g. the identification of Kadesh shows that it was S. of Hormah. Consequently a march to compass Edom by way of the Red Sea would not bring the Israelites to Hormah. Here there is no reason to doubt that the events narrated are historically true, but there is grave reason to doubt that they happened in the present order of the narrative. Further, Dt gives an account that is parallel to certain passages of Nu; and it confirms those passages, but places the events in a different order. Such difficulties may often be solved by simple transpositions, and when transpositions in the text of Nu are made under the guidance of Dt they have a very different probability from guesses that enjoy no such sanction. Another department of textual criticism deals with the removal of glosses, i.e. notes that have crept into the text. Here the ancient VSS often help us, one or other omitting some words which may be proved from other sources to be a later addition. Thus in Ex 17 7 the Vulg did not know the expression, "and Meribah" (one word in Heb), and calls the place "Massah" simply. This is confirmed by the fact that Dt habitually calls the place Massah (6 16; 9 22; 33 8). The true Meribah was Kadesh (Nu 20) and a glossator has here added this by mistake (see further [4] below). Thus we can say that a scientific textual criticism often opposes a real veto to the higher critical analysis by showing that the arguments rest on late corruptions and by explaining the true origin of the difficulties on which the critics rely.

(2) Astruc's clue tested.—Astruc's clue must next be examined. The critical case breaks down with extraordinary frequency. No clean division can be effected, i.e. there are cases where the MT of Gen makes P or E use the Tetragrammaton or J 'Ēlōhīm. In some of these cases the critics can suggest no reason; in others they are compelled to assume that the MT is corrupt for no better reason than that it is in conflict with their theory. Again the exigencies of the theory frequently force the analyst to sunder verses or phrases that cannot be understood apart from their present contexts, e.g. in Gen 28 21 Carpenter assigns the words "and Jeh will be my God" to J while giving the beginning and end of the verse to E; in ch 31, ver 3 goes to a redactor, though E actually refers to the statement of ver 3 in ver 5; in ch 32, ver 30 is torn from a J-context and given to E, thus leaving ver 31 (J) unintelligible. When textual criticism is applied, startling facts that entirely shatter the higher critical argument are suddenly revealed. The variants to the Divine appellations in Gen are very numerous, and in some instances the new readings are clearly superior to the MT, even when they substitute 'Ēlōhīm for the Tetragrammaton. Thus, in 16 11, the explanation of the name Ishmael requires the word 'Ēlōhīm, as the name would otherwise have been Ishmayah, and one Heb MS, a recension of the LXX and the Old Lat do in fact preserve the reading 'Ēlōhīm. The full facts and arguments cannot be given here, but Professor Schlögl has made an exhaustive examination of the various texts from Gen 1 1 to Ex 3 12. Out of a total of 347 occurrences of one or both words in the MT of that passage, there are variants in 196 instances. A very important and detailed discussion, too long to be summarized here, will now be found in TMH, I. Wellhausen himself has admitted that the textual evidence constitutes a sore point of the documentary theory (Expos T, XX, 563). Again in Ex 6 3, many of the best authorities read "I was not made known" instead of "I was not known"—a difference of a single letter in Heb. But if this be right, there is comparative evidence to suggest that to the early mind a revelation of his name by a deity meant a great deal more than a mere knowledge of the name, and involved rather a pledge of his power. Lastly the analysis may be tested in yet another way by inquiring whether it fits in with the other data, and when it is discovered (see below 4, [1]) that it involves ascribing, e.g. a passage that cannot be later than the time of Abraham to the period of the kingdom, it becomes certain that the clue and the method are alike misleading (see further EPC, ch i; Expos T, XX, 378 f, 473–75, 563; TMH, I; PS, 49–142; BS, 1913, 145–74; A. Troelstra, The Name of God, NKZ, XXIV [1913], 119–48; Expos, 1913).

(3) Narrative discrepancies and signs of post-Mosaic date.—Septuagintal MSS are providing very illuminating material for dealing with the chronological difficulties. It is well known that the LXX became corrupt and passed through various recensions (see SEPTUAGINT). The original text has not yet been reconstructed, but as the result of the great variety of recensions it happens that our various MSS present a wealth of alternative readings. Some of these show an intrinsic superiority to the corresponding readings of the MT. Take the case of Ishmael's age. We have seen (above, 2, [3]) that although in Gen 21 14 f he is a boy who can be carried by his mother even after the weaning of Isaac, his father, according to 16 3.16, was 86 years old at the time of his birth, and, according to ch

17, 100 years old when Isaac was born. In 17 25 we find that Ishmael is already 13 a year before Isaac's birth. Now we are familiar with marginal notes that set forth a system of chronology in many printed Eng. Bibles. In this case the Septuagintal variants suggest that something similar is responsible for the difficulty of our Heb. Two MSS, apparently representing a recension, omit the words, "after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan" in 16 3, and again, ver 16, while in 17 25 there is a variant making Ishmael only 3 years old. If these readings are correct it is easy to see how the difficulty arose. The narrative originally contained mere round numbers, like 100 years old, and these were not intended to be taken literally. A commentator constructed a scheme of chronology which was embodied in marginal notes. Then these crept into the text and such numbers as were in conflict with them were thought to be corrupt and underwent alteration. Thus the 3-year-old Ishmael became 13.

The same MSS that present us with the variants in Gen 16 have also preserved a suggestive reading in 35 28, one of the passages that are responsible for the inference that according to the text of Gen Isaac lay on his deathbed for 80 years (see above, 2, [3]). According to this Isaac was not 180, but 150 years old when he died. It is easy to see that this is a round number, not to be taken literally, but this is not the only source of the difficulty. In 27 41, Esau, according to EV, states "The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob." This is a perfectly possible rendering of the Heb, but the LXX tr^d the text differently, and its rendering, while grammatically correct, has the double advantage of avoiding Isaac's long lingering on a deathbed and of presenting Esau's hatred and ferocity far more vividly. It renders, "May the days of mourning for my father approach that I may slay my brother Jacob." Subsequent translators preferred the milder version, but doubtless the LXX has truly apprehended the real sense of the narrative. If we read the ch with this modification, we see Isaac as an old man, not knowing when he may die, performing the equivalent of making his will. It puts no strain on our credulity to suppose that he may have lived 20 or 30 years longer. Such episodes occur constantly in everyday experience. As to the calculations based on 25 26 and 26 34, the numbers used are 60 and 40, which, as is well known, were frequently employed by the ancient Hebrews, not as mathematical expressions, but simply to denote unknown or unspecified periods. See NUMBER.

The other chronological difficulty cited above (viz. that there is not room between the date of Aaron's death and the address by Moses in the plains of Moab for all the events assigned to this period by Nu) is met partly by a reading preserved by the Pesh and partly by a series of transpositions. In Nu 33 38 Pesh reads "first" for "fifth" as the month of Aaron's death, thus recognizing a longer period for the subsequent events. The transpositions, however, which are largely due to the evidence of Dt, solve the most formidable and varied difficulties; e.g. a southerly march from Kadesh no longer conducts the Israelites to Arad in the north, the name Hormah is no longer used (Nu 14 45) before it is explained (21 3), there is no longer an account directly contradicting Dt and making the Israelites spend 38 years at Kadesh immediately after receiving a Divine command to turn "tomorrow" (Nu 14 25). A full discussion is impossible here and will be found in EPC, 114–38. The order of the narrative that emerges as probably original is as follows: Nu 12; 20 1.14–21; 21 1–3; 13; 14; 16–18; 20 2–13.22a; 21 4b–9, then some missing vs, bringing the Israelites to the head of the Gulf of Akabah and narrating the turn northward from Elath and Ezion-geber, then 20 22b-29; 21 4a, and some lost words telling of the arrival at the station before Obotoh. In Nu 33, ver 40 is a gloss that is missing in Lagarde's LXX, and vs 36b-37a should probably come earlier in the chapter than they do at present.

Another example of transposition is afforded by Ex 33 7-11, the passage relating to the Tent of Meeting which is at present out of place (see above 2, [3]). It is supposed that this is E's idea of the Tabernacle, but that, unlike P, he places it outside the camp and makes Joshua its priest. This latter view is discussed and refuted in PRIESTS, 3, where it is shown that Ex 33 7 should be rendered "And Moses used to take a [or, the] tent and pitch it for himself," etc. As to the theory that this is E's account of the Tabernacle, Ex 13 has been overlooked. This chapter belongs to the same E but refers to the end of the period spent at Horeb, i.e. it is later than 33 7-11. In vs 13-16 we find Moses sitting with all the people standing about him because they came to inquire of God; i.e. the business which according to ch 33 was transacted in solitude outside the camp was performed within the camp in the midst of the people at a later period. This agrees with P, e.g. Nu 27. If now we look at the other available clues, it appears that 33 11 seems to introduce Joshua for the first time. The passage should therefore precede 17 8-15; 24 13; 32 17, where he is already known. Again, if Ex 18 refers to the closing scenes at Horeb (as it clearly does), Ex 24 14 providing for the temporary transaction of judicial business reads very strangely. It ought to be preceded by some statement of the ordinary course in normal times when Moses was not absent from the camp. Ex 33 7 ff provides such a statement. The only earlier place to which it can be assigned is after 13 22, but there it fits the context marvelously, for the statements as to the pillar of cloud in 33 9 f attach naturally to those in 13 21 f. With this change all the difficulties disappear. Immediately after leaving Egypt Moses began the practice of carrying a tent outside the camp and trying cases there. This lasted till the construction of the Tabernacle. "And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee" (Ex 25 22). After its erection the earlier tent was disused, and the court sat at the door of the Tabernacle in the center of the camp (see, further, EPC, 93-102, 106 f).

Some other points must be indicated more briefly. In Nu 16 important Septuagintal variants remove the main difficulties by substituting "company of Korah" for "dwelling of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram" in two vs (see EPC, 143-46). Similarly in the Joseph-story the perplexities have arisen through corruptions of verses which may still be corrected by the versional evidence (PS, 29-48). There is evidence to show that the numbers of the Israelites are probably due to textual corruption (EPC, 155-69). Further, there are numerous passages where careful examination has led critics themselves to hold that particular verses are later notes. In this way they dispose of Dt 10 6 f (Aaron's death, etc), the references to the Israelitish kingdom (Gen 36 31) and the Canaanites as being "then" in the land (12 6; 13 7), the bedstead of Og (Dt 3 11) and other passages. In Gen 22, "the land of Moriah" is unknown to the VSS which present the most diverse readings, of which "the land of the Amorite" is perhaps the most probable; while in ver 14 the LXX, reading the same Hebrew consonants as MT, translates "In the Mount the Lord was seen." This probably refers to a view that God manifested Himself esp. in the mountains (cf 1 K 20 23.28) and has no reference whatever to the Temple Hill. The Massoretic pointing is presumably due to a desire to avoid what seemed to be an anthropomorphism (see further PS, 19-21). Again, in Nu 21 14, the LXX knows nothing of "a book of the Wars of Jeh" (see Field, Hexapla, ad loc.). It is difficult to tell what the original reading was, esp. as the succeeding words are corrupt in the Heb, but it appears that no genitive followed "wars" and it is doubtful if there was any reference to a "book of wars."

(4) The argument from the doublets examined.—The foregoing sections show that the documentary theory often depends on phenomena that were absent from the original Pent. We are now to examine arguments that rest on other foundations. The doublets have been cited, but when we examine the instances more carefully, some curious facts emerge. Gen 16 and 21 are, to all appearance, narratives of different events; so are Ex 17 1-7 and Nu 20 1-13 (the drawing of water from rocks). In the latter case the critics after rejecting this divide the passages into 5 different stories, two going to J, two to E and one to P. If the latter also had a Rephidim-narrative (cf Nu 33 14 P), there were 6 tales. In any case both J and E tell two stories each. It is impossible to assign any cogency to the argument that the author of the Pent could not have told two such narratives, if not merely the redactor of the Pent but also J and E could do so. The facts as to the manna stories are similar. As to the flights of quails, it is known that these do in fact occur every year, and the Pent places them at almost exactly a year's interval (see EPC, 104 f, 109 f).

(5) The critical argument from the laws.—The legal arguments are due to a variety of misconceptions, the washing out of the historical background and the state of the text. Reference must be made to the separate articles (esp. SANCTUARY; PRIESTS). As the slave laws were cited, it may be explained that in ancient Israel as in other communities slavery could arise or slaves be acquired in many ways: e.g. birth, purchase (Gen 14 14; 17 12, etc), gift (20 14), capture in war (14 21; 34 29), kidnapping (Joseph). The law of Ex and Dt applies only to Heb slaves acquired by purchase, not to slaves acquired in any other way, and least of all to those who in the eye of the law were not true slaves. Lev 25 has nothing to do with Heb slaves. It is concerned merely with free Israelites who become insolvent. "If thy brother be waxed poor with thee, and sell himself" it begins (ver 39). Nobody who was already a slave could wax poor and sell himself. The law then provides that these insolvent freemen were not to be treated as slaves. In fact, they were a class of free bondmen, i.e. they were full citizens who were compelled to perform certain duties. A similar class of free bondmen existed in ancient Rome and were called nexi. The Egyptians who sold themselves to Pharaoh and became serfs afford another though less apt parallel. In all ancient societies insolvency led to some limitations of freedom, but while in some full slavery ensued, in others a sharp distinction was drawn between the slave and the insolvent freeman (see further SBL, 5-11).

(6) The argument from style.—Just as this argument is too detailed to be set out in a work like the present, so the answer cannot be given with any degree of fulness. It may be said generally that the argument too frequently neglects differences of subject-matter and other sufficient reasons (such as considerations of euphony and slight variations of meaning) which often provide far more natural reasons for the phenomena observed. Again, the VSS suggest that the Bib. text has been heavily glossed. Thus in many passages where the frequent recurrence of certain words and phrases is supposed to attest the presence of P, versional evidence seems to show that the expressions in question have been introduced by glossators, and when they are removed the narrative remains unaffected in meaning, but terser and more vigorous and greatly improved as a vehicle of expression. To take a simple instance in Gen 23 1, "And the life of Sarah was a hundred and seven and twenty years: . . . the years of the life of Sarah," the italicized words were missing in the LXX. When they are removed the meaning is unaltered, but the form of expression is far superior. They are obviously a mere marginal note. Again the critical method is perpetually breaking down. It constantly occurs that redactors have to be called in to remove from a passage attributed to some source expressions that are supposed to be characteristic of another source, and this is habitually done on no other ground than that the theory requires it. One instance must be given. It is claimed that the word "create" is a P-word. It occurs several times in Gen 1 1—2 4a and 3 t in Gen 5 1,2, but in 6 7 it is found in a J-passage, and some critics therefore assign it to a redactor. Yet J undoubtedly uses the word in Nu 16 30 and D in Dt 4 32. On the other hand, P does not use the word exclusively, even in Gen 1 1—2 4, the word "make" being employed in 1 7. 25.26.31; 2 2, while in 2 3 both words are combined. Yet all these passages are given unhesitatingly to P.

(7) Perplexities of the theory.—The perplexities of the critical hypothesis are very striking, but a detailed discussion is impossible here. Much material will, however, be found in POT and Eerd. St. A few general statements may be made. The critical analysis repeatedly divides a straightforward narrative into two sets of fragments, neither of which will make sense without the other. A man will go to sleep in one document and wake in another, or a subject will belong to one source and the predicate to another. No intelligible account can be given of the proceedings of the redactors who at one moment slavishly preserve their sources and at another cut them about without any necessity, who now rewrite their material and now leave it untouched. Even in the ranks of the Wellhausen critics chapters will be assigned by one writer to the post-exilic period and by another to the earliest sources (e.g. Gen 14, pre-Mosaic in the main according to Sellin [1910], post-exilic according to others), and the advent of Eerdmans and Dahse has greatly increased the perplexity. Clue after clue, both stylistic and material, is put forward, to be abandoned silently at some later stage. Circular arguments are extremely common: it is first alleged that some phenomenon is characteristic of a particular source; then passages are referred to that source for no other reason than the presence of that phenomenon; lastly these passages are cited to prove that the phenomenon in question distinguishes the source. Again the theory is compelled to feed on itself; for J, E, P, etc, we have schools of J's, E's, etc, subsisting side by side for centuries, using the same material, employing the same ideas, yet remaining separate in minute stylistic points. This becomes impossible when viewed in the light of the evidences of pre-Mosaic date in parts of Gen (see below 4, [1] to [3]).

(8) Signs of unity.—It is often possible to produce very convincing internal evidence of the unity of what the critics sunder. A strong instance of this is to be found when one considers the characters portrayed. The character of Abraham or Laban, Jacob or Moses is essentially unitary. There is but one Abraham, and this would not be so if we really had a cento of different documents representing the results of the labor of various schools during different centuries. Again, there are sometimes literary marks of unity, e.g. in Nu 16, the effect of rising anger is given to the dialogue by the repetition of "Ye take too much upon you" (vs 3,7), followed by the repetition of "Is it a small thing that" (vs 9.13). This must be the work of a single literary artist (see further SBL, 37 f).

(9) Supposed props of the development hypothesis.—When we turn to the supposed props of the development hypothesis we see that there is nothing conclusive in the critical argument. Jer and the subsequent lit. certainly exhibit the influence of Dt, but a Book of the Law was admittedly found in Josiah's reign and had lain unread for at any rate some considerable time. Some of its requirements had been in actual operation, e.g. in Naboth's case, while others had become a dead letter. The circumstances of its discovery, the belief in its undoubted Mosaic authenticity and the subsequent course of history led to its greatly influencing contemporary and later writers, but that really proves nothing. Ezk again was steeped in priestly ideas, but it is shown in PRIESTS, 5b, how this may be explained. Lastly, Ch certainly knows the whole Pent, but as certainly misinterprets it (see PRIESTS). On the other hand the Pent itself always represents portions of the legislation as being intended to reach the people only through the priestly teaching, and this fully accounts for P's lack of influence on the earlier literature. As to the differences of style within the Pent itself, something is said in III, below. Hence this branch of the critical argument really proves nothing, for the phenomena are susceptible of more than one explanation.

(1) The narrative of Genesis.—Entirely different lines of argument are provided by the abundant internal evidences of date. In Gen 4. Evidence 10 19, we read the phrase "as thou goest toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboiim" in a definition of boundary. Such language could only have originated when the places named actually existed. One does not define boundaries by reference to towns that are purely mythical or have been overthrown many centuries previously. The consistent tradition is that these towns were destroyed in the lifetime of Abraham, and the passage therefore cannot be later than his age. But the critics assign it to a late stratum of J, i.e. to a period at least 1,000 years too late. This suggests several comments. First, it may reasonably be asked whether much reliance can be placed on a method which after a century and a half of the closest investigation does not permit its exponents to arrive at results that are correct to within 1,000 years. Secondly, it shows clearly that in the composition of the Pent very old materials were incorporated in their original language. Of the historical importance of this fact more will be said in IV; in this connection we must observe that it throws fresh light on expressions that point to the presence in Gen of sources composed in Pal, e.g. "the sea" for "the West" indicates the probability of a Palestinian source, but once it is proved that we have materials as old as the time of Abraham such expressions do not argue post-Mosaic, but rather pre-Mosaic authorship. Thirdly, the passage demolishes the theory of schools of J's, etc. It cannot seriously be maintained that there was a school of J's writing a particular style marked by the most delicate and subjective criteria subsisting continuously for some 10 or 12 centuries from the time of Abraham onward, side by side with other writers with whom its members never exchanged terms of even such common occurrence as "hand-maid."

Gen 10 19 is not the only passage of this kind.

In 2 14 we read of the Hiddekel (Tigris) as flowing E. of Aššur, though there is an alternative reading "in front of." If the tr "east" be correct, the passage must antedate the 13th cent. BC, for Aššur, the ancient capital, which was on the west bank of the Tigris, was abandoned at about that date for Kalkhi on the E.

(2) Archaeology and Genesis.—Closely connected with the foregoing are cases where Gen has preserved information that is true of a very early time only. Thus in 10 22 Elam figures as a son of Shem. The historical Elam was, however, an Aryan people. Recently inscriptions have been discovered which show that in very early times Elam really was inhabited by Semites. "The fact," writes Driver, ad loc., "is not one which the writer of this verse is likely to have known." This contention falls to the ground when we find that only three verses off we have material that goes back at least as far as the time of Abraham. After all, the presumption is that the writer stated the fact because he knew it, not in spite of his not knowing it; and that knowledge must be due to the same cause as the noteworthy language of ver 19, i.e. to early date.

This is merely one example of the confirmations of little touches in Gen that are constantly being provided by archaeology. For the detailed facts see the separate arts., e.g. AMRAPHEL; JERUSALEM, and cf IV, below.

From the point of view of the critical question we note (a) that such accuracy is a natural mark of authentic early documents, and (b) that in view of the arguments already adduced and of the legal evidence to be considered, the most reasonable explanation is to be found in a theory of contemporary authorship.

(3) The legal evidence of Genesis.—The legal evidence is perhaps more convincing, for here no theory of late authorship can be devised to evade the natural inference. Correct information as to early names, geography, etc., might be the result of researches by an exilic writer in a Bab library; but early customs that are confirmed by the universal experience of primitive societies, and that point to a stage of development which had long been passed in the Babylonia even of Abraham's day, can be due to but one cause—genuine early sources. The narratives of Gen are certainly not the work of comparative sociologists. Two instances may be cited. The law of homicide shows us two stages that are known to be earlier than the stage attested by Ex 21 12 ff. In the story of Cain we have one stage; in Gen 9 6, which does not yet recognize any distinction between murder and other forms of homicide, we have the other.

Our other example shall be the unlimited power of life and death possessed by the head of the family (38 24; 42 37, etc.), which has not yet been limited in any way by the jurisdiction of the courts as in Ex-Dt. In both cases comparative historical jurisprudence confirms the Bible account against the critical, which would make e.g. Gen 9 6 post-exilic, while assigning Ex 21 to a much earlier period. (On the whole subject see further OP, 135 ff.)

(4) The professedly Mosaic character of the legislation.—Coming now to the four concluding books of the Pent, we must first observe that the legislation everywhere professes to be Mosaic. Perhaps this is not always fully realized. In critical editions of the text the rubrics and an occasional phrase are sometimes assigned to redactors, but the representation of Mosaic date is far too closely interwoven with the matter to be removed by such devices. If e.g. we take such a section as Dt 12, we shall find it full of such phrases as "for ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance," etc; "when ye go over Jordan," "the place which the Lord shall choose" (AV), etc. It is important to bear this in mind throughout the succeeding discussion.

(5) The historical situation required by P.—What do we find if we ignore the Mosaic dress and seek to fit P into any other set of conditions, particularly those of the post-exilic period? The general historical situation gives a clear answer. The Israelites are represented as being so closely concentrated that they will always be able to keep the three pilgrimage festivals. One exception only is contemplated, viz. that ritual uncleanness or a journey may prevent an Israelite from keeping the Passover. Note that in that case he is most certainly to keep it one month later (Nu 9 10 f). How could this law have been enacted when the great majority of the people were in Babylonia, Egypt, etc., so that attendance at the temple was impossible for them on any occasion whatever? With this exception the entire PC always supposes that the whole people are at all times dwelling within easy reach of the religious center. How strongly this view is embedded in the code may be seen esp. from Lev 17, which provides that all domestic animals to be slaughtered for food must be brought to the door of the Tent of Meeting. Are we to suppose that somebody deliberately intended such legislation to apply when the Jews were scattered all over the civilized world, or even all over Canaan? If so, it means a total prohibition of animal food for all save the inhabitants of the capital.

In post-exilic days there was no more pressing danger for the religious leaders to combat than intermarriage, but this code, which is supposed to have been written for the express purpose of bringing about their action, goes out of its way to give a fictitious account of a war and incidentally to legalize some such unions (Nu 31 18). And this chapter also contains a law of booty. What could be more unsuitable? How and where were the Jews to make conquests and capture booty in the days of Ezra?

"Or again, pass to the last chapter of Nu and consider the historical setting. What is the complaint urged by the deputation that waits upon Moses? It is this: If heiresses 'be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be added to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they shall belong.' What a pressing grievance for a legislator to consider and redress when tribes and tribal lots had long since ceased to exist for ever!" (OP, 121 f).

Perhaps the most informing of all the discrepancies between P and the post-exilic age is one that explains the freedom of the earlier prophets from its literary influence. According to the constant testimony of the Pent, including P, portions of the law were to reach the people only through priestly teaching (Lev 10 11; Dt 24 8; 33 10, etc). Ezra on the other hand read portions of P to the whole people.

(6) The hierarchical organization in P.—Much of what falls under this head is treated in PRIESTS, 2, (a), (b), and need not be repeated here. The following may be added: "Urim and Thummim were not used after the Exile. In lieu of the simple conditions—a small number of priests and a body of Levites—we find a developed hierarchy, priests, Levites, singers, porters, Nethinim, sons of Solomon's servants. The code that ex hypothesi was forged to deal with this state of affairs has no acquaintance with them. The musical services of the temple are as much beyond its line of vision as the worship of the synagogue. Even such an organization as that betrayed by the reference in 1 S 2 36 to the appointment by the high priest to positions carrying pecuniary emoluments is far beyond the primitive simplicity of P" (OP, 122).

(7) The legal evidence of P.—As this subject is technical we can only indicate the line of reasoning. Legal rules may be such as to enable the historical inquirer to say definitely that they belong to an early stage of society. Thus if we find elementary rules relating to the inheritance of a farmer who dies without leaving sons, we know that they cannot be long subsequent to the introduction of individual property in land, unless of course the law has been deliberately altered. It is an everyday occurrence for men to die without leaving sons, and the question what is to happen to their land in such cases must from the nature of the case be raised and settled before very long. When therefore we find such rules in Nu 27, etc, we know that they are either very old or else represent a deliberate change in the law. The latter is really out of the question, and we are driven back to their antiquity (see further OP, 124 ff). Again in Nu 35 we find an elaborate struggle to express a general principle which shall distinguish between two kinds of homicide. The earlier law had regarded all homicide as on the same level (Gen 9). Now, the human mind only reaches general principles through concrete cases, and other ancient legislations (e.g. the Icelandic) bear witness to the primitive character of the rules of Nu. Thus an expert like Dareste can say confidently that such rules as these are extremely archaic (see further SBL and OP, passim).

(8) The evidence of D.—The following may be quoted: "Laws are never issued to regulate a state of things which has passed away ages before, and can by no possibility be revived. What are we to think, then, of a hypothesis which assigns the code of Dt to the reign of Josiah, or shortly before it, when its injunctions to exterminate the Canaanites (20 16-18) and the Amalekites (25 17-19), who had long since disappeared, would be as utterly out of date as a law in New Jersey at the present time offering a bounty for killing wolves and bears, or a royal proclamation in Great Britain ordering the expulsion of the Danes? A law contemplating foreign conquests (20 10-15) would have been absurd when the urgent question was whether Judah could maintain its own existence against the encroachments of Babylon and Egypt. A law discriminating against Ammon and Moab (23 3,4), in favor of Edom (vs 7,8), had its warrant in the Mosaic period, but not in the time of the later kings. Jeremiah discriminates precisely the other way, promising a future restoration to Moab (48 47) and Ammon (49 6), which he denies to Edom (49 17,18), who is also to Joel (3 19), Ob, and Isa (63 1-6), the representative foe of the people of God. . . . The allusions to Egypt imply familiarity with and recent residence in that land. . . . And how can a code belong to the time of Josiah, which, while it contemplates the possible selection of a king in the future (Dt 17 14 ff), nowhere implies an actual regal government, but vests the supreme central authority in a judge and the priesthood (17 8-12; 19 17); which lays special stress on the requirements that the king must be a native and not a foreigner (17 15), when the undisputed line of succession had for ages been fixed in the family of David, and that he must not 'cause the people to return to Egypt' (ver 16), as they seemed ready to do on every grievance in the days of Moses (Nu 14 4), but which no one ever dreamed of doing after they were fairly established in Canaan?" (Green, Moses and the Prophets, 63 f). This too may be supplemented by legal evidence (e.g. 22 26 testifies to the undeveloped intellectual condition of the people). Of JE it is unnecessary to speak, for Ex 21 f are now widely regarded as Mosaic in critical circles.

Wellhausen (*Prolegomena*⁶, 392, n.) now regards their main elements as pre-Mosaic Canaanitish law.

(9) Later allusions.—These are of two kinds. Sometimes we have references to the laws, in other cases we find evidence that they were in operation.

(a) By postulating redactors evidence can be banished from the Bib. text. Accordingly, reference will only be made to some passages where this procedure is not followed. Ezk 22 26 clearly knows of a law that dealt with the subjects of P, used its very language (cf Lev 10 10 f), and like P was to be taught to the people by the priests. Hos 4 6 also knows of some priestly teaching, which, however, is moral and may therefore be Lev 19; but in 8 11-13 he speaks of 10,000 written precepts, and here the context points to ritual. The number and the subject-matter of these precepts alike make it certain that he knew a bulky written law which was not merely identical with Ex 21-23, and this passage cannot be met by Wellhausen who resorts to the device of translating it with the omission of the important word "write." (b) Again, in dealing with institutions the references can often be evaded. It is possible to say, "Yes, this passage knows such and such a law, but this law does not really come into existence with D or P, but was an older law incorporated in these documents." That argument would apply, e.g. to the necessity for two witnesses in the case of Naboth. That is a law of D, but those who assign Dt to the reign of Josiah would assert that it is here merely incorporating older material. Again the allusions sometimes show something that differs in some way from the Pent, and it is often impossible to prove that this was a development. The critics in such cases claim that it represents an earlier stage, and it frequently happens that the data are insufficient either to support or refute this view. "But fortunately there are in P certain institutions of which the critics definitely assert that they are late. Accordingly, references that prove the earlier existence of such institutions have a very different probative value. Thus it is alleged that before the exile there was but one national burnt offering and one national meal offering each day: whereas Nu 28 demands two. Now in 1 K 18 29,36, we find references to the offering of the evening oblation, but 2 K 3 20 speaks of 'the time of offering the oblation' in connection with the morning. Therefore these two oblations were actually in existence centuries before the date assigned to P—who, on the critical theory, first introduced them. So 2 K 16 15 speaks of 'the morning burnt-offering, and the evening meal-offering . . . with the burnt-offering of all the people of the land, and their meal-offering.' This again gives us the two burnt offerings, though, on the hypothesis, they were unknown to preëxilic custom. Similarly in other cases: Jer 32 shows us the land laws in actual operation; Ezekiel is familiar with the Jubilee laws—though, on the critical hypothesis, these did not yet exist. Jeroboam was acquainted with P's date for Tabernacles, though the critics allege that the date was first fixed in the Exile" (OP, 132 f).

(10) Other evidence.—We can only mention certain other branches of evidence. There is stylistic evidence of early date (see e.g. Lias, BS, 1910, 20-46, 299-334). Further, the minute accuracy of the narrative of Ex-Nu to local conditions, etc (noticed below, IV, 8, [6]), affords valuable testimony. It may be said generally that the whole work—laws and narrative—mirrors early conditions, whether we regard intellectual, economic or purely legal development (see further below, IV, and OP, passim).

(1) Moral and psychological issues.—The great fundamental improbabilities of the critical view have hitherto been kept out of sight in order that the arguments for and against the detailed case

5. Fundamental Improbabilities of the Critical Case might not be prejudiced by other considerations. We must now glance at some of the broader issues. The first probabilities that occurs is the moral and psychological incredibility. On theory two great frauds were perpetrated—in each case by men of the loftiest ethical principles. Dt was deliberately written in the form of Mosaic speeches by some person or persons who well knew that their work was not Mosaic. P is a make-up—nothing more. All its references to the wilderness, the camp, the Tent of Meeting, the approaching occupation of Canaan, etc., are so many touches introduced for the purpose of deceiving. There can be no talk of literary convention, for no such convention existed in Israel. The prophets all spoke in their own names, not in the dress of Moses. David introduced a new law of booty in his own name; the Chronicler repeatedly refers temple ordinances to David and Solomon; Samuel introduced a law of the kingdom in his own name. Yet we are asked to believe that these gigantic forgeries were perpetrated without reason or precedent. Is it credible? Consider the principles inculcated, e.g. the Deuteronomic denunciations of false prophets, the prohibition of adding aught to the law, the passionate injunctions to teach children. Can it be believed that men of such principles would have been guilty of such conduct? Nemo repente fit turpissimus, says the old maxim; can we suppose that the denunciations of those who prophesy falsely in the name of the Lord proceed from the pen of one who was himself forging in that name? Or can it be that the great majority of Bible readers know so little of truth when they meet it that they cannot detect the ring of unquestionable sincerity in the references of the Deuteronomist to the historical situation? Or can we really believe that documents that originated in such a fashion could have exercised the enormous force for righteousness in the world that these documents have exercised? Ex nihilo nihil. Are literary forgeries a suitable parentage for Gen 1 or Lev or Dt? Are the great monotheistic ethical religions of the world, with all they have meant, really rooted in nothing better than folly and fraud?

(2) The historical improbability.—A second fundamental consideration is the extraordinary historical improbability that these frauds could have been successfully perpetrated. The narrative in K undoubtedly relates the finding of what was regarded as an authentic work. King and people, priests and prophets must have been entirely deceived if the critical theory be true. It is surely possible that Huldah and Jeremiah were better judges than modern critics. Similarly in the case of P, if e.g. there had been no Levitical cities or no such laws as to tithes and firstlings as were here contemplated, but entirely different provisions on the subjects, how came the people to accept these forgeries so readily? (See further POT, 257 f, 294–97.) It is of course quite easy to carry this argument too far. It cannot be doubted that the exile had meant a considerable break in the historical continuity of the national development; but yet once the two views are understood the choice cannot be difficult. On the critical theory elaborate literary forgeries were accepted as genuine ancient laws; on the conservative theory laws were accepted because they were in fact genuine, and interpreted as far as possible to meet the entirely different requirements of the period. This explains both the action of the people and the divergence between pre-exilic and post-exilic practice. The laws were the same but the interpretation was different.

(3) Divergence between the laws and post-exilic practice.—Thirdly, the entire perversion of the true meaning of the laws in post-exilic times makes the critical theory incredible. Examples have been given (see above, 4, [5], [6], and PRIESTS, passim). It must now suffice to take just one instance to make the argument clear. We must suppose that the author of P deliberately provided that if Levites approached the altar both they and the priests should die (Nu 18 3), because he really desired that they should approach the altar and perform certain services there. We must further suppose that Ezra and the people on reading these provisions at once understood that the legislator meant the exact opposite of what he had said, and proceeded to act accordingly (1 Ch 23 31). This is only one little example. It is so throughout P. Everybody understands that the Tabernacle is really the second Temple and wilderness conditions post-exilic, and everybody acts accordingly. Can it be contended that this view is credible?

(4) The testimony of tradition.—Lastly the uniform testimony of tradition is in favor of Mosaic authenticity—the tradition of Jews, Samaritans and Christians alike. The national consciousness of a people, the convergent belief of Christendom for 18 centuries are not lightly to be put aside. And what is pitted against them? Theories that vary with each fresh exponent, and that take their start from textual corruption, develop through a confusion between an altar and a house, and end in misdating narratives and laws by 8 or 10 centuries! (see above 3 and 4; SANCTUARY; PRIESTS).

If anything at all emerges from the foregoing discussion, it is the impossibility of performing any such analytical feat as the critics

6. Origin and Transmission of the Pentateuch attempt. No critical microscope can possibly detect with any reasonable degree of certainty the joins of various sources, even if such sources really exist, and when we find that laws and narratives are constantly misdated by 8 or 10 centuries, we can only admit that no progress at all is possible along the lines that have been followed. On the other hand, certain reasonable results do appear to have been secured, and there are indications of the direction in which we must look for further light.

First, then, the Pent contains various notes by later hands. Sometimes the VSS enable us to detect and remove those notes, but many are pre-versional. Accordingly, it is often impossible to get beyond probable conjectures on which different minds may differ.

Secondly, Gen contains pre-Mosaic elements, but we cannot determine the scope of these or the number and character of the sources employed, or the extent of the author's work.

Thirdly, the whole body of the legislation is (subject only to textual criticism) Mosaic. But the laws of Dt carry with them their framework, the speeches which cannot be severed from them (see SBL, II). The speeches of Dt in turn carry with them large portions of the narrative of Ex–Nu which they presuppose. They do not necessarily carry with them such passages as Ex 35–39 or Nu 1–4, 7, 26, but Nu 1–4 contains internal evidence of Mosaic date.

At this point we turn to examine certain textual phenomena that throw light on our problem. It may be said that roughly there are two great classes of textual corruption—that which is due to the ordinary processes of copying, perishing, annotating, etc., and that which is due to a conscious and systematic effort to fix or edit a text. In the case of ancient authors, there comes a time sooner or later when scholarship, realizing the corruption that has taken place, makes a systematic attempt to produce, so far as possible, a correct standard text. Instances that will occur to many are to be found in the work of the Massoretes on the Heb text, that of Origen and others on the LXX, and that of the commission of Pelsistratos and subsequently of the Alexandrian critics on Homer. There is evidence that such revisions took place in the case of the Pent. A very important instance is to be found in the chronology of certain portions of Gen of which three different VSS survive, the Massoretic, Sam and Septuagintal. Another instance of even greater consequence for the matter in hand is to be found in Ex 35-39. It is well known that the LXX preserves an entirely different edition from that of MT (supported in the main by the Sam and other VSS). Some other examples have been noticed incidentally in the preceding discussion; one other that may be proved by further research to possess enormous importance may be mentioned. It appears that in the law of the kingdom (Dt 17) and some other passages where the Massoretic and Sam texts speak of a hereditary king, the LXX knew nothing of such a person (see further PS, 157-68). The superiority of the LXX text in this instance appears to be attested by 1 S., which is unacquainted with any law of the kingdom.

Thus we know of at least three recensions, the M, the Sam and the Sept. While there are many minor readings (in cases of variation through accidental corruption) in which the two last-named agree, it is nevertheless true that in a general way the Sam belongs to the same family as the M, while the LXX in the crucial matters represents a different textual tradition from the other two (see Expos., September 1911, 200-219). How is this to be explained? According to the worthless story preserved in the letter of Aristaeus the LXX was translated from MSS brought from Jerus at a date long subsequent to the Sam schism. The fact that the LXX preserves a recension so different from both Sam and MT (i.e. from the most authoritative Palestinian tradition of the 5th cent. BC and its lineal descendants) suggests that this part of the story must be rejected. If so, the LXX doubtless represents the text of the Pent prevalent in Egypt and descends from a Heb that separated from the ancestor of the M before the Sam schism. At this point we must recall the fact that in Jer the LXX differs from MT more widely than in any other Bib. book, and the current explanation is that the divergence goes back to the times of Jeremiah, his work having been preserved in two editions, an Egypt and a Bab. We may be sure that if the Jews of Egypt had an edition of Jer, they also had an edition of that law to which Jer refers, and it is probable that the main differences between LXX and MT (with its allies) are due to the two streams of tradition separating from the time of the exile—the Egypt and the Bab. The narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law in the days of Josiah (2 K 22), which probably refers to Dt only, suggests that its text at that time depended on the single MS found. The phenomena presented by Gen-Nu certainly suggest that they too were at one time dependent on a single damaged MS, and that conscious efforts were made to restore the original order—in some cases at any rate on a wrong principle (see esp. EPC, 114-38; BS, 1913, 270-90). In view of the great divergences of the LXX in Ex 35-39, it may be taken as certain that in some instances the editing went to considerable lengths.

Thus the history of the Pent, so far as it can be traced, is briefly as follows: The backbone of the book consists of pre-Mosaic sources in Gen, and Mosaic narratives, speeches and legislation in Ex-Dt. To this, notes, archaeological, historical, explanatory, etc. were added by successive readers. The text at one time depended on a single MS which was damaged, and one or more attempts were made to repair this damage by rearrangement of the material. It may be that some of the narrative chapters, such as Nu 1-4, 7, 26, were added from a separate source and amplified or rewritten in the course of some such redaction, but on this head nothing certain can be said. Within a period that is attested by the materials that survive, Ex 35-39 underwent one or more such redactions. Slighter redactions attested by Sam and LXX have affected the chronological data, the numbers of the Israelites and some references to post-Mosaic historical events. Further than this it is impossible to go on our present materials.

III. Some Literary Points.—No general estimate of the Pent as literature can or need be attempted. Probably most readers are fully sensible to its literary beauties. Anybody who is not would do well to compare the chapter on Joseph in the Koran (12) with the Bib. narrative. A few words must be said of some of the less obvious matters that would naturally fall into a literary discussion, the aim being rather to draw the reader's attention to points that he might overlook.

Of the style of the legislation no sufficient estimate can now be formed, for the first requisite of legal style is that it should be clear and unambiguous to contemporaries, and today no judgment can be offered on that head. There is, however, one feature that is of great interest even now, viz. the prevalence in the main of three different styles, each marked by its special adaptation to the end in view. These styles are

1. Style of Legislation (1) mnemonic, (2) oratorical, and (3) procedural. The first is familiar in other early legislations. It is lapidary, terse in the extreme, pregnant, and from time to time marked by a rhythm that must have assisted the retention in the memory. Occasionally we meet with parallelism. This is the style of Ex 21 ff and occasional later passages, such as the judgment in the case of Shelomith's son (Lev 24 10 ff). No doubt these laws were memorized by the elders.

Secondly, the legislation of Dt forms part of a speech and was intended for public reading. Accordingly, the laws here take on a distinctly oratorical style. Thirdly, the bulk of the rest of the legislation was intended to remain primarily in the custody of the priests who could certainly write (Nu 6 23). This was taken into account, and the style is not terse or oratorical, but reasonably full. It was probably very clear to those for whom the laws were meant. There are minor varieties of style but these are the most important. (On the whole subject see esp. PS, 170-224.)

What holds good of the laws is also true with certain modifications of the narrative. The style

2. The Narrative varies with the nature of the subject, occasion and purpose. Thus the itinerary in Nu 33 is intentionally composed in a style which undoubtedly possesses peculiar qualities when chanted to an appropriate tune. The census lists, etc. appear to be written in a formal official manner, and something similar is true of the lists of the spies in Nu 13. There is no ground for surprise in this. In the ancient world style varied according to the genre of the composition to a far greater extent than it does today.

A literary form that is peculiar to the Pent deserves special notice, viz. the covenant document as a form of literature. Many peoples

3. The Covenant have had laws that were attributed to some deity, but it is only here that laws are presented in the form of sworn agreements entered into with certain formalities between the nation and God. The literary result is that certain portions of the Pent are in the form of a sort of deed with properly articulated parts. This deed would have been ratified by oath if made between men, as was the covenant between Jacob and Laban, but in a covenant with God this is inapplicable, and the place of the jurat is in each case taken by a discourse setting forth the rewards and penalties attached by God to observance and breach of the covenant respectively. The covenant conception and the idea that the laws acquire force because they are terms in an agreement between God and people, and not merely because they were commanded by God, is one of extraordinary importance in the history of thought and in theology, but we must not through absorption in these aspects of the question fail to notice that the conception found expression in a literary form that is unknown elsewhere and that it provides the key to the comprehension of large sections of the Pent, including almost the whole of Dt (see in detail SBL, ch ii).

Insufficient attention has been paid to order and rhythm generally. Two great principles must be borne in mind: (1) in really good ancient prose the artist appeals to the ear in many subtle ways, and (2) in all such prose, emphasis and meaning as well as beauty are given to a great extent by the order of the words.

4. Order and Rhythm The figures of the old Gr rhetoricians play a considerable part. Thus the figure called kaklos, "the circle," is sometimes used with great skill. In this the clause or sentence begins and ends with the same word, which denotes alike the sound and the thought. Probably the most effective instance—heightened by the meaning, the shortness and the heavy boom of the word—is to be found in Dt 4 12, where there is an impressive "circle" with קול, kōl, "voice"—the emphasis conveyed by the sound being at least as marked as that conveyed by the sense. This is no isolated instance of the figure; cf e.g. in Nu 32 1, the "circle" with "cattle"; 14 2 that with "would that we had died." Chiasmus is a favorite figure, and assonances, plays on words, etc. are not uncommon. Such traits often add force as well as beauty to the narrative, as may be seen from instances like Gen 1 2: הוֹרֵי וְהוֹרֵי, tōhū wā-bhōhū, "waste and void"; 4 12: נָדָה, nā' wā-nādh, "a fugitive and a wanderer"; 9 6: שֹׁפֶהֶם דָּמָם בְּאֶדְמָתָם דָּמָם, shōphēkh dam hā-'ādham, bā-'ādham dāmō, yishshāphēkh, lit. "shedding blood of man, by-man his-blood shall-be-shed"; Nu 14 45: וַיַּכּוּם וַיִּכְחָדוּם, wayyakkūm wayyakkhūm, "and smote them and beat them down."

The prose of the Pent, except in its more formal and official parts, is closely allied to poetry (cf e.g. the Aeschylean "Sin coucheth at the door" [Gen 4 7]; "The fountains of the great deep [were] broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened" [7 11]; "how I bare you on eagles' wings" [Ex 19 4]). In the oratorical prose of Dt we find an imagery and a poetical imagination that are not common among great orators. Its rhythm is marked and the arrangement of the words is extraordinarily forcible, esp. in such a chapter as ch 28. It is difficult to convey any idea of how much the book loses in EV from the changes of order. Occasionally the rendering does observe the point of the original, e.g. in Dt 4 36: "Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice," and if we consider how strikingly this contrasts with the flat "He made thee to hear his voice out of heaven," some notion may perhaps be formed of the importance of retaining the order. More frequently however, the Eng. is false to the emphasis and spirit of the Heb. Sometimes, but not always, this is due to the exigencies of Eng. idiom. This is the cardinal fault of AV, which otherwise excels so greatly.

IV. The Pentateuch as History.—Beyond all doubt, the first duty of any who would use the Pent for historical purposes is to consider the light that textual criticism throws upon it. So many of the impossibilities that are relied upon by those who seek to prove that the book is historically worthless may be removed by the simplest operations of scientific textual criticism, that a neglect of this primary precaution must lead to disastrous consequences. After all, it is common experience that a man who sets out to produce a history—whether by original composition or compilation—does not intentionally make, e.g., a southward march lead to a point northward of the starting-place, or a woman carry an able-bodied lad of 16 or 17 on her shoulder, or a patriarch linger some 80 years on a deathbed. When such episodes are found, the rudiments of historical judgment require that we should first ask whether the text is in order, and if the evidence points to any easy, natural and well-supported solutions of the difficulties, we are not justified in rejecting them without inquiry and denying to the Pent all historical value. It is a priori far more probable that narratives which have come down to us from a date some 3,000 years back may have suffered slightly in transmission than that the Pent was in the first instance the story of a historical wonderland. It is far more reasonable, e.g., to suppose that in a couple of verses of Ex a corruption of two letters (attested by Aquila) has taken place in the MT than that the Pent contains two absolutely inconsistent accounts of the origin of the priesthood (see PRIESTS). Accordingly, the first principle of any scientific use of the Pent for historical purposes must be to take account of textual criticism.

Having discovered as nearly as may be what the author wrote, the next step must be to consider what he meant by it. Here, unfortunately, the modern inquirer is apt to neglect many most necessary precautions. It would be a truism, but for the fact that it is so often disregarded, to say that the whole of a narrative must be carefully read in order to ascertain the author's meaning; e.g. how often we hear that Gen 14 represents Abram as having inflicted a defeat on the enemy with only 318 men (ver 14), whereas from ver 24 (cf ver 13) it appears that in addition to these his allies Aner, Eshcol and Mamre (i.e. as we shall see, the inhabitants of certain localities) had accompanied him! Sometimes the clue to the precise meaning of a story is to be found near the end: e.g. in Josh 22 we do not see clearly what kind of an altar the trans-Jordanic tribes had erected (and consequently why their conduct was open to objection) till ver 28, when we learn that this was an altar of the pattern of the altar of burnt offering, and so bore not the slightest resemblance to such lawful altars as those of Moses and Joshua (see ALTAR; SANCTUARY). Nor is this the only instance in which the methods of expression adopted cause trouble to some modern readers; e.g. the word "all" is sometimes used in a way that apparently presents difficulties to some minds. Thus in Ex 9 6 it is possible to interpret "all" in the most sweeping sense and then see a contradiction in vs 19, 22, etc. which recognize that some cattle still existed. Or again the term may be regarded as limited by ver 3 to all the cattle in the field (see ALL).

At this point two further idiosyncrasies of the Sem genius must be noted—the habits of personification and the genealogical tendency; e.g. in Nu 20 12–21, Edom and Israel are personified: "thy brother Israel," Genealogies "Edom came out against him," etc.

Nobody here mistakes the meaning. Similarly with genealogical methods of expression. The Semites spoke of many relationships in a way that is foreign to occidental methods. Thus the Heb for "30 years old" is "son of 30 years." Again we read "He was the father of such as dwell in tents" (Gen 4 20). These habits (of personification and genealogical expression of relationships) are greatly extended, e.g. "And Canaan begat Zidon his first-born" (10 15). Often this leads to no trouble, yet strangely enough men who will grasp these methods when dealing with ch 10 will claim that ch 14 cannot be historical because localities are there personified and grouped in relationships. Yet if we are to estimate the historical value of the narrative, we must surely be willing to apply the same methods to one chapter as to another if the sense appears to demand this. See, further, GENEALOGIES.

A further consideration that is not always heeded is the exigency of literary form; e.g. in Gen 24 there occurs a dialogue. Strangely enough, an attack has been made on the historical character of Gen on this ground. It cannot be supposed—so runs the argument—that we have here a literal report of what was said. This entirely ignores the practice of all literary artists. Such passages are to be read as giving a literary presentation of what occurred; they convey a far truer and more vivid idea of what passed than could an actual literal report of the mere words, divorced from the gestures, glances and modulations of the voice that play such an important part in conversation.

Another matter is the influence of the sacred numbers on the text; e.g. in Nu 33 the journeys seem designed to present 40 stations and must not be held to exclude camping at other stations not mentioned; 5. The Sacred Numbers Gen 10 probably contained 70 names in the original text. This is a technical consideration which must be borne in mind, and so, too, must the Heb habit of using certain round numbers to express an unspecified time. When, for instance, we read that somebody was 40 or 60 years old, we are not to take these words literally. "Forty years old" often seems to correspond to "after he had reached man's estate" (see NUMBER).

Still more important is it to endeavor to appreciate the habits of thought of those for whom the Pent was first intended, and to seek

6. Habits of Thought One instance must suffice. Of the many explanations of names few are philologically correct. It is certain that Noah is not connected with the Heb for "to comfort" or Moses with "draw out"—even if Egypt princesses spoke Heb. The etymological key will not fit. Yet we must ask ourselves whether the narrator ever thought that it did. In times when names were supposed to have some mystic relation to their bearers they might be conceived as standing also in some mystic relation to events either present or future; it is not clear that the true original meaning of the narratives was not to suggest this in literary form. How far the ancient Hebrews were from regarding names in the same light as we do may be seen from such passages as Ex 23 20 f; Isa 30 27; see further EPC, 47 ff; see also NAMES, PROPER.

The Pent is beyond all doubt an intensely national work. Its outlook is so essentially Israelitish that no reader could fail to notice the fact,

7. National and Coloring proofs. Doubtless this has in many instances led to its presenting a view of history with which the contemporary peoples would not have agreed. It is not to be supposed that the exodus was an event of much significance in the Egypt of Moses, however important it may appear to the Egyptians of today; and this suggests two points. On the one hand we must admit that to most contemporaries the Pentateuchal narratives must have seemed out of all perspective; on the other the course of subsequent history has shown that the Mosaic sense of perspective was in reality the true one, however absurd it may have seemed to the nations of his own day. Consequently in using the Pent for historical purposes we must always apply two standards—the contemporary and the historical. In the days of Moses the narrative might often have looked to the outsider like the attempt of the frog in the fable to attain to the size of an ox; for us, with the light of history upon it, the values are very different. The national coloring, the medium through which the events are seen, has proved to be true, and the seemingly insignificant doings of unimportant people have turned out to be events of prime historical importance.

There is another aspect of the national coloring of the Pent to be borne in mind. If ever there was a book which revealed the inmost soul of a people, that book is the Pent. This will be considered in V, below, but for the present we are concerned with its historical significance. In estimating actions, motives, laws, policy—all that goes to make history—character is necessarily a factor of the utmost consequence. Now here we have a book that at every point reveals and at the same time grips the national character. Alike in contents and in form the legislation is adapted with the utmost nicety to the nature of the people for which it was promulgated.

When due allowance has been made for all the various matters enumerated above, what can be said as to the trustworthiness of the

8. How Far Pentateuchal history? The answer is entirely favorable.

(1) Contemporaneous information.—Trustworthy In the first place the discussion as to the dating of the Pent (above, II, 4) has shown that we have in it documents that are in many cases certainly contemporaneous with the matters to which they relate and have been preserved in a form that is substantially original. Thus we have seen that the wording of Gen 10 19 cannot be later than the age of Abraham and that the legislation of the last four books is Mosaic. Now contemporaneousness is the first essential of credibility.

(2) Character of our informants.—Given the fact (guaranteed by the contemporaneousness of the sources) that our informants had the means of providing accurate information if they so desired, we have to ask whether they were truthful and able. As to the ability no doubt is possible; genius is stamped on every page of the Pent. Similarly as to truthfulness. The conscience of the narrators is essentially ethical. This appears of course most strongly in the case of the legislation (cf Lev 19 11) and the attribution of truthfulness to God (Ex 34 6), but it may readily be detected throughout; e.g. in Gen 20 12 the narrative clearly shows that truthfulness was esteemed as a virtue by the ancient Hebrews. Throughout, the faults of the dramatis personae are never minimized even when the narrator's sympathy is with them. Nor is there any attempt to belittle the opponents of Israel's heroes. Consider on the one hand the magnanimity of Esau's character and on the other the very glaring light that is thrown on the weaknesses of Jacob, Judah, Aaron. If we are taught to know the Moses who prays, "And if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written" (Ex 32 32), we are also shown his frequent complaints, and we make acquaintance with the hot-tempered manslayer and the lawgiver who disobeyed his God.

(3) The historical genius of the people.—Strangely enough, those who desire to discuss the trustworthiness of the Pent often go far afield to note the habits of other nations and, selecting according to their bias peoples that have a good or a bad reputation in the matter of historical tradition, proceed to argue for or against the Pentateuchal narrative on this basis. Such procedure is alike unjust and unscientific. It is unscientific because the object of the inquirer is to obtain knowledge as to the habits of this people, and in view of the great divergences that may be observed among different races the comparative method is clearly inapplicable; it is unjust because this people is entitled to be judged on its own merits or defects, not on the merits or defects of others. Now it is a bare statement of fact that the Jews possess the historical sense to a preëminent degree. Nobody who surveys their long history and examines their customs and practices to this day can fairly doubt that fact. This is no recent development; it is most convincingly attested by the Pent itself, which here, as elsewhere, faithfully mirrors the spirit of the race. What is the highest guaranty of truth, a guaranty to which unquestioning appeal may be made in the firm assurance that it will carry conviction to all who hear? "Remember the days of old, Consider the years of many generations: Ask thy father and he will show thee; Thine elders, and they will tell thee" (Dt 32 7). "For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth," etc (Dt 4 32). Conversely, the due handing down of tradition is a religious duty: "And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? that ye shall say," etc (Ex 12 26 f). "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes saw, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but make them known unto thy children, and thy children's children" (Dt 4 9). It is needless to multiply quotations. Enough has been said to show clearly the attitude of this people toward history.

(4) The good faith of Deuteronomy.—Closely connected with the preceding is the argument from the very obvious good faith of the speeches in Dt. It is not possible to read the references to events in such a chapter as ch 4 without realizing that the speaker most fully believed the truth of his statements. The most unquestionable sincerity is impressed upon the chapter. The speaker is referring to what he believes with all the faith of which he is capable. Even for those who doubt the Mosaic authenticity of these speeches there can be no doubt as to the writer's unquestioning acceptance of the historical consciousness of the people. But once the Mosaic authenticity is established the argument becomes overwhelming. How could Moses have spoken to people of an event so impressive and unparalleled as having happened within their own recollection if it had not really occurred?

(5) Nature of the events recorded.—Another very important consideration arises from the nature of the events recorded. No nation, it has often been remarked, would gratuitously invent a story of its enslavement to another. The extreme sobriety of the patriarchal narratives, the absence of miracle, the lack of any tendency to display the ancestors of the people as conquerors or great personages, are marks of credibility. Many of the episodes in the Mosaic age are extraordinarily probable. Take the stories of the rebelliousness of the people, of their complaints of the water, the food, and so on: what could be more in accordance with likelihood? On the other hand there is another group of narratives to which the converse argument applies. A Sinai cannot be made part of a nation's consciousness by a clever story-teller or a literary forger. The unparalleled nature of the events narrated was recognized quite as clearly by the ancient Hebrews as it is today (see Dt 4 32 ff). It is incredible that such a story could have been made up and successfully palmed off on the whole nation. A further point that may be mentioned in this connection is the witness of subsequent history to the truth of the narrative. Such a unique history as that of the Jews, such tremendous consequences as their religion has had on the fortunes of mankind, require for their explanation causal events of sufficient magnitude.

(6) External corroborations.—All investigation of evidence depends on a single principle: "The coincidences of the truth are infinite." In other words, a false story will sooner or later become involved in conflict with ascertained facts. The Bib. narrative has been subjected to the most rigorous cross-examination from every point of view for more than a century. Time after time confident assertions have been made that its falsehood has been definitely proved, and in each case the Pent has come out from the test triumphant. The details will for the most part be found enumerated or referred to under the separate articles. Here it must suffice just to refer to a few matters. It was said that the whole local coloring of the Egypt scenes was entirely false, e.g. that the vine did not grow in Egypt. Egyptology has in every instance vindicated the minute accuracy of the Pent, down to even the non-mention of earthenware (in which the discolored Nile waters can be kept clean) in Ex 7 19 and the very food of the lower classes in Nu 11 5. It was said that writing was unknown in the days of Moses, but Egyptology and Assyriology have utterly demolished this. The historical character of many of the names has been strengthened by recent discoveries (see e.g. JERUSALEM; AMRAPHEL). From another point of view modern observation of the habits of the quails has shown that the narrative of Nu is minutely accurate and must be the work of an eyewitness. From the ends of the earth there comes confirmation of the details of the evolution of law as depicted in the Pent. Finally it is worth noting that even the details of some of the covenants in Gen are confirmed by historical parallels (Churchman, 1908, 17 f).

It is often said that history in the true sense was invented by the Greeks and that the Heb genius was so intent on the Divine guidance that it neglected secondary causes altogether. There is a large measure of truth in this view; but so far as the Pent is concerned it can be greatly overstated.

One great criticism that falls to be made is entirely in favor of the Pentateuch Hebrew as against some Greeks, viz. as Reason- the superior art with which the causes ed History are given. A Thucydides would have stated the reasons that induced Pharaoh to persecute the Israelites, or Abraham and Lot to separate, or Korah, Dathan and Abiram and their followers to rebel; but every reader would have known precisely what he was doing and many who can read the material passages of the Pent with delight would have been totally unable to grapple with his presentation of the narrative. The audience is here more unsophisticated and the material presented in more artistic form. In truth, any historian who sat down to compose a philosophical history of the period covered by the Pent would in many instances be surprised at the lavish material it offered to him. A second criticism is more obvious. The writer clearly had no knowledge of the other side of the case. For example, the secondary causes for the defeat near Hormah are plain enough so far as they are internal to the Israelites—lack of morale, discipline and leadership, division of opinion, discouragement produced by the Divine disapproval testified by the absence from the army of Moses and the Ark, and the warnings of the former—but the secondary causes on the side of the Amalekites and Canaanites are entirely omitted. Thus it generally happens that we do not get the same kind of view of the events as might be possible if we could have both sides. Naturally this is largely the case with the work of every historian who tells the story from one side only and is not peculiar to the Pent. Thirdly, the object of the Pent is not merely to inform, but to persuade. It is primarily statesmanship, not literature, and its form is influenced by this fact. Seeking to sway conduct, not to provide a mere philosophical exposition of history, it belongs to a different (and higher) category from the latter, and where it has occasion to use the same material puts it in a different way, e.g. by assigning as motives for obeying laws reasons that the philosophic historian would have advanced as causes for their enactment. To some extent, therefore, an attempt to criticize the Pent from the standpoint of philosophic history is an attempt to express it in terms of something that is incommensurable with it.

V. Character of the Pentateuch.—The following sentences from Maine's Early Law and Custom form a suggestive introduction to any consideration of the character of the Pent:

"The theory upon which these schools of learned men worked, from the ancient, perhaps very ancient, Apastamba and Gautama to the late Manu and the still later Narada, is perhaps still held by some persons of earnest religious convictions, but in time now buried it affected every walk of thought. The fundamental assumption is that a sacred or inspired lit. being once believed to exist, all knowledge is contained in it. The Hindu way of putting it was, and is, not simply that the Scripture is true, but that everything which is true is contained in the Scripture. . . . It is to be observed that such a theory, firmly held during the infancy of systematic thought, tends to work itself into fact. As the human mind advances, accumulating observation and accumulating reflection, nascent philosophy and dawning science are read into the sacred literature, while they are at the same time limited by the ruling ideas of its priestly authors. But as the mass of this literature grows through the additions made to it by successive expositors, it gradually specializes itself, and subjects, at first mixed together under vague general conceptions, become separated from one another and isolated. In the history of law the most important early specialization is that which separates what a man ought to do from what he ought to know. A great part of the religious literature, including the Creation of the Universe, the structure of Heaven, Hell, and the World or Worlds, and the nature of the Gods, falls under the last head, what a man ought to know. Law-books first appear as a subdivision of the first branch, what a man should do. Thus the most ancient books of this class are short manuals of conduct for an Aryan Hindu who would lead a perfect life. They contain much more ritual than law, a great deal more about the impurity caused by touching impure things than about crime, a great deal more about penances than about punishments" (pp. 16-18).

1. Hindu Law Books

It is impossible not to see the resemblances to the Pent that these sentences suggest. Particularly interesting is the commentary they provide on the attitude of Moses toward knowledge: "The secret things belong unto Jeh our God; but the things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law" (Dt 29 29).

But if the Pent has significant resemblances to other old law books, there are differences that are even more significant.

"By an act that is unparalleled in history a God took to Himself a people by means of a sworn agreement.

2. Differences

Some words that are fundamental for our purpose must be quoted from the offer; "Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be mine own possession from among all peoples: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." The views here expressed dominate the legislation. Holiness—the correlative holiness to which the Israelites must attain because the Lord their God is holy—embraces much that is not germane to our subject, but it also covers the whole field of national and individual righteousness. The duty to God that is laid upon the Israelites in these words is a duty that has practical consequences in every phase of social life. I have already quoted a sentence from Sir Henry Maine in which he speaks of the uniformity with which religion and law are implicated in archaic legislation. There is a stage in human development where life is generally seen whole, and it is to this stage that the Pent belongs. But no other legislation so takes up one department of man's life after another and impresses on them all the relationship of God and people. Perhaps nothing will so clearly bring out my meaning as a statement of some of the more fundamental differences between the Pentateuchal legislation and the old Indian law-books which often provide excellent parallels to it. Those to which I desire to draw particular attention are as follows: The Indian law-books have no idea of national (as distinct from individual) righteousness—a conception that entered the world with the Mosaic legislation and has perhaps not made very much progress there since. There is no personal God: hence His personal interest in righteousness is lacking: hence, too, there can be no relationship between God and people: and while there is a supernatural element in the contemplated results of human actions, there is nothing that can in the slightest degree compare with the Personal Divine intervention that is so often promised in the Pentateuchal laws. The caste system, like Hammurabi's class system, leads to distinctions that are always inequitable. The conception of loving one's neighbour and one's sojourner as oneself are alike lacking. The systematic provisions for poor relief are absent, and the legislation is generally on a lower ethical and moral level, while some of the penalties are distinguished by the most perverted and barbarous cruelty. All these points are embraced in the special relationship of the One God and the peculiar treasure with its resulting need for national and individual holiness" (PS, 330 f).

These sentences indicate some of the most interesting of the distinguishing features of the Pent—its national character, its catholic view

3. Holiness of life, its attitude toward the Divine, and some at any rate of its most peculiar teachings. It is worth noting that Judaism, the oldest of the religions which it has influenced, attaches particular importance to one chapter, Lev 19. The keynote of that chapter is the command: "Holy shall ye be, for holy am I the Lord your God"—to preserve the order and emphasis of the original words. This has been called the Jew's imitatio Dei, though a few moments' reflection shows that the use of the word "imitation" is here inaccurate. Now this book with this teaching has exercised a unique influence on the world's history, for it must be remembered that Judaism, Christianity and Islam spring ultimately from its teachings, and it is impossible to sever it from the history of the "people of the book"—as Mohammed called them. It appears then that it possesses in some unique way both an intensely national and an intensely universal character and a few words must be said as to this.

The great literary qualities of the work have undoubtedly been an important factor. All readers

4. The Universal Aspect have felt the fascination of the stories of Gen. The Jewish character has also counted for much; so again have the moral and ethical doctrines, and the miraculous and unprecedented nature of the events narrated. And yet there is much that might have been thought to militate against the book's obtaining any wide influence. Apart from some phrases about all the families of the earth being blessed (or blessing themselves) in the seed of Abraham, there is very little in its direct teaching to suggest that it was ever intended to be of universal application. Possibly these phrases only mean that other nations will use Israel as a typical example of greatness and happiness and pray that they may attain an equal degree of glory and prosperity. Moreover, the Pent provides for a sacrificial system that has long ceased to exist, and a corpus of jurial law that has not been adopted by other peoples. Of its most characteristic requirement—holiness—large elements are rejected by all save its own people. Wherein then lies its universal element? How came this the most intensely national of books to exercise a world-wide and ever-growing influence? The reason lies in the very first sentence: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This doctrine of the unity of an Almighty God is the answer to our question. Teach that there is a God and One Only All-powerful God, and the book that tells of Him acquires a message to all His creatures.

Of the national character of the work something has already been said. It is remarkable that for its own people it has in very truth contained life and length of days, for it has been in and through that book that the Jews have maintained themselves throughout their unique history. If it be asked wherein the secret of this strength lies, the answer is in the combination of the national and the religious. The course of history must have been entirely different if the Pent had not been the book of the people long before the Jews became the people of the book.

LITERATURE.—The current critical view is set forth in vast numbers of books. The following may be mentioned: LOT; Cornill's Intro to the Canonical Books of the OT; Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's Hexateuch (a 2d ed of the Intro without the text has been published as The Composition of the Hexateuch); the vols of the ICC, Westminster Comms. and Century Bible. Slightly less thoroughgoing views are put forward in the Ger. Intros of König (1893), Baudissin (1901), Sellin (1910); and Geden, Outlines of Intro to the Heb Bible (1909); Kittel, Scientific Study of the OT (ET, 1910); Eerdm. St. has entirely divergent critical views; POT; TMH, I, and W. Möller, Are the Critics Right? and Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel; Van Hoonacker, Lieu du culte, et Sacerdote lévitique are all much more conservative and valuable. J. H. Raven, OT Intro, gives a good presentation of the most conservative case. The views taken in this article are represented by SBL, EPC, OP, PS, Troelstra, The Name of God, and in some matters, TMH, I.

The existence of a Sam community in Nāblūs is generally known, and the fact that they have a recension of the Pent which differs in some respects from the Massoretic has been long recognized as important.

I. Knowledge of the Samaritan Pentateuch.—Of the Gr Fathers Origen knew of it and notes two insertions which do not appear in the MT—Nu 13 1 and 21 12, drawn from Dt 1 2 and 2 18. Eusebius of Caesarea in his Chronicon compares the ages of the patriarchs before Abraham in the Samaritan High Priest with Scroll.

LXX with those in the Sam Pent and the MT. Epiphanius is aware that the Samaritans acknowledged the Pent alone as canonical. Cyril of Jerus notes agreement of LXX and Sam in Gen 4 8. These are the principal evidences of knowledge of this recension among the Gr Fathers. Jerome notes some omissions in the MT and supplies them from Sam. The Talm shows that the Jews retained a knowledge of the Sam Pent longer, and speaks contemptuously of the points in which it differs from the MT. Since the differences observed by the Fathers and the Talmudists are to be seen in the Sam Pent before us, they afford evidence of its authenticity.

After nearly a millennium of oblivion the Sam Pent was restored to the knowledge of Christendom by Pietro de la Valle who in 1616 purchased a copy from the Sam community which then existed in Damascus. This copy was presented in 1623 to the Paris Oratory and shortly after published in the Paris Polyglot under the editorship of Morinus, a priest of the Oratory who had been a Protestant. He emphasized the difference between the MT and Sam Pent for argumentative reasons, in order to prove the necessity for the intervention of the church to settle which was Scripture. A fierce controversy resulted, in which various divines, Protestant and Catholic, took part. Since then copies of this recension have multiplied in Europe and America. All of them may be regarded as copies ultimately of the Nāblūs roll. These copies are in the form, not of rolls, but of codices or bound volumes. They are usually written in two columns to the page, one being the Tg or interpretation and this is sometimes in Aramaic and sometimes in Arabic. Some codices show three columns with both Tgs. There are probably nearly 100 of these codices in various libraries in Europe and America. These are all written in the Sam script and differ only by scribal blunders.

II. Codices and Script.—The visitor to the Samaritans is usually shown an ancient roll, but only rarely is the most ancient exhibited, and when so exhibited still more rarely Nāblūs Roll is it in circumstances in which it may be examined. Dr. Mills, who spent three months in the Sam community, was able to make a careful though interrupted study of it. His description (Nāblūs and the Modern Samaritans, 312) is that "the roll is of parchment, written in columns, 13 in. deep, and 7½ in. wide. The writing is in a fair hand, rather small; each column contains from 70 to 72 lines, and the whole roll contains 110 columns. The name of the scribe is written in a kind of acrostic, running through these columns, and is found in the Book of Dt. The roll has the appearance of very great antiquity, but is wonderfully well preserved, considering its venerable age. It is worn out and torn in many places and patched with re-written parchment; in many other places, where not torn, the writing is unreadable. It seemed to me that about two-thirds of the original is still readable. The skins of which the roll is composed are of equal size and measure each 25 in. long by 15 in. wide." Dr. Rosen's account on the authority of Kraus (Zeitschr. der deutsch-morgenl. Gesellsch., XVIII, 582) agrees with this, adding that the "breadth of the writing is a line and the space between is similar." Both observers have noted that the parchment has been written only on the "hair" side. It is preserved in a silk covering inclosed in a silver case embossed with arabesque ornaments.

The reader on opening one of the codices of the Sam Pent recognizes at once the difference of the writing from the characters in an ordinary Heb Bible. The Jews admit that the character in which the Sam Pent is written is older than their square character. It is said in the Talm (Sanhedrin 21b): "The law at first was given to Israel in 'ibhrī letters and in the holy tongue and again by Ezra in the square [ʾāshūrīth] character and the Aram. tongue. Israel chose for themselves the 'āshūrīth character and the holy tongue: they left to the hedhyōtōth ["uncultured"] the 'ibhrī character and the Aram. tongue—the Cuthaeans are the hedhyōtōth," said Rabbi Hasda." When Jewish hatred of the Samaritans, and the contempt of the Pharisees for them are remembered, this admission amounts to a demonstration. The Sam script resembles that on the Maccabean coins, but is not identical with it. It may be regarded as between the square character and the angular, the latter as is seen in the MS and the Siloam inscription. Another intermediate form, that found on the Assouan papyri, owes the differences it presents to having been written with a reed on papyrus. As the chronology of these scripts is of importance we subjoin those principally in question.

Table Showing Script of Semitic Languages.

The study of these alphabets will confirm the statement above made that the Sam alphabet is, in evolution, between the square character and the angular, nearer the latter than the former, while the characters of the Assouan papyri are nearer the former than the latter. Another point to be observed is that the letters which resemble each other in one alphabet do not always resemble in another. We can thus, from comparison of the letters liable to be confused, form a guess as to the script in which the document containing the confusion was written.

In inscriptions the lapidary had no hesitation, irrespective of syllables, in completing in the next line any word for which he had not sufficient room.

3. Peculiarities in Writing
Thus the beginnings and endings of lines were directly under each other, as on the M S. In the papyri the words are not divided, but the scribe was not particular to have the ends of lines directly under each other. The scribe of the square character by use of literae dilatantes secured this without dividing the words. The Samaritan secured this end by wider spacing. The first letter or couple of letters of each line are placed directly under the first letter or letters of the preceding line—so with the last letters—two or three—of the line, while the other words are spread out to fill up the space. The only exception to this is a paragraph ending. Words are separated from each other by dots; sentences by a sign like our colon. The Torah is divided into 966 kisam or paragraphs. The termination of these is shown by the colon having a dot added to it, thus :. Sometimes this is reinforced by a line and an angle—<. These kisam are often enumerated on the margin; sometimes, in later MSS in Arab. numerals. A blank space sometimes separates one of these kisam from the next.

When the scribe wished to inform the reader of his personality and the place where he had written the MS he made use of a peculiar device. In copying he left a space vacant in the middle of a column. The space thus left is every now and then bridged by a single letter.

4. The Tarikh
These letters read down the column form words and sentences which convey the information. In the case of the Nabîls roll this tarikh occurs in Dt and occupies three columns. In this it is said, "I Abishua, son of Pinhas (Phinehas), son of Eleazar, son of Aharun (Aaron) the priest, have written this holy book in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation in Mt. Gerizim in the 13th year of the rule of the children of Israel in the land of Canaan." Most of the codices in the libraries of Europe and America have like information given in a similar manner. This tarikh is usually Heb., but sometimes it is in Sam Aramaic. Falsification of the date merely is practically impossible; the forgery must be the work of the first scribe.

Not only has the difference of script to be considered, but also the different values assigned to the letters. The names given to the letters differ considerably from the Heb., as may be seen above.

5. The Mode of Pronunciation
There are no vowel points or signs of reduplication. Only B and P of the B-GaDH-K-PHaTH letters are aspirated. The most singular peculiarity is that none of the gutturals is pronounced at all—a peculiarity which explains some of the names given to the letters.

This characteristic appears all the more striking when it is remembered how prominent gutturals are in Arab., the everyday language of the Samaritans. The first 5 verses of Gen are subjoined according to the Sam pronunciation, as taken down by Petermann (Versuch einer hebr. Formenlehre, 161), from the reading of Amran the high priest: Barashêl bara Eluwêm it ashshamêm wîl aareç. Waareç ayata-te'u ube'u waashek al fani . . . tum uru Eluwem amra, efet al fani ammew waya'mer Eluwêm ya'i or way'a'i or wayerê Eluwem it a' or ki tov wayabdel Eluwem bin a' or ubin aashek uyikra Eluwêm la' or yom ula 'ashek kara lila. Uyai 'erev uyai bekar yom a'ad.

There is no doubt that if the inscription given above is really in the MS it is a forgery written on the skin at the first. Of its falsity also there is no doubt. The Am Tab of the Nā-sent from Canaan and nearly con-blūs Roll temporary with the Israelite conquest of the land were impressed with cunei-form characters and the language was Bab. Neglecting the tarikh, we may examine the matter independently and come to certain conclusions. If it is the original from which the other MSS have been copied we are forced to assume a date earlier at least than the 10th cent. AD, which is the date of the earliest Heb MS. The script dates from the Hasmonaens. The reason of this mode of writing being perpetuated in copying the Law must be found in some special sanctity in the document from which the copies were made originally. Dr. Mills seems almost inclined to believe the authenticity of the tarikh. His reasons, however, have been rendered valueless by recent discoveries. Dr. Cowley, on the other hand, would date it somewhere about the 12th cent. AD, or from that to the 14th. With all the respect due to such a scholar we venture to think his view untenable. His hypothesis is that an old MS was found and the tarikh now seen from Assyria might not unlikely be unable to pronounce the gutturals.

6. The Age

(c) Changes due to deficient attention: Another cause of variation is to be found in reader or scribe not attending sufficiently to the actual word or sentence seen or heard. This is manifested in putting for a word its equivalent. In Gen 26 31 the Sam has brē'ēhā, "to his friend," instead of as the MT br'āhūw, "to his brother," and in Ex 2 10 Sam has na'ar for yēledh in MT. In such cases it is impossible to determine which represents the original text. We may remark that the assumption of Gesenius and of such Jewish writers as Kohn that the MT is always correct is due to mere prejudice. More important is the occasional interchange of YHWH and 'Elohim, as in Gen 28 4, where Sam has YHWH and the MT 'Elohim, and Gen 7 1 where it has 'Elohim against YHWH in the MT. This last instance is the more singular, in that in the 9th verse of the same chapter the MT has 'Elohim and the Sam YHWH. Another class of instances which may be due to the same cause is the completion of a sentence by adding a clause or, it may be, dropping it from failure to observe it to be incomplete, as Gen 24 45. If the MT be the original text, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher"; if the Sam, then the MT has dropped it.

(2) Changes due to intention.—(a) Grammatical: The variations from the MT most frequently met with in reading the Sam Pent are those necessary to conform the language to the rules of ordinary grammar. In this the Sam frequently coincides with the Kṛē of the MT. The Kṛhibh of the MT has no distinction in gender between hu' in the 3d personal pronoun sing.—in both masc. and fem. it is hū'. The Sam with the Kṛē corrects this to hī'. So with na'ar, "a youth"—this is common in the Kṛhibh, but in the Kṛē when a young woman is in question the fem. termination is added, and so the Sam writers also. It is a possible supposition that this characteristic of the Torah is late and due to blundering peculiar to the MS from which the Massoretes copied the Kṛhibh. That it is systematic is against its being due to blunder, and as the latest Heb books maintain distinction of gender, we must regard this as an evidence of antiquity. This is confirmed by another set of variations between the Sam and the MT. There are, in the latter, traces of case-endings which have disappeared in later Heb. These are removed in the Sam. That case terminations have a tendency to disappear is to be seen in Eng. and Fr. The sign of the accusative, 'eth, frequently omitted in the MT, is generally supplied in Sam. A short form of the demonstrative pronoun pl. ('el instead of 'ellāh) is restricted to the Pent and 1 Ch 20 8. The syntax of the cohortative is different in Sam from that in the Massoretic Heb. It is not to be assumed that the Jewish was the only correct or primitive use. There are cases where, with colloquial inexactitude, the MT has joined a pl. noun to a singular vb., and vice versa; these are corrected in Sam. Conjugations which in later Heb have a definite meaning in relation to the root, but are used in the MT of the Torah in quite other senses, are brought in the Sam Pent into harmony with later use. It ought in passing to be noted that these pentateuchal forms do not occur in the Prophets; even in Josh 2 15 we have the fem. 3d personal pronoun; in Jgs 19 3 we have na'ārāh.

(b) Logical: Sometimes the context or the circumstances implied have led to a change on one side or another. This may involve only the change of a word, as in Gen 2 2, where the Sam has "sixth" instead of "seventh" (MT), in this agreeing with the LXX and Pesh, the Jewish scribe thinking the "sixth day" could only be reckoned ended when the "seventh" had begun. In Gen 4 8, after the clause, "And Cain talked with [said to] Abel his brother," the Sam, LXX and Pesh add, "Let us go into the field." From the evidence of the VSS, from the natural meaning of the vb. 'amar, "to say," not "to speak," from the natural meaning also of the preposition 'el, "to," not "with" (see Gesenius), it is clear that the MT has dropped the clause and that the Sam represents the true text. If this is not the case, it is a case of logical completion on the part of the Sam. Another instance is the addition to each name in the genealogy in Gen 11 10-24 of the sum of the years of his life. In the case of the narrative of the plagues of Egypt a whole paragraph is added frequently. What has been commanded Moses and Aaron is repeated as history when they obey.

(c) Doctrinal: There are cases in which the text so suits the special views of the Samaritans concerning the sanctity of Gerizim that alteration of the original in that direction may be supposed to be the likeliest explanation. Thus there is inserted at Gen 20 67 a passage from Dt 27 2 slightly modified: Gerizim being put for Ebal, the object of the addition being to give the consecration of Gerizim the sanction of the Torah. Kennicott, however, defends the authenticity of this passage as against the MT. Insertion or omission appears to be the result of doctrinal predilection. In Nu 25 4,5 the Sam harmonizes the command of Jeh with the action of Moses. The passage removed has a bloodthirsty Moloch-like look that might seem difficult to defend. On the other hand, the Jewish hatred of idolatry might express itself in the command to "take all the heads of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun," and so might be inserted. There are cases also where the language is altered for reasons of propriety. In these cases the Sam agrees with the Kṛē of the MT.

These variations are of unequal value as evidences of the relative date of the Sam recension of the Pent. The intentional are for this purpose of little value; they are evidence of the views prevalent in the northern and southern districts of Pal respectively. Only visual blunders are of real importance, and they point to a date about the days of Hezekiah as the time at which the two recensions began to diverge. One thing is obvious, that the Sam, at least as often as the MT, represents the primitive text.

(1) Statement of hypotheses.—The frequency with which the points in which the Sam Pent differs from the MT agree with those in which the LXX agree against the MT has exercised scholars. 2. Relation of Samari- Castelli asserts that there are a thou- tan Recen- sand such instances. It may be noted sion to LXX that in one instance, at any rate, a pas- sage in which the Sam and the LXX agree against the MT has the support of the NT. In Gal 3 17, the apostle Paul, following the Sam and LXX against the MT, makes the "430 years" which terminated with the exodus begin with Abraham. As a rule the attention of Bib. scholars has been so directed to the resemblances between the Sam and the LXX that they have neglected the more numerous points of difference. So impressed have scholars been, esp. when Jews, by these resemblances that they have assumed that the one was dependent on the other. Frankel has maintained that the Sam was tr^d from the LXX. Against this is the fact that in all their insulting remarks against them the Talmudists never assert that the "Cuthaeans" (Samaritans) got their Torah from the Greeks. Further, even if they only got the Law through Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, and even if he lived in the time of Alexander the Great, yet this was nearly half a century before the earliest date of the LXX. Again, while there are many evidences in the LXX that it has been tr^d from Heb, there are none in the Sam that it has been tr^d from Gr. The converse hypothesis is maintained by Dr. Kohn with all the emphasis of extended type. His hypothesis is that before the LXX was thought of a Gr tr was made from a Sam copy of the Law for the benefit of Samaritans resident in Egypt. The Jews made use of this at first, but when they found it wrong in many points, they purposed a new tr, but were so much influenced by that to which they were accustomed that it was only an improved edition of the Sam which resulted. But it is improbable that the Samaritans, who were few and who had comparatively little intercourse with Egypt, should precede the more numerous Jews with their huge colonies in Egypt, in making a Gr tr. It is further against the Jewish tradition as preserved to us by Jos. It is against the Sam tradition as learned by the present writer from the Sam high priest. According to him, the Samaritans had no independent tr, beyond the fact that five of the LXX were Samaritan. Had there been any excuse for asserting that the Samaritans were the first translators, that would not have disappeared from their traditions.

(2) Review of these hypotheses.—The above unsatisfactory explanations result from deficient observation and unwarranted assumption. That there are many cases where the Sam variations from the MT are identical with those of the LXX is indubitable. It has, however, not been observed by those Jewish scholars that the cases in which the Sam alone or LXX alone, one or other, agrees with the MT against the other, are equally numerous. Besides, there are not a few cases in which all three differ. It ought to be observed that the cases in which the LXX differs from the MT are much more numerous than those in which the Sam differs from it. One has only to compare the Sam, LXX and MT of any half a dozen consecutive chapters in the Pent to prove this. Thus neither is dependent on the others. Further, there is the unwarranted assumption that the MT represents the primitive text of the Law. If the MT is compared with the VSS, it is found that the LXX, despite the misdirected efforts of Origen to harmonize it to the Palestinian text, differs in very many cases from the MT. Theodotion is nearer, but still differs in not a few cases. Jerome is nearer still, though even the text behind the Vulg is not identical with the MT. It follows that the MT is the result of a process which stopped somewhere about the end of the 5th cent. AD. The origin of the MT appears to have been somewhat the result of accident. A MS which had acquired a special sanctity as belonging to a famous rabbi is copied with fastidious accuracy, so that even its blunders are perpetuated. This supplies the K^thbbh. Corrections are made from other MSS, and these form the K^rē. If our hypothesis as to the age of the Nāblūs roll is correct, it is older than the MT by more than half a millennium, and the MS from which the LXX was tr^d was nearly a couple of centuries older still. So far then from its being a reasonable assumption that the LXX and Sam differ from the MT only by blundering or wilful corruption on the part of the former, the converse is at least as probable. The conclusion then to which we are led is that of Kennicott (State of Heb Text Diss., II, 164) that the Sam and LXX being independent, "each copy is invaluable—each copy demands our pious veneration and attentive study." It further ought to be observed that though Dr. Kohn points to certain cases where the difference between the MT and the LXX is due to confusion of letters only possible in Sam character, this does not prove the LXX to have been tr^d from a Sam MS, but that the MSS of the MT used by the LXX were written in that script. Kohn also exhibits the relation of the Sam to the Pesh. While the Pesh sometimes agrees with the Sam where it differs from the MT, more frequently it supports the MT against the Sam.

IV. Bearing on the Pentateuchal Question.—Jos (Ant., XI, viii, 2) makes Sanballat contemporary with Alexander the Great, and states that his son-in-law Manasseh came to Samaria and became the high priest. Although it is not said by Jos, it is assumed by critics that he brought the completed Torah with him. This Manasseh is according to Jos the grandson of Eliashib the high priest, the contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah, and therefore contemporary with Artaxerxes Longimanus. Nehemiah (13 28) mentions, without naming him, a grandson of Eliashib, who was son-in-law of Sanballat, whom he chased from him. It is clear that Jos had dropped a century out of his history, and that the migration of Manasseh is to be placed not

c 335 BC, but c 435 BC. Ezra is reputed to be, if not the author of the PC in the Pent, at all events its introducer to the Palestinians, and to have edited the whole, so that it assumed the form in which we now have it. But he was the contemporary of Manasseh, and had been, by his denunciation of foreign marriages, the cause of the banishment of Manasseh and his friends. Is it probable that he, Manasseh, would receive as Mosaic the enactments of Ezra, or convey them to Samaria? The date of the introduction of P, the latest portion of the Law, must accordingly be put considerably earlier than it is placed at present. We have seen that there are visual blunders that can be explained only on the assumption that the MS from which the mother Sam roll was copied was written in some variety of angular script. We have seen, further, that the peculiarities suit those of the Siloam inscription executed in the reign of Hezekiah, therefore approximately contemporary with the priest sent by Esarhaddon to Samaria to teach the people "the manner of the God of the land." As Amos and Hosea manifest a knowledge of the whole Pent before the captivity, it would seem that this "Book of the Law" that was "read [Am 4 5 LXX] without," which would be the source from which the priest sent from Assyria taught as above "the manner of the God of the land," would contain all the portions—J, E, D, and P—of the Law. If so, it did not contain the Book of Josh; notwithstanding the honor they give the conqueror of Canaan, the Samaritans have not retained the book which relates his exploits. This is confirmed by the fact that the archaisms in the MT of the Pent are not found in Josh. It is singular, if the Prophets were before the Law, that in the Law there should be archaisms which are not found in the Prophets. From the way the Divine names are interchanged, as we saw, sometimes 'Ēlōhīm in the Sam represents YHWH in the MT, sometimes vice versa, it becomes obviously impossible to lay any stress on this. This conclusion is confirmed by the yet greater frequency with which this interchange occurs in the LXX. The result of investigation of the Sam Pent is to throw very considerable doubt on the validity of the critical opinions as to the date, origin and structure of the Pent.

V. Targums and Chronicle.—As above noted, there are two Tgs or interpretations of the Sam Pent, an Aramaic and an Arabic. The Aram. is a dialect related to the Western Aram., in which the Jewish Tgs were written, sometimes called Chaldee. It has in it many strange words, some of which may be due to the language of the Assyrian colonists, but many are the result of blunders of copyists ignorant of the language. It is pretty close to the original and is little given to paraphrase. Much the same may be said of the Arab. Tg. It is usually attributed to Abu Said of the 13th cent., but according to Dr. Cowley only revised by him from the Tg of Abulhassan of the 11th cent. There is reference occasionally in the Fathers to a Samaritikon which has been taken to mean a Gr version. No indubitable quotations from it survive—what seem to be so being really tr^s of the text of the Sam recension. There is in Arab. a wordy chronicle called "The Book of Joshua." It has been edited by Juynboll. It may be dated in the 13th cent. More recently a "Book of Joshua" in Heb and written in Sam characters was alleged to be discovered. It is, however, a manifest forgery; the characters in which it is written are very late. It is partly borrowed from the canonical Josh, and partly from the older Sam Book of Joshua with fabulous additions. The Chronicle of Abulfatah is a tolerably accurate account of the history of the Samaritans after Alexander the Great to the 4th cent. AD.

LITERATURE.—The text in the Sam script is found in the polyglots—Paris and London. Walton's text in the London Polyglot is transcribed in square characters by Blayney, Oxford, 1790. The Eng. works of importance of recent times are Mills, Nabul and the Samaritans, London, 1864; Nutt, Fragments of a Sam Tg, London, 1874; Montgomery, The Samaritans, Philadelphia, 1907 (this has a very full bibliography which includes articles in periodicals); Iverach Munro, The Sam Pent and Modern Criticism, 1911, London. In Germany, Gesenius' dissertation, De Pentateuchi Samari- tani origine, etc. Jena, 1815, has not quite lost its value; Kohn, De Pentateucho Samaritano, Leipzig, 1865; Petermann, Versuch einer hebr. Formenlehre nach der Aussprache der heutigen Samaritaner, Leipzig, 1868. There are besides arts. on this in the various Bib. Dicts. and Encs. In the numerous religious and theological periodicals there have been arts. on the Sam Pent of varying worth. The Aram. Tg has been transcribed in square characters and edited by Brill (Frankfort, 1875).

PENTECOST, pen'tê-kost: As the name indicates (πεντηκοστή, pentêkostê), this second of the great Jewish national festivals was

1. In the OT observed on the 50th day, or 7 weeks, from the Paschal Feast, and therefore in the OT it was called "the feast of weeks." It is but once mentioned in the historical books of the OT (2 Ch 8 12.13), from which reference it is plain, however, that the people of Israel, in Solomon's day, were perfectly familiar with it: "offering according to the commandment of Moses, on the sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the set feasts, three times in the year, even in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles." The requirements of the three great festivals were then well understood at this time, and their authority was founded in the Mosaic Law and unquestioned. The festival and its ritual were minutely described in this Law. Every male in Israel was on that day required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary (Ex 34 22.23). It was the first of the two agrarian festivals of Israel and signified the completion of the barley-harvest (Lev 23 15.16; Dt 16 9.10), which had begun at the time of the waving of the first ripe sheaf of the first-fruits (Lev 23 11). Pentecost, or the Feast of Weeks, therefore fell on the 50th day after this occurrence. The wheat was then also nearly everywhere harvested (Ex 23 16; 34 22; Nu 28 26), and the general character of the festival was that of a harvest-home celebration. The day was observed as a Sabbath day, all labor was suspended, and the people appeared before Jeh to express their gratitude (Lev 23 21; Nu 28 26). The central feature of the day was the presentation of two loaves of leavened, salted bread unto the Lord (Lev 23 17.20; Ex 34 22; Nu 28 26; Dt 16 10). The size of each loaf was fixed by law. It must contain the tenth of an ephah, about three quarts and a half, of the finest wheat flour of the new harvest (Lev 23 17). Later Jewish writers are very minute in their description of the preparation of these two loaves (Jos, Ant, III, x, 6). According to the Mish (M'nâhôth, xi.4), the length of the loaf was 7 handbreadths, its width 4, its depth 7 fingers. Lev 23 18 describes the additional sacrifices required on this occasion. It was a festival of good cheer, a day of joy. Free-will offerings were to be made to the Lord (Dt 16 10), and it was to be marked by a liberal spirit toward the Levite, the stranger, and orphans and widows (Dt 16 11.14). Perhaps the command against gleaning harvest-fields has a bearing on this custom (Lev 23 22).

The OT does not give it the historical significance which later Jewish writers have ascribed to it. The Israelites were admonished to remember their bondage on that day and to reconsecrate themselves to the Lord (Dt 16 12), but it does not yet commemorate the giving of the Law at Sinai or the birth of the national existence, in the OT conception (Ex 19). Philo, Jos, and the earlier Talm are all ignorant of this new meaning which was given to the day in later Jewish history. It originated with the great Jewish rabbi Maimonides and has been copied by Christian writers. And thus a view of the Jewish Pentecost has been originated, which is wholly foreign to the scope of the ancient institution.

The old Jewish festival obtained a new significance, for the Christian church, by the promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16

2. In the NT 7.13). The incidents of that memorable day, in the history of Christianity, are told in a marvelously vivid and dramatic way in the Acts of the Apostles. The old rendering of sumplêrousthai (Acts 2 1) by "was fully come" was taken by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb.) to signify that the Christian Pentecost did not coincide with the Jewish, just as Christ's last meal with His disciples was considered not to have coincided with the Jewish Passover, on Nisan 14. The bearing of the one on the other is obvious; they stand and fall together. RV translates the obnoxious word simply "was now come." Meyer, in his commentary on the Acts, treats this question at length. The tradition of the ancient church placed the first Christian Pentecost on a Sunday. According to John, the Passover that year occurred on Friday, Nisan 14 (18 28). But according to Mt, Mk and Lk, the Passover that year occurred on Thursday, Nisan 14, and hence Pentecost fell on Saturday. The Karaites explained the shabbâth of Lev 23 15 as pointing to the Sabbath of the paschal week and therefore always celebrated Pentecost on Sunday. But it is very uncertain whether the custom existed in Christ's day, and moreover it would be impossible to prove that the disciples followed this custom, if it could be proved to have existed. Meyer follows the Johannic reckoning and openly states that the other evangelists made a mistake in their reckoning. No offhand decision is possible, and it is but candid to admit that here we are confronted with one of the knottiest problems in the harmonizing of the Gospels. See CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT.

The occurrences of the first pentecostal day after the resurrection of Christ set it apart as a Christian festival and invested it, together with the commemoration of the resurrection, with a new meaning. We will not enter here upon a discussion of the significance of the events of the pentecostal day described in Acts 2. That is discussed in the article under TONGUES (q.v.). The Lutherans, in their endeavor to prove the inherent power of the Word, claim that "the effects then exhibited were due to the Divine power inherent in the words of Christ; and that they had resisted that power up to the day of Pentecost and then yielded to its influence." This is well described as "an incredible hypothesis" (Hodge, Systematic Theol., III, 484). The Holy Spirit descended in answer to the explicit promise of the glorified Lord, and the disciples had been prayerfully waiting for its fulfilment (Acts 1 4.14). The Spirit came upon them as "a power from on high." God the Holy Spirit proved on Pentecost His personal existence, and the intellects, the hearts, the lives of the apostles were on that day miraculously changed. By that day they were fitted for the arduous work that lay before them. There is some difference of opinion as to what is the significance of Pentecost for the church as an institution. The almost universal opinion among theologians and exegetes is this: that Pentecost marks the founding of the Christian church as an institution. This day is said to mark the dividing line between the ministry of the Lord and the ministry of the Spirit. The later Dutch theologians have advanced the idea that the origin of the church, as an institution, is to be found in the establishment of the apostolate, in the selection of the Twelve. Dr. A. Kuyper holds that the church as an institution was founded when the Master selected the Twelve, and that these men were "qualified for their calling by the power of the Holy Spirit." He distinguishes between the institution and the constitution of the church. Dr. H. Bavinck says: "Christ gathers a church about Himself, rules it directly so long as He is on the earth, and appoints twelve apostles who later on will be His witnesses. The institution of the apostolate is an esp. strong proof of the institutionary character which Christ gave to His church on the earth" (Gerf. Dogm., IV, 64).

Whatever we may think of this matter, the fact remains that Pentecost completely changed the apostles, and that the endowment with the Holy Spirit enabled them to become witnesses of the resurrection of Christ as the fundamental fact in historic Christianity, and to extend the church according to Christ's commandment. Jerome has an esp. elegant passage in which Pentecost is compared with the beginning of the Jewish national life on Mt. Sinai (Ad Tabi., § 7): "There is Sinai, here Sion; there the trembling mountain, here the trembling house; there the flaming mountain, here the flaming tongues; there the noisy thunders, here the sounds of many tongues; there the clangor of the ramshorn, here the notes of the gospel-trumpet." This vivid passage shows the close analogy between the Jewish and Christian Pentecost.

In the post-apostolic Christian church Pentecost belonged to the so-called "Semestre Domini," as distinct from the "Semestre Ecclesiae,"

3. Later the church festivals properly so called.
Christian As yet there was no trace of Christmas, Observance which began to appear about 360 AD.

Easter, the beginning of the pentecostal period, closed the "Quadragesima," or "Lent," the entire period of which had been marked by self-denial and humiliation. On the contrary, the entire pentecostal period, the so-called "Quinquagesima," was marked by joyfulness, daily communion, absence of fasts, standing in prayer, etc. Ascension Day, the 40th day of the period, ushered in the climax of this joyfulness, which burst forth in its fullest volume on Pentecost. It was highly esteemed by the Fathers. Chrysostom calls it "the metropolis of the festivals" (De Pentec., Hom. ii); Gregory of Nazianzen calls it "the day of the Spirit" (De Pentec., Orat. 44). All the Fathers sound its praises. For they fully understood, with the church of the ages, that on that day the dispensation of the Spirit was begun, a dispensation of greater privileges and of a broader horizon and of greater power than had hitherto been vouchsafed to the church of the living God. The festival "Octaves," which, in accordance with the Jewish custom, devoted a whole week to the celebration of the festival, from the 8th cent., gave place to a two days' festival, a custom still preserved by the Roman church and such Protestant bodies as follow the ecclesiastical year. The habit of dressing in white and of seeking baptism on Pentecost gave it the name "Whitsunday," by which it is popularly known all over the world. HENRY E. DOSKER

PENUEL, pē-nū'el, pen'ū-el. See PENIEL.

PENURY, pen'ū-ri (מַחְסוֹר, maḥsōr): In Prov 14 23, with sense of "poverty," "want": "The talk of the lips tendeth only to penury." In the NT the word in Lk 21 4 (ὀστέρημα, husterēma) is in RV tr^d "want" (of the widow's mites).

PEOPLE, pē'p'l: In EV represents something over a dozen Heb and Gr words. Of these, in the OT, אָמ, 'am, is overwhelmingly the most common (some 2,000 t), with לְאֹמִים, lē'ōm, and גּוֹי, gōy, next in order; but the various Heb words are used with very little or no difference in force (e.g. Prov 14 28; but, on the other hand, in Ps 44 contrast vs 12 and 14). Of the changes introduced by RV the only one of significance (cited explicitly in the Preface to ERV) is the frequent use of the pl. "peoples" (strangely avoided in AV except Rev 10 11; 17 15), where other nations than Israel are in question. So, for instance, in Ps 67 4; Isa 55 4; 60 2, with the contrast marked in Ps 33 10 and 12; Ps 77 14 and 15, etc. In the NT, λαός, laos, is the most common word, with ὄχλος, ochlos, used almost as often in AV. But in RV the latter word is almost always rendered "multitude," "people" being retained only in Lk 7 12; Acts 11 24.26; 19 26, and in the fixed phrase "the common people" (ὁ πῶλος ὄχλος, ho polūs ochlos in Mk 12 37; Jn 12 9.12 m (the retention of "people" would have been better in Jn 11 42, also), with "crowd" (Mt 9 23.25; Acts 21 35). The only special use of "people" that calls for attention is the phrase "people of the land." This may mean simply "inhabitants," as Ezk 12 19; 33 2; 39 13; but in 2 K 11 14, etc., and the parallel in 2 Ch, it means the people as contrasted with the king, while in Jer 1 18, etc., and in Ezk 7 27; 22 29; 46 3.9, it means the common people as distinguished from the priests and the aristocracy. A different usage is that for the heathen (Gen 23 7.12.13; Nu 14 9) or half-heathen (Ezr 9 1.2; 10 2.11; Neh 10 28-31) inhabitants of Pal. From this last use, the phrase came to be applied by some rabbis to even pure-blooded Jews, if they neglected the observance of the rabbinic traditions (cf Jn 7 49 AV). For "people of the East" see CHILDREN OF THE EAST.

PEOR, pē'or (פְּעוֹר, ha-pe'or; Φογώρ, Phogōr):

(1) A mountain in the land of Moab, the last of the three heights to which Balaam was guided by Balak in order that he might curse Israel (Nu 23 28). It is placed by Onom on the way between Livias and Heshbon, 7 Rom miles from the latter. Buhl would identify it with Jebel el-Mashakkar, on which are the ruins of an old town, between Wādy A'yūn Mūsa and Wādy Heshbān.

(2) A town in the Judaeana uplands added by LXX (Φαγώρ, Phagōr) to the list in Josh 15 9. It may be identical with Khirbet Faghūr to the S. of Bethlehem.

(3) Peor, in Nu 25 18; 31 16; Josh 22 17, is a Divine name standing for "Baal-peor."

(4) In Gen 36 39, LXX reads Phogōr for "Pau" (MT), which in 1 Ch 1 50 appears as "Pai."

PERAEA, pē-rē'a (ἡ Περαιά, hē Peraia, Περαιός, Peraios, Περαιῆς, Peraiῆs): This is not a Scriptural name, but the term used by Jos

1. The to denote the district to which the rabbis habitually refer as "the land beyond Jordan." This corresponds to the NT phrase péran tou Iordánou (Mt 4 15; 19 1, etc). The boundaries of the province are given by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 3). In length it reached from Pella in the N. to Machaerus in the S., and in breadth from the Jordan on the W. to the desert on the E. We may take it that the southern boundary was the Arnon. The natural boundary on the N. would be the great gorge of the Yarmūk. Gadara, Jos tells us (BJ, IV, vii, 3, 6), was capital of the Peraea. But the famous city on the Yarmūk was a member of the Decapolis, and so could hardly take that position. More probably Jos referred to a city the ruins of which are found at Jedūr—a reminiscence of the ancient name—not far from es-Salt. The northern Gadara then holding the land on the southern bank of the Yarmūk, the northern boundary of the Peraea would run, as Jos says, from Pella eastward. For the description of the country thus indicated see GILEAD, 2.

In the time of the Maccabees the province was mainly gentile, and Judas found it necessary to remove to Judaea the scattered handful of Jews to secure their safety (1 Macc 5 45). Possibly under

2. History Hyrcanus Jewish influence began to prevail; and before the death of Jan-naeus the whole country owned his sway (HJP, I, i, 297, 306). At the death of Herod the Great it became part of the tetrarchy of Antipas (Ant, XVII, vii, 1). The tetrarch built a city on the site of the ancient Beth-haram (Josh 13 27) and called it Julius in honor of the emperor's wife (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). Here Simon made his abortive rising (Ant, XVII, x, 6; BJ, II, iv, 2). Claudius placed it under the government of Felix (BJ, II, xii, 8). It was finally added to the Rom dominions by Placidus (BJ, IV, vii, 3-6). Under the Moslems it became part of the province of Damascus.

Peraea, "the land beyond Jordan," ranked along with Judaea and Galilee as a province of the land of Israel. The people were under the same laws as regarded tithes, marriage and property.

Peraea lay between two gentile provinces on the E., as Samaria between two Jewish provinces on the W. of the Jordan. The fords below Beisān and opposite Jericho afforded communication with Galilee and Judaea respectively. Peraea thus formed a link connecting the Jewish provinces, so that the pilgrims from any part might go to Jerus and return without setting foot on gentile soil. And, what was at least of equal importance, they could avoid peril of hurt or indignity which the Samaritans loved to inflict on Jews passing through Samaria (Lk 9 52f; Ant, XX, vi, 1; Vita, 52).

It seems probable that Jesus was baptized within the boundaries of the Peraea; and hither He came from the turmoil of Jerus at the Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10 40). It was the scene of much quiet and profitable intercourse with His disciples (Mt 19; Mk 10 1-31; Lk 13 15-30). These passages are by many thought to refer to the period after His retirement to Ephraim (Jn 11 54). It was from Peraea that He was summoned by the sisters at Bethany (ver 3).

Peraea furnished in Niger one of the bravest men who fought against the Romans (BJ, II, xx, 4; IV, vi, 1). From Bethzob, a village of Peraea, came Mary, whose story is one of the most appalling among the terrible tales of the siege of Jerus (BJ, VI, iii, 4). Jos mentions Peraea for the last time (BJ, VI, v, 1), as echoing back the doleful groans and outcries that accompanied the destruction of Jerus.

PERAZIM, per'a-zim, pē-rā'zim, MOUNT (הַר־פְּרָצִים, har-p'rāzīm): "Jeh will rise up as in mount Perazim" (Isa 28 21). It is usually considered to be identical with BAAL-PERAZIM (q.v.), where David obtained a victory over the Philis (2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 14 11).

PERDITION, pēr-dish'un (ἀπόλεια, apōleia, "ruin" or "loss," physical or eternal): The word "perdition" occurs in the Eng. Bible 8 t (Jn 17 12; Phil 1 28; 2 Thess 2 3; 1 Tim 6 9; He 10 39; 2 Pet 3 7; Rev 17 11, 18). In each of these cases it denotes the final state of ruin and punishment which forms the opposite to salvation. The vb. apolleúein, from which the word is derived, has two meanings: (1) to lose; (2) to destroy. Both of these pass over to the noun, so that apōleia comes to signify: (1) loss; (2) ruin, destruction. The former occurs in Mt 26 8; Mk 14 4, the latter in the passages cited above. Both meanings had been adopted into the religious terminology of the Scriptures as early as the LXX. "To be lost" in the religious sense may mean "to be missing" and "to be ruined." The former meaning attaches to it in the teaching of Jesus, who compares the lost sinner to the missing coin, the missing sheep, and makes him the object of a seeking activity (Mt 10 6; 15 24; 18 11; Lk 15 4, 6, 8, 24, 32; 19 10). "To be lost" here signifies to have become estranged from God, to miss realizing the relations which man normally sustains toward Him. It is equivalent to what is theologically called "spiritual death." This conception of "loss" enters also into the description of the eschatological fate of the sinner as assigned in the judgment (Lk 9 24; 17 33), which is a loss of life. The other meaning of "ruin" and "destruction" describes the same thing from a different point of view. Apōleia being the opposite of sōtēria, and sōtēria in its technical usage denoting the reclaiming from death unto life, apōleia also acquires the specific sense of such ruin and destruction as involves an eternal loss of life (Phil 1 28; He 10 39). Perdition in this latter sense is equivalent to what theology calls "eternal death." When in Rev 17 8, 11 it is predicated of "the beast," one of the forms of the world-power, this must be understood on the basis of the OT prophetic representation according to which the coming judgment deals with powers rather than persons.

The Son of Perdition is a name given to Judas (Jn 17 12) and to the Antichrist (2 Thess 2 3). This is the well-known Heb idiom by which a person typically embodying a certain trait or character or destiny is called the son of that thing. The name therefore represents Judas and the Antichrist (see MAN OF SIN) as most irrecoverably and completely devoted to the final apōleia. GEERHARDUS VOS

PERES, pē'rez. See MENE.

PERESH, pē'resh (פֶּרֶשׁ, peresh, "dung"): Son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh through his Aramitish concubine (1 Ch 7 14, 16).

PEREZ, pē'rez, PHAREZ, fā'rez (פֶּרֶץ, peretz, "breach"): One of the twins born to Judah by Tamar, Zerach's brother (Gen 38 29, 30). In AV Mt 1 3 and Lk 3 33, he is called "Phares," the name in 1 Esd 5 5. He is "Pharez" in AV Gen 46 12; Nu 26 20, 21; Ruth 4 12, 18; 1 Ch 2 4, 5; 4 1; 9 4. In AV and RV 1 Ch 27 3; Neh 11 4, 6, he is "Perez." He is important through the fact that by way of Ruth and Boaz and so through Jesse and David his genealogy comes upward to the Saviour. The patronymic "Pharzite" occurs in Nu 26 20 AV.

PERFECT, pūr'fekt, PERFECTION, pēr-fek'-shun (שָׁלֵם, shālēm, תָּמִים, tāmīm; τέλειος, téleios, τελειότης, teleiōtēs): "Perfect" in the

1. In the OT is the tr of shālēm, "finished," "whole," "complete," used (except in Dt 25 15, "perfect weight") of persons, e.g. a "perfect heart," i.e. wholly or completely devoted to Jeh (1 K 8 61, etc; 1 Ch 12 38; Isa 38 3, etc); tāmīm, "complete," "perfect," "sound or unblemished," is also used of persons and of God, His way, and law ("Noah was a just man and perfect," RVM "blameless" [Gen 6 9]; "As for God, his way is perfect" [Ps 18 30]; "The law of Jeh is perfect" [Ps 19 7], etc); tām, with the same meaning, occurs only in Job, except twice in Pss (Job 1 1, 8; 2 3, etc; Ps 37 37; 64 4); kālūl, "complete," and various other words are tr'd "perfect."

Perfection is the tr of various words so trd once only: kālil (Lam 2 15); mikhlah, "completeness" (Ps 50 2); minleh, "possession" (Job 15 29, AV "neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth," ARV "neither shall their possessions be extended on the earth," m "their produce bend to the earth"; ERV reverses this text and m); tikhlah, "completeness," or "perfection" (Ps 119 96); takhliṭh (twice), "end," "completeness" (Job 11 7); "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?", 28 3, "searcheth out all perfection," AV, RV "to the furthest bound"; cf 26 10, RV "unto the confines of light and darkness"; tōm, "perfect," "completeness" (Isa 47 9, AV "They shall come upon thee in their perfection," RV "in their full measure"); RVM gives the meaning of "the Urim and the Thummim" (Ex 28 30, etc) as "the Lights and the Perfections."

Perfection is the tr of katartisis, "thorough adjustment," "fitness" (2 Cor 13 9, RV "perfecting"); of teleōōsis (He 7 11); of teleiōtes (He 6 1, RVM "full growth"); it is trd "perfectness" (Col 3 14); "perfection" in Lk 8 14 is the tr of telephorōō, "to bear on to completion or perfection." In Apoc "perfect," "perfection," etc, are for the most part the tr of words from telos, "the end," e.g. Wisd 4 13; Eccles 34 8; 44 17; 45 8, suntēleia, "full end"; 24 28; 50 11.

RV has "perfect" for "upright" (2 S 22 24.26 his); for "sound" (Ps 119 80); for "perform" (Phil 1 6); for "undefiled" (Ps 119 1, m "upright in way"; for "perfect peace, and at such a time" (Ezr 7 12), "perfect and so forth"; for "He maketh my way perfect" (2 S 22 33), "He guideth the perfect in his way," m "or, setteth free." According to another reading, "guideth my way in perfectness"; "shall himself perfect," m "restore," for "make you perfect" (1 Pet 5 10); "perfector" for "finisher" (He 12 2); "perfectly" is omitted in RV (Mt 14 36); "set your hope perfectly on" for AV "hope to the end for" (1 Pet 1 13).

Perfection is the Christian ideal and aim, but inasmuch as that which God has set before us is infinite—"Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5 48)—absolute perfection

3. The Christian Ideal must be forever beyond, not only any human, but any finite, being; it is a Divine ideal forever shining before us, calling us upward, and making endless progression possible. As noted above, the perfect man, in the OT phrase, was the man whose heart was truly or wholly devoted to God. Christian perfection must also have its seat in such a heart, but it implies the whole conduct and the whole man, conformed thereto as knowledge grows and opportunity arises, or might be found. There may be, of course, a relative perfection, e.g. of the child as a child compared with that of the man. The Christian ought to be continually moving onward toward perfection, looking to Him who is able to "make you perfect in every good thing [or work] to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen" (He 13 21). W. L. WALKER

PERFORM, pēr-fōrm' (Fr. parfournir, "to furnish completely," "to complete," "finish entirely"): In modern Eng., through a mistaken connection with "form," "perform" usually suggests an act in its continuity, while the word properly should emphasize only the completion of the act. AV seems to have used the word in order to convey the proper sense (cf Rom 15 28; 2 Cor 8 11; Phil 1 6, where RV has respectively "accomplish," "complete," "perfect"), but usually with so little justification in the Heb or Gr that "do" would have represented the original even better. RV has rarely changed the word in the OT, and such changes as have been made (Dt 23 23; Est 1 15, etc) seem based on no particular principle. In the NT the word has been kept only in Mt 5 33 and Rom 4 21, but in neither verse does the Gr accent the completion of the act, in the former case apodidōmi, lit. "to give back," in the latter poiōō, "to make," "to do," being used.

Performance is found in AV Sir 19 20 (RV "doing"); 2 Macc 11 17 (inserted needlessly and omitted by RV); Lk 1 45 (RV "fulfilment"); 2 Cor 8 11 (RV "completion").

PERFUME, pūr-fūm, pēr-fūm', PERFUMER (קָטָרֶת, kāṭōreth, קָטַר, kāṭar, lit. "incense"): The ancients were fond of sweet perfumes of all kinds (Prov 27 9), and that characteristic is still esp. true of the people of Bible lands. Perfumed oils were rubbed on the body and feet. At a feast in ancient Egypt a guest was anointed with scented oils, and a sweet-smelling water lily was placed in his hand or suspended on his forehead. In their religious worship the Egyptians were lavish with their incense. Small pellets of dried mixed spices and resins or resinous woods were burned in special censers. In the preparation of bodies for burial, perfumed oils and spices were used. Many Bib. references indicate the widespread use of perfumes. Cant 7 8 suggests that the breath was purposely scented; clothing as well as the body was perfumed (Ps 45 8; Cant 3 6; 4 11); couches and beds were sprinkled with savory scents (Prov 7 17); ointments were used in the last rites in honor of the dead (2 Ch 16 14; Lk 24 1; Jn 19 39). The writer has in his collection a lump of prepared spices and resins taken from a tomb dating from the 1st or 2d cent. AD, which was apparently fused and run into the thoracic cavity, since an impression of the ribs has been made on the perfume. Its odor is similar to that of the incense used today, and it perfumes the whole case where it is kept. The above collection also contains a small glass vial in which is a bronze spoon firmly held in some solidified ointment, probably formerly perfumed oil. Perfumes were commonly kept in sealed alabaster jars or cruses (Lk 7 38). Thousands of these cruses have been unearthed in Pal and Syria.

Perfumes were mixed by persons skilled in the art. In AV these are called "apothecaries" (רַקָּהָה, rakkāhāh). The RV "perfumer" is probably a more correct rendering, as the one who did the compounding was not an apothecary in the same sense as is the person now so designated (Ex 30 25.35; 37 29; Eccl 10 1).

Today incense is used in connection with all religious services of the oriental Christian churches. Although there is no direct mention of the uses of incense in the NT, such allusions as Paul's "a sacrifice to God for an odor of a sweet smell" (Eph 5 2; Phil 4 18) would seem to indicate that it was used by the early Christians.

The delight of the people of Syria in pleasant odors is recorded in their literature. The attar of roses (from Arab. 'itr, "a sweet odor") was a well-known product of Damascus. The guest in a modern Syrian home is not literally anointed with oil, but he is often given, soon after he enters, a bunch of aromatic herbs or a sweet-smelling flower to hold and smell. During a considerable portion of the year the country air is laden with the odor of aromatic herbs, such as mint and sage. The Arab. phrase for taking a walk is shemm el-hawa', lit. "smell the air." See INCENSE; OIL; OINTMENT.

PERGA, pûr'ga (Πέργη, Pérgē): An important city of the ancient province of Pamphylia, situated on the river Cestris, 12 miles N.E. of

1. Location Attalia. According to Acts 13 13, and History Paul, Barnabas and John Mark visited the place on their first missionary journey, and 2 years later, according to Acts 14 24,25, they may have preached there. Though the water of the river Cestris has now been diverted to the fields for irrigating purposes, in ancient times the stream was navigable, and small boats from the sea might reach the city. It is uncertain how ancient Perga is; its walls, still standing, seem to come from the Seleucid period or from the 3d cent. BC. It remained in the possession of the Seleucid kings until 189 BC, when Rom influence became strong in Asia Minor. A long series of coins, beginning in the 2d cent. BC, continued until 286 AD, and upon them Perga is mentioned as a metropolis. Though the city was never a stronghold of Christianity, it was the bishopric of Western Pamphylia, and several of the early Christians were martyred there. During the 8th cent. under Byzantine rule the city declined; in 1084 Attalia became the metropolis, and Perga rapidly fell to decay. While Attalia was the chief Gr and Christian city of Pamphylia, Perga was the seat of the local Asiatic goddess, who corresponded to Artemis or Diana of the Ephesians, and was locally known as Leto, or the queen of Perga. She is frequently represented on the coins as a huntress, with a bow in her hand, and with sphinxes or stags at her side.

The ruins of Perga are now called Murtana. The walls, which are flanked with towers, show the city

2. The Ruins to have been quadrangular in shape. Very broad streets, running through the town, and intersecting each other, divided the city into quarters. The sides of the streets were covered with porticos, and along their centers were water channels in which a stream was always flowing. They were covered at short intervals by bridges. Upon the higher ground was the acropolis, where the earliest city was built, but in later times the city extended to the S. of the hill, where one may see the greater part of the ruins. On the acropolis is the platform of a large structure with fragments of several granite columns, probably representing the temple of the goddess Leto; others regard it as the ruin of an early church. At the base of the acropolis are the ruins of an immense theater which seated 13,000 people, the agora, the baths and the stadium. Without the walls many tombs are to be seen. E. J. BANKS

PERGAMOS, pûr'ga-mos, or PERGAMUM, pûr'ga-mum (ἡ Πέργαμος, hē Pérgamos, or τὸ Πέργαμον, tò Pérgamon): Pergamos, to which the ancient writers also gave the neuter form of the name, was a city of Mysia of the ancient Rom province of Asia, in the Caicus valley, 3 miles from the river, and about 15 miles from the sea. The Caicus was navigable for small native craft. Two of the tributaries of the Caicus were the Selinus and the Kteios. The former of these rivers flowed through the city; the latter ran along its walls. On the hill between these two streams the first city stood, and there also stood the acropolis, the chief temples, and the theaters of the later city. The early people of the town were descendants of Gr colonists, and as early as 420 BC they struck coins of their own. Lysimachus, who possessed the town, deposited there 9,000 talents of gold. Upon his death, Philetaerus (283-263 BC) used this wealth to found the independent Gr dynasty of the Attalid kings. The first of this dynasty to bear the title of king was Attalus I (241-197 BC), a nephew of Philetaerus, and not only did he adorn the city with beautiful buildings until it became the most wonderful city of the East, but he added to his kingdom the countries of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Pamphylia and Phrygia. Eumenes II (197-159 BC) was the most illustrious king of the dynasty, and during his reign the city reached its greatest height. Art and literature were encouraged, and in the city was a library of 200,000 volumes which later Antony gave to Cleopatra. The books were of parchment which was here first used; hence the word "parchment," which is derived from the name of the town P. Of the structures which adorned the city, the most renowned was the altar of Zeus, which was 40 ft. in height, and also one of the wonders of the ancient world. When in 133 BC Attalus III, the last king of the dynasty, died, he gave his kingdom to the Rom government. His son, Aristonicus, however, attempted to seize it for himself, but in 129 he was defeated, and the Rom province of Asia was formed, and P. was made its capital. The term Asia, as here employed, should not be confused with the continent of Asia, nor with Asia Minor. It applied simply to that part of Asia Minor which was then in the possession of the Romans, and formed into the province of which P. was the capital. Upon the establishment of the province of Asia there began a new series of coins struck at P., which continued into the 3d cent. AD. The magnificence of the city continued.

There were beautiful temples to the four great gods Zeus, Dionysus, Athena and Asklepios. To the temple of the latter, invalids from

2. Religions all parts of Asia flocked, and there, while they were sleeping in the court, the god revealed to the priests and physicians by means of dreams the remedies which were necessary to heal their maladies. Thus opportunities of deception were numerous. There was a school of medicine in connection with the temple. P. was chiefly a religious center of the province. A title which it bore was "Thrice Neokoros," meaning that in the city 3 temples had been built to the Rom emperors, in which the emperors were worshipped as gods. Smyrna, a rival city, was a commercial center, and as it increased in wealth, it gradually became the political center. Later, when it became the capital, P. remained the religious center. As in many of the towns of Asia Minor, there were at P. many Jews, and in 130 BC the people of the city passed a decree in their favor. Many of the Jews were more or less assimilated with the Greeks, even to the extent of bearing Gr names.

Christianity reached P. early, for there one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev stood, and there, according to Rev 2 13, Antipas was martyred; he was the first Christian to be put to death by the Rom state. The same passage speaks of P. as the place "where Satan's throne is," probably referring to the temples in which the Rom emperors were worshipped. During

3. Christianity the Byzantine times P. still continued as a religious center, for there a bishop lived. However, the town fell into the hands of the Seljuks in 1304, and in 1336 it was taken by Suleiman, the son of Orkhan, and became Turkish.

The modern name of the town, which is of considerable size, possessing 15 mosques, is Bergama, the Turkish corruption of the ancient name. One of its mosques is the early Byzantine church of St. Sophia. The modern town is built among the ruins of the ancient city, but is far less in extent. From 1879 to 1886 excavations among the ruins were conducted by Herr Humann at the expense of the German government. Among them are still to be seen the base of the altar of Zeus, the friezes of which are now in the Pergamon Museum, Berlin; the theater, the agora, the gymnasium and several temples. In ancient times the city was noted for its ointments, pottery and parchment; at present the chief articles of trade are cotton, wool, opium, valonia, and leather.

PERIDA, pē-rī'da (פֶּרִידָא, p'ridhā, "recluse"): A family of "Solomon's servants" (Neh 7 57). In Ezr 2 55, a difference in the Heb spelling gives "Peruda" for the same person, who is also the "Pharida" of 1 Esd 5 33.

PERIZZITE, per-i-zīt, pe-riz'it (פֶּרִיזִי, p'rizzī; Φερεζαῖος, Pherezaios): Signifies "a villager," and so corresponds with the Eypg fellah. Hence the Perizzite is not included among the sons of Canaan in Gen 10, and is also coupled with the Canaanite (Gen 13 7; 34 30; Jgs 1 4). We hear, accordingly, of Canaanites and Perizzites at Shechem (Gen 34 30), at Bezek in Judah (Jgs 1 4) and, according to the reading of LXX, at Gezer (Josh 16 10). In Dt 3 5 and 1 S 6 18, where AV has "unwalled towns" and "country villages," LXX has "Perizzite," the lit. tr of the Heb being "cities of the Perizzite" or "villager" and "village of the Perizzite." The same expression occurs in Est 9 19, where it is used of the Jews in Elam. In Josh 17 15,18, where the Manassites are instructed to take possession of the forest land of Carmel, "Perizzites and Rephaim" are given as the equivalent of "Canaanite."

PERPETUAL, pēr-peṭ'ū-al, PERPETUALLY, pēr-peṭ'ū-al-i, PERPETUITY, pūr-pē-tū'i-ti (עוֹלָם, ōlām, נֶצַח, neṣaḥ, תָּמִיד, tāmīd):

Perpetual is usually the tr of ōlām, properly, "a wrapping up" or "hiding," used often of time indefinitely long, and of eternity when applied to God; hence we have, "for perpetual generations" (Gen 9 12); "the priesthood by a perpetual statute" (Ex 29 9; cf 31 16; Lev 3 17; 24 9, etc); "placed the sand for the bound of the sea, by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it" (Jer 5 22, RvM "an everlasting ordinance which it cannot pass"); "sleep a perpetual sleep" (Jer 51 39,57); "Moab shall be . . . a perpetual desolation" (Zeph 2 9), etc; neṣaḥ, "preëminence," "perpetuity," "eternity" (often tr^d "for ever," Ps 9 6), is tr^d "perpetual" (Ps 74 3; Jer 15 18); nāḥaḥ (part.) (Jer 8 5); tāmīd, "continuance," generally rendered "continually," but sometimes "perpetual" or "perpetually" (Ex 30 8; Lev 6 20).

Perpetually is the rendering of 'adh, properly "progress," "duration," hence long or indefinite time, eternity (usually in AV rendered "for ever"), in Am 1 11, "His anger did tear perpetually"; and of kōl ha-yāmīm, "all the days" (1 K 9 3; 2 Ch 7 16, "my heart shall be there perpetually"; cf Mt 28 20, pāsas tās hēmēras, lit. "all the days").

Perpetuity occurs in RV of Lev 25 23,30, "The land shall not be sold in perpetuity," "The house . . . shall be made sure in perpetuity."

Perpetual is frequent in Apoc, most often as the tr of aiōnios and kindred words, e.g. Jth 13 20, "a perpetual praise"; Wisd 10 14, "perpetual glory," RV "eternal"; Ecclus 11 33, "a perpetual blot," RV "blame for ever"; 1 Macc 6 44, "a perpetual name," RV "everlasting"; ainaos, "ever-flowing," occurs in Wisd 11 6 (so RV); endelechēs, "constant" (Ecclus 41 6, "perpetual reproach").

For "perpetual" (Jer 50 5; Hab 3 6) RV has "everlasting"; for "the old hatred" (Ezk 25 15), "perpetual enmity"; for "perpetual desolation" (Jer 25 12), "desolate for ever," m "Heb 'everlasting desolations.'"

The importance of this subject may be indicated by the fact of the frequency of its occurrence, both in the OT and NT, where in AV the words "persecute," "persecuted," "persecuting" are found no fewer than 53 t, "persecution" 14 t, and "persecutor" 9 t.

It must not be thought that persecution existed only in NT times. In the days of the OT it existed too. In what Jesus said to the Pharisees, He specially referred to the innocent blood which had been shed in

1. Persecution in OT Times those times, and told them that they were showing themselves heirs—to use a legal phrase—to their fathers who had persecuted the righteous, "from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah" (Mt 23 35).

In the period between the close of the OT and the coming of Christ, there was much and protracted suffering endured by the Jews, because

2. Between the Testaments of their refusal to embrace idolatry, and of their fidelity to the Mosaic Law and the worship of God. During that time there were many patriots who were true martyrs, and those heroes of faith, the Maccabees, were among those who "know their God . . . and do exploits" (Dnl 11 32). "We have no need of human help," said Jonathan the Jewish high priest, "having for our comfort the sacred Scriptures which are in our hands" (1 Macc 12 9).

In the Ep. to the He, persecution in the days of the OT is summed up in these words: "Others had trial of mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment: they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword: they went about in sheepskins, in goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, ill-treated (of whom the world was not worthy)" (He 11 36-38).

Coming now to NT times, persecution was frequently foretold by Christ, as certain to come to

3. Foretold by Christ those who were His true disciples and followers. He forewarned them again and again that it was inevitable. He said that He Himself must suffer it (Mt 16 21; 17 22,23; Mk 8 31).

It would be a test of true discipleship. In the parable of the Sower, He mentions this as one of the causes of defection among those who are Christians in outward appearance only. When affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately the stony-ground hearers are offended (Mk 4 17).

It would be a sure means of gaining a blessing, whenever it came to His loyal followers when they were in the way of well-doing; and He

5. A Means of Blessing thus speaks of it in two of the Beatitudes, "Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"; "Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you . . . for my sake" (Mt 5 10,11; see also ver 12).

It would take different forms, ranging through every possible variety, from false accusation to the infliction of death, beyond which, He

6. Various Forms pointed out (Mt 10 28; Lk 12 4), persecutors are unable to go. The methods of persecution which were employed by the Jews, and also by the heathen against the followers of Christ, were such as these: (1) Men would revile them and would say all manner of evil against them falsely, for Christ's sake (Mt 5 11). (2) Contempt and disparagement: "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon?" (Jn 8 48); "If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household!" (Mt 10 25). (3) Being, solely on account of their loyalty to Christ, forcibly separated from the company and the society of others, and expelled from the synagogues or other assemblies for the worship of God: "Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake" (Lk 6 22); "They shall put you out of the synagogues" (Jn 16 2). (4) Illegal arrest and spoliation of goods, and death itself.

All these various methods, used by the persecutor, were foretold, and all came to pass. It was the fear of apprehension and death that led the eleven disciples to forsake Jesus in Gethsemane and to flee for their lives. Jesus often forewarned them of the severity of the persecution which they would need to encounter if they were loyal to Him: "The hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you shall think that he offereth service unto God" (Jn 16 2); "I send unto you prophets . . . some of them shall ye kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city" (Mt 23 34).

In the case of Christ Himself, persecution took the form of attempts to entrap Him in

7. In the Case of Jesus His speech (Mt 22 15); the questioning of His authority (Mk 11 28); illegal arrest; the heaping of every insult upon Him as a prisoner; false accusation; and a violent and most cruel death.

After Our Lord's resurrection the first attacks against His disciples came from the high priest and his party. The high-priesthood was then in the hands of the Sadducees, and one reason which moved them to take action of this kind was their 'sore trouble,' because the apostles "proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead" (Acts 4 2; 5 17). The gospel based upon the resurrection of Christ was evidence of the untruth of the chief doctrines held by the Sadducees, for they held that there is no resurrection. But instead of yielding to the evidence of the fact that the resurrection had taken place, they opposed and denied it, and persecuted His disciples. For a time the Pharisees were more moderate in their attitude toward the Christian faith, as is shown in the case of Gamaliel (Acts 5 34); and on one occasion they were willing even to defend the apostle Paul (Acts 23 9) on the doctrine of the resurrection. But gradually the whole of the Jewish people became bitter persecutors of the Christians. Thus in the earliest of the Pauline Epp., it is said, "Ye also suffered the same things of your own countrymen, even as they [in Judaea] did of the Jews; who both killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drove out us, and please not God, and are contrary to all men" (1 Thess 2 14,15).

8. Instigated by the Jews

Serious persecution of the Christian church began with the case of Stephen (Acts 7 1-60); and his lawless execution was followed by "a

9. Stephen great persecution" directed against the Christians in Jerus. This "great persecution" (Acts 8 1) scattered the members of the church, who fled in order to avoid bonds and imprisonment and death. At this time Saul signalized himself by his great activity, persecuting "this Way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women" (Acts 22 4).

By and by one of the apostles was put to death—the first to suffer of "the glorious company of the apostles"—James the brother of John,

10. The Apostles who was slain with the sword by Herod Agrippa (Acts 12 2). Peter also was James and Peter imprisoned, and was delivered only by an angel (12 7-11).

During the period covered by the Acts there was not much purely gentile persecution: at that time the persecution suffered by the Christian church was chiefly Jewish. There

11. Gentile Persecution were, however, great dangers and risks encountered by the apostles and by all who proclaimed the gospel then.

Thus, at Philippi, Paul and Silas were most cruelly persecuted (Acts 16 19-40); and, even before that time, Paul and Barnabas had suffered much at Iconium and at Lystra (Acts 14 5,19). On the whole the Rom authorities were not actively hostile during the greater part of Paul's lifetime. Gallio, for instance, the deputy of Achaia, declined to go into the charge brought by the Jews at Corinth against Paul (Acts 18 14,15,16). And when Paul had pleaded in his own defence before King Herod Agrippa and the Rom governor Festus, these two judges were agreed in the opinion, "This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds" (Acts 26 31). Indeed it is evident (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 308) that the purpose of Paul's trial being recorded at length in the Acts is to establish the fact that the preaching of the gospel was not forbidden by the laws of the Rom empire, but that Christianity was a religio licita, a lawful religion.

Christianity, at first, not a forbidden religion.—This legality of the Christian faith was illustrated and enforced by the fact that when Paul's case was heard and decided by the supreme court of appeal at Rome, he was set free and resumed his missionary labors, as these are recorded or referred to in the Pastoral Epp. "One thing, however, is clear from a comparison of Phil with 2 Tim. There had been in the interval a complete change in the policy toward Christianity of the Rom government. This change was due to the great fire of Rome (July, 64). As part of the persecution which then broke out, orders were given for the imprisonment of the Christian leaders. Poppaea, Tigellinus and their Jewish friends were not likely to the prisoner of two years before. At the time St. Paul was away from Rome, but steps were instantly taken for his arrest. The apostle was brought back to the city in the autumn or winter of 64. . . . That he had a trial at all, instead of the summary punishment of his brethren, witnesses to the importance attached by the government to a show of legality in the persecution of the leader" (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 38). See PASTORAL EPISTLES; PAUL THE APOSTLE.

The legal decisions which were favorable to the Christian faith were soon overturned on the occasion of the great fire in Rome, which

12. The occurred in July, 64. The public
Neronic feeling of resentment broke out against Persecution the emperor to such a degree that, to avoid the stigma, just or unjust, of being himself guilty of setting the city on fire, he made the Christians the scapegoats which he thought he needed. Tacitus (Annals xv.44) relates all that occurred at that time, and what he says is most interesting, as being one of the very earliest notices found in any profane author, both of the Christian faith, and of Christ Himself.

(1) Testimony of Tacitus.—What Tacitus says is that nothing that Nero could do, either in the way of gifts to the populace or in that of sacrifice to the Rom deities, could make the people believe that he was innocent of causing the great fire which had consumed their dwellings. Hence to relieve himself of this infamy he falsely accused the Christians of being guilty of the crime of setting the city on fire. Tacitus uses the strange expression "the persons commonly called Christians who were hated for their enormities." This is an instance of the saying of all manner of evil against them falsely, for Christ's sake. The Christians, whose lives were pure and virtuous and beneficent, were spoken of as being the offscouring of the earth.

(2) References in 1 Pet.—The First Ep. of Peter is one of the parts of the NT which seem to make direct reference to the Neronic persecution, and he uses words (1 Pet 4 12ff) which may be compared with the narrative of Tacitus: "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial among you, which cometh upon you to prove you, as though a strange thing happened unto you: but inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, rejoice. . . . If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye; because the Spirit of glory and the Spirit of God resteth upon you. For let none of you suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or an evil-doer, or as a meddler in other men's matters: but if a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name. For the time is come for judgment to begin at the house of God. . . . Wherefore let them also that suffer according to the will of God commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator."

(3) Tacitus' narrative.—How altogether apposite and suitable was this comforting exhortation to the case of those who suffered in the Neronic persecution. The description which Tacitus gives is as follows: "Christus, the founder of that name, was put to death as a criminal by Pontius Pilate, procurator in the reign of Tiberius. But the pernicious superstition, repressed for a time, broke out again not only through Judaea, where the mischief originated, but through the city of Rome also, whither all things horrible and disgraceful flow from all quarters as to a common sink, and where they are encouraged. Accordingly, first, those were seized who confessed they were Christians; next, on their information, a vast multitude were convicted, not so much on the charge of setting the city on fire, as of hating the human race. And in their deaths they were made the subject of sport, for they were covered with the skins of wild beasts and were worried to death by dogs, or nailed to crosses, or set fire to, and when day declined were burned to serve for nocturnal lights. Nero offered his own gardens for that spectacle, and exhibited circus games, indiscriminately mingling with the common people dressed as a charioteer, or else standing in the sufferers, whence a feeling of compassion arose toward the sufferers, though guilty and deserving to be made examples of by capital punishment, because they seemed not to be cut off for the public good, but to be victims to the ferocity of one man." See NERO.

(4) NT references.—Three of the books of the NT bear the marks of that most cruel persecution under Nero, the Second Ep. to Timothy, the First Ep. of Peter—already referred to—and the Rev of John. In 2 Tim, Paul speaks of his impending condemnation to death, and the terror inspired by the persecution causes "all" to forsake him when he is brought to public trial (2 Tim 4 16).

The "fiery trial" is spoken of in 1 Pet, and Christians are exhorted to maintain their faith with patience; they are pleaded with to have their "conversation honest" (1 Pet 2 12 AV), so that all accusations directed against them may be seen to be untrue, and their sufferings shall then be, not for ill-doing, but only for the name of Christ (3 14.16). "This important ep. proves a general persecution (1 6; 4 12.16) in Asia Minor N. of the Taurus (1 1; note esp. Bithynia) and elsewhere (5 9). The Christians suffer 'for the name,' but not the name alone (4 14). They are the objects of vile slanders (2 12.15; 3 14-16; 4 4.15), as well as of considerable zeal on the part of officials (5 8 [Gr 3 15]). As regards the slanders, the Christians should be circumspect (2 15.16; 3 16.17; 4 15). The persecution will be short, for the end of all things is at hand (4 7.13; 5 4)" (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 354).

In Rev the apostle John is in "Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (Rev 1 9). Persecution has broken out among

cution in At Smyrna, there is suffering, imprison-Asia ment and prolonged tribulation; but the sufferers are cheered when they are told that if they are faithful unto death, Christ will give them the crown of life (Rev 2 10). At Pergamum, persecution has already resulted in Antipas, Christ's faithful martyr, being slain (2 13). At Ephesus and at Thyatira the Christians are commended for their patience, evidently indicating that there had been persecution (2 2.19). At Philadelphia there has been the attempt made to cause the members of the church to deny Christ's name (3 8); their patience is also commended, and the hour of temptation is spoken of, which comes to try all the world, but from which Christ promised to keep the faithful Christians in Philadelphia. Strangely enough, there is no distinct mention of persecution having taken place in Sardis or in Laodicea.

As the book proceeds, evidences of persecution are multiplied. In 6 9, the apostle sees under the altar the souls of them that were slain

14. Rome as for the word of God and for the testi-
Persecutor mony which they held; and those souls are bidden to rest yet for a little season "until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, who should be killed even as they were, should have fulfilled their course" (6 11). The meaning is that there is not yet to be an end of suffering for Christ's sake; persecution may continue to be as severe as ever. Cf 20 4, "I saw the souls of them that had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and such as worshipped not the beast," for the persecution had raged against all classes indiscriminately, and Rom citizens who were true to Christ had suffered unto death. It is to these that reference is made in the words "had been beheaded," decapitation being reserved as the most honorable form of execution, for Rom citizens only. So terrible does the persecution of Christians by the imperial authorities become, that Rome is "drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus" (17 6; 16 6; see also 18 24; 19 2).

Paul's martyrdom is implied in 2 Tim, throughout the whole ep., and esp. in 4 6.7.8. The martyrdom of Peter is also implied in Jn 21 18.19, and in

2 Pet 1 14. The abiding impression made by these times of persecution upon the mind of the apostle John is also seen in the defiance of the world found throughout his First Ep. (2 17; 5 19), and in the rejoicing over the fall of Babylon, the great persecuting power, as that fall is described in such passages as Rev 14 8; 15 2,3; 17 14; 18 24.

Following immediately upon the close of the NT, there is another remarkable witness to the continuance of the Rom persecution against the Christian church. This is Pliny, proconsul of Bithynia.

In 111 or 112 AD, he writes to the emperor Trajan a letter in which he describes the growth of the Christian faith. He goes on to say that "many of all ages and of all ranks and even of both sexes are being called into danger, and will continue to be so. In fact the contagion of this superstition is not confined to the cities only, but has spread to the villages and country districts." He proceeds to narrate how the heathen temples had been deserted and the religious rites had been abandoned for so long a time: even the sacrificial food—that is, the flesh of the sacrificial victims—could scarcely find a purchaser.

But Pliny had endeavored to stem the tide of the advancing Christian faith, and he tells the emperor how he had succeeded in bringing back to the heathen worship many professing Christians. That is to say, he had used persecuting measures, and had succeeded in forcing some of the Christians to abandon their faith. He tells the methods he had used. "The method I have observed toward those who have been brought before me as Christians is this. I asked them whether they were Christians. If they admitted it, I repeated the question a second and a third time, and threatened them with punishment. If they persisted I ordered them to be punished. For I did not doubt, whatever the nature of that which they confessed might be, that a contumacious and inflexible obstinacy ought to be punished. There were others also, possessed with the same infatuation, whom, because they were Rom citizens, I ordered to be sent to Rome. But this crime spreading, as is usually the case, while it was actually under legal prosecution, several cases occurred. An anonymous information was laid before me, containing the names of many persons. Those who denied that they were Christians, or that they had ever been so, repeated after me an invocation of the gods, and offered prayer, with wine and incense, to your statue, which I had ordered to be brought in for this very purpose, along with the statues of the gods, and they even reviled the name of Christ; whereas there is no forcing, it is said, those who are really Christians into any of these compliances: I thought it proper to discharge them. Others who were accused by a witness at first confessed themselves Christians, but afterward denied it. Some owned indeed that they had been Christians formerly, but had now, some for several years, and a few above 20 years ago, renounced it. They all worshipped your statue and the images of the gods. . . . I forbade the meeting of any assemblies, and therefore I judged it to be so much the more necessary to endeavor to extort the real truth by putting to the torture two female slaves, who were called deaconesses, yet I found nothing but an absurd and extravagant superstition."

In Trajan's reply to Pliny he writes, "They [the Christians] ought not to be searched for. If they are brought before you and convicted, they should be punished, but this should be done in such a way, that he who denies that he is a Christian, and when his statement is proved by his invoking our deities, such a person, although suspected for past conduct, must nevertheless be forgiven, because of his repentance."

These letters of Pliny and Trajan treat state-persecution as the standing procedure—and this not a generation after the death of the apostle John. The sufferings and tribulation predicted in Rev 2 10, and in many other passages, had indeed come to pass. Some of the Christians had denied the name of Christ and had worshipped the images of the emperor and of the idols, but multitudes of them had been faithful unto death, and had received the martyr's crown of life.

Speaking generally, persecution of greater or less severity was the normal method employed by the

Rom empire against the Christian church during the 2d and the 3d cents. It may be said to have come to an end only about the end of the 3d or the beginning of the 4th cent., when the empire became nominally Christian.

When the apostolic period is left, persecution becomes almost the normal state in which the church is found. And persecution, instead of abolishing the name of Christ, as the persecutors vainly imagined they had succeeded in doing, became the means of the growth of the Christian church and of its purity. Both of these important ends, and others too, were secured by the severity of the means employed by the persecuting power of the Rom empire.

Under Trajan's successor, the emperor Hadrian, the lot of the Christians was full of uncertainty: persecution might break out at any moment. At the best Hadrian's régime was only that of unauthorized toleration.

With the exception of such instances as those of Nero and Domitian, there is the surprising fact to notice, that it was not the worst emperors, but the best, who became the most violent persecutors. One reason probably was that the ability of those emperors led them to see that the religion of Christ is really a divisive factor in any kingdom in which civil government and pagan religion are indissolubly bound up together. The more that such a ruler was intent on preserving the unity of the empire, the more would he persecute the Christian faith. Hence among the rulers who were persecutors, there are the names of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius the philosopher-emperor, and Septimius Severus (died at York, 211 AD).

Persecution was no accident, which chanced to happen, but which might not have occurred at all.

It was the necessary consequence of the principles embodied in the heathen Rom government, when these came into contact and into conflict with the essential principles of the Christian faith. The reasons for the persecution of the Christian church by the Rom empire were (1) political; (2) on account of the claim which the Christian faith makes, and which it cannot help making, to the exclusive allegiance of the heart and of the life. That loyalty to Christ which the martyrs displayed was believed by the authorities in the state to be incompatible with the duties of a Rom citizen. Patriotism demanded that every citizen should unite in the worship of the emperor, but Christians refused to take part in this worship on any terms, and so they continually lived under the shadow of a great hatred, which always slumbered, and might break out at any time. The claim which the Christian faith made to the absolute and exclusive loyalty of all who obeyed Christ was such that it admitted of no compromise with heathenism. To receive Christ into the pantheon as another divinity, as one of several—this was not the Christian faith. To every loyal follower of Christ compromise with other faiths was an impossibility. An accommodated Christianity would itself have been false to the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He had sent, and would never have conquered the world. To the heathen there were lords many and gods many, but to the Christians there was but one God the Father and one Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world (1 Cor 8 5,6). The essential absoluteness of the Christian faith was its strength, but this was also the cause of its being hated.

"By a correct instinct paganisms of all sorts discerned in the infant church their only rival. So, while the new Hercules was yet in the cradle, they sent their snakes to kill him. But Hercules lived to cleanse out the Augean stables" (Workman, op. cit., 88).

"For 200 years, to become a Christian meant the great renunciation, the joining a despised and persecuted sect, the swimming against the tide of popular prejudice, the coming under the ban of the Empire, the possibility at any moment of imprisonment and death under its most fearful forms. For 200 years he that would follow Christ must count the cost, and be prepared to pay the same with his liberty and life. For 200 years the mere profession of Christianity was itself a crime. Christianus sum was almost the one plea for which there was no forgiveness, in itself all that was necessary as a 'title' on the back of the condemned. He who made it was allowed neither to present apology, nor call in the aid of a pleader. "Public hatred," writes Tertullian, "asks but one thing, and that not investigation into the crimes charged, but simply the confession of the Christian name." For the name itself in periods of stress, not a few, meant the rack, the blazing shirt of pitch, the lion, the panther, or in the case of maidens an infamy worse than death" (Workman, 103).

Service in the Rom army involved, for a Christian, increasing danger in the midst of an organized and aggressive heathenism. Hence arose the persecution of the Christian soldier who refused compliance with the idolatrous ceremonies in which the army engaged, whether those ceremonies were concerned with the worship of the Rom deities or with that of Mithraism. "The invincible saviour," as Mithra was called, had become, at the time when Tertullian and Origen wrote, the special deity of soldiers. Shrines in honor of Mithra were erected through the entire breadth of the Rom empire, from Dacia and Pannonia to the Cheviot Hills in Britain. And woe to the soldier who refused compliance with the religious sacrifices to which the legions gave their adhesion! The Christians in the Rom legions formed no inconsiderable proportion of "the noble army of martyrs," it being easier for the persecuting authorities to detect a Christian in the ranks of the army than elsewhere.

In the 2d and 3d cents. Christians were to be found everywhere, for Tertullian, in an oftentimes quoted passage in his Apology, writes, "We live beside you in the world, making use of the same forum, market, bath, shop, inn, and all other places of trade. We sail with you, fight shoulder to shoulder, till the soil, and traffic with you"; yet the very existence of Christian faith, and its profession, continued to bring the greatest risks. "With the best will in the world, they remained a peculiar people, who must be prepared at any moment to meet the storm of hatred" (Workman, 189). For them it remained true that in one way or another, hatred on the part of the world inevitably fell to the lot of those who walked in the footsteps of the Master; "All that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim 3 12).

The strange title, "the third race," probably invented by the heathen, but willingly accepted by the Christians without demur, showed with what a bitter spirit the heathen regarded the faith of Christ. "The first race" was indifferently called the Roman, Greek, or Gentile. "The second race" was the Jews; while "the third race" was the Christian. The cry in the circus of Carthage was Usque quo gens tertium? "How long must we endure this third race?"

But one of the most powerful causes of the hatred entertained by the heathen against the Christians was, that though there were no citizens so loyal as they, yet in every case in which the laws and customs of the empire came into conflict with the will of God, their supreme rule was loyalty to Christ, they must obey God rather than man. To worship Caesar, to offer even one grain of incense on the shrine of Diana, no Christian would ever consent, not even when this minimum of compliance would save life itself.

The Rom empire claimed to be a kingdom of universal sway, not only over the bodies and the property of all its subjects, but over their consciences and their souls. It demanded absolute obedience to its supreme lord, that is, to Caesar. This obedience the Christian could not render, for unlimited obedience of body, soul and spirit is due to God alone, the only Lord of the conscience. Hence it was that there arose the antagonism of the government to Christianity, with persecution as the inevitable result.

These results, hatred and persecution, were, in such circumstances, inevitable; they were "the outcome of the fundamental tenet of primitive Christianity, that the Christian ceased to be his own master, ceased to have his old environment, ceased to hold his old connections with the state; in everything he became the bond-servant of Jesus Christ, in everything owing supreme allegiance and fealty to the new empire and the Crucified Head. 'We engage in these conflicts,' said Tertullian, 'as men whose very lives are not our own. We have no master but God'" (Workman, 195).

The persecution inaugurated by the emperor Decius in 250 AD was particularly severe. There was hardly a province in the empire where there were no martyrs; but there were also many who abandoned their faith and rushed to the magistrates to obtain their libelli, or certificates that they had offered heathen sacrifice. When the days of persecution were over, these persons usually came with eagerness to seek readmission to the church. It was in the Decian persecution that the great theologian Origen, who was then in his 68th year, suffered the cruel torture of the rack; and from the effects of what he then suffered he died at Tyre in 254.

Many libelli have been discovered in recent excavations in Egypt. In the Expos T for January, 1909, p. 185, Dr. George Milligan gives an example, and prints the Gr text of one of these recently discovered Egypt libelli.

These libelli are most interesting, illustrating as they do the account which Cyprian gives of the way in which some faint-hearted Christians during the Decian persecution obtained certificates—some of these certificates being true to fact, and others false—to the effect that they had sacrificed in the heathen manner. The one which Dr. Milligan gives is as follows: "To those chosen to superintend the sacrifices at the village of Alexander Island, from Aurelius Diogenes, the son of Satabus, of the village of Alexander Island, being about 72 years old, a scar on the right eyebrow. Not only have I always continued sacrificing to the gods, but now also in your presence, in accordance with the decrees, I have sacrificed and poured libations and tasted the offerings, and I request you to countersign my statement. May good fortune attend you. I, Aurelius Diogenes, have made this request."

(2d Hand) "I, Aurelius Syrus, as a participant, have certified Diogenes as sacrificing along with us."

(1st Hand) "The first year of the Emperor Caesar Gaius Messius Quintus Trajan Decius Pius Felix Augustus, Epiph. 2" (= June 25, 250 AD).

Under Valerian the persecution was again very severe, but his successor, Gallienus, issued an edict of toleration, in which he guaranteed freedom of worship to the Christians. Thus Christianity definitely became a religio licita, a lawful religion. This freedom from persecution continued until the reign of Diocletian.

The persecution of the Christian church by the empire of Rome came to an end in March, 313 AD, when Constantine issued the document known as the "Edict of Milan," which assured to each individual freedom of religious belief. This document marks an era of the utmost importance in the history of the world. Official Rom persecution had done its worst, and had failed; it was ended now; the Galilean had conquered.

The results of persecution were: (1) It raised up witnesses, true witnesses, for the Christian faith. Men and women and even children were among the martyrs whom no cruelties, however refined and protracted, could terrify into denial of their Lord. It is to a large extent owing to persecution that the Christian church possesses the testimony of men like Quadratus and Tertullian and Origen and Cyprian and many others. While those who had adopted the Christian faith in an external and formal manner only generally went back from their profession, the true Christian, as even the Rom proconsul Pliny testifies, could not be made to do this. The same stroke which crushed the straw—such as a saying of Augustine's—separated the pure grain which the Lord had chosen.

(2) Persecution showed that the Christian faith is immortal even in this world. Of Christ's kingdom there shall be no end. "Hammer away, ye hostile bands, your hammers break, God's altar stands." Pagan Rome, Babylon the Great, as it is called by the apostle John in the Apocalypse, tried hard to destroy the church of Christ; Babylon was drunk with the blood of the saints. God allowed this tyranny to exist for 300 years, and the blood of His children was shed like water. Why was it necessary that the church should have so terrible and so prolonged an experience of suffering? It was in order to convince the world that though the kings of the earth gather themselves against the Lord and against His Christ, yet all that they can do is vain. God is in the midst of Zion; He shall help her, and that right early. The Christian church, as if suspended between heaven and earth, had no need of other help than that of the unseen but Divine hand, which at every moment held it up and kept it from falling. Never was the church more free, never stronger, never more flourishing, never more extensive in its growth, than in the days of persecution.

And what became of the great persecuting power, the Rom empire? It fell before the barbarians. Rome is fallen in its ruins, and its idols are utterly abolished, while the barbarians who overwhelmed the empire have become the nominally Christian nations of modern Europe, and their descendants have carried the Christian faith to America and Australia and Africa and all over the world.

(3) Persecution became, to a large extent, an important means of preserving the true doctrines of the person and of the work of Christ. It was in the ages of persecution that Gnosticism died, though it died slowly. It was in the ages of persecution that Arianism was overthrown. At the Council of Nicea in 325 AD, among those who were present and took part in the discussion and in the decision of the council, there were those who "bore in their bodies the branding-marks of Jesus," who had suffered pain and loss for Christ's sake.

Persecution was followed by these important results, for God in His wisdom had seen fit to permit these evils to happen, in order to change them into permanent good; and thus the wrath of man was overruled to praise God, and to effect more ultimate good, than if the persecutions had not taken place at all. What, in a word, could be more Divine than to curb and restrain and overrule evil itself and change it into good? God lets iniquity do what it pleases, according to its own designs; but in permitting it to move on one side, rather than on another, He overrules it and makes it enter into the order of His providence. So He lets this fury against the Christian faith be kindled in the hearts of persecutors, so that they afflict the saints of the Most High. But the church remains safe, for persecution can work nothing but ultimate good in the hand of God. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." So said Tertullian, and what he said is true.

Persecution has permanently enriched the history of the church. It has given us the noble heritage of the testimony and the suffering of those whose lives would otherwise have been unrecorded. Their very names as well as their careers would have been unknown had not persecution "dragged them into fame and chased them up to heaven."

Persecution made Christ very near and very precious to those who suffered. Many of the martyrs bore witness, even when in the midst of the most cruel torments, that they felt no pain, but that Christ was with them. Instances to this effect could be multiplied. Persecution made them feel how true Christ's words were, that even as He was not of the world, so they also were not of it. If they had been of the world, the world would love its own, but because Christ had chosen them out of the world, therefore the world hated them. They were not greater than their Lord. If men had persecuted Jesus, they would also persecute His true disciples. But though they were persecuted, they were of good cheer, Christ had overcome the world; He was with them; He enabled them to be faithful unto death. He had promised them the crown of life.

Browning's beautiful lines describe what was a common experience of the martyrs, how Christ "in them" and "with them," "quenched the power of fire," and made them more than conquerors:

"I was some time in being burned,
But at the close a Hand came through
The fire above my head, and drew
My soul to Christ, whom now I see.
Sergius, a brother, writes for me
This testimony on the wall—
For me, I have forgot it all."

PERSEPOLIS, pēr-sep'ō-lis (2 Macc 9 2; Περσέ-πολις, Persēpolis, Περσαίπολις, Persaīpolis, in Ptolemy Περσόπολις, Persōpolis; orig-

1. Location inal Pers name unknown; Pahlavi Stakhr, now Istakhr and Chihil Minār, "Forty Turrets"): The ruins of Persepolis lie about 35 miles N.E. of Shirāz and some 40 miles S. of the ruins of Pasargadae.

The magnificent palace of which such striking remains are still visible (Takht i Jamshīd) was built by Darius and Xerxes of white marble

2. History and black stone. The city was captured, pillaged and burnt by Alexander in 324 BC, most of the inhabitants being massacred or enslaved. Much of the treasure of the Pers kings was found there. Curtius says the palace was never rebuilt. Antiochus Epiphanes (166 BC) tried but failed to plunder the temple (of Anaitis, Anāhita?) there (2 Macc 9 2; perhaps this is the incident referred to in 1 Macc 6 1 ff, and Polyb. xxxi.11). At Persepolis were the sepulchers of the Achaemenian kings (except Cyrus). Long and important inscriptions of Darius and Xerxes are found at Persepolis and the neighboring Naqsh i Rūstam, in cuneiform characters and in the Achaemenian Pers, Assyrian and neo-Susian tongues (published by Spiegel, Rawlinson and Weisbach). Clitarchus first among Europeans mentions the city. The writer of this article visited it in 1892. Not now inhabited.

PERSEUS, pūr'sūs, pūr'sē-us (Περσεύς, Perseús): In 1 Macc 8 5 the conquest of "Perseus, king of the Citims" (RV "king of Chittim") was part of the "fame of the Romans" which reached the ears of Judas. This Perseus, the son and successor of Philip III of Macedonia, came to the throne in 178 BC and was the last king of Macedonia. In 171 BC began the war with Rome which ended in his disastrous defeat and capture at Pydna, 168 BC (to which 1 Macc 8 5 refers), by L. Aemilius Paulus. Macedonia soon became a Rom province. Perseus was led to Rome to grace the triumph of his conqueror, by whose clemency he was spared, and died in captivity at Rome (Polyb. xxix.17; Livy xlv. 40 ff).

Kittim or Chittim, properly of the people of the town of Citium in Cyprus, then signifying Cyprians, and extended by Jewish writers (Gen 10 4; Nu 24 24; Isa 23 1; Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6; Dnl 11 30; Jos. Ant. I, vi) to include the coasts of Greece generally, is here applied to Macedonia. In 1 Macc 1 1 Macedonia (or Greece) is called "the land of Chittim."

PERSEVERANCE, pūr-sē-vēr'ans: The word occurs only once in AV (Eph 6 18), where it refers quite simply to persistence in prayer. In theology (esp. in the phrase "final perseverance") the word has come to denote a special persistency, the undying continuance of the new life (manifested in faith and holiness) given by the Spirit of God to man. It is questioned whether such imparted life is (by its nature, or by the law of its impartation) necessarily permanent, indestructible, so that the once regenerate and believing man has the prospect of final glory infallibly assured. This is not the place to trace the history of a great and complex debate. It is more fitting here to point to the problem as connected with that supreme class of truths in which, because of our necessary mental limits, the entire truth can only be apprehended as the unrevealed but certain harmony of seeming contradictions. Scripture on the one hand abounds with assurances of "perseverance" as a fact, and largely intimates that an exulting anticipation of it is the intended experience of the believer (see Jn 10 28 above all, and cf among other passages Rom 8 31-37; 1 Pet 1 8.9). On the other hand, we find frequent and urgent warnings and cautions (see e.g. 1 Cor 8 11; 9 27). The teacher dealing with actual cases, as in pastoral work, should be ready to adopt both classes of utterances, each with its proper application; applying the first, e.g., to the true but timid disciple, the latter to the self-confident. Meanwhile Scripture on the whole, by the manner and weight of its positive statements, favors a humble belief of the permanence, in the plan of God, of the once-given new life. It is as if it laid down "perseverance" as the Divine rule for the Christian, while the negative passages came in to caution the man not to deceive himself with appearances, nor to let any belief whatever palliate the guilt and minimize the danger of sin. In the biographies of Scripture, it is noteworthy that no person appears who, at one time certainly a saint, was later certainly a castaway. The awful words of He 6 4-6; 10 26.27 appear to deal with cases (such as Balaam's) of much light but no loving life, and so are not precisely in point. Upon the whole subject, it is important to make "the Perseverance of the Saviour" our watchword rather than "the Perseverance of the saint."

PERSIA, pûr'sha, -zha (𐎱𐎠𐎼𐎿, pārsā; Περσίς, Persis; in Assy Parsu, Parsua; in Achaemenian Pers Pārsa, modern Fārs): In the Bible (2 Ch 36 20.22.23; Ezr 1 1.8; Est 1 3.14.18; 10 2; Ezk 27 10; 38 5; Dnl 8 20; 10 1; 11 2) this name denotes properly the modern province of Fārs, not the whole Pers empire. The latter was by its people called Airyana, the present Irān (from the Skt. word ārya, "noble"); and even now the Persians never call their country anything but Irān, never "Persia." The province of Persis lay to the E. of Elam (Susiana), and stretched from the Pers Gulf to the Great Salt Desert, having Carmania on the S.E. Its chief cities were Persepolis and Pasargadae. Along the Pers Gulf the land is low, hot and unhealthy, but it soon begins to rise as one travels inland. Most of the province consists of high and steep mountains and plateaus, with fertile valleys. The table-lands in which lie the modern city of Shirāz and the ruins of Persepolis and Pasargadae are well watered and productive. Nearer the desert, however, cultivation grows scanty for want of water. Persis was doubtless in early times included in Elam, and its population was then either Semitic or allied to the Accadians, who founded more than one state in the Bab plain. The Aryan Persians seem to have occupied the country in the 8th or 9th cent. BC.

LITERATURE

I. Language (Introductory).—The Pers language, ancient and modern alike, is an Aryan tongue. In its ancient forms it is more closely connected with Vedic Sanskrit than with any other language except Armenian. Most of its roots are to be found also in Slavonic, Gr, Lat and other tongues of the same stock.

There were two main dialects in the ancient language of Irān (Airyānem), (1) that of the Persians proper, and (2) that of the Medes.

Dialects The former is known to us from the inscriptions of the Achaemenian kings, the latter from the Avesta, and a few Median words preserved for us by Herodotus and other Gr writers.

II. Old Persian Inscriptions.—These fall between 550 and 330 BC, and contain about 1,000 lines and 400 words. They are carved upon the rocks in a cuneiform character, simplified from that of the neo-Susian, which again comes from the neo-Bab syllabary. In Old Pers inscriptions only 44 characters are employed, of which 7 are ideographs or contractions. The remaining 37 phonetic signs are syllabic, each consisting of an open syllable and not merely of a single letter, except in case of separate vowels. The syllabary, though much simpler than any other cuneiform system, does not quite attain therefore to being an alphabet. It was written from left to right, like the other cuneiform syllabaries. Of Cyrus the Great only one Pers sentence has been found: Adam Kurush Khshāyathiya Hakhāmānishiya, "I am Cyrus the King, the Achaemenian." Darius I has left us long inscriptions, at Behistān (Besitūn), Mt. Alvand, Persepolis, Naqsh i Rostam, etc, and one at Suez, the latter mentioning his conquest of Egypt and the construction of the first (?) Suez canal:

Adam niyashtāyam imām yuviyām kaftanaiy hacā Pirāva nāma rauta tya Mudrāyiy danawatīy abiy daraya tya hacā Pārsā aiti.

("I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile, which flows through Egypt, to the sea which comes from Persia.")

We have also inscriptions of Xerxes at Persepolis and many short ones of Artaxerxes I, Artaxerxes Mnēmōn, and Artaxerxes Ochus. From them all taken together we learn much concerning the history and the religion of the Achaemenian period.

It is from Achaemenian or Old Pers, and not from the Medic or Avestic, that modern Pers has sprung through Pahlavi and Dari as intermediate stages. This is probably due to the political supremacy which the Persians under the Achaemenides gained over the Medes. The few words in the inscriptions which might otherwise be doubtful can be understood through comparison with Armenian and even with the modern Pers, e.g. yuyiya in the above inscription is the modern vulgar Pers jāb.

III. Medic Dialect.—The Medic dialect is represented in literature by the Avesta or sacred books of the Zoroastrians (Pārsis). The word Avesta does not occur in the book itself and is of uncertain meaning and signification. It is probably the Abashā of Beh. Inscr., IV, 64, and means either (1) an interview, meeting (Skt. avashtā, "appearance before a judge"; Av. ava-stā, "to stand near"), or (2) a petition (Pahl. apastān, "petition"; Arm. apastan, "refuge," "asylum"), in either case deriving its name from Zoroaster's drawing near to Ahura Mazda in worship.

1. Ordinary Avestic

Yezdikhist.

This dialect represents a much greater decadence in grammar and vocabulary than does the Old Pers. Many of its consonants and most of its vowels are weakened. Its verbs have almost entirely lost the augment; its declensional system shows extreme confusion. It stands to Old Pers grammatically somewhat as Eng. does to Ger. Its alphabet, consisting of 43 letters, is derived from the Syr (probably the Estrangelā), and is written from right to left. As a specimen of the language of most of the Avesta we give the following extract (Yasna LXIV, 15[61]):

*Dāidī mōi, yē gām tashō apasca urarōsca
Ameretātā, haurvātā, Spēnīštā Mainyū Mazdā, Tēvishī, utayūitī, Manahhā Vōhū, sēnhē, ("Give me, O thou who didst make the bull [earth], and the waters and the plants, immortality, health—O most Bountiful Spirit, Mazda—strength, might, through Vōhu Manō, I say.")*

There is a sub-dialect of Medic (Avestic) known as the Gāthā-dialect, from the fact that the Gāthās, or "Hymns" (Yasna XXVIII–XXXIV, XLII–L, LII), and also the prayers (Yathā Ahū Vairiyo, Ashem Vōhū, Airyamā Ishyō, and originally Yēhē Hātām, and a few scattered passages elsewhere) are composed in it. This represents, speaking generally, an older form of the Avestic. It is probably the old language of Bactria or of Margiana. Gāthā I, 2, runs thus:

*Yē vō, Mazdā Ahurā, pairijasāi Vōhū Manahhā, Maibyō dāvōi ahvō (astatāscā hyatca manahhō)
Ayaptā Ashōt hacā, yāsi rapeitō dāidit hvāthrē.
("To me, O Ahura Mazda, who approach you two through Vōhu Manō, grant the benefits from Asha, [those] of both worlds, both of the material [world] and of that which is of the spirit, through which [benefits] may [Asha] place in glory those who please him.")*

The meter of the Gāthās, like that of the other Avestic poems, is based on the number of syllables in a line, with due regard to the caesura. But the condition of the text is such that there is great difficulty in recovering the original reading with sufficient accuracy to enable us to lay down rules on the subject with any certainty.

The first Gāthā is composed of strophes of 3 lines each (as above). Each line contains 16 syllables, with a caesura after the 7th foot.

IV. Zoroaster.—Many of the Gāthās are generally ascribed to Zoroaster himself, the rest to his earliest disciples. They compose the

1. His Date, etc most ancient part of the Avesta. It is now becoming a matter of very great probability that Zoroaster lived at earliest in the middle of the 7th cent. BC, more probably a century later. The Artā Virāf Nāmak says that his religion remained pure for 300 years, and connects its corruption with the alleged destruction of much of the Avesta in the palace burned by Alexander at Persepolis, 324 BC. This traditional indication of date is confirmed by other evidence. Zoroaster's prince Vishtāspa (in Gr Hustāspēs) bears the same name as the father of Darius I, and was probably the same person. Vishtāspa's queen Hutaosa, who also protected and favored Zoroaster, bears the same name (in Gr Atōssa) as Cambyses' sister who afterward married Darius, and probably belonged to the same family. Zoroastrianism comes to the fore under Darius, whereas Cyrus in his inscriptions speaks as a decided polytheist. Hence we conclude that the earliest part of the Avesta belongs to c 550 BC. Of Zoroaster himself we learn much from the Avesta, which traces his genealogy back for 10 generations. It mentions his wife's name (Hōvī), and tells of his 3 sons and 3 daughters. His first disciple was Frashaostra, his wife's natural uncle. His own name means "Owner of the yellow camel," and has none of the higher meanings sometimes assigned to it by those who would deny his existence. Tradition says he was born at Ragha (Raga, Rai), about 5½ miles S. of the present Tehrān, though some think his native place was Western Atropatene (Āzarbāijān). Rejected by his own tribe, the Magi, he went to Vishtāspa's court in Bactria. The faith which he taught spread to the Pers court (very naturally, if Vishtāspa was identical with Darius' father) and thence throughout the country. Tradition (Yasht XIX, 2, etc) says that the Avesta was revealed to Zoroaster on Mt. Ushi-darena ("intellect-holding") in Sistān. But it is not the composition of one man or of one age.

Herodotus makes no mention of Zoroaster, but speaks of the Magi (whom he calls a Median tribe [i.101]) as already performing priestly

2. Date of Avesta functions. His description of their repetition of charms and theological compositions (i.132) would agree very well with recitation of the Gāthās and Yasna. Mention of controversies with Gautama, Buddha's disciples (Yasht XIII, 16) who probably reached Persia in the 2d cent. BC, is another indication of date. The fact that in both the Yasna and the Vendīdād heretics (zañda) are mentioned who preferred the comm. (zañd) on the Avesta to the Avesta itself, is a sign of late date. Names of certain persons found in the Avesta (e.g. Ātare-pāta, a Dastūr who lived under Hormuzd I, 273 AD, and Rāstare-Yagheñti, whom the Dinkart identifies with the chief Mobed of Sapor II, 309–379 AD, Aderpād Mārespand, and who, according to the Patēt, §28, "purified" the revelation made to Zoroaster, i.e. revised the text of the earlier parts of the Avesta) enable us to prove that certain portions of the work as we now have it were composed as late as near the end of the 4th cent. of our era. It is said that the text was in confusion in the time of Vologases I (51–78 [?] AD). A recension was then begun, and continued with much zeal by Ardashīr Pāpakān, 226–40 AD. According to Geldner (Prolegomena, xlv) the final recension took place some considerable time after Yazdigird III (overthrown 642 AD). In the times of the Sāsānides there were, it is said, 21 Naskas or volumes of the Avesta, and the names of these are given in the Dinkart (Book IX). Of these we now possess only one entire Naska, the Vendīdād, and portions of three others.

The present Avesta is divided into 5 parts: (1) The Yasna (√ yaz, Skt. yaj, "to invoke," "to praise") contains 72 chapters of hymns for use at sacrifices, etc, including the "Older Yasna" or Gāthās. (2) The Present Avesta Vispered (vispa, "every," "all," and rādha, "a lord") is divided into 24 chapters in Geldner's edition; it is supplementary to the Yasna. (3) The Vendīdād (van+daēva+data, "law for vanquishing the demons") contains 22 chapters. The first chapter contains the Iranian myth about the order in which the provinces of the Iranian world were created by Ahura Mazda. It tells how the Evil Spirit, Ahrō Mainyuš, created plagues, sins and death, to destroy the good creatures of the Good Spirit. The greater part of the book contains ceremonial laws and formulae, some of them loathsome and all rather petty and superstitious in character. (4) The Yashts, 21 in all, are hymns, telling many mythological tales about Mithra, Tishtriya, etc. (5) The Khorda Avesta ("Little Avesta") consists of a number of short compositions, hymns, etc, compiled by the Āderpād Mārespand (Ādharpād Mahraspand, Ātarobāt Mānsarspendān) already mentioned, in Sapor II's reign.

Much of the Avesta is said to have been destroyed by the Khalifah 'Umar's orders when Persia was conquered by the Arabs after the battle of Nahāvand (642 AD). Certainly 'Umar ordered the destruction of Pers libraries, as we learn from the Kashfuz Zūnūn (p. 341).

V. Pahlavi.—Under ancient Pers literature may be classed the Pahlavi (a) inscriptions of Sapor at Hāzībābād and elsewhere, (b) legends on Sāsānian coins, (c) translations of certain parts of the Avesta, made under the Sāsānides for the most part, (d) such books as the Artā Virāf Nāmāh, the Zād Spāram, Dinkart, Ormazd Yasht, Patēt, Būndihishnih, etc. These are mostly of religious import. The Artā Virāf Nāmāh gives a description of the visit of the young dastūr Artā Virāf, to the Zoroastrian heaven. The Būndihishnih ("creation") tells how Ormazd and Ahriman came into being, and treats of the 9,000 years' struggle between them. Pahlavi, as written (the so-called Huzvarešh), contains an immense number of Aram. words, but the Pers terminations attached to these show that they were read as Pers; thus yehabūnt-ano is written, and dāt-ano ("to give") is read. Pahlavi works that are no longer extant are the sources of the Vis o Rāmin, Zarātūšt Nāmāh, Shāhnāmāh, etc.

In order to understand the relation in which the Pers dialects and stages in the history of the language stand to one another, it may be well to subjoin a list of words in Old Pers, Avestic, Pahlavi and modern Pers. It will be seen that Avestic is not the source of the Aryan part of the present tongue.

LITERATURE

I. Before Zoroaster.—There are clear indications in the Avesta that the religion of the Medes and Persians before Zoroaster's time agreed in most respects with that of the Indian Aryans, and in a less degree with the beliefs of the Aryans in general. All the Aryan tribes in very ancient times showed great respect for the dead, though they carefully distinguished them from the gods (cf Rig-Veda X, 56, 4). The latter were principally the powers of Nature, the wind, fire, water, the sky, the sun, the earth, and a host of personifications. The procreative powers in Nature, animate and inanimate, seeming to be the source of animal and vegetable life, received adoration, which ultimately led to unspeakable corruption. Herodotus tells us that the Persians in his time worshipped the sun, moon, sky, earth, fire, wind and water (i.131). Offerings to the gods were laid on a mass of pomegranate twigs (baresman, Skt. barhis), and the flesh of victims was boiled, not burnt. Libations of haoma-juice were poured out, just as in India the soma was the drink of both gods and their worshippers.

A comparison between the spiritual beings mentioned in the Avesta and those spoken of in the Rig-Veda is most instructive in two ways. It shows that the original religion of the Iranians and of the Indian Aryans agreed very closely; and it also enables us to realize the immensity of the reformation wrought by Zoroaster. Many of the names of supernatural beings are practically the same; e.g. Indra (Indra, Andra), Mitra (Mithra), Aryaman (Airyaman), Asura (Ahura), Apām Napāt (Apām Napāt), Tvashtri (? Tishtriya), Rāma (Rāman), Vāyu (Vāyu), Vāta (Vāta). So are many words of religious import, as Sōma (Haoma), Mantra (Māthra), Hōtra (Zaotar). The Yama of India is the Yima of Persia, and the father of the one is Vivasvat and that of the other Vivanhat, which is the same word with dialectic change. The Holy River of the Avesta, Aredhvi Sūra, the Unstained (Anāhita), is represented by the Sarasvati, the Gangā (Ganges) and other sacred streams worshipped in India. In Persia Ātar (or Fire) is a son of Ahura Mazda (Yasna LXIV, 46-53), as Agni (= Ignis) is of Tvashtri in the Rig-Veda. Armaiti is Ahura Mazda's daughter, as Saranyu in the Rig-

Veda is the daughter of Tvashtṛi, the "Creator." The use of gomēz (bovis urina) for purification is common to both India and Persia. Though the soma-plant is not now the same as the haoma, the words are the same, and no doubt they at one time denoted one and the same plant. Many of the myths of the Avesta have a great resemblance to those of the Rig-Veda. This comparison might be extended almost indefinitely.

In another respect also there is an important agreement between the two. Though some 33 deities are adored in the Vedic Hymns, yet, in spite of polytheism and low ideas of the Divine, traces of something higher may be found. Varuṇa, for instance, represents a very lofty conception. In the closest connection with him stands Asura, who is a being of great eminence, and whose sons are the gods, esp. the Ādityas.

Tvashtṛi again is creator of heaven and earth and of all beings, though his worship was ultimately in Vedic times displaced by that of Indra.

3. The Creator It is clear then that the Indian Āryans were worshippers of the Creator and that they knew something of Him long before they sank into polytheism. In the Avesta and in the Pers cuneiform inscriptions alike, Ahura Mazda occupies much the same position as Varuṇa, Asura (the same word as Ahura), or Tvashtṛi in the Rig-Veda, or rather in the ancient belief of which traces are retained in the latter work. Hence, as the Avesta teaches, Zoroaster was not for the first time preaching the existence of Ahura Mazda, but he was rather endeavoring to recall his people to the belief of their ancestors, the doctrine which Ahura Mazda had taught Yima in primeval time in his first revelation (Vendidad II, 1-16,42). The great truth of the existence of the Creator, testified to by tradition, reason and conscience, undoubtedly contributed largely to Zoroaster's success, just as a similar proclamation of the God Most High (Allāh Ta'ālā), worshipped by their ancestors, helped the thoughtful among the Arabs in later years to accept Muhammad's teaching. The consciousness in each case that the doctrine was not new but very ancient, materially helped men to believe it true.

II. Zoroastrianism.—The reformation wrought by Zoroaster was a great one. He recognized—as

1. Leading Principle Euripides in Greece did later—that "if the gods do aught shameful, they are not gods." Hence he perceived that many of the deities worshipped in Irān were unworthy of adoration, being evil in character, hostile to all good and therefore to the "All-Wise" Spirit (Ahura Mazda) and to men. Hence his system of dualism, dividing all beings, spiritual or material, into two classes, the creatures of Ahura Mazda and those of the "Destroying Mind" (Anrō Mainyuš). So many of the popular deities were evil that Zoroaster used the word daēva (the same as deva, deus, and Aram. di) to denote henceforth an evil spirit, just as Christianity turned the Gr datmones and daimōnia (words used in a good sense in classical authors) into "demons." Instead of this now degraded word daēva, he employed bagā (Old Pers; Av. bagha, Vedic bhaga, "distribution," "patron," "lord") for "God."

But it must be remembered that Zoroaster did not teach monotheism. Darius says that "Auramazda and the other gods that there

2. Not Monotheistic are" brought him aid (Beh. Inscr., IV, 60-63), and both he and Xerxes speak of Auramazda as "the greatest of the gods." So, even in the first Gāthā, Zoroaster himself invokes Asha, Vōhu-Manō, Armaiti, Sraosha, and even Gēuš-urvan ("the Soul of the Bull"), as well as Ahura Mazda.

(1) Darius and Xerxes.—Darius mentions the "clan-gods," but does not name any of them. He and Xerxes ascribe the creation of heaven and earth to Auramazda, and say that the latter, "Who made this earth, who made yon sky, who made man, who made happiness for man," has appointed each of them king. It is "by the grace of Auramazda" (vashnā Auramazdāha) that Darius conquers his enemies. But both Artaxerxes Mnēmōn and Artaxerxes Ochus couple Mithra and Anāhata (Anāhita) with Auramazda (Ahura Mazda) in praying for the protection of the empire.

Ahura Mazda.

(2) Ahura Mazda.—In the Avesta, Ahura Mazda is one of the seven Amesha Spēntas or "Bountiful Immortals." He is the father of one of them, Spēnta Armaiti, who is also his spouse. He is primus inter pares among them, their chief, but by no means the only god. Monotheism is distinctly taught in later Zoroastrian works, for instance, in the Zarātūst-Nāmāh, composed 1278 AD, but it is due to Christian and Islāmic influence.

The modern Zoroastrian view, clearly stated in the Dasātīr i Āsmānī and elsewhere, that all the good creatures of Ōrmazd (Ahura Mazda)

3. Objects of Worship rests upon the Avesta. There we find, in the first place, the Amesha Spēntas, who occupy in regard to Mazda the same position as do the Vedic Ādityas toward Varuṇa, though not one of the Ādityas is identical with any of the Amesha Spēntas.

The names of these are: (1) Ahura Mazda (otherwise called Spēntō Mainyuš or "Bountiful Mind"); (2) Vōhu Manō ("Good Mind"); (3) Asha Vahista ("Best Righteousness"); (4) Khshathra Vairya ("Excellent Righteousness"); (5) Spēnta Armaiti ("Bounteous Piety"); (6) Haurvatāt ("Health"); (7) Ameretāt ("Immortality"). Each has a special province: thus Armaiti is the general spirit of earth and presides over its fruitfulness. She is the patroness of virtuous matrons. Khshathra is the guardian of metals. Vōhu Manō guards sheep and cattle and introduces to Ahura Mazda the spirits of the just. Next in rank come the Yazatas ("Worshipful Ones"), of whom there are a large number. Three of them, Mithra, Rashnu and Sraosha, preside at the judgment of the dead on the 4th day from death. Rashnu holds the scales in which a man's deeds are weighed. Sraosha guards the soul during the first three nights after death. Airyaman Ishya ("the longed-for comrade") is the protector of mankind, the bestower of peace and happiness. On one occasion (Vend., Farg. XXII, 23-29) Ahura Mazda sends his messenger Nairyō Saṇha ("male instructor") to ask his aid against overwhelming odds. Rāman Hvāstra, the bosom friend of Mithra, presides over the atmosphere and also gives its taste to food. Mithra is the genius of truth, possessed of 1,000 ears, and riding in a single-wheeled chariot (the sun), while darting golden darts and driving fiery steeds. Tishtrya, identified with the dog-star Sirius, sends rain and is by Ahura Mazda endowed with his own power and dignity (Yasht VIII, 52 ff.). This is true of Mithra also (Yasht X, 1), Atar ("Fire"), Vāyu ("Air"), Vata ("Wind"), Verethraghna ("Mars"), Saoka ("Prosperity"), Arštāt (genius of Justice), Vazista ("Lightning"), Frādātshu (the guardian of cattle), Berejya (genius of corn), Cistā and Daēnā ("Knowledge" and "Religion"), who are others of the Yazatas. All these are entitled to worship at the hands of the true adoror of Mazda (Mazdayasna, opposed to Daēvayasna, or worshipper of the demons).

In opposition to the creatures of Ahura Mazda are those of Ahrō Mainyuš, who is the source of all moral and material evil. The first chapter of the Vendidad tells how he created something bad in opposition to everything good made by Ahura Mazda.

A demon is the adversary of each Amesha Speñta: Aka Manō ("Evil Mind") that of Vohu Manō, and so in order: Indra (or Andra, "demon of untruthfulness"), Saurya ("evil government"), Nəhəithya ("discontent"), Tauru ("who poisons water") and Zairi ("poison"), being antagonistic to the other Bountiful Immortals. Aeshma-Daēva ("Demon of Wrath")—the Asmodeus of Tob 3 8—is the special foe of Sraosha, the genius of obedience. Apaosha, demon of drought, is the enemy of Tishtrya. Būiti (or Būidhi) teaches men to worship idols, and also causes death. Būshyāsta is the demon of sloth. Vidhātus or Astuvīdhātus causes death by destroying the body. Other evil beings, Drujes, Pairikas, Jainis, Yatus, are so numerous in the later parts of the Avesta that a pious Zoroastrian must have lived in continual dread of their assaults. He had even to conceal the parings of his nails, lest they should be used as darts to his injury by these his spiritual foes.

Combat between King and Evil Spirit.

Holiness does not enter into Zoroaster's conception of the Divine nature. This is a point to which attention has not yet been properly

5. Production v. Destruction

Speñta, often applied to Ahura Mazda and mistranslated "Holy," is by the Zoroastrians themselves in Pahlavi rendered afzūnik, i.e. "that causes increase." Its √ span or spén = Skt. śvi, "to swell," "to grow," "to increase." The opposite to this is the term anrō (añgro, from √ añgh; cf Ger. eng, "narrow") applied to the Evil Spirit, and denoting "narrowing," "decreasing," "destroying." Hence, as the Destroyer, he is styled pōurumahrka, "full of death."

Fertility.—Ahura Mazda and his assistants promote life, fertility in man, beast and plant, agriculture, increase; while Ahrō Mainyuš and his creatures cause destruction and death. Ātar ("Fire"), also styled Apām Napāt ("Offspring of the Waters"), is the vital flame and the male energy in the world; Aredhvi Sūra Anāhita is the female. As a river the latter flows from Mt. Hukairya, a peak in the Elburz Range (Yasna LXIV), into the Caspian Sea (Vōurukasha) in the midst of which grows the tree Hvāpa ("well watered"), which bears the seeds of all plants. Anāhita means "undefiled," but it is applied to purity of water (to defile any of the four "elements" was, for later Zoroastrians, a grievous sin) and not to any moral purity in the goddess. Her association with Mithra was close, even in Herodotus' time, for he falls into the mistake of saying (i.131) that the Persians called Aphrodite Mithra, when he should have said Anaitis (Anāhita). Though god of truth and righteousness Mithra is not associated with moral purity (chastity). On the contrary, he was said to fertilize the earth with his rays, as sun-god, and Anāhita as goddess of fruitfulness represented the female principle in conjunction with him. The vileness which led to the identification of Anāhita with the Bab Mylitta was doubtless of later date than Zoroaster's time, yet there was little or nothing in Zoroastrianism to check it. Something similar asserts itself in Armenia, as well as in Irān, and in fact in all Nature-worship everywhere. Associated with this was the form of incest known as next-of-kin marriage (Av. Huəšta-datha, Pahl. Khvəštakdas), which permitted and encouraged marriages between brothers and sisters.

According to later Zoroastrian belief, the contest between Ōrmazd (Ahura Mazda) and Ahriman (Ahrō Mainyuš), after continuing for 6. Contest 9,000 years, is to be decided in favor of the former only through his possessing foreknowledge and Ahriman's lacking it (Bünd., I). Both came into existence independently in limitless time (Av. Zrvāna Akarana; Vend., Farg. XIX, 13; Pahl. Damān ī Akanārakhōmand, Bünd., I), which, personified in the Vendidad, is called "Self-created," and is there by Ahura Mazda's command invoked by Zoroaster in conjunction with Vāyu, the Air, the Winds, "the bountiful, beauteous daughter of Ahura Mazda" (Armaiti), the Earth, and other objects of worship (loc. cit.). No creature of Ahriman is to be worshipped; hence Indra, though in later Vedic times rising in India to a leading position in the Pantheon, is in the Avesta accounted a fiend, the very impersonation of the Lie which the Avesta so firmly denounces and which Darius mentions as the cause of all the rebellions, which produced so much bloodshed in his time. No virtue was valued so highly as truth in ancient Irān, as Herodotus agrees with the Avesta in testifying.

Avestic morality encourages the destruction of all hurtful things, as being of Ahrō Mainyuš' creation, and the propagation of everything good.

7. Ethics

Hence agriculture is esp. commended, together with the rearing of cattle and sheep. Somewhat later the whole duty of man was said to consist in good thoughts, good words, good deeds. Fierce opposition to every other religion was enjoined as a religious duty, and, under the Sāsānides esp., this led to fearful and repeated persecutions of Christians throughout the empire.

The Sacred Thread (Av. Aiwiyōñhana; Skt. Upavītam, etc, now by the Pārsis styled the Kushti) plays as important a part in Zoroastrianism as in Hindūism. So do charms, māthras (Skt. mantras), consisting in repetitions of the verses of the Avesta. The latter is even adored.

The first thing created by Ahura Mazda was a Bull, which may represent the earth, and reminds us of the Cow Audhumla in the Edda (Gylfaginning VI). This was killed

9. Early Traditions by Ahrō Mainyuš (in a later version, by Mithra). His spirit (Gēuš Urvan) went to heaven and became the guardian of cattle.

The first man was Gaya-maretan ("Mortal Life"); hence the phrase Haca Gayāt Marethnā ā Saoshyāntā, "from Gaya-maretan [Gayōmard, Kayomarth] to Saoshyant" (Yasna XXVI, 10; Yasht XIII, 145), means "from the beginning to the end of the world." From the Airyanem Vaēō ("Āryan germ"), the first home of the Iranians, men were compelled to migrate because Ahūrō Mainyuš so altered the climate that the winter became ten months long and the summer only two. Yima Khshaēta ("Yima the Brilliant," Pers Jamshīd), son of Vivānhāt, though he twice refused Ahura Mazda's commission to guard his creatures, and though by three lies he lost the "Royal Light" (Hvarēnō Kavaēm) which he originally possessed, was yet directed to prepare a very extensive inclosure (Vāra), in which he preserved "the seeds of sheep and cattle, of men, of dogs, of birds, and of red, glowing fires" from some terribly severe winters which came upon the earth (Vendīdād II; Yasht XIX). The Būndihīšnīh tale of a flood differs from this, preserving an independent narrative. Ahura Mazda's law was preached to men within Yima's inclosure.

The earth consists of seven divisions, called Karshvares (cf the Skt. dvīpas). Only one of these, Hyāniratha, is inhabited by men; the

10. The Earth others are separated from it by impassable abysses. Sun, moon, and stars revolve round Mt. Taēra, a peak in the Elburz Mountains (Demāvend?). A later legend says that the Elburz Range surrounds the earth.

Each god and man possesses a fravashi, which has been compared to a guardian spirit and seems to differ from the soul (urvan). After

11. Heaven and Hell judgment by Mithra, Rashnu and Sraosha, the souls of the dead must cross the Chinwat-bridge ("Bridge of the Judge"), which is guarded by two dogs and is narrow and difficult for the unjust, but wide and easy for the just. The righteous man then advances through three Paradises, those of Good Thoughts, Good Words and Good Works (Humata, Hūkhta, Hvaršta; Yasht XVI; Artā Vīrāf Nāmak, VII-IX), until, led by Sraosha, Atar, and Vōhu Manō, he finally reaches Ahura Mazda's abode of light and glory, Garō-nmāna (in Gāthās, Gāro-demāna; Pahl. Garōtmān), where Ahura Mazda himself receives him with the words: "Greeting to thee; well hast thou come; from that mortal world hast thou come to this pure, bright place" (A. V. Nāmak, XI, 8, 9). But the soul of the wicked man, passing through regions of Evil Thoughts, Evil Words and Evil Deeds, finally reaches a dark and gloomy Hell (Duzhañh). In later times it was believed that those not yet fit for heaven waited in Misvānō Gātuš, an intermediate place where the extra merits of the just were stored up for the benefit of the less fortunate (Vend., Farg. XIX). A later name was Hamistakān. But De Harlez is of the opinion that this idea was borrowed from mediaeval Christianity.

In primeval times the Persians buried or burned their dead. Zoroastrianism may have introduced

12. Interment the dakhma (Vendīdād, passim) or Tower of Silence, on which bodies are exposed to be eaten by vultures. Those of which the ruins have been discovered at Al Hibbah are very ancient. But in Herodotus' time it was usual, after permitting the flesh to be devoured by dogs and birds, to cover the bones with wax and bury them (Herod. i.140). This was done to prevent them from coming in contact with and so polluting the earth. The custom of burial is proved by the tombs of the Achaemenian kings near Persepolis, and that of Cyrus, a stone chamber raised high above the ground, at Pasargadae.

Zoroastrianism permits no idol-worship and no temples, fire-altars only being used. These were served by Ātharvans or fire-priests,

13. Worship who fed the fire with costly wood and poured into it libations of haoma-juice, taking care to cover their mouths with a cloth

Fire Altars.

(paiti-dhāna) to keep the sacred fire from being polluted by their breath. Sacrifices were often offered on the tops of the highest mountains under the open sky (Herod. i.132; Xen. Cyrop. viii).

The Magi doubtless owed their monopoly of priestly functions to their being Zoroaster's own tribe. They are not mentioned as

14. The Magi priests in the Pers cuneiform inscriptions. Only once does the word "Magus" occur in the Avesta, and then in composition (Mōghu-θish, a Magus-hater, Yasna LXV, 7). It is not necessary to trace to Bab influence the decay of Zoroastrianism and its degradation in late Achaemenian times. This was at least in large measure due to a revival of the ideas and practices forbidden by Zoroaster, which reassert themselves in some parts of the Avesta, and which afterward gave rise to Mithraism.

The Avesta states that, 1,000 years after Zoroaster's death, a prophet named Ukshyaē-creta will arise from his seed to restore his religion. After another 1,000 years

15. Eschatology another, Ukshyaē-nemahh, will appear for the same purpose. The end of the world will come 1,000 years later. Then a third prophet, Saoshyañt, will be born, and will usher in the Restoration (frashō-kereti) of the world to its primitive happiness and freedom from the evil creatures of Ahūrō Mainyuš. This process will be completed in 57 years, during which 6 other prophets will perform in the other 6 Karshvares the work which will here be accomplished by Saoshyañt. But mention of this Restoration occurs only in very late parts of the Avesta (e.g. Vend., Farg. XVIII, 51). It does not mean Resurrection, as De Harlez has shown. Later still, something of the kind was believed, and in the Būndihīšnīh (ch v) and the Patēt (§ 28) we have the word rīstākhīz (from Av. irista, "departed," and hvis, "to rise"), which does mean "rising of the dead." But it can hardly be doubted that the doctrine is due to Heb and Christian influence, esp. when we consider

16. Hebrew and Christian Influence the late and uncertain date of the and Chris- books in which the idea occurs. Israel- ites settled in Media in large numbers in or about 730-728 BC under Sargon (2 K 17 6), long before Zoroaster's birth. It is possible that his reformation may have owed much therefore to Heb influence. See, further, ZOROASTRIANISM.

The idea of virgin birth has been asserted to occur in Zoroastrianism, both with reference to Zoroaster himself and to the last three great prophets of whom mention has been made. This is an error. The Avesta and all later Zoroastrian books speak of Zoroaster's birth as quite natural, his father being Pōrushaspa. Nor is virgin birth referred to in the case of Saoshyant and the rest. (Mater cuiusque ex iis, sese in lacu quodam lavans, Zoroastris semine illic reposito grvida facta filium pariet: Vend., Farg. XIX, 4-6; Yasht XIII, 128, 142; Būd., XXXII, 8, 9.) Virginity is not highly esteemed in the Avesta, though fornication is condemned.

LITERATURE

The Persians are not mentioned in the Bible until the exilic books (2 Ch 36 20.22.23; Ezr 1 1.2.8; 3 7; Est 1 19, etc.; Dnl 5 28; 6 8.12.15.28), being previously included under the Medes (Gen 10 2), as they were by Thucydides, and even by Xenophon often.

Achaemenes (Hakhāmanish)

Tēispēs (Chaišpish, Šispīs)

I. Affinity.—Being of the same stock as the Medes they shared the name Āryans (Achaem. āriya; Av. airya; Skt. ārya, "noble"); cf the Naqsh i Rustam Inscription, where Darius I calls himself "a Persian, son of a Persian, an Āryan, of Āryan descent" (ll. 13, 14). Tradition assigns as their earliest known habitat the so-called Airyānem Valējō ("Āryan germ"), a district between the Jaxartes and the Oxus (Vendīdād I), whence they migrated gradually to what was afterward known as Persis (modern Fārs), including probably part of Elam.

The Avesta shows that the Medo-Pers community was divided into 3 classes (zañtu): the

1. Three Classes Āthravans or fire-priests, the Rath-aēštars or charioteers, and the Vāstrya-fshuyans or cattle-rearers (cf the three original Hindū castes, the Brāhmanas, the Kshattriyas and the Vaiśyas). A 4th class, the artisans or Hūitis, came later. But these were classes, not castes.

They were also divided into tribes, clans (Achaem. vith; Av. vis; cf vicus) and families or households (Achaem. taumā; Av. nmāna). Herod-

2. Tribal and Clan Divisions otus (i.125) mentions ten Pers tribes, the chief being the Pasargadae, to which belonged the Achaemenian clan (φρητρην, phrētrē) which included the royal family. This dynasty traced its origin to Achaemenes (Hakhāmanish) according to Darius and Herodotus. The following scheme will serve to show the descent of the line of Pers kings mentioned in the Bible and in secular history up to the time of the fall of the dynasty in 331 BC.

II. Civilization.—The Persians had indulged less in luxury than the Medes, until their conquest of Media and other lands under Cyrus

1. Writing the Great gave them the opportunity, which they were not slow to embrace, being famed for their readiness to adopt foreign customs. Writing was introduced from Babylonia through Elam. This cuneiform character was afterward superseded by one

2. Institutions and Customs derived from Syria, from which came the Avestic writing, which, in its corrupt Pahlavi form, lasted until the Arabian conquest imposed the Arab. character on the people. The Achaemenian kings probably borrowed from Babylon and further developed their system of royal posts (Est 8 14) or messengers

(and even the words ἀγγαροι, aggaroi, and ἀσάνδαι, astāndai, used to denote them, are almost certainly Babylonian). Of these men's pace it was said, "No mortal thing is quicker." The custom of showing special honor to the "Benefactors of the King" (Herod. viii.85: δοσάγγαι, orosaggai = Av. uru+sanh, "widely renowned") is referred to in Est 6 1.2.3, and that of covering the (head and) face of a criminal condemned to death (with a large black cap) (Est 7 8.9) occurs in the Shāhnāmah also.

(1) The king was an arbitrary ruler with unlimited power, the council of seven princes who stood nearest to the throne (Est 1 14; cf Herod. iii. 70-84) having no share in the government.

(2) The army.—As soldiers, the Persians were famous as archers and javelin-throwers; they were also skilled in the use of the sling, and above all in riding. Boys were taken from the women's into the men's part of the house at the age of 5, and were there trained in "riding, archery and speaking the truth" until 20 years old. In Darius' inscriptions, as well as in the Avesta, lying is regarded as a great crime.

(3) Marriage.—The Persians practised polygamy, and marriages between those next of kin were approved of. Pride and garrulity are mentioned as distinctive of the Pers character.

III. History.—Pers history, as known to us, begins with Cyrus the Great. His ancestors, for at least some generations, seem to have been chiefs or "kings" of Anshan, a district in Persia or Elam. Cyrus himself (WAI, V, plate 35) gives his genealogy up to and including Teispēs, entitling all his ancestors whom he mentions, kings of Anshan. Phraortēs, king of the Medes, is said to have first subjugated the Persians to that kingdom about 97 years before Cyrus (Herod. i.102). Cyrus himself headed his countrymen's revolt against Astyages, who advanced to attack Pasargadae (549 BC). His army mutinied and surrendered him to Cyrus, whom the Greeks held to be his grandson on the mother's side. Cyrus, becoming supreme ruler of both Medes and Persians, advanced to the conquest of Lydia. He defeated and captured Croesus, overran Lydia, and compelled the Greek colonies in Asia Minor to pay tribute (547 BC).

He overthrew the Sute (Bedawīn) across the Tigris the following year, and was then invited by a large party in Babylonia to come to their help against the usurper Nabu-nāhid, whose religious zeal had led him to collect as many as possible of the idols from other parts of Babylonia and remove them to Babylon, thereby increasing the sacredness and magnificence of that city but inflicting injury on neighboring and more ancient sanctuaries. Defeating Nabu-nāhid's army and capturing the king, Cyrus sent his own forces under Gōbryas (Gubaru, Gaubaruva) to take possession of Babylon. This he did in June, 538, "without opposition and without a battle." The citadel, however, where Belshazzar ("the king's son") was in command, held out for some months, and was then taken in a night attack in which "the king's son" was slain. Cyrus made Gōbryas viceroy of Chaldaea, and he "appointed governors in Babylonia" (Cyrus' "Annalistic Tablet"). When Gōbryas died within the year, Cyrus' son Cambyses was made viceroy of the country, now become a province of the Pers empire. Cyrus restored the gods to their sanctuaries, and this doubtless led to permission being given to the Jews to return to Jerus, taking with them their sacred vessels, and to rebuild their temple. Cyrus was killed in battle against some frontier tribe (accounts differ where) in 529 BC. His tomb at Murghāb, near the ruins of Pasargadae, is still standing.

Cyrus' son and successor, Cambyses, invaded Egypt and conquered it after a great battle near Pelusium (525 BC). During his absence, a Magian, Gaumāta, who pretended to be Smerdis (Bardiya), Cambyses' murdered brother, seized the throne. Marching against him, Cambyses committed suicide. After a reign of 7 months, the usurper was overthrown and slain by Darius and his 6 brother-nobles (their names in Herod. iii.70 are confirmed with one exception in Darius' Besitūn Inscription, col. iv, 80-86). Darius became king as the heir of Cambyses (521 BC). But in nearly every part of the empire

5. Darius I rebellions broke out, in most cases headed by real or pretended descendants of the ancient kings of each country. After at least 3 years' struggle Darius' authority was firmly established everywhere. He then divided the empire into satrapies, or provinces (dahyāva), of which there were at first 23 (Beh. Inscription, col. i, 13-17), and ultimately at least 29 (Naqsh i Rostam Inscription, 22-30). Over these he placed satraps of noble Pers or Median descent, instead of representatives of their ancient kings. His empire extended from the Indus to the Black Sea, from the Jaxartes to beyond the Nile.

Tomb of Cyrus.

Darius united the latter river with the Red Sea by a canal, the partly obliterated inscription commemorating which may perhaps be thus restored and rendered: "I am a Persian; with Persia I seized Egypt. I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile [Pirāva], which flows through Egypt, to this sea which comes from Persia. Then this canal was dug, according as I commanded. And I said, 'Come ye from the Nile through this canal to Persia.'"

Darius' expedition into Scythia, his success in subduing the rebellion among the Asiatic Greeks, his attempts to conquer Greece itself and his overthrow at Marathon (499-490 BC) are part of the history of Greece. A rebellion in Egypt had not been repressed when Darius died in 485 BC.

Xerxes I, who succeeded his father, regained Egypt, but his failure in his attempts to conquer Greece largely exhausted his empire.

7. Xerxes I In 464 BC he was murdered. His son Artaxerxes I, surnamed "the long-armed," succeeded him, being himself succeeded in 424 BC by his son Xerxes II, who was murdered the following year. This ended the legitimate Achaemenian line, the next king, Darius II (styled Nothos, or "bastard," as well

8. Artaxerxes I as Ōchos), being one of Artaxerxes' illegitimate sons (we pass over Sogdianus' brief reign). Artaxerxes II, Mnēmōn, succeeded his father and left the throne to his son Artaxerxes III, Ōchos. The latter was murdered with all his sons but the

9. Xerxes II youngest, Arsēs, by an Egypt eunuch Bagōas, probably in revenge for Artaxerxes' conduct in Egypt (338 BC). Arsēs was murdered by Bagōas 3 years later, when Darius III,

10. Later Persian Kings Codomannus, the son of Sisygambis, daughter of Artaxerxes II, and her husband, a Pers noble, ascended the throne. Darius was completely overthrown by Alexander the Great in the battle of Gaugamela or Arbela, 331 BC, and shortly after fell by an assassin's hand. This ended the Pers empire of the Achaemenides, the whole of the lands composing it becoming part of the empire of Macedon.

IV. First Mention in Inscriptions.—Persia (Par-sua) is first mentioned as a country in an inscription of Rammānu Nirāri III (WAI, I, plate 35, no. 1, l. 8), who boasts of having conquered it and other lands (he reigned from 812 to 783 or from 810 to 781 BC).

PERSIS, pūr'sis (Περσίς, Persís): The name of a female member of the Christian community at Rome, to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 12). Paul designates her "the beloved, who labored much in the Lord." The name is not found in inscriptions of the imperial household, but it occurs as the name of a freedwoman (CIL, VI, 23, 959).

PERSON, pūr'sun, pūr's'n, PERSONALITY, pūr-sun-al'i-ti (נָפֶשׁ, nephesh, אִישׁ, 'ish, אָדָם, 'ādām, פְּאִיִּים, pānīm; πρόσωπον, prósōpon, ὑπόστασις, hupostasis): The most frequent word for "person" in the OT is nephesh, "soul" (Gen 14 21, "Give me the persons, and take the goods"; 36 6, AV "all the persons"; Nu 5 6, AV "that person," etc); 'ish, "a man," "an individual," is also used (Jgs 9 2, "threescore and ten persons"; 1 S 16 18, "a comely person," etc); 'ādām, "a man," "a human being" (Nu 31 28, "of the persons, and of the oxen"; Prov 6 12, "a worthless person," etc); 'enōsh, "a man," "a weak, mortal man," occurs twice (Jgs 9 4, AV "vain and light persons"; Zeph 3 4); ba'al, "owner," "lord," is once tr^d "person" (Prov 24 8, AV "a mischievous person"), and m'thīm, "men," once (Ps 26 4, AV "vain persons"); pānīm, "face," is frequently tr^d "person" when the reference is to the external appearance, as of persons in high places, rich persons who could favor or bribe, etc, chiefly in the phrases "regarding the person," "accepting the person" (Dt 10 17; Mal 1 8).

In the NT prosōpon, "face," "countenance," stands in the same connection (Mt 22 16, "Thou regardest not the person of men"; Gal 2 6, "God accepteth not man's person"; Acts 10 34, "God is no respecter of persons"; Rom 2 11, "there is no respect of persons with God"; Eph 6 9; Col 3 25; Jas 2 1.9); in 2 Cor 1 11 we have "persons" (prosōpon), absol. as in the later Gr, "the gift bestowed . . . by many persons," the only occurrence in the NT; in 2 10 prosōpon may stand for "presence," as RV "in the presence of Christ," but it might mean "as representing Christ"; in He 1 3, AV hupostasis, "that which lies under," substratum, is rendered "person," "the express image of his person," i.e. of God, which RV renders "the very image of his substance," m "the impress of his substance," i.e. the manifestation or expression of the invisible God and Father. "Person" is also frequently supplied as the substantive implied in various adjs., etc, e.g. profane, perjured, vile.

In the Apoc we have prosōpon tr^d "person" (Jth 7 15, RV "face"; Ecclus 10 5, etc); the "accepting of persons" is condemned (Wisd 6 7; Ecclus 4 22.27; 7 6; 20 22, RV "by a foolish countenance"; 35 13; 42 1; "With him [God] is no respect of persons," Ecclus 35 12).

RV has "soul" for "person" (Nu 5 6), "face" (Jer 52 25), "man" (Mt 27 24); "reprobate" for "vile person" (Ps 15 4), ARV, ERV m "fool" (Isa 32 5.6); ARV "men of falsehood" for "vain persons" (Ps 26 4); for "a wicked person," RV has "an evil thing" (Ps 101 4); "back to thee in his own person" (autōn, different text) for "again thou therefore receive him" (Philem ver 12); "take away life" for "respect any person" (2 S 14 14); "with seven others" for "the eighth person" (2 Pet 2 5); "false swearers" for "perjured persons" (1 Tim 1 10); "seven thousand persons" for "of men seven thousand" (Rev 11 13).

Personality is that which constitutes and characterizes a person. The word "person" (Lat persona) is derived from the mask through which an actor spoke his part (per-sona). "From being applied to the mask, it came next to be applied to the actor, then to the character acted, then to any assumed character, then to anyone having any character or station"; lastly, it came to mean an individual, a feeling, thinking and acting being. For full personality there must be self-consciousness, with the capability of free thought and action—self-determination—hence we speak of personal character, personal action, etc. A person is thus a responsible being, while an animal is not. Personality is distinctive of man. The personality is the unit of the entire rational being, perhaps most clearly represented by "the will"; it is that which is deepest in man, belonging, of course, not to the realm of space or the region of the visible, but existing as a spiritual reality in time, with a destiny beyond it. It is the substance (hupostasis) of the being, that which underlies all its manifestations; hence the rendering "the express image of his person" in He 1 3 AV. Hupostasis was employed by the early Gr Fathers to express what the Latins intended by persona; afterward prosōpon was introduced.

Recent psychology has brought into prominence elements in the subconscious realm, the relation of which to the personality is obscure. There seems to be more in each individual than is normally expressed in the personal consciousness and action. The real, responsible personality, however, is something which is always being formed. The phenomenon of double personality is pathological, as truly the result of brain disease as is insanity.

In the Bible man is throughout regarded as personal, although it was only gradually that the full importance of the individual as distinct from the nation was realized. The use of prosōpon for "person" indicates also a more external conception of personality than the modern. With the Hebrews the nephesh was the seat of personality, e.g. "Thou wilt not leave my soul [nephesh] to Sheol" (Ps 16 10); "Thou hast brought up my soul from Sheol" (Ps 30 3). God is also always regarded as personal (who has created man in His own image), and although the representations seem often anthropomorphic they are not really such. The Divine personality could only be conceived after the analogy of the human, as far as it could be definitely conceived at all; but God was regarded as transcending, not only the whole of Nature, but all that is human, e.g. "God is not a man, that he should lie" (Nu 23 19; 1 S 15 29); "Canst thou by searching find out God?" (Job 11 7; Isa 40 28; cf Eccl 3 11; 8 17, etc). In the NT the personality of God is, on the warrant of Jesus Himself, conceived after the analogy of human fatherhood, yet as transcending all our human conceptions: "How much more?" (Mt 7 11); "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" (Rom 11 34). Man is body, soul and spirit, but God in Himself is Spirit, infinite, perfect, ethical Spirit (Mt 5 48; Jn 4 24). He is forever more than all that is created, "For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things" (Rom 11 36). The human personality, being spiritual, survives bodily dissolution and in Christ becomes clothed again with a spiritual body (Phil 3 21; 1 Cor 15 44).

LITERATURE

It is the purpose of this article to make as clear as possible the conception of the Person of Christ, in the technical sense of that term, which lies on—or, if we prefer to say so, beneath—the pages of the NT. Were it its purpose to trace out the process by which this great mystery has been revealed to men, a beginning would need to be taken from the intimations as to the nature of the person of the Messiah in OT prophecy, and an attempt would require to be made to discriminate the exact contribution of each organ of revelation to our knowledge. And were there added to this a desire to ascertain the progress of the apprehension of this mystery by men, there would be demanded a further inquiry into the exact degree of understanding which was brought to the truth revealed at each stage of its revelation. The magnitudes with which such investigations deal, however, are very minute; and the profit to be derived from them is not, in a case like the present, very great. It is, of course, of importance to know how the person of the Messiah was represented in the predictions of the OT; and it is a matter at least of interest to note, for example, the difficulty experienced by Our Lord's immediate disciples in comprehending all that was involved in His manifestation. But, after all, the constitution of Our Lord's person is a matter of revelation, not of human thought; and it is pre-eminently a revelation of the NT, not of the OT. And the NT is all the product of a single movement, at a single stage of its development, and therefore presents in its fundamental teaching a common character. The whole of the NT was written within the limits of about half a century; or, if we except the writings of John, within the narrow bounds of a couple of decades; and the entire body of writings which enter into it are so much of a piece that it may be plausibly represented that they all bear the stamp of a single mind. In its fundamental teaching, the NT lends itself, therefore, more readily to what is called dogmatic than to what is called genetic treatment; and we shall penetrate most surely into its essential meaning if we take our start from its clearest and fullest statements, and permit their light to be thrown upon its more incidental allusions. This is peculiarly the case with such a matter as the person of Christ, which is dealt with chiefly incidentally, as a thing already understood by all, and needing only to be alluded to rather than formally expounded. That we may interpret these allusions aright, it is requisite that we should recover from the first the common conception which underlies them all.

1. The Teaching of Paul.—(1) General drift of passage.—We begin, then, with the most didactic of the NT writers, the apostle Paul, and

1. Phil 2: with one of the passages in which he most fully intimates his conception of the person of his Lord, Phil 2 5-9.

Even here, however, Paul is not formally expounding the doctrine of the Person of Christ; he is only alluding to certain facts concerning His person and action perfectly well known to his readers, in order that he may give point to an adduction of Christ's example. He is exhorting his readers to unselfishness, such unselfishness as esteems others better than ourselves, and looks not only on our own things but also on those of others. Precisely this unselfishness, he declares, was exemplified by Our Lord. He did not look upon His own things but the things of others; that is to say, He did not stand upon His rights, but was willing to forego all that He might justly have claimed for Himself for the good of others. For, says Paul, though, as we all know, in His intrinsic nature He was nothing other than God, yet He did not, as we all know right well, look greedily on His condition of equality with God, but made no account of Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and, being found in fashion as a man, humbled Himself, becoming obedient up to death itself, and that, the death of the cross. The statement is thrown into historical form; it tells the story of Christ's life on earth. But it presents His life on earth as a life in all its elements alien to His intrinsic nature, and assumed only in the performance of an unselfish purpose. On earth He lived as a man, and subjected Himself to the common lot of men. But He was not by nature a man, nor was He in His own nature subject to the fortunes of human life. By nature He was God; and He would have naturally lived as became God—"on an equality with God." He became man by a voluntary act, "taking no account of Himself," and, having become man, He voluntarily lived out His human life under the conditions which the fulfilment of His unselfish purpose imposed on Him.

(2) Our Lord's intrinsic Deity.—The terms in which these great affirmations are made deserve the most careful attention. The language in which Our Lord's intrinsic Deity is expressed, for example, is probably as strong as any that could be devised. Paul does not say simply, "He was God." He says, "He was in the form of God," employing a turn of speech which throws emphasis upon Our Lord's possession of the specific quality of God. "Form" is a term which expresses the sum of those characterizing qualities which make a thing the precise thing that it is. Thus, the "form" of a sword (in this case mostly matters of external configuration) is all that makes a given piece of metal specifically a sword, rather than, say, a spade. And "the form of God" is the sum of the characteristics which make the being we call "God," specifically God, rather than some other being—an angel, say, or a man. When Our Lord is said to be in "the form of God," therefore, He is declared, in the most express manner possible, to be all that God is, to possess the whole fulness of attributes which make God God. Paul chooses this manner of expressing himself here instinctively, because, in adducing Our Lord as our example of self-abnegation, his mind is naturally resting, not on the bare fact that He is God, but on the richness and fulness of His being as God. He was all this, yet He did not look on His own things but on those of others.

It should be carefully observed also that in making this great affirmation concerning Our Lord, Paul does not throw it distinctively into the past, as if he were describing a mode of being formerly Our Lord's, indeed, but no longer His because of the action by which He became our example of unselfishness. Our Lord, he says, "being," "existing," "subsisting" "in the form of God"—as it is variously rendered. The rendering proposed by RVm, "being originally," while right in substance, is somewhat misleading. The vb. employed means "strictly 'to be beforehand,' 'to be already' so and so" (Blass, Grammar of NT Greek, ET, 244), "to be there and ready," and intimates the existing circumstances, disposition of mind, or, as here, mode of subsistence in which the action to be described takes place. It contains no intimation, however, of the cessation of these circumstances or disposition, or mode of subsistence; and that, the less in a case like the present, where it is cast in a tense (the imperfect) which in no way suggests that the mode of subsistence intimated came to an end in the action described by the succeeding vb. (cf the μ 's, Lk 16 14.23; 23 50; Acts 2 30; 3 2; 2 Cor 8 17; 12 16; Gal 1 14). Paul is not telling us here, then, what Our Lord was once, but rather what He already was, or, better, what in His intrinsic nature He is; he is not describing a past mode of existence of Our Lord, before the action he is adducing as an example took place—although the mode of existence he describes was Our Lord's mode of existence before this action—so much as painting in the background upon which the action adduced may be thrown up into prominence. He is telling us who and what He is who did these things for us, that we may appreciate how great the things He did for us are.

(3) No exinanition.—And here it is important to observe that the whole of the action adduced is thrown up thus against this background—not only its negative description to the effect that Our Lord (although all that God is) did not look greedily on His (consequent) being on an equality with God; but its positive description as well, introduced by the "but . . ." and that in both of its elements, not merely that to the effect (ver 7) that "he took no account of himself" (rendered not badly by AV, He "made himself of no reputation"; but quite misleading by RV, He "emptied himself"), but equally that to the effect (ver 8) that "he humbled himself." It is the whole of what Our Lord is described as doing in vs 6-8, that He is described as doing despite His "subsistence in the form of God." So far is Paul from intimating, therefore, that Our Lord laid aside His Deity in entering upon His life on earth, that he rather asserts that He retained His Deity throughout His life on earth, and in the whole course of His humiliation, up to death itself, was consciously ever exercising self-abnegation, living a life which did not by nature belong to Him, which stood in fact in direct contradiction to the life which was naturally His. It is this underlying implication which determines the whole choice of the language in which Our Lord's earthly life is described. It is because it is kept in mind that He still was "in the form of God," that is, that He still had in possession all that body of characterizing qualities by which God is made God, for example, that He is said to have been made, not man, but "in the likeness of man," to have been found, not man, but "in fashion as a man"; and that the wonder of His servanthood and obedience, the mark of servanthood, is thought of as so great. Though He was truly man, He was much more than man; and Paul would not have his readers imagine that He had become merely man. In other words, Paul does not teach that Our Lord was once God but had become instead man; he teaches that though He was God, He had become also man.

An impression that Paul means to imply, that in entering upon His earthly life Our Lord had laid aside His Deity, may be created by a very prevalent misinterpretation of the central clause of his statement—a misinterpretation unfortunately given currency by the rendering of ERV: "counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself," varied without improvement in ARV to: "counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself." The former (negative) member of this clause means just: He did not look greedily upon His being on an equality with God; did not "set supreme store" by it (see Lightfoot on the clause). The latter (positive) member of it, however, cannot mean in antithesis to this, that He therefore "emptied himself," divested Himself of this, His being on an equality with God, much less that He "emptied himself," divested Himself of His Deity ("form of God") itself, of which His being on an equality with God is the manifested consequence. The vb. here rendered "emptied" is in constant use in a metaphorical sense (so only in the NT: Rom 4 14; 1 Cor 1 17; 9 15; 2 Cor 9 3) and cannot here be taken literally. This is already apparent from the definition of the manner in which the "emptying" is said to have been accomplished, supplied by the modal clause which is at once attached: by "taking the form of a servant." You cannot "empty" by "taking"—adding. It is equally apparent, however, from the strength of the emphasis which, by its position, is thrown upon the "himself." We may speak of Our Lord as "emptying Himself" of something else, but scarcely, with this strength of emphasis, of His "emptying Himself" of something else. This emphatic "Himself," interposed between the preceding clause and the vb. rendered "emptied," builds a barrier over which we cannot climb backward in search of that of which Our Lord emptied Himself. The whole thought is necessarily contained in the two words, "emptied himself," in which the word "emptied" must therefore be taken in a sense analogous to that which it bears in the other passages in the NT where it occurs. Paul, in a word, says here nothing more than that Our Lord, who did not look with greedy eyes upon His estate of equality with God, emptied Himself, if the language may be pardoned, of Himself; that is to say, in precise accordance with the exhortation for the enhancement of which His example is adduced, that He did not look on His own things. 'He made no account of Himself,' we may fairly paraphrase the clause; and thus all question of what He emptied Himself of falls away. What Our Lord actually did, according to Paul, is expressed in the following clauses; those now before us express more the moral character of His act. He took "the form of a servant," and so was "made in the likeness of men." But His doing this showed that He did not set overweening store by His state of equality with God, and did not account Himself the sufficient object of all the efforts. He was not self-regarding: He had regard for others. Thus He becomes our supreme example of self-abnegating conduct. See also KENOSIS.

(4) Our Lord's humanity.—The language in which the act by which Our Lord showed that He was self-abnegating is described, requires to be taken in its complete meaning. He took "the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men," says Paul. The term "form" here, of course, bears the same full meaning as in the preceding instance of its occurrence in the phrase "the form of God." It imparts the specific quality, the whole body of characteristics, by which a servant is made what we know as a servant. Our Lord assumed, then, according to Paul, not the mere state or condition or outward appearance of a servant, but the reality; He became an actual "servant" in the world. The act by which He did this is described as a "taking," or, as it has become customary from this description of it to phrase it, as an "assumption." What is meant is that Our Lord took up into His personality a human nature; and therefore it is immediately explained that He took the form of a servant by "being made in the likeness of men." That the apostle does not say, shortly, that He assumed a human nature, is due to the engagement of his mind with the contrast which he wishes to bring out forcibly for the enhancement of his appeal to Our Lord's example, between what Our Lord is by nature and what He was willing to become, not looking on His own things but also on the things of others. This contrast is, no doubt, embodied in the simple opposition of God and man; it is much more pungently expressed in the qualificative terms, "form of God" and "form of a servant." The Lord of the world became a servant in the world; He whose right it was to rule took obedience as His life-characteristic. Naturally therefore Paul employs here a word of quality rather than a word of mere nature; and then defines his meaning in this word of quality by a further expegetical clause. This further clause—"being made in the likeness of men"—does not throw doubt on the reality of the human nature that was assumed, in contradiction to the emphasis on its reality in the phrase "the form of a servant." It, along with the succeeding clause—"and being found in fashion as a man"—owes its peculiar force, as has already been pointed out, to the vividness of the apostle's consciousness, that he is speaking of one who, though really man, possessing all that makes a man a man, is yet, at the same time, infinitely more than a man, no less than God Himself, in possession of all that makes God God. Christ Jesus is in his view, therefore (as in the view of his readers, for he is not instructing his readers here as to the nature of Christ's person, but reminding them of certain elements in it for the purposes of his exhortation), both God and man, God who has "assumed" man into personal union with Himself, and has in this His assumed manhood lived out a human life on earth.

The elements of Paul's conception of the person of Christ are brought before us in this suggestive passage with unwonted fullness. But they all receive endless illustration from his occasional allusions to them, one or another, throughout his Epp. The leading motive of this passage, for example, reappears quite perfectly in 2 Cor 8 9, where we are exhorted to imitate the graciousness of Our Lord Jesus Christ, who became for our sakes

(emphatic) poor—He who was (again an imperfect participle, and therefore without suggestion of the cessation of the condition described) rich—that we might by His (very emphatic) poverty be made rich. Here the change in Our Lord's condition at a point of time perfectly understood between the writer and his readers is adverted to and assigned to its motive, but no further definition is given of the nature of either condition referred to. We are brought closer to the precise nature of the act by which the change was wrought by such a passage as Gal 4 4. We read that "When the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law." The whole transaction is referred to the Father in fulfilment of His eternal plan of redemption, and it is described specifically as an incarnation: the Son of God is born of a woman—He who is in His own nature the Son of God, abiding with God, is sent forth from God in such a manner as to be born a human being, subject to law. The primary implications are that this was not the beginning of His being; but that before this He was neither a man nor subject to law. But there is no suggestion that on becoming man and subject to law, He ceased to be the Son of God or lost anything intimated by that high designation. The uniqueness of His relation to God as His Son is emphasized in a kindred passage (Rom 8 3) by the heightening of the designation to that of God's "own Son," and His distinction from other men is intimated in the same passage by the declaration that God sent Him, not in sinful flesh, but only "in the likeness of sinful flesh." The reality of Our Lord's flesh is not thrown into doubt by this turn of speech, but His freedom from the sin which is associated with flesh as it exists in lost humanity is asserted (cf 2 Cor 5 21). Though true man, therefore (1 Cor 15 21; Rom 5 21; Acts 17 31), He is not without differences from other men; and these differences do not concern merely the condition (as sinful) in which men presently find themselves; but also their very origin: they are from below, He from above—"the first man is from the earth, earthy; the second man is from heaven" (1 Cor 15 47). This is His peculiarity: He was born of a woman like other men; yet He descended from heaven (cf Eph 4 9; Jn 3 13). It is not meant, of course, that already in heaven He was a man; what is meant is that even though man He derives His origin in an exceptional sense from heaven. Paul describes what He was in heaven (but not alone in heaven)—that is to say before He was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh (though not alone before this)—in the great terms of "God's Son," "God's own Son," "the form of God," or yet again in words whose import cannot be mistaken, "God over all" (Rom 9 5). In the last cited passage, together with its parallel earlier in the same ep. (Rom 1 3), the two sides or elements of Our Lord's person are brought into collocation after a fashion that can leave no doubt of Paul's conception of His twofold nature. In the earlier of these passages he tells us that Jesus Christ was born, indeed, of the seed of David according to the flesh, that is, so far as the human side of His being is concerned, but was powerfully marked out as the Son of God according to the Spirit of Holiness, that is, with respect to His higher nature, by the resurrection of the dead, which in a true sense began in His own rising from the dead. In the later of them, he tells us that Christ sprang indeed, as concerns the flesh, that is on the human side of His being, from Israel, but that, despite this earthly origin of His human nature, He yet is and abides (present participle) nothing less than the Supreme God, "God over all [emphatic], blessed forever." Thus Paul teaches us that by His coming forth from God to be born of woman, Our Lord, assuming a human nature to Himself, has, while remaining the Supreme God, become also true and perfect man. Accordingly, in a context in which the resources of language are strained to the utmost to make the exaltation of Our Lord's being clear—in which He is described as the image of the invisible God, whose being antedates all that is created, in whom, through whom and to whom all things have been created, and in whom they all subsist—we are told not only that (naturally) in Him all the fullness dwells (Col 1 19), but, with complete explanation, that 'all the fullness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily' (Col 2 9); that is to say, the very Deity of God, that which makes God God, in all its completeness, has its permanent home in Our Lord, and that in a "bodily fashion," that is, it is in Him clothed with a body. He who looks upon Jesus Christ sees, no doubt, a body and a man; but as he sees the man clothed with the body, so he sees God Himself, in all the fullness of His Deity, clothed with the humanity. Jesus Christ is therefore God "manifested in the flesh" (1 Tim 3 16), and His appearance on earth is an "epiphany" (2 Tim 1 10), which is the technical term for manifestations on earth of a God. Though truly man, He is nevertheless also our "great God" (Tit 2 13).

II. Teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.—

The conception of the person of Christ which underlies and finds expression in the Ep. to the He is indistinguishable from that which governs all the allusions to Our Lord in the Epp. of Paul. To the author of this ep. Our Lord is above all else the Son of God in the most eminent sense of that word; and it is the Divine dignity and majesty belonging to Him from His very nature which forms the fundamental feature of the image of Christ which stands before his mind. And yet it is this author who, perhaps above all others of the NT writers, emphasizes the truth of the humanity of Christ, and dwells with most particularity upon the elements of His human nature and experience.

(1) Background of express Deity.—The great Christological passage which fills ch 2 of the Ep. to the He rivals in its richness and fullness of detail, and its breadth of implication, that of Phil 2. It is thrown up against the background of the remarkable exposition of the Divine dignity of the Son which occupies ch 1 (notice the "therefore" of 2 1). There the Son had been declared to be "the effulgence of his (God's) glory, and the very image of his substance," through whom the universe has been created and by the word of whose power all things are held in being; and His exaltation above the angels, by means of whom the Old Covenant had been inaugurated, is measured by the difference between the designations "ministering spirits" proper to the one, and the Son of God, nay, God itself (1 8.9), proper to the other. The purpose of the succeeding statement is to enhance in the thought of the Jewish readers of the ep. the value of the salvation wrought by this Divine Saviour, by removing from their minds the offence they were in danger of taking at His lowly life and shameful death on earth. This earthly humiliation finds its abundant justification, we are told, in the greatness of the end which it sought and attained. By it Our Lord has, with His strong feet, broken out a pathway along which, in Him, sinful man may at length climb up to the high destiny which was promised him when it was declared he should have dominion over all creation. Jesus Christ stooped only to conquer, and He stooped to conquer not for Himself (for He was in His own person no less than God), but for us.

(2) Completeness of humanity.—The language in which the humiliation of the Son of God is in the first instance described is derived from the context. The establishment of His Divine majesty in ch 1 had taken the form of an exposition of His infinite exaltation above the angels, the highest of all creatures. His humiliation is described here therefore as being "made a little lower than the angels" (2 9). What is meant is simply that He became man; the phraseology is derived from Ps 8 AV, from which had just been cited the declaration that God had made man (despite his insignificance) "but a little lower than the angels," thus crowning him with glory and honor. The adoption of the language of the psalm to describe Our Lord's humiliation has the secondary effect, accordingly, of greatly enlarging the reader's sense of the immensity of the humiliation of the Son of God in becoming man; He descended an infinite distance to reach man's highest conceivable exaltation. As, however, the primary purpose of the adoption of the language is merely to declare that the Son of God became man, so it is shortly afterward explained (2 14) as an entering into participation in the blood and flesh which are common to men: "Since then the children are sharers in flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same." The voluntariness, the reality, the completeness of the assumption of humanity by the Son of God, are all here emphasized.

The proximate end of Our Lord's assumption of humanity is declared to be that He might die; He was "made a little lower than the angels . . . because of the suffering of death" (2 9); He took part in blood and flesh in order "that through death . . ." (2 14). The Son of God as such could not die; to Him belongs by nature an "indissoluble life" (7 16 m). If He was to die, therefore, He must take to Himself another nature to which the experience of death were not impossible (2 17). Of course it is not meant that death was desired by Him for its own sake. The purpose of our passage is to save its Jewish readers from the offence of the death of Christ. What they are bidden to observe is, therefore, Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels because of the suffering of death, 'crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God the bitterness of death which he tasted might redound to the benefit of every man' (2 9), and the argument is immediately pressed home that it was eminently suitable for God Almighty, in bringing many sons into glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect (as a Saviour) by means of suffering. The meaning is that it was only through suffering that these men, being sinners, could be brought into glory. And therefore in the plainer statement of ver 14 we read that Our Lord took part in flesh and blood in order "that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage"; and in the still plainer statement of ver 17 that the ultimate object of His assimilation to men was that He might "make propitiation for the sins of the people." It is for the salvation of sinners that Our Lord has come into the world; but, as that salvation can be wrought only by suffering and death, the proximate end of His assumption of humanity remains that He might die; whatever is more than this gathers around this.

The completeness of Our Lord's assumption of humanity and of His identification of Himself with it receives strong emphasis in this passage. He took part in the flesh and blood which is the common heritage of men, after the same fashion that other men participate in it (2 14); and, having thus become a man among men, He shared with other men the ordinary circumstances and fortunes of life, "in all things" (2 17). The stress is laid on trials, sufferings, death; but this is due to the actual course in which His life ran—and that it might run in which He became man—and is not exclusive of other human experiences. What is intended is that He became truly a man, and lived a truly human life, subject to all the experiences natural to a man in the particular circumstances in which He lived.

(3) Continued possession of Deity.—It is not implied, however, that during this human life—"the days of his flesh" (5 7)—He had ceased to be God, or to have at His disposal the attributes which belonged to Him as God. That is already excluded by the representations of ch 1. The glory of this dispensation consists precisely in the bringing of its revelations directly by the Divine Son rather than by mere prophets (1 1), and it was as the effulgence of God's glory and the express image of His substance, upholding the universe by the word of His power, that this Son made purification of sins (1 3). Indeed, we are expressly told that even in the days of the flesh, He continued still a Son (5 8), and that it was precisely in this that the wonder lay: that though He was and remained (imperfect particeps) a Son, He yet learned the obedience He had set Himself to (cf Phil 2 8) by the things which He suffered. Similarly, we are told not only that, though an Israelite of the tribe of Judah, He possessed "the power of an indissoluble life" (7 16 m), but, describing that higher nature which gave Him this power as an "eternal Spirit" (cf "spirit of holiness," Rom 1 4), that it was through this eternal Spirit that He could offer Himself without blemish unto God, a real and sufficing sacrifice, in contrast with the shadows of the Old Covenant (9 14). Though a man, therefore, and truly man, sprung out of Judah (7 14), touched with the feeling of human infirmities (4 15), and tempted like as we are, He was not altogether like other men. For one thing, He was "without sin" (4 15; 7 26), and, by this characteristic, He was, in every sense of the words, separated from sinners. Despite the completeness of His identification with men, He remained, therefore, even in the days of His flesh different from them and above them.

III. Teaching of Other Epistles.—It is only as we carry this conception of the person of Our Lord with us—the conception of Him as at once our Supreme Lord, to whom our adoration is due, and our fellow in the experiences of a human life—that unity is induced in the multiform allusions to Him throughout, whether the Epp. of Paul or the Ep. to the He, or, indeed, the other epistolary literature of the NT. For in this matter there is no difference between those and these. There are no doubt a few passages in these other letters in which a plurality of the elements of the person of Christ are brought together and given detailed mention. In 1 Pet 3 18, for instance, the two constitutive elements of His person are spoken of in the contrast, familiar from Paul, of the "flesh" and the "spirit." But ordinarily we meet only with references to this or that element separately. Everywhere Our Lord is spoken of as having lived out His life as a man; but everywhere also He is spoken of with the supreme reverence which is due to God alone, and the very name of God is not withheld from Him. In 1 Pet 1 11 His preexistence is taken for granted; in Jas 2 1 He is identified with the Shekinah, the manifested Jeh—"our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory"; in Jude ver 4 He is "our only Master [Despot] and Lord"; over and over again He is the Divine Lord who is Jeh (e.g. 1 Pet 2 3.13; 2 Pet 3 2.18); in 2 Pet 1 1, He is roundly called "our God and Saviour." There is nowhere formal inculcation of the entire doctrine of the person of Christ. But everywhere its elements, now one and now another, are presupposed as the common property of writer and readers. It is only in the Epp. of John that this easy and unstudied presupposition of them gives way to pointed insistence upon them.

IV. Teaching of John.—In the circumstances in which he wrote, John found it necessary to insist upon the elements of the person of Our Lord—His true Deity, His true humanity and the unity of His person—in a manner which is more didactic in form than anything we find in the other writings of the NT. The great depository of his teaching on the subject is, of course, the prologue to his Gospel.

But it is not merely in this prologue, nor in the Gospel to which it forms a fitting introduction, that these didactic statements are found. The full emphasis of John's witness to the twofold nature of the Lord is brought out, indeed, only by combining what he says in the Gospel and in the Epp. "In the Gospel," remarks Westcott (on Jn 20 31), "the evangelist shows step by step that the historical Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (opposed to mere 'flesh'); in the Ep. he reaffirms that the Christ, the Son of God, was true man (opposed to mere 'spirit'; 1 Jn 4 2)." What John is concerned to show throughout is that it was "the true God" (1 Jn 5 20) who was "made flesh" (Jn 1 14); and that this 'only God' (Jn 1 18, RVm "God only begotten") has truly come "in . . . flesh" (1 Jn 4 2). In all the universe there is no other being of whom it can be said that He is God come in flesh (cf 2 Jn ver 7, He that "cometh in the flesh," whose characteristic this is). And of all the marvels which have ever occurred in the marvelous history of the universe, this is the greatest—that 'what was from the beginning' (1 Jn 2 13.14) has been heard and gazed upon, seen and handled by men (1 Jn 1 1).

From the point of view from which we now approach it, the prologue to the Gospel of John may be said to fall into three parts. In the first of these, the nature of the Being who became incarnate in the person we know as Jesus Christ is described; in the second, the general nature of the act we call the incarnation; and in the third, the nature of the incarnated person. See JOHANNINE THEOLOGY, III; JOHN, GOSPEL OF, IV, 1, (3), 2.

(1) The Being who was incarnate.—John here calls the person who became incarnate by a name peculiar to himself in the NT—the "Logos" or "Word." According to the predicates which he here applies to Him, he can mean by the "Word" nothing else but God Himself, "considered in His creative, operative, self-revealing, and communicating character," the sum total of what is Divine (C. F. Schmid). In three crisp sentences he declares at the outset His eternal subsistence, His eternal intercommunion with God, His eternal identity with God: 'In the beginning the Word was; and the Word was with God; and the Word was God' (Jn 1 1). "In the beginning," at that point of time when things first began to be (Gen 1 1), the Word already "was." He antedates the beginning of all things. And He not merely antedates them, but it is immediately added that He is Himself the creator of all that is: 'All things were made by him, and apart from him was not made one thing that hath been made' (1 3). Thus He is taken out of the category of creatures altogether. Accordingly, what is said of Him is not that He was the first of existences to come into being—that 'in the beginning He already had come into being'—but that 'in the beginning, when things began to come into being, He already was.' It is express eternity of being that is asserted: "the imperfect tense of the original suggests in this relation, as far as human language can do so, the notion of absolute, supra-temporal existence" (Westcott). This, His eternal subsistence, was not, however, in isolation: "And the Word was with God." The language is pregnant. It is not merely coexistence with God that is asserted, as of two beings standing side by side, united in a local relation, or even in a common conception. What is suggested is an active relation of intercourse. The distinct personality of the Word is therefore not obscurely intimated. From all eternity the Word has been with God as a fellow: He who in the very beginning already "was," "was" also in communion with God. Though He was thus in some sense a second along with God, He was nevertheless not a separate being from God: "And the Word was"—still the eternal "was"—"God." In some sense distinguishable from God, He was in an equally true sense identical with God. There is but one eternal God; this eternal God, the Word is; in whatever sense we may distinguish Him from the God whom He is "with," He is yet not another than this God, but Himself is this God. The predicate "God" occupies the position of emphasis in this great declaration, and is so placed in the sentence as to be thrown up in sharp contrast with the phrase "with God," as if to prevent inadequate inferences as to the nature of the Word being drawn even momentarily from that phrase. John would have us realize that what the Word was in eternity was not merely God's coeternal fellow, but the eternal God's self.

(2) The incarnation.—Now, John tells us that it was this Word, eternal in His subsistence, God's eternal fellow, the eternal God's self, that, as "come in the flesh," was Jesus Christ (1 Jn 4 2). "And the Word became flesh" (Jn 1 14), he says. The terms he employs here are not terms of substance, but of personality. The meaning is not that the substance of God was transmuted into that substance which we call "flesh." "The Word" is a personal name of the eternal God; "flesh" is an appropriate designation of humanity in its entirety, with the implications of dependence and weakness. The meaning, then, is simply that He who had just been described as the eternal God became, by a voluntary act in time, a man. The exact nature of the act by which He "became" man lies outside the statement; it was matter of common knowledge between the writer and the reader. The language employed intimates merely that it was a definite act, and that it involved a change in the life-history of the eternal God, here designated "the Word." The whole emphasis falls on the nature of this change in His life-history. He became flesh. That is to say, He entered upon a mode of existence in which the experiences that belong to human beings would also be His. The dependence, the weakness, which constitute the very idea of flesh, in contrast with God, would now enter into His personal experience. And it is precisely because these are the connotations of the term "flesh" that John chooses that term here, instead of the more simply denotative term "man." What he means is merely that the eternal God became man. But he elects to say this in the language which throws best up to view what it is to become man. The contrast between the Word as the eternal God and the human nature which He assumed as flesh, is the hinge of the statement. Had the evangelist said (as he does in 1 Jn 4 2) that the Word 'came in flesh,' it would have been the continuity through the change which would have been most emphasized. When he says rather that the Word became flesh, while the continuity of the personal subject is, of course, intimated, it is the reality and the completeness of the humanity assumed which is made most prominent.

(3) The incarnated person.—That in becoming flesh the Word did not cease to be what He was before entering upon this new sphere of experiences, the evangelist does not leave, however, to mere suggestion. The glory of the Word was so far from quenched, in his view, by His becoming flesh, that he gives us at once to understand that it was rather as "trailing clouds of glory" that He came. "And the Word became flesh," he says, and immediately adds: "and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth" (1 14). The language is colored by reminiscences from the Tabernacle, in which the Glory of God, the Shekinah, dwelt. The flesh of Our Lord became, on its assumption by the Word, the Temple of God on earth (cf Jn 2 19), and the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord. John tells us expressly that this glory was visible, that it was precisely what was appropriate to the Son of God as such. "And we beheld his glory," he says; not divined it, or inferred it, but perceived it. It was open to sight, and the actual object of observation. Jesus Christ was obviously more than man; He was obviously God. His actually observed glory, John tells us further, was a "glory as of the only begotten from the Father." It was unique; nothing like it was ever seen in another. And its uniqueness consisted precisely in its consonance with what the unique Son of God, sent forth from the Father, would naturally have; men recognized and could not but recognize in Jesus Christ the unique Son of God. When this unique Son of God is further described as "full of grace and truth," the elements of His manifested glory are not to be supposed to be exhausted by this description (cf 2 11). Certain items of it only are singled out for particular mention. The visible glory of the incarnated Word was such a glory as the unique Son of God, sent forth from the Father, who was full of grace and truth, would naturally manifest.

That nothing should be lacking to the declaration of the continuity of all that belongs to the Word as such into this new sphere of existence, and its full manifestation through the veil of His flesh, John adds at the close of his exposition the remarkable sentence: 'As for God, no one has even yet seen him; God only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father—he hath declared him' (1 18 m). It is the incarnate Word which is here called 'only begotten God.' The absence of the article with this designation is doubtless due to its parallelism with the word "God" which stands at the head of the corresponding clause. The effect of its absence is to throw up into emphasis the quality rather than the mere individuality of the person so designated. The adj. "only begotten" conveys the idea, not of derivation and subordination, but of uniqueness and consubstantiality: Jesus is all that God is, and He alone is this. Of this 'only begotten God' it is now declared that He "is"—not "was," the state is not one which has been left behind at the incarnation, but one which continues uninterrupted and unmodified—"into"—not merely "in"—"the bosom of the Father"—that is to say, He continues in the most intimate and complete communion with the Father. Though now incarnate, He is still "with God" in the full sense of the external relation intimated in 1 1. This being true, He has much more than seen God, and is fully able to "interpret" God to men. Though no one has ever yet seen God, yet he who has seen Jesus Christ, "God only begotten," has seen the Father (cf 14 9; 12 45). In this remarkable sentence there is asserted in the most direct manner the full Deity of the incarnate Word, and the continuity of His life as such in His incarnate life; thus He is fitted to be the absolute revelation of God to man.

This condensed statement of the whole doctrine of the incarnation is only the prologue to a historical treatise. The historical treatise

3. The Gospel is which it introduces, naturally, is written from the point of view of its prologue. Its object is to present Jesus Christ in His historical manifestation, as obviously the Son of God in flesh. "These are written," the Gospel testifies, "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (20 31); that Jesus who came as a man (1 30) was thoroughly known in His human origin (7 27), confessed Himself man (8 40), and died as a man dies

(19 5), was, nevertheless, not only the Messiah, the Sent of God, the fulfiller of all the Divine promises of redemption, but also the very Son of God, that God only begotten, who, abiding in the bosom of the Father, is His sole adequate interpreter. From the beginning of the Gospel onward, this purpose is pursued: Jesus is pictured as ever, while truly man, yet manifesting Himself as equally truly God, until the veil which covered the eyes of His followers was wholly lifted, and He is greeted as both Lord and God (20 28). But though it is the prime purpose of this Gospel to exhibit the Divinity of the man Jesus, no obscuration of His manhood is involved. It is the Deity of the man Jesus which is insisted on, but the true manhood of Jesus is as prominent in the representation as in any other portion of the NT. Nor is any effacement of the humiliation of His earthly life involved. For the Son of man to come from heaven was a descent (3 13), and the mission which He came to fulfil was a mission of contest and conflict, of suffering and death. He brought His glory with Him (1 14), but the glory that was His on earth (17 22) was not all the glory which He had had with the Father before the world was, and to which, after His work was done, He should return (17 5). Here too the glory of the celestial is one and the glory of the terrestrial is another. In any event, John has no difficulty in presenting the life of Our Lord on earth as the life of God in flesh, and in insisting at once on the glory that belongs to Him as God and on the humiliation which is brought to Him by the flesh. It is distinctly a duplex life which he ascribes to Christ, and he attributes to Him without embarrassment all the powers and modes of activity appropriate on the one hand to Deity and on the other to sinless (Jn 8 46; cf 14 30; 1 Jn 3 5) human nature. In a true sense his portrait of Our Lord is a dramatization of the God-man which he presents to our contemplation in his prologue.

V. Teaching of the Synoptic Gospels.—The same may be said of the other Gospels. They are all dramatizations of the God-man set forth in thetical exposition in the prologue to John's Gospel. The Gospel of Luke, written by a known companion of Paul, gives us in a living narrative the same Jesus who is presupposed in all Paul's allusions to Him. That of Mark, who was also a companion of Paul, as also of Peter, is, as truly as the Gospel of John itself, a presentation of facts in the life of Jesus with a view to making it plain that this was the life of no mere man, human as it was, but of the Son of God Himself. Matthew's Gospel differs from its fellows mainly in the greater richness of Jesus' own testimony to His Deity which it records. What is characteristic of all three is the inextricable interlacing in their narratives of the human and Divine traits which alike marked the life they are depicting. It is possible, by neglecting one series of their representations and attending only to the other, to sift out from them at will the portrait of either a purely Divine or a purely human Jesus. It is impossible to derive from them the portrait of any other than a Divine-human Jesus if we surrender ourselves to their guidance and take off of their pages the portrait they have endeavored to draw. As in their narratives they cursorily suggest now the fulness of His Deity and now the completeness of His humanity and everywhere the unity of His person, they present as real and as forcible a testimony to the constitution of Our Lord's person as uniting in one personal life a truly Divine and a truly human nature, as if they announced this fact in analytical statement. Only on the assumption of this conception of Our Lord's person as underlying and determining their presentation, can unity be given to their representations; while, on this supposition, all their representations fall into their places as elements in one consistent whole. Within the limits of their common presupposition, each Gospel has no doubt its own peculiarities in the distribution of its emphasis. Mark lays particular stress on the Divine power of the man Jesus, as evidence of His supernatural being; and on the irresistible impression of a veritable Son of God, a Divine being walking the earth as a man, which He made upon all with whom He came into contact. Luke places his Gospel by the side of the Ep. to the He in the prominence it gives to the human development of the Divine being whose life on earth it is depicting and to the range of temptation to which He was subjected. Matthew's Gospel is notable chiefly for the heights of the Divine self-consciousness which it uncovers in its report of the words of Him whom it represents as nevertheless the Son of David, the Son of Abraham; heights of Divine self-consciousness which fall in nothing short of those attained in the great utterances preserved for us by John. But amid whatever variety there may exist in the aspects on which each lays his particular emphasis, it is the same Jesus Christ which all three bring before us, a Jesus Christ who is at once God and man and one individual person. If that be not recognized, the whole narrative of the Synoptic Gospels is thrown into confusion; their portrait of Christ becomes an insoluble puzzle; and the mass of details which they present of His life-experiences is transmuted into a mere set of crass contradictions. See also GOSPELS, THE SYNOPTIC.

VI. Teaching of Jesus.—The Gospel narratives not only present us, however, with dramatizations of the God-man, according to their

1. The authors' conception of His composite person. They preserve for us also a considerable body of the utterances of Jesus Himself, and this enables us to observe the conception of His person which underlay and found expression in Our Lord's own teaching. The discourses of Our Lord which have been selected for record by John have been chosen (among other reasons) expressly for the reason that they bear witness to His essential Deity. They are accordingly peculiarly rich in material for forming a judgment of Our Lord's conception of His higher nature. This conception, it is needless to say, is precisely that which John, taught by it, has announced in the prologue to his Gospel, and has illustrated by his Gospel itself, compacted as it is of these discourses. It will not be necessary to present the evidence for this in its fulness. It will be enough to point to a few characteristic passages, in which Our Lord's conception of His higher nature finds esp. clear expression.

(1) His higher nature.—That He was of higher than earthly origin and nature, He repeatedly asserts. "Ye are from beneath," he says to the Jews (8 23), "I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world" (cf 17 16). Therefore, He taught that He, the Son of Man, had "descended out of heaven" (3 13), where was His true abode. This carried with it, of course, an assertion of preëxistence; and this preëxistence is explicitly affirmed: "What then," He asks, "if ye should behold the Son of man ascending where he was before?" (6 62). It is not merely preëxistence, however, but eternal preëxistence which He claims for Himself: "And now, Father," He prays (17 5), "glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (cf ver 24); and again, as the most impressive language possible, He declares (8 58 AV): "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am," where He claims for Himself the timeless present of eternity as His mode of existence. In the former of these two last-cited passages, the character of His preëxistent life is intimated; in it He shared the Father's glory from all eternity ("before the world was"); He stood by the Father's side as a companion in His glory. He came forth, when He descended to earth, therefore, not from heaven only, but from the very side of God (8 42; 17 8). Even this, however, does not express the whole truth; He came forth not only from the Father's side where He had shared in the Father's glory; He came forth out of the Father's very being—"I came out from the Father, and am come into the world" (16 28; cf 8 42). "The connection described is inherent and essential, and not that of presence or external fellowship" (Westcott). This prepares us for the great assertion: "I and the Father are one" (10 30), from which it is a mere corollary that "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (14 9; cf 8 19; 12 45).

(2) His humiliation.—In all these declarations the subject of the affirmation is the actual person speaking: it is of Himself who stood before men and spoke to them that Our Lord makes these immense assertions. Accordingly, when He majestically declared, "I and the Father are" (plurality of persons) "one" (neuter singular, and accordingly singleness of being), the Jews naturally understood Him to be making Himself, the person then speaking to them, God (10 33; cf 5 18; 19 7). The continued sameness of the person who has been, from all eternity down to this hour, one with God, is therefore fully safeguarded. His earthly life is, however, distinctly represented as a humiliation. Though even on earth He is one with the Father, yet He "descended" to earth; He had come out from the Father and out of God; a glory had been left behind which was yet to be returned to, and His sojourn on earth was therefore to that extent an obscuration of His proper glory. There was a sense, then, in which, because He had "descended," He was no longer equal with the Father. It was in order to justify an assertion of equality with the Father in power (10 25, 29) that He was led to declare: "I and my Father are one" (10 30). But He can also declare "The Father is greater than I" (14 28). Obviously this means that there was a sense in which He had ceased to be equal with the Father, because of the humiliation of His present condition, and in so far as this humiliation involved entrance into a status lower than that which belonged to Him by nature. Precisely in what this humiliation consisted can be gathered only from the general implication of many statements. In it He was a "man": "a man who hath told you the truth, which I have heard from God" (8 40), where the contrast with "God" throws the assertion of humanity into emphasis (cf 10 33). The truth of His human nature is, however, everywhere assumed and endlessly illustrated, rather than explicitly asserted. He possessed a human soul (12 27) and bodily parts (flesh and blood, 6 53 ff; hands and side, 20 27); and was subject alike to physical affections (weariness, 4 6, and thirst, 19 28, suffering and death), and to all the common human emotions—not merely the love of compassion (13 34; 14 21; 15 8–13), but the love of simple affection which we pour out on "friends" (11 11; cf 15 14, 15), indignation (11 33, 38) and joy (15 11; 17 13). He felt the perturbation produced by strong excitement (11 33; 12 27; 13 21), the sympathy with suffering which shows itself in tears (11 35), the thankfulness which fills the grateful heart (6 11, 23; 11 41; 16 27). Only one human characteristic was alien to Him: He was without sin: "the prince of the world," He declared, "hath nothing in me" (14 30; cf 8 46). Clearly Our Lord, as reported by John, knew Himself to be true God and true man in one indivisible person, the common subject of the qualities which belong to each.

(1) His Deity.—(a) Mk 13 32: The same is true of His self-consciousness as revealed in His sayings recorded by the synoptists.

2. The Synoptic Jesus

Perhaps no more striking illustration of this could be adduced than the remarkable declaration recorded in Mk 13 32 (cf Mt 24 36): 'But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, nor yet the Son, but the Father.' Here Jesus places Himself, in an ascending scale of being, above "the angels in heaven," that is to say, the highest of all creatures, significantly marked here as supramundane. Accordingly, He presents Himself elsewhere as the Lord of the angels, whose behests they obey: "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity" (Mt 13 41), "And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other" (Mt 24 31; cf 13 49; 25 31; Mk 8 38). Thus the "angels of God" (Lk 12 8, 9; 15 10) Christ designates as His angels, the "kingdom of God" (Mt 12 28; 19 24; 21 31, 43; Mk and Lk often) as His Kingdom, the "elect of God" (Mk 13 20; Lk 18 7; cf Rom 8 33; Col 3 12; Tit 1 1) as His elect. He is obviously speaking in Mk 13 22 out of a Divine self-consciousness: "Only a Divine being can be exalted above angels" (B. Weiss). He therefore designates Himself by His Divine name, "the Son," that is to say, the unique Son of God (9 7; 1 11), to claim to be whom would for a man be blasphemy (Mk 14 61, 64). But though He designates Himself by this Divine name, He is not speaking of what He once was, but of what at the moment of speaking He is: the action of the vb. is present, "knoweth." He is claiming, in other words, the supreme designation of "the Son," with all that is involved in it, for His present self, as He moved among men: He is, not merely was, "the Son." Nevertheless, what He affirms of Himself cannot be affirmed of Himself distinctively as "the Son." For what He affirms of Himself is ignorance—"not even the Son" knows it; and ignorance does not belong to the Divine nature which the term "the Son" connotes. An extreme appearance of contradiction accordingly arises from the use of this terminology, just as it arises when Paul says that the Jews "crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor 2 8), or exhorts the Ephesian elders to "feed the church of God which he purchased with his own blood" (Acts 20 28 m); or John Keble praises Our Lord for "the blood of souls by Thee redeemed." It was not the Lord of Glory as such who was nailed to the tree, nor have either "God" or "souls" blood to shed.

We know how this apparently contradictory mode of speech has arisen in Keble's case. He is speaking of men who are composite beings, consisting of souls and bodies, and these men come to be designated from one element of their composite personalities, though what is affirmed by them belongs rather to the other; we may speak, therefore, of the "blood of souls" meaning that these "souls," while not having blood as such, yet designate persons who have bodies and therefore blood. We know equally how to account for Paul's apparent contradictions. We know that he conceived of Our Lord as a composite person, uniting in Himself a Divine and a human nature. In Paul's view, therefore, though and as such has no blood, yet Jesus Christ who is God has blood because He is also man. He can justly speak, therefore, when speaking of Jesus Christ, of His blood as the blood of God. When precisely the same phenomenon meets us in Our Lord's speech of precisely the same state of things. When He speaks of "the Son" (who is God) as ignorant, we must understand that He is designating Himself as "the Son" because of His higher nature, and yet has in mind the ignorance of His lower nature; what He means is that the person properly designated "the Son" is ignorant, that is to say with respect to the human nature which is as intimate an element of His personality as is His Deity.

When Our Lord says, then, that "the Son knows not," He becomes as express a witness to the two natures which constitute His person as Paul is when he speaks of the blood of God, or as Keble is a witness to the twofold constitution of a human being when he speaks of souls shedding blood. In this short sentence, thus, Our Lord bears witness to His Divine nature with its supremacy above all creatures, to His human nature with its creaturely limitations, and to the unity of the subject possessed of these two natures.

(b) Other passages: Son of Man and Son of God: All these elements of His personality find severally repeated assertions in other utterances of Our Lord recorded in the Synoptics. There is no need to insist here on the elevation of Himself above the kings and prophets of the Old Covenant (Mt 12 41 ff), above the temple itself (Mt 12 6), and the ordinances of the Divine Law (Mt 12 8); or on His accent of authority in both His teaching and action, His great "I say unto you" (Mt 5 21,22; 'I will; be cleansed' (Mk 1 41; 2 5; Lk 7 14); or on His separation of Himself from men in His relation to God, never including them with Himself in an "Our Father," but consistently speaking distinctively of "my Father" (e.g. Lk 24 49) and "your Father" (e.g. Mt 5 16); or on His intimation that He is not merely David's Son but David's Lord, and that a Lord sitting on the right hand of God (Mt 22 44); or on His parabolic discrimination of Himself a Son and Heir from all "servants" (Mt 21 33 ff); or even on His ascription to Himself of the purely Divine functions of the forgiveness of sins (Mk 2 8) and judgment of the world (Mt 25 31), or of the purely Divine powers of reading the heart (Mk 2 8; Lk 9 47), omnipotence (Mt 24 30; Mk 14 62) and omnipresence (Mt 18 20; 28 10). These things illustrate His constant assumption of the possession of Divine dignity and attributes; the claim itself is more directly made in the two great designations which He currently gave Himself, the Son of Man and the Son of God. The former of these is His favorite self-designation. Derived from Dnl 7 13,14, it intimates on every occasion of its employment Our Lord's consciousness of being a supra-mundane being, who has entered into a sphere of earthly life on a high mission, on the accomplishment of which He is to return to His heavenly sphere, whence He shall in due season come back to earth, now, however, in His proper majesty, to gather up the fruits of His work and consummate all things. It is a designation, thus, which implies at once a heavenly preexistence, a present humiliation, and a future glory; and He proclaims Himself in this future glory no less than the universal King seated on the throne of judgment for quick and dead (Mk 8 31; Mt 25 31). The implication of Deity imbedded in the designation, Son of Man, is perhaps more plainly spoken out in the companion designation, Son of God, which Our Lord not only accepts at the hands of others, accepting with it the implication of blasphemy in permitting its application to Himself (Mt 26 63,65; Mk 14 61,64; Lk 22 29,30), but persistently claims for Himself both, in His constant designation of God as His Father in a distinctive sense, and in His less frequent but more pregnant designation of Himself as, by way of eminence, "the Son." That His consciousness of the peculiar relation to God expressed by this designation was not an attainment of His mature spiritual development, but was part of His most intimate consciousness from the beginning, is suggested by the sole glimpse which is given us into His mind as a child (Lk 2 49). The high significance which the designation bore to Him is revealed to us in two remarkable utterances preserved, the one by both Matthew (11 27 ff) and Luke (10 22 ff), and the other by Matthew (28 19).

(c) Mt 11 27; 28 19: In the former of these utterances, Our Lord, speaking in the most solemn manner, not only presents Himself, as the Son, as the sole source of knowledge of God and of blessedness for men, but places Himself in a position, not of equality merely, but of absolute reciprocity and interpenetration of knowledge with the Father. "No one," He says, "knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son . . ." varied in Luke so as to read: "No one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son . . ." as if the being of the Son were so immense that only God could know it thoroughly; and the knowledge of the Son was so unlimited that He could know God to perfection. The peculiarly pregnant employment here of the terms "Son" and "Father" over against one another is explained to us in the other utterance (Mt 28 19). It is the resurrected Lord's commission to His disciples. Claiming for Himself all authority in heaven and on earth—which implies the possession of omnipotence—and promising to be with His followers 'always, even to the end of the world'—which adds the implications of omnipresence and omniscience—He commands them to baptize their converts 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' The precise form of the formula must be carefully observed. It does not read: 'In the names' (plural)—as if there were three beings enumerated, each with its distinguishing name. Nor yet: 'In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost,' as if there were one person, going by a threefold name. It reads: 'In the name [singular] of the Father, and of the [article repeated] Son, and of the [article repeated] Holy Ghost,' carefully distinguishing three persons, though uniting them all under one name. The name of God was to the Jews Jeh, and to name the name of Jeh upon them was to make them His. What Jesus did in this great injunction was to command His followers to name the name of God upon their converts, and to announce the name of God which is to be named on their converts in the threefold enumeration of "the Father" and "the Son" and "the Holy Ghost." As it is unquestionable that He intended Himself by "the Son," He here places Himself by the side of the Father and the Spirit, as together with them constituting the one God. It is, of course, the Trinity which He is describing; and that is as much as to say that He announces Himself as one of the persons of the Trinity. This is what Jesus, as reported by the Synoptics, understood Himself to be. See TRINITY.

(2) His humanity.—In announcing Himself to be God, however, Jesus does not deny that He is man also. If all His speech of Himself rests on His consciousness of a Divine nature, no less does all His speech manifest His consciousness of a human nature. He easily identifies Himself with men (Mt 4 4; Lk 4 4), and receives without protest the imputation of humanity (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34). He speaks familiarly of His body (Mt 26 12,26; Mk 14 8; 14 22; Lk 22 19), and of His bodily parts—His feet and hands (Lk 24 39), His head and feet (Lk 7 44-46), His flesh and bones (Lk 24 39), His blood (Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20). We chance to be given indeed a very express affirmation on His part of the reality of His bodily nature; when His disciples were terrified at His appearing before them after His resurrection, supposing Him to be a spirit, He reassures them with the direct declaration: "See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye behold me having" (Lk 24 39). His testimony to His human soul is just as express: "My soul," says He, "is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death" (Mt 26 38; Mk 14 34). He speaks of the human dread with which

He looked forward to His approaching death (Lk 12 50), and expresses in a poignant cry His sense of desolation on the cross (Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34). He speaks also of His pity for the weary and hungering people (Mt 15 32; Mk 8 2), and of a strong human desire which He felt (Lk 22 15). Nothing that is human is alien to Him except sin. He never ascribes imperfection to Himself and never betrays consciousness of sin. He recognizes the evil of those about Him (Lk 11 13; Mt 7 11; 12 34. 39; Lk 11 29), but never identifies Himself with it. It is those who do the will of God with whom He feels kinship (Mt 12 50), and He offers Himself to the morally sick as a physician (Mt 9 12). He proposes Himself as an example of the highest virtues (Mt 11 28 ff) and pronounces him blessed who shall find no occasion of stumbling in Him (Mt 11 6).

(3) Unity of the Person.—These manifestations of a human and Divine consciousness simply stand side by side in the records of Our Lord's self-expression. Neither is suppressed or even qualified by the other. If we attend only to the one class we might suppose Him to proclaim Himself wholly Divine; if only to the other we might equally easily imagine Him to be representing Himself as wholly human. With both together before us we perceive Him alternately speaking out of a Divine and out of a human consciousness; manifesting Himself as all that God is and as all that man is; yet with the most marked unity of consciousness. He, the one Jesus Christ, was to His own apprehension true God and complete man in a unitary personal life.

VII. The Two Natures Everywhere Presupposed.

—There underlies, thus, the entire literature of the NT a single, unvarying conception of the constitution of Our Lord's person. From Mt where He is presented as one of the persons of the Holy Trinity (23 19)—or if we prefer the chronological order of books, from the Ep. of Jas where He is spoken of as the Glory of God, the Shekinah (2 1)—to the Apocalypse where He is represented as declaring that He is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End (1 8.17; 22 13), He is consistently thought of as in His fundamental being just God. At the same time from the Synoptic Gospels, in which He is dramatized as a man walking among men, His human descent carefully recorded, and His sense of dependence on God so emphasized that prayer becomes almost His most characteristic action, to the Epp. of John in which it is made the note of a Christian that He confesses that Jesus Christ has come in flesh (1 Jn 4 2) and the Apocalypse in which His birth in the tribe of Judah and the house of David (5 5; 22 16), His exemplary life of conflict and victory (3 21), His death on the cross (11 8) are noted, He is equally consistently thought of as true man. Nevertheless, from the beginning to the end of the whole series of books, while first one and then the other of His two natures comes into repeated prominence, there is never a question of conflict between the two, never any confusion in their relations, never any schism in His unitary personal action; but He is obviously considered and presented as one, composite indeed, but undivided personality. In this state of the case not only may evidence of the constitution of Our Lord's person properly be drawn indifferently from every part of the NT, and passage justly be cited to support and explain passage without reference to the portion of the NT in which it is found, but we should be without justification if we did not employ this common presupposition of the whole body of this literature to illustrate and explain the varied representations which meet us cursorily in its pages, representations which might easily be made to appear mutually contradictory were they not brought into harmony by their relation as natural component parts of this one unitary conception which underlies and gives consistency to them all. There can scarcely be imagined a better proof of the truth of a doctrine than its power completely to harmonize a multitude of statements which without it would present to our view only a mass of confused inconsistencies. A key which perfectly fits a lock of very complicated wards can scarcely fail to be the true key.

VIII. Formulation of the Doctrine.—Meanwhile the wards remain complicated. Even in the case of our own composite structure, of soul and body, familiar as we are with it from our daily experience, the mutual relations of elements so disparate in a single personality remain an unplumbed mystery, and give rise to paradoxical modes of speech which would be misleading, were not their source in our duplex nature well understood. We may read, in careful writers, of souls being left dead on battlefields, and of everybody's immortality. The mysteries of the relations in which the constituent elements in the more complex personality of Our Lord stand to one another are immeasurably greater than in our simpler case. We can never hope to comprehend how the infinite God and a finite humanity can be united in a single person; and it is very easy to go fatally astray in attempting to explain the interactions in the unitary person of natures so diverse from one another. It is not surprising, therefore, that so soon as serious efforts began to be made to give systematic explanations of the Bib. facts as to Our Lord's person, many one-sided and incomplete statements were formulated which required correction and complementing before at length a mode of statement was devised which did full justice to the Bib. data. It was accordingly only after more than a century of controversy, during which nearly every conceivable method of construing and misconstruing the Bib. facts had been proposed and tested, that a formula was framed which successfully guarded the essential data supplied by the Scriptures from destructive misconception. This formula, put together by the Council of Chalcedon, 451 AD, declares it to have always been the doctrine of the church, derived from the Scriptures and Our Lord Himself, that Our Lord Jesus Christ is "truly God and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; in all things like unto us, without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, according to the manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and Only-begotten, God, the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ." There is nothing here but a careful statement in systematic form of the pure teaching of the Scriptures; and therefore this statement has stood ever since as the norm of thought and teaching as to the person of the Lord. As such, it has been incorporated, in one form or another, into the creeds of all the great branches of the church; it underlies and gives their form to all the allusions to Christ in the great mass of preaching and song which has accumulated during the centuries; and it has supplied the background of the devotions of the untold multitudes who through the Christian ages have been worshippers of Christ.

PERSONALITY. See PERSON.

PERSUADE, pēr-swād', PERSUASION, pēr-swā'-zhun: (1) In the older Eng. "persuade" need not mean "convince" (although this is its usual sense in the AV: Mt 27 20, etc), but may mean only "attempt to convince," "argue with." This is well brought out in Acts 26 28, where the Gr is lit. "In little thou 'persuadest' [πεῖθεῖς, peitheis] to make me a Christian." AV took peitheis as "convince" ("almost thou persuadest me . . ."), but this is impossible, and so the RV rendered peitheis by "thou wouldest fain." To keep something of the language of AV, "persuasion" was supplied after "little," but it should have been italicized, for it is merely conjectural, as ARV^m recognizes by giving "time" as an alternative for "persuasion." The text of the passage, however, is suspected. See ALMOST. Similarly in Acts 13 43, RV replaces "persuade" by "urge," and the same change should have been made also in 2 K 18 32 and 1^s. (2) The "popular persuasions" of 1 Esd 5 73 are "efforts to persuade the people" (uncertain text, however). Acts 19 8 AV writes "persuading the things" (RV "as to the things") for "present the things persuasively." And in Gal 1 10 (ERV and AV, not in ARV) and 2 Cor 5 11, there is a half-ironic force in the word: St. Paul's enemies have accused him of using unworthy persuasion in making his conversions.

PERUDA, pe-rōō'da (פֶּרֻדָּא, p'rūdā'). See PERIDA.

PERVERSE, pēr-vūrs': The group "perverse, -ly, -ness," "act perversely" in AV represents nearly 20 Heb words, of which, however, most are derivatives of the stems פָּרַה, 'āwāh, לוּז, lūz, עָקַשׁ, 'āqash. RV has made few changes. In Job 6 30, RV "mischievous" is better for the taste of a thing, and in Isa 59 3 greater emphasis is gained by RV "wickedness." In Ezk 9 9, "wresting of judgment" is perhaps too concrete, and "perverseness" is kept in the m (inverted in AV). RV^m "headlong" in Nu 22 32 is over-literal, but in 23 21 ARV^m's "trouble" is a distinct improvement.

PESTILENCE, pes'ti-lens (דֶּבֶר, debher; λοιμός, loimós): Any sudden fatal epidemic is designated by this word, and in its Bib. use it generally indicates that these are Divine visitations. The word is most frequently used in the prophetic books, and it occurs 25 t in Jer and Ezk, always associated with the sword and famine. In 4 other passages it is combined with noisome or evil beasts, or war. In Am 4 10 this judgment is compared with the plagues of Egypt, and in Hab 3 5 it is a concomitant of the march of God from the Arabian mountain. There is the same judicial character associated with pestilence in Ex 5 3; 9 15; Lev 26

25; Nu 14 12; Dt 28 21; 2 S 24 21; 1 Ch 21 12; Ezk 14 19, 21. In the dedication prayer of Solomon, a special value is besought for such petitions against pestilence as may be presented toward the temple (2 Ch 6 28). Such a deliverance is promised to those who put their trust in God (Ps 91 6). Here the pestilence is called noisome, a shortened form of "annoysome," used in the sense of "hateful" or that which causes trouble or distress. In modern Eng. it has acquired the sense of loathsome. "Noisome" is used by Tindale where AV and RV have "hurtful" in 1 Tim 6 9.

The Lat word pestilentialia is connected with pestis, "the plague," but pestilence is used of any visitation and is not the name of any special disease; debher is applied to diseases of cattle and is tr^d "mur- rain."

In the NT pestilence is mentioned in Our Lord's eschatological discourse (Mt 24 7 AV; Lk 21 11) coupled with famine. The assonance of loimós and limós in these passages (loimos is omitted in the RV passage for Mt) occurs in several classical passages, e.g. Herodotus vii.171. The pestilence is said to walk in darkness (Ps 91 6) on account of its sudden onset out of obscurity unassociated with any apparent cause.

LITERATURE

The data for this article are found chiefly in the four Gospels; in Acts, chs 1-15; in Gal 1 and 2; and in the two Epp. of Peter.

Simon (or Simeon) was the original name of Peter, the son of Jonas (or John), and brother of Andrew, a disciple of John the Baptist, as Peter also may have been. A fisherman by occupation, he was an inhabitant of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, though subsequently he dwelt with his family at Capernaum (Mt 4 18; 8 14; 10 2; 16 16, 17; 17 25; Mk 1 16, 29, 30, 36; Lk 5 3, 4, 5, 8, 10; 22 31; 24 34; Jn 1 40-44).

His first appearance in Gospel history is in Jn 1 35-42, when Andrew, having discovered Jesus to be the Messiah, "first findeth his own

2. First brother Simon, and "brought him unto Appearance Jesus"; on which occasion it was that in Gospel the latter, beholding him, said, "Thou History shalt be called Cephas," an Aram. surname whose Gr synonym is Petrós, or Peter, meaning "a rock" or "stone." At this time also he received his first call to the discipleship of Jesus, although, in common with that of others of the Twelve, this call was twice repeated. See Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17; Lk 5 3 for the second call, and Mt 10 2; Mk 3 14, 16; Lk 6 13, 14 for the third. Some interpret the second as that when he was chosen to be a constant companion of Jesus, and the third when he was at length selected as an apostle.

The life-story of Peter falls into two parts: first, from his call to the ascension of Christ; secondly, from that event to the close of his earthly career.

3. Life-Story

(1) The first period again may be conveniently divided into the events prior to the Passion of Christ and those following. There are about ten of the former: the healing of his wife's mother at Capernaum (Mt 8 14 ff); the great draught of fishes, and its effect in his self-abasement and surrender of his all to Jesus (Lk 5 1-11); his call to the apostolic office and his spiritual equipment therefor (Mt 10 2); his attachment to his Master, as shown in his attempt to walk upon the waves (Mt 14 28); the same attachment as shown at a certain crisis, in his inquiry "Lord, to whom shall we go?" (Jn 6 68); his noble confession of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, and, alas, the rebuke that followed it (Mt 16 13-23); the exalted privileges he enjoyed with James and John as witness of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5 37) and the transfiguration of his Lord (Mt 17 1-5); and finally, the incident of the tribute money, found only in Mt 17 24.

The events beginning at the Passion are more easily recalled, because to so large an extent are they found in all the Gospels and about in the same order. They commence with the washing of his feet by the Master at the time of the last Passover, and the two mistakes he made as to the spiritual import of that act (Jn 13 1-10); the first of his presumptuous boastings as to the strength of his devotion to his Master, and the warning of the latter as to Satan's prospective assault upon him (Lk 22 31-34), twice repeated before the betrayal in Gethsemane (Mt 26 31-35); the admission to the garden to behold the Saviour's deepest distress, the charge to watch and pray, and the failure to do so through sleepiness (Mt 26 36-46); the mistaken courage in severing the ear of Malchus (Jn 18 10-12); the forsaking of his Lord while the latter was being led away as a prisoner, his following Him afar off, his admission into the high priest's palace, his denial "before them all," his confirmation of it by an oath, his remembrance of the warning when "the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," and his tears of bitterness as he went out (Mt 26 56-58; Mk 14 66-72; Lk 22 54-62; Jn 18 15-27).

It will be seen that the story of Peter's fall is thus related by all the evangelists, but, to quote another, "None have described it in a more heinous light than Mark; and if, as is generally supposed, that Gospel was reviewed by Peter himself and even written under his direction, this circumstance may be considered as an evidence of his integrity and sincere contrition."

Nothing more is heard of Peter until the morning of the resurrection, when, on the first tidings of the event, he runs with John to see the tomb (Jn 20 1-10); his name is esp. mentioned to the women by the angel (Mk 16 7); and on the same day he sees Jesus alive before any of the rest of the Twelve (Lk 24 34; 1 Cor 15 5). Subsequently, at the Sea of Tiberias, Peter is given an opportunity for a threefold confession of Jesus whom he had thrice denied, and is once more assigned to the apostolic office; a prediction follows as to the kind of death he should die, and also a command to follow his Lord (Jn 21).

(2) The second period, from the ascension of Christ to the conversion of Paul, is more briefly sketched. After the ascension, of which Peter was doubtless a witness, he "stood up in the midst of the brethren" in the upper room in Jerus to counsel the choice of a successor to Judas (Acts 1 15-26). On the day of Pentecost he preaches the first gospel sermon (Acts 2), and later, in company with John, instrumentally heals the lame man, addresses the people in the Temple, is arrested, defends himself before the Sanhedrin and returns to his "own company" (Acts 3, 4). He is again arrested and beaten (ch 5); after a time he is sent by the church at Jerus to communicate the Holy Ghost to the disciples at Samaria (ch 8). Returning to Jerus (where presumably Paul visits him, Gal 1 18), he afterward journeys "throughout all parts," heals Aeneas at Lydda, raises Dorcas from the dead at Joppa, sees a vision upon the housetop which influences him to preach the gospel to the gentile centurion at Caesarea, and explains this action before "the apostles and the brethren that were in Judaea" (9 32-41; ch 11).

After a while another persecution arose against the church, and Herod Agrippa, having put James to death, imprisons Peter with the thought of executing him also. Prayer is made by the church on his behalf, however, and miraculous deliverance is given him (ch 12). Retiring for a while from public attention, he once more comes before us in the church council at Jerus, when the question is to be settled as to whether works are needful to salvation, adding his testimony to that of Paul and Barnabas in favor of justification by faith only (ch 15).

Subsequently he is found at Antioch, and having fellowship with gentile Christians until "that certain came from James," when "he drew back and separated himself, fearing them that were of the circumcision," for which dissembling Paul "resisted him to the face, because he stood condemned" (Gal 2 11-14).

Little more is authentically known of Peter, except that he traveled more or less extensively, being accompanied by his wife (1 Cor 9 5), and that he wrote two epp., the second of which was penned as he approached the end of his life (2 Pet 1 12-15).

The tradition is that he died a martyr at Rome about 67 AD, when about 75 years old. His Lord and Master had predicted a violent death for him (Jn 21 18, 19), which it is thought came to pass by crucifixion under Nero. It is said that at his own desire he was crucified head downward, feeling himself unworthy to resemble his Master in his death.

It should be observed, however, that the tradition that he visited Rome is only tradition and nothing more, resting as it does partly upon a miscalculation of some of the early Fathers, "who assume that he went to Rome in 42 AD, immediately after his deliverance from prison" (cf Acts 12 17). Schaff says this "is irreconcilable with the silence of Scripture, and even with the mere fact of Paul's Ep. to the Rom, written in 58, since the latter says not a word of Peter's previous labors in that city, and he himself never built on other men's foundations" (Rom 15 20; 2 Cor 10 15, 16).

The character of Peter is transparent and easily analyzed, and it is doubtless true that no other "in Scriptural history is drawn for us more clearly or strongly." He has been styled the prince of the apostles, and, indeed, seems to have been their leader on every occasion. He is always named first in every list of them, and was their common spokesman. He was hopeful, bold, confident, courageous, frank, impulsive, energetic, vigorous, strong, and loving, and faithful to his Master notwithstanding his defection prior to the crucifixion. It is true that he was liable to change and inconsistency, and because of his peculiar temperament he sometimes appeared forward and rash. Yet, as another says, "His virtues and faults had their common root in his enthusiastic disposition," and the latter were at length overruled by Divine grace into the most beautiful humility and meekness, as evinced in his two Epp.

4. His Character

The leadership above referred to, however, should not lead to the supposition that he possessed any supremacy over the other apostles, of which there is no proof. Such supremacy was never conferred upon him by his Master, it was never claimed by himself, and was never conceded by his associates. See in this connection Mt 23 8-12; Acts 15 13, 14; 2 Cor 12 11; Gal 2 11.

It is true that when Christ referred to the meaning of his name (Mt 16 18), He said, "Upon this rock I will build my church," but He did not intend to teach that His church would be built upon Peter, but upon Himself as confessed by Peter in ver 16 of the same chapter. Peter is careful to affirm this in the first of his two Epp. (2 4-9). Moreover, when Christ said, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc (Mt 16 19), He invested him with no power not possessed in common with his brethren, since they also afterward received the same commission (Mt 18 18; Jn 20 23). A key is a badge of power or authority, and, as many Protestant commentators have pointed out, to quote the language of one of them, "the apostolic history explains and limits this trust, for it was Peter who opened the door of the gospel to Israel on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2 38-42) and to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10 34-46)." Some, however, regard this authority as identical with the great commission (Mt 28 19). See KEYS, POWER OF THE.

The two Epp. of Peter were written presumably late in life, as appears esp. of the Second (1 12-15).

Both were addressed to the same class of persons, chiefly Jewish Christians scattered abroad in the different provinces of Asia Minor, among whom Paul and his associates had planted the gospel (1 Pet 1 1, 2; 2 Pet 3 1). The First was written at Babylon (1 Pet 5 13), doubtless the famous Babylon on the Euphrates, which, though destroyed as a great capital, was still inhabited by a small colony of people, principally Jews (see Weiss, INT, II, 150; but see also PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF).

(1) First Epistle.—The theme of the First Ep. seems to be the living hope to which the Christian has been begotten, and the obligations it lays upon him. The living hope is expounded in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise (1 13-2 10).

The writer drops his pen at this point, to take it up again to address those who were suffering persecution for righteousness' sake, upon whom two more obligations are impressed, submission to authority, and testimony to Christ (2 11-4 6). The third group which concludes the book begins here, dealing with such themes as spiritual hospitality in the use of heavenly gifts, patience in suffering, fidelity in service, and humility in ministering to one another. The letter was sent to the churches "by Silvanus, our faithful brother," the author affirming that his object in writing was to exhort and testify concerning "the true grace of God" (5 12).

The genuineness of this First Ep. has never been doubted, except of course by those who in these latter days have doubted everything, but the same cannot be said of the Second. It is not known to whom the latter was intrusted; as a matter of fact it found no place in the catalogues of the NT Scriptures of the 2d and 3d cents. The first church employing it was at Alexandria, but subsequently the church at large became satisfied from internal evidence of its genuineness and inspiration, and when the Canon was pronounced complete in the 4th cent., it was without hesitancy received.

(2) Second Epistle.—The Second Ep. claims to have been written by Peter (1 1; 3 1, 2), to doubt which would start more serious difficulties than can be alleged against its genuineness, either because of its late admission to the Canon or its supposed diversity of style from Peter's early writing. See PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF.

His object is the same in both Epp., to "stir up your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance" (3 1). Like Paul in his Second Ep. to Tim, he foresees the apostasy in which the professing church will end, the difference being that Paul speaks of it in its last stage when the laity have become infected (2 Tim 3 1-5; 4 3, 4), while Peter sees it in its origin as traceable to false teachers (2 Pet 2 1-3, 15-19). As in the First Ep. he wrote to exhort and to testify, so here it is rather to caution and warn. This warning was, as a whole, against falling from grace (3 17, 18), the enforcement of which warning is contained in 1 2-11, the ground of it in 1 12-21, and the occasion of it in the last two chapters. To speak only of the occasion: This, as was stated, was the presence of false teachers (2 1), whose eminent success is predicted (2 2), whose punishment is certain and dreadful (2 3-9), and whose description follows (2 10-22). The character of their false teaching (ch 3) forms one of the most interesting and important features of the Ep., focusing as it does on the Second Coming of Christ.

The theology of Peter offers an interesting field of study because of what may be styled its freshness and variety in comparison with 6. Theology that of Paul and John, who are the great theologians of the NT.

(1) Messianic teaching.—In the first place, Peter is unique in his Messianic teaching as indicated in the first part of the Acts, where he is the chief personage, and where for the most part his ministry is confined to Jerus and the Jews. The latter, already in covenant relations with Jeh, had sinned in rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, and Peter's preaching was directed to that point, demanding repentance or a change of mind about Him. The apparent failure of the OT promises concerning the Davidic kingdom (Isa 11 10-12; Jer 23 5-8; Ezk 37 21-28) was explained by the promise that the kingdom would be set up at the return of Christ (Acts 2 25-31; 15 14-16); which return, personal and corporeal, and for that purpose, is presented as only awaiting their national repentance (Acts 3 19-26). See Scofield, Reference Bible, at the places named.

(2) Justification.—But Peter's special ministry to the circumcision is by no means in conflict with that of Paul to the Gentiles, as demonstrated at the point of transition in Acts 10. Up until this time the gospel had been offered to the Jews only, but now they have rejected it in the national sense, and "the normal order for the present Christian age" is reached (Acts 13 44-48). Accordingly, we find Peter, side by side with Paul, affirming the great doctrine of justification by faith only, in the words, "We believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we [Jews] shall be saved, even as they [Gentiles]" (Acts 15 11 AV). Moreover, it is clear from Peter's Second Ep. (1 1) that his conception of justification from the Divine as well as the human side is identical with that of Paul, since he speaks of justifying faith as terminating on the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. As we understand it, this is not the righteousness which God is, but the righteousness which God gives (cf Rom 1 16, 17; 3 21-25; 2 Cor 5 20, 21).

(3) Redemption.—Passing from his oral to his written utterances, Peter is particularly rich in his allusions to the redemptive work of Christ. Limiting ourselves to his First Ep., the election of the individual believer is seen to be the result of the sprinkling of Christ's blood (1 1); his obedience and godly fear are inspired by the sacrifice of the "lamb without blemish and without spot: Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world" (1 17-20 AV). But most interesting are the manner and the connection in which these sublime truths are sometimes set before the reader. For example, an exhortation to submission on the part of household slaves is the occasion for perhaps the most concise and yet comprehensive interpretation of Christ's vicarious sufferings anywhere in the NT (2 18-25, esp. the last two verses; cf also in its context 3 18-22).

(4) Future life.—Next to the redemptive work of Christ, the Petrine teaching about the future life claims attention. The believer has been begotten again unto "a lively [or living] hope" (1 Pet 1 3); which is "an inheritance" "reserved in heaven" (1 4); and associated with "praise, and glory and honor at the revelation [Second Coming] of Jesus Christ" (1 7.13; 4 13; 5 4.10; 2 Pet 1 11.16; 3 13, etc). This "hope" or "inheritance" is so real and so precious as to cause rejoicing even in times of heaviness and trial (1 Pet 1 6); to stimulate to holiness of living (1 13-16); to patience in persecution (4 12.13); fidelity in service (5 1-4); steadfastness against temptation (5 8-10); and growth in grace (2 Pet 1 10.11). It is a further peculiarity that the apostle always throws the thought of the present suffering forward into the light of the future glory. It is not as though there were merely an allotment of suffering here, and an allotment of glory by and by, with no relation or connection between the two, but the one is seen to be incident to the other (cf 1 Pet 1 7.11; 4 13; 5 1; 2 Pet 3 12.13). It is this circumstance, added to others, that gives Peter the title of the apostle of hope, as Paul has been called the apostle of faith, and John the apostle of love.

(5) Holy Scripture.—Considering their limitations as to space, Peter's Epp. are notable for the emphasis they lay upon the character and authority of the Holy Scriptures. 1 Pet 1 10-12 teaches a threefold relation of the Holy Spirit to the Holy Word as its Author, its Revealer, and its Teacher or Preacher. The same chapter (vs 22-25) speaks of its life-giving and purifying power as well as its eternal duration. Ch 2 opens with a declaration of its vital relation to the Christian's spiritual growth. In 4 11, it is shown to be the staple of the Christian's ministry. Practically the whole of the Second Ep. is taken up with the subject. Through the "exceeding great and precious promises" of that Word, Christians become "partakers of the divine nature" (1 4 AV); that they may be kept "always in remembrance" is Peter's object in writing (vs 12-15 AV); the facts of that Word rest on the testimony of eyewitnesses (vs 16-18); its origin is altogether Divine (vs 20.21); which is as true of the NT as of the OT (3 2); including the Epp. of Paul (vs 15.16).

(6) Apostasy and judgment.—This appreciation of the living Word of God finds an antithesis in the solemn warning against apostate teachers and teaching forming the substance of 2 Pet 2 and 3. The theology here is of judgment. It is swift and "lingereth not" (2 1-3); the Judge is He who "spared not" in olden time (vs 4-7); His delay expresses mercy, but He "will come as a thief" (3 9.10); the heavens "shall pass away," the earth and its works shall be burned up (ver 10); "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy living and godliness?" (ver 11).

(7) Second Coming of Christ.—Peter's theology concerning judgment is a further illustration of the Messianic character of his instruction. For example, the Second Coming of Christ of which he speaks in the closing chapter of the Second Ep. is not that aspect of it associated with the translation of His church, and of which Paul treats (1 Thess 4 13-18), but that pertaining to Israel and the day of Jeh spoken of by the OT prophets (Isa 2 12-22; Rev 19 11-21, etc).

LITERATURE

Simon Peter was a native of Galilee. He was brought to the Saviour early in His ministry by his brother Andrew (Jn 1 40.41). His call to the office of apostle is recorded in Mt 10 1-4; Mk 3 13-16.

He occupied a distinguished place among the Lord's disciples. In the four lists of the apostles found in the NT his name stands first (Mt 10 2-4; Mk 3 16-19; Lk 6 14-16; Acts 1 13). He is the chief figure in the first twelve chapters of the Acts. It is Peter that preaches the first Christian sermon (Acts 2), he that opens the door of the gospel to the gentile world in the house of the Rom soldier, Cornelius, and has the exquisite delight of witnessing scenes closely akin to those of Pentecost at Jerus (Acts 10 44-47). It was given him to pronounce the solemn sentence on the guilty pair, Ananias and Sapphira, and to rebuke in the power of the Spirit the profane Simon Magus (Acts 5 1-11; 8 18-23). In these and the like instances Peter exhibited the authority with which Christ had invested him (Mt 16 19)—an authority bestowed upon all the disciples (Jn 20 22.23)—the power to bind and to loose.

Two Epp. are ascribed to Peter. Of the Second doubt and uncertainty have existed from the early ages to the present. The genuineness and authenticity of the First are above suspicion.

I. Canonicity of 1 Peter.—The proof of its integrity and trustworthiness is ample and altogether satisfactory. It falls into parts: external

1. External and internal. The historical attestation to its authority as an apostolic document is abundant. Polycarp, disciple of the apostle John, martyred in 156 AD at 86 or more years of age, refers to the Ep. in unmistakable terms. Irenaeus, a man who may well be said to represent both the East and the West, who was a disciple of Polycarp, quotes it copiously, we are assured. Clement of Alexandria, born c 150 AD, died c 216 AD, cites it many times in his Stromata, one passage (4 8) being quoted five times by actual count. "The testimony of the early church is summed up by Eusebius (HE, III, xxiii, 3). He places it among those writings about which no question was ever raised, no doubt ever entertained by any portion of the catholic church" (Professor Lumby in Bible Comm.).

The internal evidence in favor of the Ep. is as conclusive as the external. The writer is well acquainted with Our Lord's teaching,

2. Internal and he makes use of it to illustrate and Evidence enforce his own. The references he makes to that teaching are many, and they include the four Gospels. He is familiar likewise with the Epp., particularly Jas, Rom, and Eph. But what is esp. noteworthy is the fact that 1 Pet in thought and language stands in close relation with the apostle's discourses as recorded in Acts. By comparing 1 Pet 1 17 with Acts 10 34; 1 21 with 2 32-36 and 10 40-41; 2 7,8 with 4 10,11; 2 17 with 10 28, and 3 18 with 3 14, one will perceive how close the parallel between the two is. The inference from these facts appears legitimate, viz. 1 Pet in diction and thought belongs to the same period of time and moves in the same circle of truth as do the other writings of the NT. The writer was an apostle, and he was Simon Peter.

II. The Address.—Peter writes to the "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion." James employs the term "Dispersion" to designate believing Hebrews of the Twelve Tribes who lived outside the land (1 1). The Jews included in it the whole body of Israelites scattered among the gentile nations (Jn 7 35). But we must not conclude from this that the Ep. is directed to Christian Jews alone. Gentile believers are by no means excluded, as 1 14,18,20; 2 10; 3 6; 4 3,4 abundantly attest. Indeed, the gentile element in the churches of Asia Minor largely predominated at the time. The term "sojourners" represents a people away from home, strangers in a strange land; the word is trd "pilgrims" in 2 11 and He 11 13—an appropriate name for those who confess that they have here no continuing city, but who seek one to come. While no doubt Peter had believing Israelites in mind when he wrote, for he never forgot that his ministry belonged primarily to the circumcision (Gal 2 7,8), he did not neglect the more numerous gentile converts, and to these he speaks as earnestly as to the others; and these also were "sojourners."

Three of the four provinces Peter mentions, viz. Pontus, Cappadocia, and Asia, had representatives at the memorable Pentecost in Jerus (Acts 2 9; 1 Pet 1 1). Many of these "sojourners of the Dispersion" may have believed the message of the apostle and accepted salvation through Jesus Christ, and returned home to tell the good news to their neighbors and friends. This would form a strong bond of union between them and Peter, and would open the way for him to address them in the familiar and tender manner of the Ep.

Silvanus appears to have been the hearer of the letter to the Christians of Asia Minor: "By Silvanus, our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto you briefly" (5 12). It is an assumption to assert from these words that Silvanus was employed in the composition of the letter. The statement denotes rather the bearer than the writer or secretary. Silvanus was Paul's companion in the ministry to the Asiatic churches, and since we do not read of him as going with Paul to Jerus or to Rome, it is probable he returned from Corinth (Acts 18 5) to Asia Minor and labored there. He and Peter met, where no one knows, though not a few think in Rome; as likely a guess perhaps is in Pal. At any rate, Silvanus gave Peter an account of the conditions in the provinces, the afflictions and persecutions of believers, and the deep need they had for sympathy and counsel. He would, accordingly, be of the greatest assistance to the apostle. This seems to account for the peculiarity of language which Peter uses: "By Silvanus, our faithful brother, I have written unto you," as if he had some share in furnishing the contents of the Ep.

Silvanus

III. Place and Time of Composition.—According to 5 13 the Ep. was written in Babylon. But what place is meant? Two cities having this

1. Babylon: name were known in apostolic times. Which? One was in Egypt, probably on or near the present site of Cairo, and we are told that it was a "city of no small importance."

Epiphanius calls it "great Babylon" (Zahn). The absence, however, of all tradition that would tend to identify this place with the Babylon of the Ep. seems to shut it out of the problem. Babylon on the Euphrates is regarded by many as the place here designated. Jews in considerable numbers still dwelt in Babylon, notwithstanding the massacre of thousands in the reign of Claudius, and the flight of multitudes into other countries. There is much to be said in favor of this city as the place meant, and yet the absence of tradition in its support is a very serious difficulty. A third view regards it as symbolical of Rome. Roman Catholics thus interpret it, and not a few Protestants so understand it. Tradition which runs back into the first half of the 2d cent. appears to favor it, though much uncertainty and obscurity still surround the earliest ages of our era, in spite of the unwearied researches of modern scholars. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, who lived in the first half of the 2d cent., appears to have had no doubt that Peter was martyred in Rome, and that the Babylon of the Ep. designates the Imperial City. There are very serious objections to this interpretation. One is, that it is totally out of keeping with Peter's manner of writing. Preëminently he is direct and matter-of-fact in his style. The metaphorical language he employs is mostly drawn from the OT, or, if from himself, it is so common of use as to be well understood by all readers. It is altogether improbable that this man, plain of speech almost to bluntness, should interject in the midst of his personal explanations and final salutations such a mystical epithet with no hint of what he means by it, or why he employs such a mode of speech.

Besides, there is no evidence that Rome was called Babylon by the Christians until the Book of Rev was published, i.e. c 90-96 AD. But if 1 Pet is dependent on the Apocalypse for this name of Babylon as Rome, Peter could not have been its author, for he died years before that date. The Ep. was written about 64 AD, at the time when persecutions under the infamous Nero were raging, at which time also the apostle himself bore his witness and went to his heavenly home, even as his Master had forewarned him (Jn 21 18,19). While not unmindful of the great difficulties that beset the view, nevertheless we are inclined to the opinion that the Babylon of 5 13 is the ancient city on the Euphrates. See PETER (SIMON).

IV. Design.—The apostle had more than one object in view when he addressed the "elect" in Asia Minor. The Lord Jesus had charged him, "Feed my lambs"—"Tend my sheep"—"Feed my sheep" (Jn 21 15-17). His two Epp. certify how faithfully he obeyed the charge. With loving and tender hand he feeds the lambs and tends the whole flock, warns against foes, guards from danger, and leads them into green pastures and beside still waters. He reminds them of the glorious inheritance they are to possess (1 3-9); he exhorts them to walk in the footsteps of the uncomplaining Christ (2 20-25); to be compassionate, loving, tender-hearted, humble-minded, and circumspect in their passage through this unfriendly world (3 8-12). He sums up the main duties of Christian life in the short but pregnant sentences, "Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king" (2 17). But his supreme object is to comfort and encourage them amid the persecutions and the sufferings to which they were unjustly subjected, and to fortify them against the heavier trials that were impending.

From the beginning the Christian church was the object of suspicion and of hatred, and many of its adherents had suffered even unto death at the hands of both hostile Jews and fanatical Gentiles. But these afflictions were generally local and sporadic. There were churches of large membership and wide influence which were unmolested (1 Cor 4 8-10), and which seem to have been able to get fair treatment in heathen courts (1 Cor 6 1-6). But the condition brought to view in 1 Pet is altogether different. Trials and afflictions of the severest sort assailed them, and an enmity and hostility, bent on their destruction, pursued them with tireless energy. The whole Christian body shared in the persecutions (5 9). The trial was a surprise (4 12), both in its intensity, for Peter calls it "fiery," and for its unexpectedness. The apostle represents it as a savage beast of prey, a roaring lion, prowling about them to seize and devour (5 8, 9).

A variety of charges were brought against the Christians, but they were calumnies and slanders, without any foundation in fact. They were spoken against as evil-doers (2 12—kakopoion; malefici, Tacitus calls them). Their adversaries railed against them (3 9); reviled them (3 16); spake evil of them (4 4); reproached them for the name of Christ (4 14). These are ugly epithets. They show how bitter was the hatred and how intense the hostility felt by the heathen toward the Christians who dwelt among them. If there had been any justification for such antagonism in the character and the conduct of Christ's people, if they were evil-doers, "haters of the human race," to be classed with thieves and murderers and meddlers in other men's matters (4 14-16), as they were accused of being and doing, we could understand the fierce opposition which assailed them and the savage purpose to suppress them altogether, but the only ground for the enmity felt against them was the refusal of the Christians to join their heathen neighbors in their idolatries, their feasts, winebibblings, revelings, carousings, lasciviousness and lusts in which once they freely shared (4 2-4). The Asian saints had renounced all such wicked practices, had separated themselves from their old companions in riotous living and revolting debaucheries; they were witnesses against their immoralities, and hence became the objects of intense dislike and persecuting animosity. Peter bears testimony to the high character, the purity of life and the self-sacrificing devotion of these believers. In all Asia Minor no better company of men and women could be found than these disciples of Jesus Christ; none more submissive to constituted authority, none more ready to help their fellow-men in their distress and trouble. The head and front of their offending was their separation from the ungodly world about them, and their solemn witness against the awful sins done daily before their eyes.

How mightily does the apostle minister to his suffering friends! He bids them remember the un-

2. Example of Christ complaining Christ when He was unjustly afflicted by cruel men (2 19-25). He tells them how they may effectively put to silence their accusers, and refute the calumnies and the slanders that are so cruelly circulated against them, namely, by living such pure and godly lives, by being so meek, docile, patient, steadfast, true and faithful to God, that none can credit the false accusations (2 1-5; 2 13-17; 3 8, 9, 13-17; 5 6-11).

There is little or no evidence in the Ep. that the persecutions were inflicted by imperial authority or that the state was dealing with the Christians as enemies who were dangerous to the peace of society. In the provinces to which the letter was sent there seems to have been complete absence of formal trial and punishment through the courts. Peter does not speak of legal proceedings against the Christians by the magistrates. On the contrary, he urges them to be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether to the king as supreme; or unto governors, as sent by him for vengeance on evil-doers and for praise to them that do well (2 13). They are to honor all men, to honor the king (2 17). This submission would scarcely be pressed if the state had already proscribed Christianity and decreed its total suppression. This the imperial government did later on, but there is no evidence furnished by the apostle that in 64 AD—the date of the Ep.—the government formally denounced Christians and determined to annihilate them.

Peter exhorts his fellow-believers to silence their persecutors by their upright conduct (2 15); they are thus to put them to shame who falsely accuse them (3 16); and they are not to combat evil with evil nor answer reviling with reviling, but contrariwise with blessing (3 9). The antagonism here indicated obviously springs from the heathen populace; there is no hint of arraignment before magistrates or subjection to legal proceedings. It is unbelievers who revile and slander and denounce the people of God in the provinces.

Everything in the Ep. points to the time of Nero, 64 AD, and not to the time of Domitian or Trajan, or even Titus. In Rome vast multitudes of Christians were put to death in the most brutal fashion, so Tacitus relates, but the historian asserts that there was a sinister report to the effect that Nero himself instigated the burning of the city (July 19, 64), and "he [Nero] falsely diverted the charge on to a set of people to whom the vulgar gave the name of Christians (or Chrestians), and who were detested for the abominations which they perpetrated." See NERO. Certain facts are clear from Tacitus' statements, viz. that at the time the Christians were well known as a distinct sect; and that they were subjected to the dreadful sufferings inflicted upon them because they were Christians; and the persecutions at the time were instigated by the fear and the brutality of the tyrant. Peter likewise recognizes the fact that believers were disliked and calumniated by their heathen neighbors for the same reason—they were Christians: "If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye" (4 14); "But if a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name" (4 16). But the imperial government at the time does not appear to have taken formal action for the overthrow of Christianity as a system inimical to the empire. Of course, where direct charges of a criminal nature were made against Christians, judicial inquiry into them would be instituted. But in the Ep. what believers had to endure and suffer were the detraction, the vituperation, the opprobrium and the vile and malignant slanders with which the heathen assailed them.

V. Characteristic Features of the Epistle.—It has certain very distinct marks, some of which may be noticed.

It does not observe a close logical sequence in its structure, as those of Paul so prominently display.

1. Freedom in Structure There is truth in Dean Alford's statement, although perhaps he pushes it rather far: "The link between one idea and another is found, not in any progress of unfolding thought or argument, but in the last word of the foregoing sentence which is taken up and followed out in the new one" (see 1 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, etc.). This peculiarity, however, does not interfere with the unity of the ep., it rather adds to it, and it gives to it a vividness which it otherwise might not possess.

It is the ep. of hope. How much it makes of this prime grace! Peter seems never to grow weary of describing it and exalting its radiant

2. Hope beauty and desirableness. He calls it a living hope (1 3). It is born by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and it calmly awaits the glorious inheritance that soon will be enjoyed. It is a hope that will be perfected at the advent of Christ (1 13), and it is set on God, hence cannot fail (1 21). With sickly, dying hope we are quite familiar. The device which a certain state (South Carolina) has inscribed on its Great Seal is, dum spiro spero ("while I live I hope"). Such a hope may serve for a commonwealth whose existence is limited to this world, but a man needs something more enduring, something imperishable. "It is a fearful thing when a man and his hopes die together" (Leighton). A Christian can confidently write, "when I am dying I hope," for his is a living hope that fills and thrills the future with a blessed reality.

The Christian's glorious inheritance (1 3-5) is depicted in one of the most comprehensive and suggestive descriptions of the believer's

3. Inheritance heritage found in the Bible. It is declared to be "incorruptible." The word points to its substance. It is imperishable. In it there is no element of decay. It holds in its heart no germ of death. Like its author, the living God, it is unchangeable and eternal. It is "undefiled." It is not stained by sin nor polluted by crime, either in its acquisition or its possession. Human heritages generally are marred by human wrongs. There is hardly an acre of soil that is not tainted by fraud or violence. The coin that passes from hand to hand is in many instances soiled by guilt. But this of Peter is absolutely pure and holy. It "fadeth not away." It never withers. Ages do not impair its beauty or dim its luster. Its bloom will remain fresh, its fragrance undiminished, forever. Thus our inheritance "is glorious in these respects: it is in its substance, incorruptible; in its purity, undefiled; in beauty, unfading" (Alford).

Now why does the apostle in the very opening of his Ep. give so lofty a place to the saints' inheritance? He does so in order to comfort and encourage his fellow-believers with the consolations of the Lord Himself, that they may bear steadfastly their manifold sufferings and triumph over their weighty afflictions. Hence he writes: "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a little while, if need be, ye have been put to grief in manifold trials, that the proof of your faith . . . may be found unto praise and glory and honor at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1 6-9). He lifts their thoughts and their gaze up far above the troubles and distresses around them to Him whose they are, whom they serve, who will by and by crown them with immortal bliss.

The prophets and their study are described in 1 10.11: "Concerning which salvation the prophets

4. Testimony of Prophets sought and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you," etc. With Peter and his fellow-apostles the testimony of the prophets was authoritative and final. Where they had a clear word from the OT Scriptures, they felt that every question was settled and controversy was at an end.

(1) Salvation.—The burden of the prophetic communications was salvation. The prophets spoke on many subjects; they had to exhort, rebuke and entreat their wayward contemporaries; to denounce sin, to announce judgment on the guilty and to recall them to repentance and reformation. But ever and anon their vision was filled with the future and its blessedness, their voices would swell with rapture as they saw and foretold the great salvation to be brought to the world and the grace that would then so copiously go out unto men; for the Messiah was to appear and to suffer, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God.

(2) Spirit of Christ.—The prophet's messages were the messages of the Spirit of Christ. It was He who testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow. The prophets always disclaim any part in the origination of their messages. They affirm in the most positive and solemn manner that their predictions are not their own, but God's. Hence they are called the Lord's "spokesmen," the Lord's "mouth" (Ex 4 15.16; 7 1.2; 2 Pet 1 21).

(3) Prophetic study.—They "sought and searched diligently." These terms are strong and emphatic. They pored over the predictions which the Spirit had revealed through themselves; they scrutinized them with eager and prolonged inquiry. Two points engaged their attention: "What time or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did point unto." The first "what" relates to the time of the Messiah's advent; the second "what" to the events and circumstances which would attend His appearing—a fruitful theme, one that engages the inquiry of nobler students—"which things angels desire to look into."

The Christian brotherhood is described in 2 9.10: "But ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy

5. The Christian Brotherhood nation, a people for God's own possession, that ye may show forth the excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light."

The brotherhood is the new Israel. The apostle describes it in terms which were applied to the old Israel, but which include more than the ancient Israel ever realized. The exalted conception is by one who was a strict Jew, the apostle of the circumcision, and who held somewhat closely to the Mosaic institutions to the end of his life. All the more significant on this account is his testimony. The descriptive titles which he here gathers together and places on the brow of the Christian brotherhood are of the most illustrious sort. A distinguished man, a noble, a general, a statesman, will sometimes appear in public with his breast covered with resplendent decorations which mark his rank or his achievements. But such distinctions sink into insignificance alongside of this dazzling cluster. This is the heavenly nobility, the royal family of the Lord of glory, decorated with badges brighter far than ever glittered on the breast of king or emperor. But even in this instance Peter reminds Christians of the glorious destiny awaiting them that they may be strengthened and stimulated to steadfastness and loyalty in the midst of the trials and afflictions to which they are subjected (2 11.12).

A study of 1 Pet 3 18-20—"preached unto the spirits in prison"—should here follow in the present

6. Spirits in Prison cursory review of the characteristic features of the Ep., but anything like an adequate examination of this difficult passage would require more space than could be given it. Suffice it to quote a sentence from Professor Zahn (NT, II, 289) with which the writer agrees: "That interpretation of 1 Pet 3 19 is in all probability correct, according to which a preaching of Christ at the time of the Flood is referred to, i.e. a preaching through Noah, so that Noah is here represented as a preacher of righteousness, as in 2 Pet 2 5." See PRISON, SPIRITS IN.

VI. Analysis.—A very general analysis of the Ep. is the following:

- (1) Christian privileges, 1—2 10.
- (2) Christian duties, 2 11—4 11.
- (3) Persecutions and trials, 4 12—5 11.
- (4) Personal matters and salutations, 5 12-14.

The chief doctrines of Christianity are found in 1 Pet. The vicarious suffering and death of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 24; 3 18); the new birth (1 3 23); redemption by the blood of Christ (1 18. 19), faith, hope, patient endurance under unjust suffering, and holiness of life, are all pressed upon Christians with great earnestness and force.

The Second Ep. of Peter comes to us with less historical support of its genuineness than any other book of the NT. In consequence, its right to a place in the Canon is seriously doubted by some and denied by others. There are those who confidently assign it to the Apostolic age and to the apostle whose name it bears in the NT, while there are those who as confidently assign it to post-apostolic times, and repudiate its Petrine authorship. It is not the aim of this article to trace the history of the two opinions indicated above, nor to cite largely the arguments employed in the defence of the Ep., or those in opposition to it; nor to attempt to settle a question which for more than a thousand years the wisest and best men of the Christian church have been unable to settle. Such a procedure would in this case be the height of presumption. What is here attempted is to point out as briefly as may be some of the reasons for doubting its canonicity, on the one hand, and those in its support, on the other.

I. External Evidence in Favor of Its Apostolic Authority.—It must be admitted at the very outset that the evidence is meager. The

1. Ancient Opinion first writer who mentions it by name is Origen (c 240 AD). In his homily on Josh, he speaks of the two Epp. of Peter. In another place he quotes 2 Pet 1 4: "partakers of the divine nature," and gives it the name of Scripture. But Origen is careful to say that its authority was questioned: "Peter has left one acknowledged Ep., and perhaps a second, for this is contested." Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, regarded it with even more suspicion than did Origen, and accordingly he placed it among the disputed books (Antilegomena). Jerome knew the scruples which many entertained touching the Ep., but notwithstanding, he included it in his Vulg Version. The main reason for Jerome's uncertainty about it he states to be "difference of style from 1 Pet." He accounts for the difference by supposing that the apostle "made use of two different interpreters." As great teachers and scholars as Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, e.g. Athanasius, Augustine, Epiphanius, Rufinus and Cyril, received it as genuine. At the Reformation Erasmus rejected 2 Pet; Luther seems to have had no doubt of its genuineness; while Calvin felt some hesitancy because of the "discrepancies between it and the First." In the 4th cent., two church councils (Laodicea, c 372, and Carthage, 397) formally recognized it and placed it in the Canon as equal in authority with the other books of the NT.

The opinion of modern scholars as to references in post-apostolic literature to 2 Pet is not only divided, but in many instances antagonistic. Salmon, Warfield, Zahn and others strongly hold that such references are to be found in the writings of the 2d cent., perhaps in one or two documents of the 1st. They insist with abundant proof in support of their contention that Irenaeus, Justin Martyr, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Didache, and Clement of Rome, were all acquainted with the Ep. and made allusions to it in their writings. Weighing as honestly and as thoroughly as one can the citations made from that literature, one is strongly disposed to accept the evidence as legitimate and conclusive.

On the other side, Professor Chase (HDB) has subjected all such references and allusions in the primitive writings to a very keen and searching criticism, and it must be frankly confessed that he has reduced the strength of the evidence and argument very greatly. But Professor Chase himself, from the remains of the ancient literature, and from the internal evidence of the Ep. itself, arrives at the conclusion that 2 Pet is not at all an apostolic document, that it certainly was not written by Peter, nor in the 1st cent. of our era, but about the middle of the 2d cent., say 150 AD. If this view is accepted, we must pronounce the Ep. a forgery, pseudonymous and pseudepigraphic, with no more right to be in the NT than has the Apocalypse of Peter or the romance of the Shepherd of Hermas.

II. Internal Evidence in Support of Its Apostolic Authority.—At first sight, this seems to be not altogether reassuring, but looking deeper

1. Style and Diction into the letter itself we arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Difference of style between the two Epp. attributed to Peter is given as one prominent reason for questioning the validity of the Second. It is mainly if not entirely on this ground that Jerome, Calvin and others hesitated to receive it. It is noteworthy that in the earlier times objections were not urged because of its relation to Jude—its borrowing from Jude, as is often charged in our days. Its alleged dissimilarity to 1 Pet in diction, structure, and measurably in its contents, explains why it was discredited. Admitting that there is substantial ground for this criticism, nevertheless there are not a few instances in which words rarely found in the other Bib. books are common to the two Epp. Some examples are given in proof: "precious" (1 Pet 1 7 19; 2 Pet 1 1) (a compound), occurring often in Rev, not often in other books; "virtue" (1 Pet 2 9 Avm; 2 Pet 1 3), found elsewhere only in Phil 4 8; "supply" (1 Pet 4 11; 2 Pet 1 5), rare in other books; "love of brethren" (1 Pet 1 22; 2 Pet 1 7 m), only in three places besides; "behold" (1 Pet 2 12; 3 2 [verbal form]; 2 Pet 1 16) (eyewitnesses), not found elsewhere in the NT; "without blemish," "without spot" (1 Pet 1 19; 2 Pet 3 14) (order of words reversed); also positive side (2 Pet 2 13), "spots and blemishes"; the words do not occur elsewhere; "ungodly" (1 Pet 4 18; 2 Pet 2 5; 3 7) occurs in but three other places, except Jude, which has it three times.

Besides, there are many striking similarities in thought and diction in the two Epp. Two instances are given. In the First the saved are described as the "elect" (1 1), and as of Dissimilarities "called" (2 21). In the Second, the two great truths are brought together (1 10). Likewise, in both stress is laid upon prophecy (1 Pet 1 10-12; 2 Pet 1 19-21). Now, all this tends to prove that the writer of the Second Ep. was well acquainted with the peculiarity of diction employed in the First, and that he made use purposely of its uncommon terms, or, if the Second was written by another than the apostle, he succeeded surprisingly well in imitating his style. The latter alternative does not merit discussion. The differences arise mainly out of the subjects treated in the two, and the design which the writer seems to have kept constantly in view. In the First, he sought to comfort, strengthen and sustain his persecuted brethren; this is his supreme aim. In the Second he is anxious to warn and to shield those whom he addresses as to impending dangers more disastrous and more to be feared than the sufferings inflicted by a hostile world. In the First, judgment had begun at the house of God (4 17,18), and believers were to arm, not to resist their persecutors, but for martyrdom (4 1). But in the Second, a very different condition of things is brought to view. Ungodly men holding degrading principles and practising shocking immoralities were threatening to invade the Christian brotherhood. Evil of a most vicious sort was detected by the watchful eye of the writer, and he knew full well that if suffered to continue and grow, as assuredly it would, utter ruin for the cause he loved would ensue. Therefore he forewarns and denounces the tendency with the spirit and energy of a prophet of God.

2 Pet opens with the positive statement of Peter's authorship: "Simon ['Symeon,' Nestle, Weymouth] Peter, a servant . . . of Jesus Christ."

3. Claim to Petrine Authorship

The insertion of "Symeon," the old Heb name, in the forefront of the document is significant. If a forger had been writing in Peter's name he would have begun his letter almost certainly by copying the First Ep. and simply written, "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ." Note also that "servant" is introduced into the Second Ep., but is absent from the First. He designates himself as a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ. "Although several pseudonymous writings appear in early Christian literature, there is no Christian document of value written by a forger who uses the name of an apostle" (Dods, SBD). If this important statement is accepted at its full worth, it goes far to settle the question of authorship. Both "servant" and "apostle" appear in the opening sentence, and the writer claims both for himself.

Furthermore, the writer is distinctively a Christian; he addresses those who "have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness of our God and the Saviour Jesus Christ" (1 1).

4. Christian Earnestness

His is the same precious faith which all the saints enjoy; his also the exceeding great and precious promises of God, and he expects with all other believers to be made a partaker of the Divine nature (1 3,4). Is it at all probable that one with such a faith and such expectations would deliberately forge the name of Simon Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ? The writer is unsparing in his denunciations of false teachers, corrupters of others, and perverters of the truth. He instances the fall of the angels, the destruction of Sodom, the rebuke of Balaam, as examples of the doom of those who know the truth and yet live in shameful sin and crime. Would a Christian and servant of Jesus Christ be at all likely to commit in the most flagrant manner the things he so vehemently condemns? If the writer was not the apostle Peter, he was a false teacher, a corrupter of others, and a hypocrite, which seems incredible to us.

Moreover, he associates himself with the other apostles (3 2), is in full sympathy with Paul and is acquainted with Paul's Epp. (3 15,16), and he holds and teaches the same fundamental truth. An apostolic spirit breathes through this document such as is generally absent from spurious writings and such as a forger does not exhibit. He is anxiously concerned for the purity of the faith and for the holiness and fidelity of believers.

5. Relation to Apostles

He exhorts them to give "diligence that ye may be found in peace, without spot and blameless in his sight," and that they "grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (3 14,18). All this and much more of like devout teaching is apostolic in tone and betokens genuineness and reality.

Still further, the writer appeals to certain facts in the life of Peter that are almost autobiographical.

For example, he speaks of "putting off of my tabernacle . . . even as our Lord Jesus Christ signified unto me" (1 13,14). The reference undoubtedly is to Jn 13 36; 21 18,19.

He claims to have been a witness of the Transfiguration (1 16-18). He indirectly claims the inspiration without which true prophecy is impossible (1 19-21). He asserts that this is his "second epistle" (3 1). This testimony on the part of the writer is personal, emphatic and direct. It reads much like Peter's plain way of speaking of himself at the Council of Jerus, "Ye know that a good while ago God made choice among you, that by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel, and believe" (Acts 15 7).

Once more, Jude appears to quote from 2 Pet (see Jude). The question of the priority of the two Epp. is by no means settled. Many recent writers give the precedence to Jude, others to Peter. One of the highest authority, Zahn (NT, II, 238 ff), argues with great force in support of the view that Peter's is the older and that Jude cites from it. The arguments in favor of this latter belief are here only summarized: (1) Jude cites from writings other than Scripture, as the apocryphal Book of En and perhaps also from the Assumption of Moses. Peter scarcely quotes from any source. The former would be more likely to cite 2 Pet 2-3 than the latter from Jude vs 4-16. The resemblance between these two sections of the Epp. is so close that one must have drawn both thoughts and language from the other, or both availed themselves of the same documentary source. Of this latter supposition antiquity furnishes no hint. The differences are as marked as the resemblances, and hence the one who cites from the other is no servile copyist. The real difference between the two is that between prediction and fulfillment. (2) Peter predicts the advent of the "false teachers" (2 1). His principal vbs. are in the future tense (2 1,2,3,12,13). He employs the present tense indeed in describing the character and the conduct of the libertines (2 17,18), but their presence and their disastrous teaching he puts in the future (2 13,14). The deadly germs were there when he wrote, the rank growth would speedily follow. Jude, on the contrary, throughout his short letter, speaks of the same corrupters as already come; his objects are present, they are in the midst of the people of God and actively doing their deadly work. (3) Jude twice refers to certain sources of information touching these enemies, with which his readers were acquainted and which were designed to warn them of the danger and keep them from betrayal. The two sources were (a) a writing that spoke of "ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ," ver 4; (b) the prediction of Peter that "in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts" (2 Pet 3 3). Jude urges his readers to remember the words which the apostles of Christ had before spoken, and then he cites this prediction of Peter in almost the exact terms: "In the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their ungodly lusts." He applies the prediction to the libertines then and there practising their unholy deeds: "These are they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit." The conclusion is inevitable. Jude quotes from Peter. (4) Chronology gives the priority to Peter. The apostle died between 63-67 AD, probably in 64 AD. The vast majority of recent interpreters date the Ep. of Jude at 75-80 AD. There is no doubt but that it was written after the destruction of Jerus, 70 AD. Accordingly, it is later than Peter's death by from 5 to 10 years. Jude quoted from 2 Pet. This being so, it follows that his Ep. endorses that of Peter as being apostolic and likewise canonical, for he recognizes Peter as an apostle and gifted with the prophetic spirit. See JUDE; PETER (SIMON).

7. Quoted by Jude

III. Doctrinal Teachings of the Epistle.—Only some of the more important features of the Ep. are here noticed. If all were treated as they deserve to be, this article would expand into the proportions of a commentary.

The key-word of 1 Pet is Hope; of 2 Pet Knowledge. The apostle gives to this gift of grace a prominent place (1 2.3.5.6.8; 2 20.21; 1. Saving 3 18). The term he uses is largely in Knowledge the intensified form, viz. "full knowledge"; that is, knowledge that rests on fact, knowledge that comes to the believer as something supernatural, as being communicated by the Spirit of God, and therefore is true and complete. The grace and peace Peter asks for the saints should issue in the knowledge of God and of Jesus Our Lord, who has granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of Him (1 2.3).

(1) The basis of saving knowledge rests on the "exceeding great and precious promises" which He has made us, and which become ours by faith in Him. It leads us into acquaintance with the righteousness of God, into the realization of our calling as saints, and of the glorious destiny that awaits them who know and trust God (1 2-4 AV).

(2) The growth in true knowledge (1 5-11): "In your faith supply virtue," etc. He does not ask that faith be supplied, that these believers already had. But starting with faith as the foundation of all, let the other excellencies and virtues be richly and abundantly furnished. The original word for "supply" is derived from the Gr "chorus," in behalf of the members of which the manager supplied all the equipments needed. And Peter appropriating that fact urges Christians to give all diligence to furnish themselves with the gifts and grace he mentions, which are far more needful to the Christian than were the equipments for the ancient chorus. See SUPPLY.

What a magnificent cluster Peter here gives! Each springs out of the other; each is strengthened by the other. "In your faith supply virtue," or fortitude, manliness; and let virtue supply "knowledge." Knowledge by itself tends to puff up. But tempered by the others, by self-control, by patience, by godliness, by love, it becomes one of the most essential and powerful forces in the Christian character. Paul begins his list of the "fruits of the Spirit" with love (Gal 5 22); Peter ends his with love. It is like a chain, each link holds fast to its fellow and is a part of the whole. It matters little at which end of the chain we begin to count, for the links form a unity, and to touch one is to touch all. God freely gives what we need and all we need; we are to "add all diligence" to supply the need richly.

(3) Inerrancy of the sources of saving knowledge (1 16-21). The apostle rests his teaching on two trustworthy facts: (a) the fact and meaning of the Saviour's Transfiguration; (b) the fact of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Taken together these two facts invest his teaching with infallible certainty. "For we did not follow cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty." Pagan mythology, so widely prevailing at the time in Asia Minor, indeed over the whole heathen world, was composed of "myths" (Peter's word) skilfully framed and poetically embellished. Jewish cabalism, and the wild vagaries springing up in the Christian brotherhood itself had no place in the gospel message nor in apostolic teaching. What Peter and his fellow-disciples taught was the very truth of God, for at the Transfiguration they saw the outshining glory of the Son of God, they heard the Divine Voice, they beheld the two visitants from the unseen world, Moses and Elijah. Of the majestic scene they were eyewitnesses. Peter adds, "And we have the word of prophecy made more sure." The Transfiguration has confirmed what the prophets say touching the future and God's purpose to fill the earth with His glory; every word He has spoken is to be made good.

Moreover, the apostle appeals to the inspiration of the prophets in confirmation of his teaching: "No prophecy of scripture is of private interpretation. For no prophecy ever came by the will of man; but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit." He recognizes this as primary truth, that prophecy is not of one's own origination, nor is it to be tied up to the times of the prophet. The prophecy was brought to him, as it is brought to us. Peter and his fellow-believers did not follow "cunningly devised fables"; they were borne along in their prophetic utterances by the Spirit.

Of course in 3 5-13, where the three worlds are spoken of, three globes are not meant, but three vast epochs, three enormous periods in earth's history. The apostle divides 2. The Three Worlds its history into three clearly defined sections, and mentions some of the characteristic features of each.

(1) The old world.—"The world that then was" (3 6): this is his first world. It is the antediluvian world that is meant, the world which the Flood overwhelmed. Scoffers in Peter's time asked, no doubt with a sneer, "Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (3 4). This is a surprisingly modern inquiry. Mockers then as now appealed to the continuity of natural processes, and to the inviolability of Nature's laws. Nature keeps her track with unwavering precision. There is no sign of any change; no catastrophe is likely, is possible. The promise of His coming fails. Peter reminds the skeptics that a mighty cataclysm did once overwhelm the world. The Flood drowned every living thing, save those sheltered within the ark. As this is a historical fact, the query of the mockers is foolish.

(2) The present world.—Peter's second world is "the heavens that now are, and the earth" (3 7). It is the present order of things in sky and earth that is meant. He asserts that this world is "stored up for fire, being reserved against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men." The margin reads, "stored with fire," i.e., it contains within itself the agency by which it may be consumed. The world that now is, is held in strict custody, reserved, not for a second deluge, but for fire. The advent of Christ and the judgment are associated in Scripture with fire: "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him" (Ps 50 3 AV; cf Isa 66 15.16; Dnl 7 10.11). Nor is the NT silent on this point: "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of his power in flaming fire" (2 Thess. 1 7).

Ample materials are stored up in the earth for its consumption by fire. The oils and the gases so inflammable and destructive in their energy can, when it may please God to release these forces, speedily reduce the present order of things to ashes. Peter's language does not signify earth's annihilation, nor its dissolution as an organic body, nor the end of time. He speaks of cosmical convulsions and physical revolutions of both sky and earth, such as shall transform the planet into something glorious and beautiful.

(3) The new world.—The third world is this: "But, according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (3 13). This is Paradise restored. We have sure ground for the expectancy; the last two chapters of Rev contain the prophetic fulfilment: "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth are passed away; and the sea is no more." The accomplishment of these sublime predictions will involve a fundamental change in the constitution of the globe. Life would be impossible if the sea was no more. But He who made the world can surely recreate it, clearing it of every vestige of sin and misery and imperfection, fitting it for the dwelling of perfect beings and of

His supreme glory. Immanuel will dwell with the holy inhabitants of the new earth and in the new Jerus which is to descend into the glorified planet. John is bidden, "Write, for the predictions are faithful and true; they shall not fail to come to pass."

"Earth, thou grain of sand on the shore of the Universe of God,
On thee has the Lord a great work to complete."

LITERATURE.—See at end of PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF; PETER (SIMON).

WILLIAM G. MOOREHEAD

PETHAHIAH, peth-a-hi'a (פֶּתַח־יָהּ, p'thahyāh, "Jeh opens up"):

(1) Chief of the 19th course of priests (1 Ch 24 16).

(2) One of the Levites having "foreign wives" (Ezr 10 23; Neh 9 5; "Patheus" in 1 Esd 9 23).

(3) Son of Meshezabeel, descendant of Judah, who was "at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people" (Neh 11 24).

PETHOR, pē'thor (פֶּתוֹר, p'thōr; Φαθοῦρα, Phathoúra, Βαθοῦρα, Bathoúra): The dwelling-place of Balaam, situated on "the river" (the

1. Possibly Euphrates) (Nu 22 5). In Dt 23 4, it is further described as being in Mesopotamia (Aram-naharaim). Pethor is identified with the Pedru(i) of the geographical lists of Thothmes III (c 1500 BC) and the Pitru (Pithru) of the Assyrian king Shalmaneser II, who states that in his 3d year (857 BC) he took the city Ana-Aššur-utir-ašbat (meaning: "I founded [it] anew for Aššur"), which the Hattāa (Hittites) called Pitru. He says that it lay on the farther (western) bank of the Euphrates, by the Sagurru or Sagūra River, the modern Sajūr. The importance of Pitru is indicated by the fact that he received there the tribute of the kings of Carchemish, Comagene, Melitene and other districts.

As Pitru is about 400 miles from Moab, this meant for Balaam a three or four weeks' journey, but the messengers sent to fetch him,

2. Difficult- though they had to travel that distance twice, could naturally, by pressing their mounts, have performed it in much less time. Doubt may likewise be entertained as to the identity of Pethor with Pitru by the absence in the latter of the š, which would lead one to expect rather the Assyrian form Pit(h)ūru. Shalmaneser, however, says that Pitru was the Hittite name, and that may account for it. With regard to the derivation, nothing can at present be said, except that, as a Hittite name, Tomkins (Records of the Past, V [London, 1891], 38) has compared the name Pitru with the Pteria of Herodotus i.76 (identified with Boghaz-keui, the great Hittite capital in Cappadocia, anciently called Hattu). T. G. PINCHES

PETHUEL, pē-thū'el (פֶּתוּאֵל, p'thū'el, "God's opening"): Father of Joel the prophet (Joel 1 1).

PETITION, pē-tish'un: Used in EV only as a noun, usually as representing the Heb פִּתְיוֹן, sh'ēlāh (Ps 20 5, מִשְׁפָּאֵה, mish'alāh), from the common vb. שָׁאַל, shā'al, "to ask." The noun, consequently, has no technical meaning, and may be used indifferently in the active (Est 7 2) or passive (1 S 1 27) sense, or for a petition addressed to either God (1 S 1 17) or man (1 K 2 16), while in Jgs 8 24; Job 6 8; Ps 106 15, it is rendered simply "request." Otherwise "petition" represents the Aram. בִּעְיָ, bā'ū (Dnl 6 7.13), the Gr αἰτήμα, aitēma (1 Jn 5 15), and δέησις, dēesis (1 Macc 7 37, RV "supplication"), and the Lat oratio (2 Esd 8 24). BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PETRA, pē'tra. See SELA.

PEULTHAI, pē-ul'thī, PEULLETHAI, pē-ul'thī (פֶּלְתַּי, p'ull'thay, "Jeh's seed"): One of the "porters," 8th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 5).

PHAATH MOAB, fā'ath mō'ab (A, Φαάθ Μωάβ, Phaðth Mōáb, B followed by Swete, Φθαλειμωάβ, Phthaleimōáb [1 Esd 5 11]; 1 Esd 8 31 [AV "Pahath Moab"], B followed by Swete reads Μααθμωάβ, Maathmōáb; Fritzsche in both places reads Φαάθ Μωάβ): One of the families, part of which, consisting "of the sons of Jesus and Joab 2,812," went up out of captivity with Zerubbabel and Joshua (1 Esd 5 11), and part of which, viz. "Eliaonias the son of Zaraias and with him 200 men," went up with Ezra (1 Esd 8 31="Pahath-moab" of Ezr 2 6; 8 4; [10 30]; and Neh 7 11 [3 11; 10 14]). As the name of a Jewish clan or family the name Phaath or Pahath Moab presents difficulties of which explanations are offered, though none is convincing. It is generally taken as "ruler of Moab," which may refer to the Israelite conquest of Moab in which this family may have distinguished itself, or it may have arisen from the settlement and incorporation of a Moabite family in Heb territory, or from the settlement of an Israelite family in Moabite territory (cf 1 Ch 4 22); or it may be the corruption of some unknown word or name. Instances of such corruption are quite common in these apocryphal Heb proper names. See PAHATH-MOAB.

PHACARETH, fak'a-reth (Φακαρέθ, Phakaréth, but B followed by Swete correctly reads Φ. Σαβεή, Sabeē, together, A followed by AV reading "sons of Sabie," as a distinct family, 1 Esd 5 34): The same as "Pochereth-hazzebaim" of Ezr 2 57.

PHAISUR, fā'sur, fā-ī'sur (B, Φαισοῦρ, Phaisoúr, A, Φαισοῦ, Phaisoú): Head of one of the families of priests some of whom had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 22)="Pashhur" of Ezr 10 22; styled "Phassurus" in 1 Esd 5 25.

PHALDEUS, fal-dē'us (A [Fritzsche], Φαλδαῖος, Phaldaios, B [Swete], Φαλαδαῖος, Phaladaios; AV Phaldaius): One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand when he expounded the Law (1 Esd 9 44)="Pedaiah" of Neh 8 4.

PHALEAS, fa-lē'as (Φαλαῖας, Phalaías): A family of "temple-servants" who went up with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esd 5 29)="Padon" of Ezr 2 44.

PHALEC, fā'lek (Φαλέκ, Phalék, WH, Φάλεκ, Phálek): AV; Gr form of "Peleg" (thus RV) (Lk 3 35).

PHALIAS, fa-lī'as (Φαλίας, Phalias, A, Φιάθας, Phiáthas; AV Biatas, following Aldine Βιάτας, Biátas): One of the Levites who read and explained the Law to the multitude (1 Esd 9 48)="Pelaiah" of Neh 8 7.

PHALLU, fal'ōō (פַּלְלִי, pal'lū). See PALLU.

PHALTI, fal'tī (פַּלְתִּי, pal'tī). See PALTÍ.

PHALTIEL, fal'ti-el (פַּלְתִּי־עֵל, pal'tī'el; Syr "Psaltiel"; Vulg and AV Salathiel): "The captain of the people" who came to Esdras between his first and second vision (2 Esd 5 16). Fritzsche (Libri Apoc vet. test.) reads "Phalthiel." See PALTIEL.

PHANUEL, fan-ū'el, fan'ū-el (פַּנְיָאֵל, p'anū'el, "vision of God"; Φανουήλ, Phanouēl): Parent of Anna (Lk 2 36). See PENIEL.

PHARAKIM, far'a-kim (Φαρακίμ, Pharakeim, B, Φαρακέμ, Pharakém; AV Pharacim): One of the families of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31; not found in Ezr or Neh).

PHARAOH, fā'rō, fā'rā-ō (פַּרְעֹה, par'oh; Φαραώ, Pharaō; Egypt per aa, "great house"):

1. Use of Name in Egypt Many and strange differences of opinion have been expressed concerning the use of this name in Egypt and elsewhere, because of its importance in critical discussions (see below). EB says "a name given to all Egypt kings in the Bible"; it also claims that the name could not have been received by the Hebrews before 1000 BC. HDB (III, 819) says that a letter was addressed to Amenhotep as "Pharaoh, lord of," etc. According to Winckler's theory of a North Arabian Musri, it was the Hebrews alone in ancient times who adopted the term Pharaoh from the Egyptians, the name not being found even in the Am Tab or anywhere else in cuneiform literature for the king of Egypt. Such a result is obtained according to Winckler's theory by referring every reference in cuneiform to "Pir'u, king of Musri" to the North Arabian country.

In Egypt inscriptions the term "Pharaoh" occurs from the Pyramid inscriptions onward. At first it is used with distinct reference to its etymology and not clearly as an independent title. Pharaoh, "great house," like Sublime Porte, was applied first as a metaphor to mean the government. But as in such an absolute monarchy as Egypt the king was the government, Pharaoh was, by a figure of speech, put for the king. Its use in Egypt clearly as a title denoting the ruler, whoever he might be, as Caesar among the Romans, Shah among Persians, and Czar among Russians, belongs to a few dynasties probably beginning with the XVIIIth, and certainly ending not later than the XXist, when we read of Pharaoh Sheshonk, but the Bible does not speak so, but calls him "Shishak king of Egypt" (1 K 14 25). This new custom in the use of the title Pharaoh does not appear in the Bible until we have "Pharaoh-necoh." Pharaoh is certainly used in the time of Rameses II, in the "Tale of Two Brothers" (Records of the Past, 1st series, II, 137; Recueil de Travaux, XXI, 13, l. 1).

It appears from the preceding that Bib. writers use this word with historical accuracy for the various periods to which it refers, not only for the time of Necoh and Hophra, but for the time of Rameses II, and use the style of the time of Rameses II for the time of Abraham and Joseph, concerning which we have not certain knowledge of its use in Egypt. It is strongly urged that writers of the 7th or 5th cent. BC would not have been able to make such historical use of this name, while, to a writer at the time of the exodus, it would have been perfectly natural to use Pharaoh for the king without any further name; and historical writers in the time of the prophets in Pal would likewise have used Pharaoh-necoh and Pharaoh Hophra. This evidence is not absolutely conclusive for an early authorship of the Pent and historical books, but is very difficult to set aside for a late authorship (cf Gen 12 14-20; 41 14; Ex 1 11; 3 11; 1 K 3 1; 14 25; 2 K 23 29; Jer 44 30; also 1 K 11 19; 2 K 18 21; 1 Ch 4 18).

PHARAOH HOPHRA, hof'ra (פַּרְעֹה הֹפְרָא, par'oh hōphra; Οὐαφρῆ, Houaphrē): He is so called in Scripture (Jer 44 30); Herodotus calls him Apries (ii.169). He is known on the monuments as Uah 'ab 'ra. He was the son of Psammetichus II, whose Gr mercenaries have left inscriptions upon the rocks of Abu-Sim-bel, and the grandson of Pharaoh-necoh. He reigned alone from 589 BC to 570 BC, and jointly, by compulsion of his people, with his son-in-law Aahmes (Gr Amasis) for some years longer. No sooner had he mounted the throne than he yielded to the overtures of Zedekiah of Judah, who thought Hophra's accession a good opportunity for throwing off the yoke of Babylon. So, as Ezekiel says (17 15), "he rebelled against him [Nebuchadrezzar] in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people." Zedekiah had entered into the intrigue against the advice of Jeremiah, and it proved fatal to Zedekiah and the kingdom. Nebuchadrezzar was not slow to punish the disloyalty of his vassal, and in a brief space his armies were beleaguering Jerus. The Egyptians did indeed march to the relief of their allies, and the Chaldaeans drew off their forces from Jerus to meet them. But the Egyptians returned without attempting to meet the Chaldaeans in a pitched battle, and Jerus was taken, the walls broken down and the temple burnt up with fire.

When Jerus had fallen and Nebuchadrezzar's governor, Gedaliah, had been assassinated, the dispirited remnant of Judah, against the advice of Jeremiah, fled into Egypt, carrying the prophet with them. They settled at Tahpanhes, then Daphnae (modern Tell Defenneh), now identified with a mound bearing the significant name of Kaqr Bint el Yahudi, "the palace of the Jew's daughter." Here Pharaoh had a palace, for Jeremiah took great stones and hid them in mortar in the brickwork "which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house at Tahpanhes," and prophesied that Nebuchadrezzar would spread his royal pavilion over them (Jer 43 8-13). The Pharaoh of that day was Hophra, and when the fortress of Tahpanhes was discovered and cleared in 1886, the open-air platform before the entrance was found. "Here the ceremony described by Jeremiah took place before the chiefs of the fugitives assembled on the platform, and here Nebuchadrezzar spread his royal pavilion. The very nature of the site is precisely applicable to all the events" (Flinders Petrie, Nebesheh and Deferneh, 51). It was in 568 BC that the prophecy was fulfilled when Nebuchadrezzar marched into the Delta.

More recently, in 1909, in the course of excavations carried on by the British School of Archaeology in Egypt, the palace of King Apries, Pharaoh Hophra, has been discovered on the site of Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt. Under the grey mud hill, close to the squalid Arab village of Mitrahenny, which every tourist passes on the way to Sakkhara, had lain for centuries Hophra's magnificent palace, 400 ft. long by 200 ft., with a splendid pylon, an immense court, and stone-lined halls, of which seven have been found intact. With many other objects of value there was found a fitting of a palanquin of solid silver, decorated with a bust of Hathor with a gold face. It is said to be of the finest workmanship of the time of Apries, a relic of the fire, which, Jeremiah predicted at Tahpanhes, the Lord of Hosts was to kindle "in the houses of the gods of Egypt" (Jer 43 12).

Pharaoh Hophra, as Jeremiah prophesied (44 29 f), became the victim of a revolt and was finally strangled.

PHARAOH-NECOH, nē'kō (פַּרְעֹה נֶכֶח, par'ōh nē'khōh, also פַּרְעֹה נֶכָח, nē'khō; Νεχαώ, Nechaō [2 K 23 29. 33.34; 2 Ch 35 22; 36 4, AV Necho,

1. Pharaoh- RV NECO; Jer 46 2; 2 Ch 35 20, Necho, 610- AV Necho, RV NECO): Nekau II of 594 BC the monuments—Gr Nekōs—was the 2d king of the XXVIth Dynasty, being the son of Psammetichus I, famous in Gr contemporary history, whose long reign has left so many memorials both in Upper and Lower Egypt (Herod. ii.153, 158, 169). The great event of his reign (610–594 BC) was his expedition across Syria to secure for himself a share in the decaying empire of Assyria. In the days of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, Egypt had been tributary to Assyria, and, when it began to break up, Egypt and other subject kingdoms saw their opportunity to throw off its yoke. Psammetichus had turned back the Scythian hordes which had reached his border on their western march, and now his son Necho was to make a bold stroke for empire.

On his expedition toward the East, he had to pass through the territory of Judah, and he desired to have Josiah its king as an ally.

2. Battle of Megiddo, 608 BC Whatever may have been his reasons, Josiah remained loyal to his Assyrian suzerain, declined the Egyptian alliance, and threw himself across the path of the invader. The opposing armies met on the battlefield of Megiddo, 608 BC, where Josiah was mortally wounded and soon after died amid the lamentations of his people. Necho marched northward, captured Kadesh, and pressed on to the Euphrates. Not having met an enemy there, he seems to have turned back and established himself for a time at Riblah in Syria. To Riblah he summoned Jehoahaz whom the people had anointed king in room of his father Josiah, deposed him after a brief reign of 3 months, and set his brother Jehoiakim on the throne as the vassal of Egypt. Jehoiakim paid up the tribute of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold which Necho had imposed upon the land, but he recovered it by exactions which he made from the people (2 K 23 35).

The Egyptian monarch still kept some hold upon Syria, and his presence there had attracted the attention of the newly established

3. Battle of power at Babylon. The Chaldeans Carchemish, under Nebuchadrezzar set out for the 604 BC

Euphrates, and, meeting the army of Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, inflicted upon him a signal defeat. The Chaldeans were now undisputed masters of Western Asia, and the sacred historian relates that "the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land; for the king of Babylon had taken, from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt" (2 K 24 7).

While Pharaoh-necho II was ambitious to extend his empire, he was bent also upon the commercial development of Egypt. For this he set himself to collect a navy. He had two fleets built, composed of triremes, one of them to navigate the Mediterranean, the other to navigate the Red Sea.

In order to secure a combination of his fleets, he conceived the idea of reopening the canal between the Nile and the Red Sea which had been originally constructed by Seti I and Rameses II, two Pharaohs of the days of the Israelite oppression, but had become silted up by desert sands. He excavated this old canal, following the line of the former cutting, and widening it so that two triremes might meet and pass each other in it. According to Herodotus he was obliged to desist from the undertaking in consequence of the mortality among the laborers, and it was left to Darius to complete. He also resolved to try whether it was possible to circumnavigate Africa, and, manning his ships with Phoenician sailors, he sent them forth with instructions to keep the coast of Africa on their right and to return to Egypt by way of the Mediterranean. They succeeded, and, rounding the Cape of Good Hope from the East, anticipated by two millenniums the feat which Vasco da Gama accomplished from the West. The enterprise took more than two years, and the result of it was of no practical value. Herodotus, when he visited Egypt in 450 BC, saw still remaining the docks which Necho had built for the accommodation of his fleet.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER (בַּת־פַּרְעֹה, bath-par'ōh): The princess who rescued Moses (Ex 2 5–10; He 11 24). This is probably a title as well as an appellation, indicating not only one of the daughters of a Pharaoh, but also some very distinguished rank, thought to be most probably that of the heir to the throne by birth; though she was debarred from reigning by reason of sex, she still possessed the right to entail the scepter and crown to her oldest son. Positive identification of the "Pharaoh's daughter" mentioned in the Bible is not possible yet. All attempts toward identification are, of course, guided by the particular theory of the oppressor accepted. If the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Rameses II, as is most likely, then Pharaoh's daughter was probably the daughter of Seti I, an older sister of Rameses II. If, as many think, the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Thothmes III, then Pharaoh's daughter was some unknown princess. Some have thought she was Hatshepsut, the "Queen Elizabeth of Egypt."

PHARATHON, far'a-thon (Φαραθών, Pharathōn): One of the strong cities of Judaea fortified by Bacchides during the Maccabean war (1 Macc 9 50). LXX reads "Thamnatha-pharathon" as the name of one city. Jos, however (Ant, XIII, i, 3), and Syr supply the "and" between them. The name represents a Heb pir'āthōn. If it is to be taken strictly as in Judaeian territory, it cannot be identified with PIRATHON (q.v.) of Jgs 12 15. In that case we should probably seek for it with Dr. G. A. Smith in some fortress covering the top of Wādy Far'ah.

LITERATURE

A prominent sect of the Jews. The earliest notice of them in Jos occurs in connection with Jonathan, the high priest. Immediately after the account of the embassy to the Lacedaemonians, there is subjoined (Jos, Ant, XIII, v, 9) an account of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes, therefore implying that then and in this connection they had been prominent, although no notice of any of these parties is to be found that confirms that view. Later (XIII, x, 5), the Pharisees are represented as envious of the success of John Hyrcanus; Eleazar, one of them, insults him at his own table. From the fact that earlier in the history the Assidaeans occupy a similar place to that occupied later by the Pharisees, it may be deduced that the two parties are in a measure one. See HASIDAEANS; ASMONEANS. It would seem that not only the Pharisees, but also the Essenes, were derived from the Assidaeans or hāsidhīm.

In considering the characteristics and doctrines of the Pharisees we are in some difficulty from the nature of our authorities. The writers

2. Authorities of the NT assume generally that the character and tenets of the Pharisees are well known to their readers, and only lay stress on the points in which they were in antagonism to Our Lord and His followers. The evidence of Jos, a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, is lessened in value by the fact that he modified his accounts of his people to suit the taste of his Rom masters. The Pharisees, with him, are a philosophic sect, and not an active political party. Their Messianic hopes are not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the descendants of the Pharisees, the fact that the Gemara, from which most of our information is derived, is so late renders the evidence deduced from Talmudic statements of little value. Even the Mish, which came into being only a century after the fall of the Jewish state, shows traces of exaggeration and modification of facts. Still, taking these deficiencies into consideration, we may make a fairly consistent picture of the sect. The name means "separatists," from פָּרַשׁ, pārash, "to separate"—those who carefully kept themselves from any legal contamination, distinguishing themselves by their care in such matters from the common people, the 'am hā-āreṣ, who had fewer scruples. Like the Puritans in England during the 17th cent., and the Presbyterians in Scotland during the same period, the Pharisees, although primarily a religious party, became ere long energetically political. They were a closely organized society, all the members of which called each other hābhērīm, "neighbors"; this added to the power they had through their influence with the people.

1. History of the Sect.—The Assidaeans (hāsidhīm) were at first the most active supporters of Judas Maccabaeus in his struggle for religious freedom. A portion of them rather than fight retired to the desert to escape the tyranny of Epiphanes (1 Macc 2 27f). The followers of these in later days became the Essenes. When Judas Maccabaeus cleansed the temple and rededicated it with many sacrifices, it is not expressly said, either in the Books of Macc or by Jos, that he acted as high priest, but the probability is that he did so. This would be a shock to the Assidaeans purists, as Judas, though a priest, was not a Zadokite; but his actions would be tolerated at that time on account of the imminent necessity for the work of reconsecration and the eminent services of Judas himself and his family.

When Bacchides appeared against Jerus with Alcimus in his camp, this feeling against Judas took shape in receiving the treacherous Alcimus into Jerus and acknowledging him as high priest, a line of action which soon showed that it was fraught with disaster, as Alcimus murdered many of the people. They had to betake themselves anew to Judas, but this desertion was the beginning of a separating gulf which deepened when he made a treaty with the idolatrous Romans. As is not infrequently the case with religious zealots, their valor was associated with a mystic fanaticism. The very idea of alliance with heathen powers was hateful to them, so when Judas began to treat with Rome they deserted him, and he sustained the crushing defeat of Eleasa. Believing themselves the saints of God and therefore His peculiar treasure, they regarded any association with the heathen as faithlessness to Jeh. Their attitude was much that of the Fifth Monarchy men in the time of Cromwell, still more that of the Cameronians in Scotland at the Revolution of 1688 who, because William of Orange was not a "covenanted" king, would have none of him. As the later Hasmonians became more involved in worldly politics, they became more and more alienated from the strict Assidaeans, yet the successors of Judas Maccabaeus retained their connection with the party in a lukewarm fashion, while the Sadducean sect was gaining in influence.

About this time the change of name seems to have been effected. They began to be called Pharisees, p'rūshīm, instead of hāsidhīm—"separatists" instead of saints. A parallel instance is to be found in the religious history of England.

The Puritans of the 17th cent. became in the 19th "Non-conformists." The earliest instance of the

2. Change of Name Pharisees' intervening in history is that referred to in Jos (Ant, XIII, x, 5), where Eleazar, a Pharisee, demanded that John Hyrcanus should lay down the high-priesthood because his mother had been a captive, thus insinuating that he—Hyrcanus—was no true son of Aaron, but the bastard of some nameless heathen to whom his mother had surrendered herself. This unforgivable insult to himself and to the memory of his mother led Hyrcanus to break with the Pharisaic party definitely. He seems to have left them severely alone.

The sons of Hyrcanus, esp. Alexander Jannaeus, expressed their hostility in a more active way.

3. Later Fortunes of the Sect Alexander crucified as many as 800 of the Pharisaic party, a proceeding that seems to intimate overt acts of hostility on their part which prompted this action. His whole policy was the aggrandizement of the Jewish state, but his ambition was greater than his military abilities. His repeated failures and defeats confirmed the Pharisees in their opposition to him on religious grounds. He scandalized them by calling himself king, although not of the Davidic line, and further still by adopting the heathen name "Alexander," and having it stamped in Gr characters on his coins. Although a high priest was forbidden to marry a widow, he married the widow of his brother. Still further, he incurred their opposition by abandoning the Pharisaic tradition as to the way in which the libation water was poured out. They retaliated by rousing his people against him and conspiring with the Syrian king. On his deathbed he advised his wife, Alexandra Salome, who succeeded him on the throne, to make peace with the Pharisees. This she did by throwing herself entirely into their hands. On her death a struggle for the possession of the throne and the high-priesthood began between her two sons, John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II. The latter, the more able and energetic, had the support of the Sadducees; the former, the elder of the two brothers, had that of the Pharisees. In the first phase of the conflict, Hyrcanus was defeated and compelled to make a disadvantageous peace with his brother, but, urged by Antipater, the Idumaeen, he called in Aretas, who inclined the balance at once to the side of Hyrcanus. The Romans were appealed to and they also, moved partly by the astuteness of Antipater, favored Hyrcanus. All this resulted ultimately in the supremacy of the Herodians, who through their subservience to Rome became inimical to the Pharisees and rivals of the Sadducees.

When the NT records open, the Pharisees, who have supreme influence among the people, are also strong, though not predominant, in the

4. In NT Times Sanhedrin. The Herodians and Sadducees, the one by their alliance with the Rom authorities, and the other by their inherited skill in political intrigue, held the reins of government. If we might believe the Talmudic representation, the Pharisees were in the immense majority in the Sanhedrin; the nāsī', or president, and the 'abb-bēth-dīn, or vice-president, both were Pharisees. This, however, is to be put to the credit of Talmudic imagination, the relation of which to facts is of the most distant kind.

Recently Büchler (Das grosse Synedrium in Jerus) has attempted to harmonize these Talmudic fables with the aspect of things appearing in the NT and Jos. He assumes that there were two Sanhedrins, one civil, having to do with matters of government, in which the Sadducees were overwhelmingly predominant, and the other scholastic, in which the Pharisees were equally predominant—the one the Senate of the nation, like the Senate of the United States, the other the Senate of a university, let us say, of Jerus. Although followed by Rabbi Lauterbach in the Jew Enc, this attempt cannot be regarded as successful. There is no evidence for this dual Sanhedrin either in the NT or Jos, on the one hand, or in the Talm on the other.

Outside the Sanhedrin the Pharisees are ubiquitous, in Jerus, in Galilee, in Peraea and in the Decapolis, always coming in contact with Jesus. The attempts made by certain recent Jewish writers to exonerate them from the guilt of the condemnation of Our Lord has no foundation; it is contradicted by the NT records, and the attitude of the Talm to Jesus.

The Pharisees appear in the Book of Acts to be in a latent way favorers of the apostles as against the high-priestly party. The personal influence of Gamaliel, which seems commanding, was exercised in their favor. The anti-Christian zeal of Saul the Tarsian, though a Pharisee, may have been to some extent the result of the personal feelings which led him to perpetuate the relations of the earlier period when the two sects were united in common antagonism to the teaching of Christ. He, a Pharisee, offered himself to be employed by the Sadducean high priest (Acts 9 1.2) to carry on the work of persecution in Damascus. In this action Saul appears to have been in opposition to a large section of the Pharisaic party. The bitter disputes which he and the other younger Pharisees had carried on with Stephen had possibly influenced him.

When Paul, the Christian apostle, was brought before the Sanhedrin at Jerus, the Pharisaic party were numerous in the Council, if they did not even form the majority, and they readily became his defenders against the Sadducees.

From Jos we learn that with the outbreak of the war with the Romans the Pharisees were thrust into the background by the more fanatical Zealots, Simon ben Gioras and John of Gischala (BJ, V, i). The truth behind the Talmudic statements that Gamaliel removed the Sanhedrin to Jabneh and that Johanan ben Zakkai successfully entreated Vespasian to spare the scholars of that city is that the Pharisees in considerable numbers made peace with the Romans. In the Mish we have the evidence of their later labors when the Sanhedrin was removed from Jabneh, ultimately to Tiberias in Galilee. There under the guidance of Jehuda ha-Kādōsh ("the Holy") the Mish was reduced to writing. It may thus be said that Judaism became Pharisaism, and the history of the Jews became that of the Pharisees. In this later period the opposition to Christianity sprang up anew and became embittered, as may be seen in the Talmudic fables concerning Jesus.

II. Doctrines of the Pharisees.—The account given of the doctrines of the Pharisees by Jos is

1. Josephus' Statements Colored by Greek Ideas clearly influenced by his desire to parallel the Jewish sects with the Gr philosophical schools. He directs especial attention to the Pharisaic opinion as to fate and free will, since on this point the Stoic and Epicurean sects differed very emphatically. He regards the Pharisaic position as midway between that of the Sadducees, who denied fate altogether and made human freedom absolute, and that of the Essenes that "all things are left in the hand of God." He says "The Pharisees ascribe all things to fate and God, yet allow that to do what is right or the contrary is principally in man's own power, although fate coöperates in every action." It is to be noted that Jos, in giving this statement of views, identifies "fate" with "God," a process that is more plausible in connection with the Lat fatum, "something decreed," than in relation to the impersonal moira, or heimarmenē, of the Greeks. As Jos wrote in Gr and used only the second of these terms, he had no philological inducement to make the identification; the reason must have been the matter of fact. In other words, he shows that the Pharisees believed in a personal God whose will was providence.

In connection with this was their doctrine of a future life of rewards and punishments. The phrase which Jos uses is a peculiar one:

2. Conditional Re-incarnation "They think that every soul is immortal; only the souls of good men will pass into another body, but the souls of the evil shall suffer everlasting punishment" (aidiā timōriā kolázesthai). From this it has been deduced that the Pharisees held the transmigration of souls. In our opinion this is a mistake. We believe that really it is an attempt of Jos to state the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in a way that would not shock Hellenic ideas. The Gr contempt for the body made the idea of the resurrection abhorrent, and in this, as in most philosophical matters, the Romans followed the Greeks. It would seem that Jos regarded the Pharisees as maintaining that this resurrection applied only to the righteous. Still even this restriction, though certainly the natural interpretation, is not absolutely necessary. This is confirmed by the corresponding section in the Antiquities (XVIII, i, 3): "They also believe . . . that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life, and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again." Jos also declares the Pharisees to be very attentive students of the law of God: "they interpret the law with careful exactitude."

Nothing in the Gospels or the Acts at all militates against any part of this representation, but there is much to fill it out. They believed in

3. NT Presentation of Pharisaic Doctrines angels and spirits (Acts 23 8). From the connection it is probable that the present activity of such beings was the question in the mind of the writer. In that same sentence belief in the resurrection is ascribed to the Pharisees.

Another point is that to the bare letter of the Law they added traditions. While the existence of these traditions is referred to in the

4. Traditions Added to the Law Gospels, too little is said to enable us to grasp their nature and extent (Mt 15 2 ff; 16 5 ff; Mk 7 1-23). The evangelists only recorded these traditional glosses when they conflicted with the teaching of Christ and were therefore denounced by Him. We find them exemplified in the Mish. The Pharisaic theory of tradition was that these additions to the written law and interpretations of it had been given by Moses to the elders and by them had been transmitted orally down through the ages. The classical passage in the Mish is to be found in Pirke 'Abhōth: "Moses received the [oral] Law from Sinai and delivered it to Joshua and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets and the prophets to the men of the great synagogue." Additions to these traditions were made by prophets by direct inspiration, or by interpretation of the words of the written Law. All this mass, as related above, was reduced to writing by Jehuda ha-Kādōsh in Tiberias, probably about the end of the 2d cent. AD. Jehuda was born, it is said, 135 AD, and died somewhere about 220 AD.

The related doctrines of the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the final judgment with its consequent eternal rewards and punishments formed a portion and a valuable portion of this tradition.

5. Traditional Interpretation of the Law by Pharisees Less valuable, at times burdensome and hurtful, were the minute refinements they introduced into the Law. Sometimes the ingenuity of the Pharisaic doctors was directed to lighten the burden of the precept as in regard to the Sabbath. Thus a person was permitted to go much farther than a Sabbath day's journey if at some time previous he had deposited, within the legal Sabbath day's journey of the place he wished to reach, bread and water; this point was now to be regarded as the limit of his house, and consequently from this all distances were to be ceremonially reckoned (Jew Enc, s.v. "Erub"). The great defect of Pharisaism was that it made sin so purely external. An act was right or wrong according as some external condition was present or absent; thus there was a difference in bestowing alms on the Sabbath whether the beggar put his hand within the door of the donor or the donor stretched his hand beyond his own threshold, as may be seen in the first Mish in the Tractate Shabbāth. A man did not break the Sabbath rest of his ass, though he rode on it, and hence did not break the Sabbath law, but if he carried a switch with which to expedite the pace of the beast he was guilty, because he had laid a burden upon it.

Along with these traditions and traditional interpretations, the Pharisees were close students of the sacred text. On the turn of a sentence they suspended many decisions. So much so, that it is said of them later that they suspended mountains from their hairs. This is esp. the case with regard to the Sabbath law with its burdensome minutiae. At the same time there was care as to the actual wording of the text of the Law; this has a bearing on textual criticism, even to the present day. A specimen of Pharisaic exegesis which Paul turns against their followers as an argumentum ad hominem may be seen in Gal 3 16: "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

6. Close Students of the Text of Scripture—It is also to be said for them, that they maintained the Messianic hopes of the nation when their rivals were ready to sacrifice everything to the Romans, in order to gain greater political influence for themselves. Their imagination ran riot in the pictures they drew of these future times, but still they aided the faith of the people who were thus in a position to listen to the claims of Christ. They were led by Rabbi Akiba in the reign of Hadrian to accept Bar-Cochba about a century after they had rejected Jesus. They were fanatical in their obedience to the Law as they understood it, and died under untold tortures rather than transgress.

(1) Messianic hopes.—It is also to be said for them, that they maintained the Messianic hopes of the nation when their rivals were ready to sacrifice everything to the Romans, in order to gain greater political influence for themselves. Their imagination ran riot in the pictures they drew of these future times, but still they aided the faith of the people who were thus in a position to listen to the claims of Christ. They were led by Rabbi Akiba in the reign of Hadrian to accept Bar-Cochba about a century after they had rejected Jesus. They were fanatical in their obedience to the Law as they understood it, and died under untold tortures rather than transgress.

(2) Almsgiving.—They elevated almsgiving into an equivalent for righteousness. This gave poverty a very different place from what it had in Greece or among the Romans. Learning was honored, although its possessors might be very poor. The story of the early life of Hillel brings this out. He is represented as being so poor as to be unable sometimes to pay the small daily fee which admitted pupils to the rabbinic school, and when this happened, in his eagerness for the Law, he is reported to have listened on the roof to the words of the teachers. This is probably not historically true, but it exhibits the Pharisaic ideal.

III. Organization of the Pharisaic Party.—We have no distinct account of this organization, either in the Gospels, in Jos, or in the Talm. But the close relationship which the members of the sect sustained to each other, their habit of united action as exhibited in the narratives of the NT and of Jos are thus most naturally explained. The Talmudic account of the hābhērīm affords confirmation of this. These were persons who primarily associated for the study of the Law and for the better observance of its precepts. No one was admitted to these hā- bhārōth without taking an oath of fidelity to the society and a promise of strict observance of Levitical precepts.

One of the elements of their promise has to be noted. The hābhēr promised not to pay ma'ārōth, "tithe," or terūmah, "heave offering," to a priest who was not a hābhēr. They were only permitted to take this oath when their associates in the brotherhood certified to their character. Even then the candidate had to pass through a period of probation of 30 days, according to the "house of Hillel," of a year, according to the "house of Shammai." This latter element, being quite more Talmudic, may be regarded as doubtful. Association with any not belonging to the Pharisaic society was put under numerous restrictions. It is at least not improbable that when the lawyer in Lk 10 29 demanded "Who is my neighbor?" he was minded to restrict the instances of the command in Lev 19 18 to those who were, like himself, Pharisees. A society which thus had brotherhoods all over Pal and was separated from the rest of the community would naturally wield formidable power when their claims were supported by the esteem of the people at large. It is to be observed that to be a hābhēr was a purely personal thing, not heritable like priesthood, and women as well as men might be members. In this the Pharisees were like the Christians. In another matter also there was a resemblance between them and the followers of Jesus; they, unlike the Sadducees, were eager to make proselytes. "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte" (Mt 23 15). Many members of Rom society, esp. women, were proselytes, as, for instance, Poppaea Sabina.

IV. Character of the Pharisees.—Because the ideal of the Pharisees was high, and because they revered learning and character above wealth and civil rank, they had a tendency to despise those who did not agree with them. We see traces of this in the Gospels; thus Jn 7 49: "This multitude that knoweth not the law are accursed." The distinction between the Pharisees, the Puritans and the 'am hā-āreḥ, "the people of the land," began with the distinction that had to be kept between the Jews and the Gentiles who had entered the land as colonists or intruders. These would, during the Bab captivity, almost certainly speak Western Aram., and would certainly be heathen and indulge in heathen practices. They were "the people of the land" whom the returning exiles found in possession of Judaea.

Mingled with them were the few Jews that had neither been killed nor deported by the Babylonians, nor carried down into Egypt by Johanan, the son of Kareah. As they had conformed in a large measure to the habits of their heathen neighbors and intermarried with them, the stricter Jews, as Ezra and Nehemiah, regarded them as under the same condemnation as the heathen, and shrank from association with them. During the time of Our Lord's life on earth the name was practically restricted to the ignorant Jews whose conformity to the law was on a broader scale than that of the Pharisees. Some have, however, dated the invention of the name later in the days of the Maccabean struggle, when the ceremonial precepts of the Law could with difficulty be observed. Those who were less careful of these were regarded as 'am hā-āreḥ.

The distinction as exhibited in the Talm shows an arrogance on the part of the Pharisaic hābhēr that must have been galling to those who, though Jews as much as the Pharisees, were not Puritans like them. A hābhēr, that is a Pharisee, might not eat at the table of a man whose wife was of the 'am hā-āreḥ, even though her husband might be a Pharisee. If he would be a full hābhēr, a Pharisee must not sell to any of the 'am hā-āreḥ anything that might readily be made unclean. If a woman of the 'am hā-āreḥ was left alone in a room, all that she could touch without moving from her place was unclean. We must, however, bear in mind that the evidence for this is Talmudic, and therefore of but limited historical value.

(1) Their scrupulosity.—We find traces of this scrupulosity in the Gospels. The special way in which the ceremonial sanctity of the

4. The NT Pharisees exhibited itself was in tithing, hence the reference to their tithing "mint and anise and cummin" (Mt 23 23). In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, one of the things that the Pharisee plumes himself on is that he gives tithes of all he possesses (Lk 18 12). He is an example of the Pharisaic arrogance of those "who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and set all others at nought." Their claiming the first seats in feasts and synagogues (Mt 23 6) was an evidence of the same spirit.

(2) Their hypocrisy.—Closely akin to this is the hypocrisy of which the Pharisees were accused by Our Lord. When we call them "hypocrites," we must go back to the primary meaning of the word. They were essentially "actors," poseurs. Good men, whose character and spiritual force have impressed themselves on their generation, have often peculiarities of manner and tone which are easily imitated. The very respect in which they are held by their disciples leads those who respect them to adopt unconsciously their mannerisms of voice and deportment. A later generation unconsciously imitates, "acts the part." In a time when religion is persecuted, as in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, or despised as it was in the Hellenizing times which preceded and succeeded, it would be the duty of religious men not to hide their convictions. The tendency to carry on this public manifestation of religious acts after it had ceased to be protest would be necessarily great. The fact that they gained credit by praying at street corners when the hour of prayer came, and would have lost credit with the people had they not done so, was not recognized by them as lessening the moral worth of the action. Those who, having lived in the period of persecution and contempt, survived in that when religion was held in respect would maintain their earlier practice without any arrière-pensée. The succeeding generation, in continuing the practice, consciously "acted." They were poseurs. Their hypocrisy was none the less real that it was reached by unconscious stages. Hypocrisy was a new sin, a sin only possible in a spiritual religion, a religion in which morality and worship were closely related. Heathenism, which lay in sacrifices and ceremonies by which the gods could be bribed, or cajoled into favors, had a purely casual connection with morality; its worship was entirely a thing of externals, of acting, "posing." Consequently, a man did not by the most careful attention to the ceremonies of religion produce any presumption in favor of his trustworthiness. There was thus no sinister motive to prompt to religion. The prophets had denounced the insincerity of worship, but even they did not denounce hypocrisy, i.e. religion used as a cloak to hide treachery or dishonesty. Religion had become more spiritual, the connection between morality and worship more intimate by reason of the persecution of the Seleucids.

The Talm to some extent confirms the representation of the Gospels. There were said to be seven classes of Pharisees: (1) the "shoulder" Pharisee, who wears his good deeds on his shoulders and obeys the precept of the Law, not from principle, but from expediency; (2) the "wait-a-little" Pharisee, who begs for time in order to perform a meritorious action; (3) the "bleeding" Pharisee, who in his eagerness to avoid looking on a woman shuts his eyes and so bruises himself to bleeding by stumbling against a wall; (4) the "painted" Pharisee, who advertises his holiness lest any one should touch him so that he should be defiled; (5) the "reckoning" Pharisee, who is always saying "What duty must I do to balance any unpalatable duty which I have neglected?"; (6) the "fearing" Pharisee, whose relation to God is one merely of trembling awe; (7) the Pharisee from "love." In all but the last there was an element of "acting," of hypocrisy. It is to be noted that the Talm denounces ostentation; but unconsciously that root of the error lies in the externality of their righteousness; it commands an avoidance of ostentation which involves equal "posing."

V. Our Lord's Relationship to the Pharisees.—

The attitude of the Pharisees to Jesus, to begin with, was, as had been their attitude to John, critical. They sent representatives to watch His doings and His sayings and report. They seem to have regarded it as possible that He might unite Himself with them, although, as we think, His affinities rather lay with the Essenes. Gradually their criticism became opposition. This opposition grew in intensity as He disregarded their interpretations of the Sabbatic law, ridiculed their refinements of the law of tithes and the distinctions they introduced into the validity of oaths, and denounced their insincere posing. At first there seems to have been an effort to cajole Him into compliance with their plans. If some of the Pharisees tempted Him to use language which would compromise Him with the people or with the Rom authorities, others invited Him to their tables, which was going far upon the part of a Pharisee toward one not a hābhēr. Even when He hung on the cross, the taunt with which they greeted Him may have had something of longing, lingering hope in it: "If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him" (Mt 27 42 AV). If He would only give them that sign, then they would acknowledge Him to be the Messiah.

The opposition of the Pharisees to Jesus was intensified by another reason. They were the democratic party; their whole power lay in the reputation they had with the people for piety. Our Lord denounced them as hypocrites; moreover He had secured a deeper popularity than theirs. At length when cajolery failed to win Him and astute questioning failed to destroy His popularity, they combined with their opponents, the Sadducees, against Him as against a common enemy. On the other hand, Jesus denounced the Pharisees more than He denounced any other class of the people. This seems strange when we remember that the main body of the religious people, those who looked for the Messiah, belonged to the Pharisees, and His teaching and theirs had a strong external resemblance. It was this external resemblance, united as it was with a profound spiritual difference, which made it incumbent on Jesus to mark Himself off from them. All righteousness with them was external, it lay in meats and drinks and divers washings, in tithing of mint, anise and cummin. He placed religion on a different footing, removed it into another region. With Him it was the heart that must be right with God, not merely the external actions; not only the outside of the cup and platter was to be cleansed, but the inside first of all. It is to be noted that, as observed above, the Pharisees were less antagonistic to the apostles when their Lord had left them. The after-history of Pharisaism has justified Our Lord's condemnation.

(3) Father of Joiada (AV "Jehoiada"), the repairer of the "old gate" in Jerus (Neh 3 6).

PHASELIS, fa-sē'lis (Φάσηλις, Phásēlis): A city of Lycia in southern Asia Minor, on the seacoast, near the boundary of Pamphylia, to which country some ancient writers have assigned it. Situated on the extreme end of a promontory which projected into the sea, and with high mountains in the rear, it was separated both politically and geographically from the rest of Lycia. Hence it may be understood how it early became the favorite haunt of pirates. Already in the 6th cent. BC, when trade was carried on with Egypt, the city struck coins of its own; upon them the prow and the stern of a war galley were commonly represented. The coinage ceased in 466 BC, but it was resumed about 400 BC, when the city again became practically independent. For a time Phaselis was under the control of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but in 190 BC it again regained its independence or continued as a member of the league of Lycian cities (1 Macc 15 23). Before the beginning of the Christian era it had lost considerable of its earlier importance, yet it was still famed for its temple of Athene in which it was said that the sword of Achilles was preserved, and also for the attar of roses which was produced there. It figures little in early Christian history, yet in Byzantine times it was the residence of a bishop. Its site, now marked by the ruins of the stadium, temples and theater, bears the Turkish name of Tekir Ova. See also LYCIA.

PHILADELPHIA, fil-a-del'fi-a (Φιλαδέλφια, Philadelphía): A city of ancient Lydia in Asia Minor on the Cogamus River, 105 miles from Smyrna. It stood upon a terrace 650 ft. above the sea. Behind it are the volcanic cliffs to which the Turks have given the name of Devitt, or "ink-wells"; on the other side of the city the land is exceedingly fertile, and there was produced a wine of whose excellence the celebrated Rom poet Virgil wrote. Philadelphia is not so ancient as many of the other cities of Asia Minor, for it was founded after 189 BC on one of the highways which led to the interior. Its name was given to it in honor of Attalus II, because of his loyalty to his elder brother, Eumenes II, king of Lydia. Still another name of the city was Decapolis, because it was considered as one of the ten cities of the plain. A third name which it bore during the 1st cent. AD was Neo-kaisaria; it appears upon the coins struck during that period. During the reign of Vespasian, it was called Flavia. Its modern name, Ala-shehir, is considered by some to be a corruption of the Turkish words Allah-shehir, "the city of God," but more likely it is a name given it from the reddish color of the soil. In addition to all of these names it sometimes bore the title of "Little Athens" because of the magnificence of the temples and other public buildings which adorned it. Philadelphia quickly became an important and wealthy trade center, for as the coast cities declined, it grew in power, and retained its importance even until late Byzantine times. One of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev (Rev 3 7 ff) was there, and it was the seat of a bishop. As in most Asia Minor cities, many Jews lived there, and they possessed a synagogue. During the reign of Tiberius the city was destroyed by an earthquake, yet it was quickly rebuilt. Frederick Barbarossa entered it while on his crusade in 1190. Twice, in 1306 and 1324, it was besieged by the Seljuk Turks, but it retained its independence until after 1390, when it was captured by the combined forces of the Turks and Byzantines. In 1403 Tamerlane captured it, and, it is said, built about it a wall of the corpses of his victims.

Ala-shehir is still a Christian town; one-fourth of its modern population is Greek, and a Gr bishop still makes his home there. One of the chief modern industries is a liquorice factory; in the fields about the city the natives dig for the roots. On the terrace upon which the ancient city stood, the ruins of the castle and the walls may still be seen, and among them is pointed out the foundation of the early church. The place may now best be reached by rail from Smyrna. E. J. BANKS

PHILARCHES, fī-lār'kēz. See PHYLARCHES.

PHILEMON, fī-lē'mon, fī-lē'mun (Φιλήμων, Philēmōn): Among the converts of St. Paul, perhaps while at Ephesus, was one whom he calls a "fellow-worker," Philemon (Philem ver 1). He was probably a man of some means, was celebrated for his hospitality (vs 5-7) and of considerable importance in the ecclesia at Colossae. It was at his house (ver 2) that the Colossian Christians met as a center. It is more than probable that this was a group of the Colossian church rather than the entire ecclesia. His wife was named Apphia (ver 2); and Archippus (ver 2) was no doubt his son. From Col 4 17 we learn that Archippus held an office of some importance in Colossae, whether he was a presbyter (Abbott, ICC), or an evangelist, or perhaps the reader (Zahn), we cannot tell. He is called here (ver 2) St. Paul's "fellow-soldier."

The relation between the apostle and Philemon was so close and intimate that St. Paul does not hesitate to press him, on the basis of it, to forgive his slave, Onesimus, for stealing and for running away. See PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.

Tradition makes Philemon the bishop of Colossae (Apos Const, vii, 46), and the Gr Martyrology (Menae) for November 22 tells us that he together with his wife and son and Onesimus were martyred by stoning before Androcles, the governor, in the days of Nero. With this the Lat Martyrology agrees (cf Lightfoot, St. Ignatius, II, 535). This evidence, however, is unsatisfactory and cannot be trusted as giving unquestionable facts as to Philemon. The only sure information is that in the ep. bearing his name. CHARLES SMITH LEWIS

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO: This most beautiful of all St. Paul's Epp., and the most intensely human, is one of the so-called Captivity Epp. of which Eph, Col, and Phil are the others. Of these four PHILIPPIANS (q.v.) stands apart, and was written more probably after the other three. These are mutually interdependent, sent by the same bearer to churches of the same district, and under similar conditions.

There is some diversity of opinion as to the place from which the apostle wrote these letters. Certain scholars (Reuss, Schenkel, Weiss,

1. Place of Holtzmann, Hilgenfeld, Hausrath and Meyer) have urged Caesarea in opposition to the traditional place, Rome.

The arguments advanced are first that Onesimus would have been more likely to have escaped to Caesarea than to Rome, as it is nearer Colossae than Rome is, to which we may reply that, though Caesarea is nearer, his chance of escape would have been far greater in the capital than in the provincial city. Again it is said that as Onesimus is not commended in Eph, he had already been left behind at Colossae; against which there are advanced the precarious value of an argument from silence, and the fact that this argument assumes a particular course which the bearers of the letters would follow, viz. through Colossae to Ephesus. A more forcible argument is that which is based on the apostle's expected visit. In Phil 2 24 we read that he expected to go to Macedonia on his release; in Philem ver 22 we find that he expected to go to Colossae. On the basis of this latter reference it is assumed that he was to the south of Colossae when writing and so at Caesarea. But it is quite as probable that he would go to Colossae through Philippi as the reverse; and it is quite possible that even if he had intended to go direct to Colossae when he wrote to Philemon, events may have come about to cause him to change his plans. The last argument, based on the omission of any reference to the earthquake of which Tacitus (Ann. xiv.27) and Eusebius (Chron., Ol, 207) write, is of force as opposed to the Rom origin of the letters only on the assumption that these writers both refer to the same event (by no means sure) and that the epp. were written after that event, and that it was necessary that St. Paul should have mentioned it. If the early chronology be accepted it falls entirely, as Tacitus' earlier date would be after the epp. were written. In addition we have the further facts, favorable to Rome, that St. Paul had no such freedom in Caesarea as he is represented in these epp. as enjoying; that no mention is made of Philip who was in Caesarea and a most important member of that community (Acts 21 8), and finally that there is no probability that so large a body of disciples and companions could have gathered about the apostle in his earlier and more strict imprisonment, at Caesarea. We may therefore conclude that the Captivity Epp. were written from Rome, and not from Caesarea.

The external evidence for the ep. is less extensive than that of some of the other epp., but it is abundantly strong. The play on the word 2. Authen- Onesimus which St. Paul himself uses ticity (Philem ver 11) is found in Ignat., Eph. ii. This may not mean necessarily a literary connection, but it suggests this. The ep. is known to Tertullian, and through him we know that Marcion accepted it (Adv. Marc., v.21). It is in the list in the Muratorian Fragment (p. 106, l. 27), and is quoted by Origen as Pauline (Hom. in Jer., 19) and placed by Eusebius (HE, III, xxv) among the acknowledged books.

It has twice been the object of attack. In the 4th and 5th cents. it was opposed as unworthy of St. Paul's mind and as of no value for edification. This attack was met successfully by Jerome (Comm. in Philem., praef.), Chrysostom (Argum. in Philem.) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (Spicil. in Solesm., I, 149), and the ep. was finally established in its earlier firm position. The later attack by Baur was inspired by his desire to break down the corroborative value of Philem to the other Captivity Epp., and has been characterized by Weiss as one of Baur's worst blunders. The suggestions that it is interpolated (Holtzmann), or allegorical (Weizsäcker and Pfleiderer), or based on the letter of Pliny (Ep. IX, 21) to Sabinianus (Steck), are interesting examples of the vagaries of their authors, but "deserve only to be mentioned" (Zahn). In its language, style and argument the letter is clearly Pauline.

The date will, as is the case with the other Captivity Epp., depend on the chronology. If the earlier scheme be followed it may be dated about 58, if the later about 63, or 64.

3. Date The apostle writes in his own and Timothy's name to his friend PHILEMON (q.v.) in behalf of Onesimus, a runaway slave of the latter. Beginning with his usual thanksgiving, here awakened by the report of Philemon's hospitality, he intercedes for his 'son begotten in his bonds' (ver 10), Onesimus, who though he is Philemon's runaway slave is now "a brother." It is on this ground that the apostle pleads, urging his own age, and friendship for Philemon, and his present bonds. He pleads, however, without belittling Onesimus' wrongdoing, but assuming himself the financial responsibility for the amount of his theft. At the same time the apostle quietly refers to what Philemon really owes him as his father in Christ, and begs that he will not disappoint him in his expectation. He closes with the suggestion that he hopes soon to visit him, and with greetings from his companions in Rome.

The charm and beauty of this ep. have been universally recognized. Its value to us as giving a glimpse of St. Paul's attitude toward slavery and his intimacy with a man like Philemon cannot be over-estimated. One of the chief elements of value in it is the picture it gives us of a Christian home in the apostolic days; the father and mother well known for their hospitality, the son a man of position and importance in the church, the coming and going of the Christian brethren, and the life of the brotherhood centering about this household.

PHILETUS, fi-lē'tus, fi-lē'tus (Φίλητος, Phīlētos [2 Tim 2 17]): This person is mentioned by Paul, who warns Timothy against him as

1. The well as against his associate in error, Nature of Hymenaeus. The apostle speaks of His Error Hymenaeus and Philetus as instances of men who were doing most serious injury to the church by their teaching, and by what that teaching resulted in, both in faith and morals. The specific error of these men was that they denied that there would be any bodily resurrection. They treated all Scriptural references to such a state, as figurative or metaphorical. They spiritualized it absolutely, and held that the resurrection was a thing of the past. No resurrection was possible, so they taught, except from ignorance to knowledge, from sin to righteousness. There would be no day when the dead would hear the voice of Christ and come forth out of the grave. The Christian, knowing that Christ was raised from the dead, looked forward to the day when his body should be raised in the likeness of Christ's resurrection. But this faith was utterly denied by the teaching of Hymenaeus and Philetus. 2. How It This teaching of theirs, Paul tells us, Overthrew had overthrown the faith of some. It would also overthrow Christian faith altogether, for if the dead are not raised, neither is Christ risen from the dead, and "ye are yet in your sins" (1 Cor 15 17).

The denial of the resurrection of the body, whether of mankind generally or of Christ, is the overthrow of the faith. It leaves nothing to cling to, no living Christ, who saves and leads and comforts His people. The apostle proceeds to say that teaching of this kind "eats as doth a gangrene," and that it increases unto more ungodliness. As a canker or gangrene eats away the flesh, so does such teaching eat away Christian faith. Paul is careful to say, more than once, that the teaching which denies that there will be a resurrection of the dead leads inevitably to "ungodliness" and to "iniquity." See HYMENAËUS. PHILIP, fil'ip (Φίλιππος, Philippos, "lover of horses"):

(1) The father of Alexander the Great (1 Macc 1 1; 6 2), king of Macedonia in 359-336 BC. His influence for Greece and for mankind in general lay in hastening the decadence of the Gr city-state and in the preparations he left to Alexander for the diffusion throughout the world of the varied phases of Gr intellectual life.

(2) A Phrygian left by Antiochus Epiphanes as governor at Jerus (c 170 BC) and described in 2 Macc 5 22 as "more barbarous" than Antiochus himself, burning fugitive Jews who had assembled in caves near by "to keep the sabbath day secretly" (2 Macc 6 11) and taking special measures to check the opposition of Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 8 8). There is some ground for identifying him with—

(3) A friend or foster-brother of Antiochus (2 Macc 9 29), appointed by Antiochus on his death-bed as regent. Lysias already held the office of regent, having brought up the son of Antiochus from his youth, and on the death of his father set him up as king under the name of Eupator. The accounts of the rivalries of the regents and of the fate of Philip as recorded in 1 Macc 6 56; 2 Macc 9 29; Jos, Ant, XII, ix, 7, are not easily reconciled.

(4) Philip V, king of Macedonia in 220-179 BC. He is mentioned in 1 Macc 8 5 as an example of the great power of the Romans with whom Judas Maccabaeus made a league on conditions described (op. cit.). The conflict of Philip with the Romans coincided in time with that of Hannibal, after whose defeat at Zama the Romans were able to give undivided attention to the affairs of Macedonia. Philip was defeated by the Romans under Flaminius, at Cynoscephalae (197 BC), and compelled to accept the terms of the conquerors. He died in 179, and was succeeded by his son Perseus, last king of Macedonia, who lost his crown in his contest with the Romans. See PERSEUS. J. HUTCHISON

PHILIP (Φίλιππος, Philippos): One of the Twelve Apostles. Philip belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 1 44; 12 21). Along with Andrew and other fellow-townsmen, he had journeyed to Bethany to hear the teaching of John the Baptist, and there he received his first call from Christ, "Follow me" (Jn 1 43). Like Andrew, Philip immediately won a fresh follower, Nathanael, for Jesus (Jn 1 45). It is probable that he was present at most of the events recorded of Jesus' return journey from Bethany to Galilee, and that the information relating to these was supplied to St. John by him and St. Andrew (cf ANDREW). His first ordination to the Twelve is recorded in Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 14; Acts 1 13. At the feeding of the 5,000, Philip was asked the question by Jesus, "Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat?" (Jn 6 5-7). He was appealed to by the Greeks when they desired to interview Jesus at the Passover (Jn 12 20-33). During the address of Jesus to His disciples after the Last Supper, Philip made the request, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us" (Jn 14 8).

According to the "Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles," Philip was of the house of Zebulun (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50). Clement of Alexandria (Strom., iii.4, 25, and iv.9, 73) gives the tradition identifying him with the unknown disciple who asked permission to go and bury his father ere he followed Jesus (cf Mt 8 21; Lk 9 59), and says that he died a natural death. Owing to confusion with Philip the evangelist, there is much obscurity in the accounts of Apoc lit. concerning the earlier missionary activities of Philip the apostle. The "Acts of Philip" tell of a religious controversy between the apostle and a Judaean high priest before the philosophers of Athens. Later Lat documents mention Gaul (Galatia) as his field. As to his sending Joseph of Arimathea thence to Britain, see JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA. The evidence seems conclusive that the latter part of his life was spent in Phrygia. This is supported by Polycrates (bishop of Ephesus in the 2d cent.), who states that he died at Hierapolis, by Theodoret, and by the parts of the Contendings of the Apostles dealing with Philip. Thus according to, "The Preaching of St. Philip and St. Peter" (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 146), Phrygia was assigned to Philip as a mission field by the risen Christ when He appeared to the disciples on the Mount of Olives, and "The Martyrdom of St. Philip in Phrygia"

(Budge, II, 156) tells of his preaching, miracles and crucifixion there.

Philip was regarded in early times as the author of "The Gospel of Philip," a gnostic work of the 2d cent., part of which was preserved by Epiphanius (cf Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 40, 41). See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

As with Andrew, Philip's Gr name implies he had Gr connections, and this is strengthened by the fact that he acted as the spokesman of the Greeks at the Passover. Of a weaker mold than Andrew, he was yet the one to whom the Greeks would first appeal; he himself possessed an inquirer's spirit and could therefore sympathize with their doubts and difficulties. The practical, strong-minded Andrew was naturally the man to win the impetuous, swift-thinking Peter; but the slower Philip, versed in the Scriptures (cf Jn 1 45), appealed more to the critical Nathanael and the cultured Greeks. Cautious and deliberate himself, and desirous of submitting all truth to the test of sensuous experience (cf Jn 14 8), he concluded the same criterion would be acceptable to Nathanael also (cf Jn 1 46). It was the presence of this materialistic trend of mind in Philip that induced Jesus, in order to awaken in His disciple a larger and more spiritual faith, to put the question in Jn 6 6, seeking "to prove him." This innate diffidence which affected Philip's religious beliefs found expression in his outer life and conduct also. It was not merely modesty, but also a certain lack of self-reliance, that made him turn to Andrew for advice when the Greeks wished to see Jesus. The story of his later life is, however, sufficient to show that he overcame those initial defects in his character, and fulfilled nobly the charge that his risen Lord laid upon him (cf Mt 28 16-20).

PHILIP ("tetrarch," Lk 3 1). See HEROD.

PHILIP, THE EVANGELIST: One of "the seven" chosen to have the oversight of "the daily ministration" of the poor of the Christian community in Jerus (Acts 6 5). Whether Philip, bearing a Gr name, was a Hellenist, is not known, but his missionary work reveals to us one free from the religious prejudices of the strict Hebrew.

The martyrdom of Stephen was the beginning of a systematic persecution of the church in Jerus, and all except the apostles were scattered over Judaea and Samaria (Acts 8 1), and even as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch (11 19). Thus the influence of the new teaching was extended, and a beginning made to the missionary movement. The story of Philip's missionary labors is told in Acts 8 5 ff. He went to the chief city of Samaria, called Sebaste in honor of Augustus (Gr Sebastós). The Samaritans, of mixed Israelitish and gentile blood, had, in consequence of their being rigidly excluded from the Jewish church since the return from exile, built on Mt. Gerizim a rival sanctuary to the temple. To them Philip proclaimed the Christ and wrought signs, with the result that multitudes gave heed, and "were baptized, both men and women." They had been under the influence of a certain sorcerer, Simon, who himself also believed and was baptized, moved, as the sequel proved, by the desire to learn the secret of Philip's ability to perform miracles (see SIMON MAGUS). The apostles (Acts 8 14) at Jerus sanctioned the admission of Samaritans into the church by sending Peter and John, who not only confirmed the work of Philip, but also themselves preached in many Samaritan villages.

The next incident recorded is the conversion of a Gentile, who was, however, a worshipper of the God of Israel, a eunuch under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians. As he was returning from worshipping in the temple at Jerus, he was met by Philip on the road to Gaza. Philip expounded to him that portion of Isa 53 which he had been reading aloud as he sat in his chariot, and preached unto him Jesus. It is another sign of Philip's insight into the universality of Christianity that he baptized this eunuch who could not have been admitted to full membership in the Jewish church (Dt 23 1). See ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.

After this incident Philip went to Azotus (Ashdod), and then traveled north to Caesarea, preaching in the cities on his way. There he settled, for Luke records that Paul and his company abode in the house of Philip, "the evangelist," "one of the seven," for some days (Acts 21 8 ff.). This occurred more than 20 years after the incidents recorded in Acts 8. Both at this time and during Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, Luke had the opportunity of hearing about Philip's work from his own lips. Luke records that Philip had 4 daughters who were preachers (Acts 21 9).

The Jewish rebellion, which finally resulted in the fall of Jerus, drove many Christians out of Pal, and among them Philip and his daughters. One tradition connects Philip and his daughters with Hierapolis in Asia, but in all probability the evangelist is confounded with the apostle. Another tradition represents them as dwelling at Tralles, Philip being the first bishop of the Christian community.

PHILIPPI, fi-lip'i (Φίλιπποι, Philippoi, ethnic Φιλιππίσιος, Philippēsios, Phil 4 15): A city of Macedonia, situated in 41° 5' N. lat. and 24° 16' E. long. It lay on the Egnatian Road, 33 Rom miles from Amphipolis and 21 from Acontisma, in a plain bounded on the E. and N. by the mountains which lie between the rivers Zygactes and Nestus, on the W. by Mt. Pangaeus, on the S. by the ridge called in antiquity Symbolum, over which ran the road connecting the city with its seaport, NEAPOLIS (q.v.), 9 miles distant. This plain, a considerable part of which is marshy in modern, as in ancient, times, is connected with the basin of the Strymon by the valley of the Angites (Herodotus vii.113), which also bore the names Gangas or Gangites (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv.106), the modern Anghista. The ancient name of Philippi was Crenides (Strabo vii.331; Diodorus xvi.3, 8; Appian, Bell. Civ. iv.105; Stephanus Byz. s.v.), so called after the springs which feed the river and the marsh; but it was refounded by Philip II of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, and received his name.

Appian (Bell. Civ. iv.105) and Harpocration say that Crenides was afterward called Daton, and that this name was changed to Philippi.

2. History but this statement is open to question, since Daton, which became proverbial among the Greeks for good fortune, possessed, as Strabo tells us (vii.331 fr. 36), "admirably fertile territory, a lake, rivers, dockyards and productive gold mines," whereas Philippi lies, as we have seen, some 9 miles inland. Many modern authorities, therefore, have placed Daton on the coast at or near the site of Neapolis. On the whole, it seems best to adopt the view of Heuzey (Mission archéologique, 35, 62 ff) that Daton was not originally a city, but the whole district which lay immediately to the E. of Mt. Pangaeus, including the Philippian plain and the seacoast about Neapolis. On the site of the old foundation of Crenides, from which the Gr settlers had perhaps been driven out by the Thracians about a century previously, the Thasians in 360 BC founded their colony of Daton with the aid of the exiled Athenian statesman Callistratus, in order to exploit the wealth, both agricultural and mineral, of the neighborhood. To Philip, who ascended the Macedonian throne in 359 BC, the possession of this spot seemed of the utmost importance. Not only is the plain itself well watered and of extraordinary fertility, but a strongly fortified post planted here would secure the natural land-route from Europe to Asia and protect the eastern frontier of Macedonia against Thracian inroads. Above all, the mines of the district might meet his most pressing need, that of an abundant supply of gold. The site was therefore seized in 358, the city was enlarged, strongly fortified, and renamed, the Thasian settlers either driven out or reinforced, and the mines, worked with characteristic energy, produced over 1,000 talents a year (Diodorus xvi.8) and enabled Philip to issue a gold currency which in the West soon superseded the Persarics (G. F. Hill, Historical Greek Coins, 80 ff). The revenue thus obtained was of inestimable value to Philip, who not only used it for the development of the Macedonian army, but also proved himself a master of the art of bribery. His remark is well known that no fortress was impregnable to whose walls an ass laden with gold could be driven. Of the history of Philippi during the next 3 centuries we know practically nothing. Together with the rest of Macedonia, it passed into the Rom hands after the battle of Pydna (168 BC), and fell in the first of the four regions into which the country was then divided (Livy xlv.29). In 146 the whole of Macedonia was formed into a single Rom province. But the mines seem to have been almost, if not quite, exhausted by this time, and Strabo (vii.331 fr. 41) speaks of Philippi as having sunk by the time of Caesar to a "small settlement" (κατοικία μικρά, katoikia mikrá). In the autumn of 42 BC it witnessed the death-struggle of the Rom republic. Brutus and Cassius, the leaders of the band of conspirators who had assassinated Julius Caesar, were faced by Octavian, who 15 years later became the Emperor Augustus, and Antony. In the first engagement the army of Brutus defeated that of Octavian, while Antony's forces were victorious over those of Cassius, who in despair put an end to his life. Three weeks later the second and decisive conflict took place. Brutus was compelled by his impatient soldiery to give battle, his troops were routed and he himself fell on his own sword. Soon afterward Philippi was made a Rom colony with the title Colonia Iulia Philippensis. After the battle of Actium (31 BC) the colony was reinforced, largely by Ital. partisans of Antony who were dispossessed in order to afford allotments for Octavian's veterans (Dio Cassius li.4), and its name was changed to Colonia Augusta Iulia (Victrix) Philippensis. It received the much-coveted ius Italicum (Digest L. 15, 8), which involved numerous privileges, the chief of which was the immunity of its territory from taxation.

In the course of his second missionary journey Paul set sail from Troas, accompanied by Silas (who bears his full name Silvanus in

3. Paul's 2 Cor 1 19; 1 Thess 1 1; 2 Thess First Visit 1 1), Timothy and Luke, and on the following day reached Neapolis (Acts 16 11). Thence he journeyed by road to Philippi, first crossing the pass some 1,600 ft. high which leads over the mountain ridge called Symbolum and afterward traversing the Philippian plain. Of his experiences there we have in Acts 16 12-40 a singularly full and graphic account. On the Sabbath, presumably the first Sabbath after their arrival, the apostle and his companions went out to the bank of the Angites, and there spoke to the women, some of them Jews, others proselytes, who had come together for purposes of worship.

One of these was named Lydia, a Gr proselyte from Thyatira, a city of Lydia in Asia Minor, to the church of which was addressed the message recorded in Rev 2 18-29. She is described as a "seller of purple" (Acts 16 14), that is, of woolen fabrics dyed purple, for the manufacture of which her native town was famous. Whether she was the agent in Philippi of some firm in Thyatira or whether she was carrying on her trade independently, we cannot say; her name suggests the possibility that she was a freedwoman, while from the fact that we hear of her household and her house (ver 15; cf ver 40), though no mention is made of her husband, it has been conjectured that she was a widow of some property. She accepted the apostolic message and was baptized with her household (ver 15), and insisted that Paul and his companions should accept her hospitality during the rest of their stay in the city (see further LYDIA).

All seemed to be going well when opposition arose from an unexpected quarter. There was in the town a girl, in all probability a slave, who was reputed to have the power of oracular utterance. Herodotus tells us (vii.111) of an oracle of Dionysus situated among the Thracian tribe of the Satrae, probably not far from Philippi; but there is no reason to connect the soothsaying of this girl with that worship. In any case, her masters reaped a rich harvest from the fee charged for consulting her. Paul, troubled by her repeatedly following him and those with him crying, "These men are bondservants of the Most High God, who proclaim unto you a way of salvation" (Acts 16 17 m), turned and commanded the spirit in Christ's name to come out of her. The immediate restoration of the girl to a sane and normal condition convinced her masters that all prospect of further gain was gone, and they therefore seized Paul and Silas and dragged them into the forum before the magistrates, probably the duumviri who stood at the head of the colony. They accused the apostles of creating disturbance in the city and of advocating customs, the reception and practice of which were illegal for Rom citizens. The rabble of the market-place joined in the attack (ver 22), whereupon the magistrates, accepting without question the accusers' statement that Paul and Silas were Jews (ver 20) and forgetting or ignoring the possibility of their possessing Rom citizenship, ordered them to be scourged by the attendant lictors and afterward to be imprisoned. In the prison they were treated with the utmost rigor; they were confined in the innermost ward, and their feet put in the stocks. About midnight, as they were engaged in praying and singing hymns, while the other prisoners were listening to them, the building was shaken by a severe earthquake which threw open the prison doors. The jailer, who was on the point of taking his own life, reassured by Paul regarding the safety of the prisoners, brought Paul and Silas into his house where he tended their wounds, set food before them, and, after hearing the gospel, was baptized together with his whole household (vs 23-34).

On the morrow the magistrates, thinking that by dismissing from the town those who had been the cause of the previous day's disturbance they could best secure themselves against any repetition of the disorder, sent the lictors to the jailer with orders to release them. Paul refused to accept a dismissal of this kind. As Rom citizens he and Silas were legally exempt from scourging, which was regarded as a degradation (1 Thess 2 2), and the wrong was aggravated by the publicity of the punishment, the absence of a proper trial and the imprisonment which followed (Acts 16 37). Doubtless Paul had declared his citizenship when the scourging was inflicted, but in the confusion and excitement of the moment his protest had been unheard or unheeded. Now, however, it produced a deep impression on the magistrates, who came in person to ask Paul and Silas to leave the city. They, after visiting their hostess and encouraging the converts to remain firm in their new faith, set out by the Egnatian Road for Thessalonica (vs 38-40). How long they had stayed in Philippi we are not told, but the fact that the foundations of a strong and flourishing church had been laid and the phrase "for many days" (ver 18) lead us to believe that the time must have been a longer one than appears at first sight. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 226) thinks that Paul left Troas in October, 50 AD, and stayed at Philippi until nearly the end of the year; but this chronology cannot be regarded as certain.

Several points in the narrative of these incidents call for fuller consideration. (1) We may notice, first, the very small part played by Jews and Judaism at Philippi.

There was no synagogue here, as at Salamis in Cyprus (Acts 13 5), Antioch in Pisidia (13 14-43), Iconium (14 1), Ephesus (18 19-26; 19 8), Thessalonica (17 1), Beroea (17 10), Athens (17 17) and Corinth (18 4). The number of resident Jews was small, their meetings for prayer took place on the river's bank, the worshippers were mostly or wholly women (16 13), and among them some, perhaps a majority, were proselytes. Of Jewish converts we hear nothing, nor is there any word of Jews as either inciting or joining the mob which dragged Paul and Silas before the magistrates. Further, the whole tone of the ep. to this church seems to prove that here at least the apostolic teaching was not in danger of being undermined by Judaizers. True, there is one passage (Phil 3 2-7) in which Paul denounces "the concision," those who had "confidence in the flesh"; but it seems "that in this warning he was thinking of Rome more than of Philippi; and that his indignation was aroused rather by the vexatious antagonism which there thwarted him in his daily work, than by any actual errors already undermining the faith of his distant converts" (Lightfoot).

(2) Even more striking is the prominence of the Rom element in the narrative. We are here not in a Gr or Jewish city, but in one of those Rom colonies which Aulus Gellius describes as "miniatures and pictures of the Rom people" (Noctes Atticae, xvi.13).

In the center of the city is the forum (ἀγορά, agorá, ver 19), and the general term "magistrates" (ἀρχοντες, archontes, EV "rulers," ver 19) is exchanged for the specific title of praetors (στρατηγοί, stratēgoi, EV "magistrates," vs 20. 22.35.36.38); these officers are attended by lictors (παῖδουχοι, rhaddouchoi, EV "sergeants," vs 35.38) who bear the fascis with which they scourged Paul and Silas (παῖδιζοι, rhaddizo, ver 22). The charge is that of disturbing public order and introducing customs opposed to Rom law (vs 20.21), and Paul's appeal to his Rom civitas (ver 37) at once inspired the magistrates with fear for the consequences of their action and made them conciliatory and apologetic (vs 38.39). The title of praetor borne by these officials has caused some difficulty. The supreme magistrates of Rom colonies, two in number, were called duoviri or duumviri (iuri dicundo), and that this title was in use at Philippi is proved by three inscriptions (Orelli, No. 3746; Heuzey, Mission archéologique, 15, 127). The most probable explanation of the discrepancy is that these magistrates assumed the title of praetor, or that it was commonly applied to them, as was certainly the case in some parts of the Rom world (Cicero De lege agraria ii.34; Horace Sat. i.5, 34; Orelli, No. 3785).

(3) Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 200 ff) has brought forward the attractive suggestion that Luke was himself a Philippian, and that he was the "man of Macedonia" who appeared to Paul at Troas with the invitation to enter Macedonia (Acts 16 9).

In any case, the change from the 3d to the 1st person in ver 10 marks the point at which Luke joined the apostle, and the same criterion leads to the conclusion that Luke remained at Philippi between Paul's first and his third visit to the city (see below). Ramsay's hypothesis would explain (a) the fullness and vividness of the narrative of Acts 16 11-40; (b) the emphasis laid on the importance of Philippi (ver 12); and (c) the fact that Paul recognized as a Macedonian the man whom he saw in his vision, although there was nothing either in the language, features or dress of Macedonians to mark them out from other Greeks. Yet Luke was clearly not a householder at Philippi (ver 15), and early tradition refers to him as an Antiochene (see, however, Ramsay, op. cit. 389 f).

(4) Much discussion has centered round the description of Philippi given in Acts 16 12. The reading of \aleph A C, etc, followed by WH, RV, etc, is:

ἥτις ἐστὶν πρώτη τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πόλις κολωνία, ἥτις ἐστὶν πρὸς τὰς μερίδας Μακεδονίας πόλις κολωνία. But it is doubtful whether Makedonias is to be taken with the word which precedes or with that which follows, and further the sense derived from the phrase is unsatisfactory. For πρὸς must mean either (1) first in political importance and rank, or (2) the first which the apostle reached. But the capital of the province was Thessalonica, and if τὰς μερίδας be taken to refer to the easternmost of the 4 districts into which Macedonia had been divided in 168 BC (though there is no evidence that that division survived at this time), Amphipolis was its capital and was apparently still its most important city, though destined to be outstripped by Philippi somewhat later. Nor is the other rendering of πρὸς (adopted, e.g. by Lightfoot) more natural. It supposes that Luke reckoned Neapolis as belonging to Thrace, and the boundary of Macedonia as lying between Philippi and its seaport; moreover, the remark is singularly pointless; the use of ἐστὶν rather than ἐν is against this view, nor is πρὸς found in this sense without any qualifying phrase. Lastly, the τὰς in its present position is unnatural; in B it is placed after, instead of before, μερίδος, while D (the Bezan reviser) reads κεφαλὴ τῆς Μακεδονίας, κεφαλὴ τὰς Μακεδονίας. Of the emendations which have been suggested, we may notice three: (a) for μερίδος Hort has suggested Pieridos, "a chief city of Pierian Macedonia"; (b) for πρὸς τὰς we may read πρὸς τὴν, "which belongs to the first region of Macedonia"; (c) μερίδος may be regarded as a later insertion and struck out of the text, in which case the whole phrase will mean, "which is a city of Macedonia of first rank" (though not necessarily the first city).

Paul and Silas, then, probably accompanied by Timothy (who, however, is not expressly mentioned in Acts between 16 1 and 17 14), left

4. Paul's Later Visits Philippi for Thessalonica, but Luke apparently remained behind, for the "we" of Acts 16 10-17 does not appear again until 20 5, when Paul is once more leaving Philippi on his last journey to Jerus. The presence of the evangelist during the intervening 5 years may have had much to do with the strength of the Philippian church and its steadfastness in persecution (2 Cor 8 2; Phil 1 29.30). Paul himself did not revisit the city until, in the course of his third missionary journey, he returned to Macedonia, preceded by Timothy and Erastus, after a stay of over 2 years at Ephesus (Acts 19 22; 20 1). We are not definitely told that he visited Philippi on this occasion, but of the fact there can be little doubt, and it was probably there that he awaited the coming of Titus (2 Cor 2 13; 7 5.6) and wrote his 2d Ep. to the Corinthians (8 1 ff; 9 2-4). After spending 3 months in Greece, whence he intended to return by sea to Syria, he was led by a plot against his life to change his plans and return through Macedonia (Acts 20 3). The last place at which he stopped before crossing to Asia was Philippi, where he spent the days of unleavened bread, and from (the seaport of) which he sailed in company with Luke to Troas, where seven of his companions were awaiting him (20 4-6). It seems likely that Paul paid at least one further visit to Philippi in the interval between his first and second imprisonments. That he hoped to do so, he himself tells us (Phil 2 24), and the journey to Macedonia mentioned in 1 Tim 1 3 would probably include a visit to Philippi, while if, as many authorities hold, 2 Tim 4 13 refers to a later stay at Troas, it may well be connected with a further and final tour in Macedonia. But the intercourse between the apostle and this church of his founding was not limited to these rare visits. During Paul's first stay at Thessalonica he had received gifts of money on two occasions from the Philippian Christians (Phil 4 16), and their kindness had been repeated after he left Macedonia for Greece (2 Cor 11 9;

Phil 4 15). Again, during his first imprisonment at Rome the Philippians sent a gift by the hand of one of their number, Epaphroditus (Phil 2 25; 4 10.14-19), who remained for some time with the apostle, and finally, after a serious illness which nearly proved fatal (2 27), returned home bearing the letter of thanks which has survived, addressed to the Philippian converts by Paul and Timothy (1 1). The latter intended to visit the church shortly afterward in order to bring back to the imprisoned apostle an account of its welfare (2 19.23), but we do not know whether this plan was actually carried out or not. We cannot, however, doubt that other letters passed between Paul and this church besides the one which is extant, though the only reference to them is a disputed passage of Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians (iii.2), where he speaks of "letters" (ἐπιστολαί, epistolai) as written to them by Paul (but see Lightfoot's note on Phil 3 1).

After the death of Paul we hear but little of the church or of the town of Philippi. Early in the 2d

5. Later History of the Church cent. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, was condemned as a Christian and was taken to Rome to be thrown to the wild beasts. After passing through Philadelphia, Smyrna and Troas, he reached Philippi. The Christians there showed him every mark of affection and respect, and after his departure wrote a letter of sympathy to the Antiochene church and another to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, requesting him to send them copies of any letters of Ignatius which he possessed. This request Polycarp fulfilled, and at the same time sent a letter to the Philippians full of encouragement, advice and warning. From it we judge that the condition of the church as a whole was satisfactory, though a certain presbyter, Valens, and his wife are severely censured for their avarice which belied their Christian profession. We have a few records of bishops of Philippi, whose names are appended to the decisions of the councils held at Sardica (344 AD), Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451), and the see appears to have outlived the city itself and to have lasted down to modern times (Le Quien, Oriens Christ., II, 70; Neale, Holy Eastern Church, I, 92). Of the destruction of Philippi no account has come down to us. The name was perpetuated in that of the Turkish hamlet Felibedjik, but the site is now uninhabited, the nearest village being that of Raktcha among the hills immediately to the N. of the ancient acropolis. This latter and the plain around are covered with ruins, but no systematic excavation has yet been undertaken. Of the extant remains the most striking are portions of the Hellenic and Hellenistic fortification, the scanty vestiges of the theater, the ruin known among the Turks as Derekler, "the columns," which perhaps represents the ancient thermae, traces of a temple of Silvanus with numerous rock-cut reliefs and inscriptions, and the remains of a triumphal arch (Kiemer).

I. Paul and the Church at Philippi.—Paul was on his second missionary journey in the year 52 AD. He felt that he was strangely thwarted in many of his plans. He had had a most distressing illness in Galatia. The Spirit would not permit him to preach in Asia, and when he essayed to enter Bithynia the Spirit again would not suffer it. Baffled and perplexed, the apostle with his two companions, Silas and Timothy, went on to the seacoast and stopped in Troas. Here at last his leading became clear. A vision of a man from Macedonia convinced him that it was the will of God that he should preach in the western continent of Europe. The way was opened at once. The winds were favorable. In two days he came to Neapolis. At once he took the broad paved way of the Via Egnatia up to the mountain pass and down on the other side to Philippi, a journey of some 8 miles. There was no synagogue at Philippi, but a little company of Jews gathered for Sabbath worship at "a place of prayer" (προσευχή, proseuchē, Acts 16 13), about a mile to the W. of the city gate on the shore of the river Gangites (see PROSEUCHA). Paul and his companions talked to the women gathered there, and Lydia was converted. Later, a maid with the spirit of divination was exorcised. Paul and Silas were scourged and thrown into prison, an earthquake set them free, the jailer became a believer, the magistrates repented their treatment of men who were Rom citizens and besought them to leave the city (Acts 16 6-40). Paul had had his first experience of a Rom scourging and of lying in the stocks of a Rom prison here at Philippi, yet he went on his way rejoicing, for a company of disciples had been formed, and he had won the devotion of loyal and loving hearts for himself and his Master (see PHILIPPI). That was worth all the persecution and the pain. The Christians at Philippi seem to have been Paul's favorites among all his converts. He never lost any opportunity of visiting them and refreshing his spirit with their presence in the after-years. Six years later he was resident in Ephesus, and having sent Titus to Corinth with a letter to the Corinthians and being in doubt as to the spirit in which it would be received, he appointed a meeting with Titus in Macedonia, and probably spent the anxious days of his waiting at Philippi. If he met Titus there, he may have written 2 Cor in that city (2 Cor 2 13; 7 6). Paul returned to Ephesus, and after the riot in that city he went over again into Macedonia and made his third visit to Philippi. He probably promised the Philippians at this time that he would return to Philippi to celebrate the Easter week with his beloved converts there. He went on into Greece, but in 3 months he was back again, at the festival of the resurrection in the year 58 AD (Acts 20 2.6). We read in 1 Tim 1 3 that Paul visited Macedonia after the Rom imprisonment. He enjoyed himself among the Philippians. They were Christians after his own heart. He thanks God for their fellowship from the first day until now (Phil 1 5). He declares that they are his beloved who have always obeyed, not in his presence only, but much more in his absence (2 12). With fond repetition he addresses them as his brethren, beloved and longed for, his joy and crown, his beloved (4 1). This was Paul's favorite church, and we can gather from the ep. good reason for this fact.

II. Characteristics of the Church at Philippi.—

(1) It seems to be the least Jewish of all the Pauline churches. There were few Jews in Philippi. No Heb names are found in the list of converts in this church mentioned in the NT. The Jewish opponents of Paul seem never to have established themselves in this community. (2) Women seem to be unusually prominent in the history of this church, and this is consistent with what we know concerning the position accorded to woman in Macedonian society. Lydia brings her whole family with her into the church. She must have been a very influential woman, and her own fervor and devotion and generosity and hospitality seem to have been contagious and to have become characteristic of the whole Christian community. Euodia and Syntyche are mentioned in the ep., two women who were fellow-laborers with Paul in the gospel, for both of whom he has great respect, of both of whom he is sure that their names are written in the book of life, but who seem to have differed with each other in some matter of opinion. Paul exhorts them to be of the same mind in the Lord (4 2). The prominence of women in the congregation at Philippi or the dominance of Lydia's influence among them may account for the fact that they seem to have been more mindful of Paul's comfort than any of his other converts were. They raised money for Paul's support and forwarded it to him again and again. They were anxious that he should have all that was needful. They were willing to give of their time and their means to that end. There seem to have been no theological differences in their company. That may testify to the fact that the most of them were women. (3) There were splendid men in the church membership too. Some of them were Macedonians and some of them were Rom veterans.

Hausrath declares that the Macedonians represented the "noblest and soundest part of the ancient world. . . . Here was none of the shuffling and the indecision of the Asiatics, none of the irritable vanity and the uncertain levity of the Gr communities. . . . They were men of sterner mold than could be found in Asia Minor or languorous Syria. The material was harder to work in, and offered more stubborn resistance; but the work, once done, endured. A new Macedonian phalanx was formed here, a phalanx of Pauline Christians. . . . Manliness, loyalty, firmness, their characteristics in general history, are equally their characteristics in the history of the Christian church. . . . They were always true to Paul, always obedient, always helpful" (Time of the Apostles, III, 203-4).

Paul rejoiced in them. They were spirits congenial with his own. The Rom veterans had been trained in the Rom wars to hardness and discipline and loyalty. They were Rom citizens and proud of the fact. In the ep. Paul exhorts them to behave as citizens worthy of the gospel of Christ (1 27), and he reminds them that though they were proud of their Rom citizenship, as was he, they all had become members of a heavenly commonwealth, citizenship in which was a much greater boon than even the jus Italicum had been. In 3 20 Paul states the fact again, "Our citizenship is in heaven"; and he goes on to remind them that their King is seated there upon the throne and that He is coming again to establish a glorious empire, for He has power to subject all things unto Himself.

It is to these old soldiers and athletes that Paul addresses his military and gymnastic figures of speech. He informs them that the whole praetorian guard had heard of the gospel through his imprisonment at Rome (1 13). He sends them greeting from the saints that are in Caesar's household (4 22). He prays that he may hear of them that they stand fast like an immovable phalanx, with one soul striving athletically for the faith of the gospel (1 27). He knows that they will be fearless and brave, in nothing affrighted by the adversaries (1 28). He speaks of his own experience as a wrestling-match, a conflict or contest (1 30). He joys in the sacrifice and service of their faith (2 17). He calls Epaphroditus not only his fellow-worker but his fellow-soldier (2 25). He likens the Christian life to a race in which he presses on toward the goal unto the prize (3 14). He asks the Philippians to keep even, soldierly step with him in the Christian walk (3 16). These metaphors have their appeal to an athletic and military race, and they bear their testimony to the high regard which Paul had for this type of Christianity and for those in whose lives it was displayed. We do not know the names of many of these men, for only Clement and Epaphroditus are mentioned here; but we gather much concerning their spirit from this ep., and we are as sure as Paul himself that their names are all written in the book of life (4 3).

(4) If the constituent elements of the church at Philippi fairly represented the various elements of the population of the city, they must have been cosmopolitan in character. Philippi was an old Macedonian city which had been turned into a Rom colony. It was both Gr and Rom in its characteristics. Christianity had been introduced here by two Jews, who were Rom citizens, and a Jewish son of a gentile father. In the account given of the founding of the church in Acts 16 three converts are mentioned, and one is a Jewish proselyte from Asia, one a native Greek, and one a Rom official. The later converts doubtless represented the same diversity of nationality and the same differences in social position. Yet, apart from those two good women, Euodia and Syntyche, they were all of one mind in the Lord. It is a remarkable proof of the fact that in Christ all racial and social conditions may be brought into harmony and made to live together in peace. (5) They were a very liberal people. They gave themselves to the Lord and to Paul (2 Cor 8 5), and whenever they could help Paul or further the work of the gospel they gave gladly and willingly and up to the limit of their resources; and then they hypothecated their credit and gave beyond their power (2 Cor 8 3). Even Paul was astonished at their giving. He declares that they gave out of much affliction and deep poverty, that they abounded in their bounty, and that they were rich only in their liberality (2 Cor 8 2).

Surely these are unusual encomiums. The Philippians must have been a very unusual people. If the depth of one's consecration and the reality of one's religion are to be measured by the extent to which they affect the disposition of one's material possessions, if one measure of Christian love is to be found in Christian giving, then the Philippians may well stand supreme among the saints in the Pauline churches. Paul seems to have loved them most. He loved them enough to allow them to contribute toward his support. Elsewhere he refused any help of this sort, and steadfastly adhered to his plan of self-support while he was preaching the gospel. He made the single exception in the case of the Philippians. He must have been sure of their affection and of their confidence. Four times they gave Paul pecuniary aid. Twice they sent him their contributions just after he had left them and gone on to Thessalonica (4 15, 16). When Paul had proceeded to Corinth and was in want during his ministry there his heart was gladdened by the visitation of brethren from Philippi, who supplied the measure of his want (2 Cor 11 8, 9). It was not a first enthusiasm, forgotten as soon as the engaging personality of the apostle was removed from their sight. It was not merely a personal attachment that prompted their gifts. They gave to their own dear apostle, but only that he might minister to others as he had ministered to them. He was their living link with the work in the mission field.

Eleven years passed by, and the Philippians heard that Paul was in prison at Rome and again in need of their help. Eleven years are enough to make quite radical changes in a church membership, but there seems to have been no change in the loyalty or the liberality of the Philippian church in that time. The Philippians hastened to send Epaphroditus to Rome with their contributions and their greetings. It was like a bouquet of fresh flowers in the prison cell. Paul writes this ep. to thank them that their thought for him had blossomed afresh at the first opportunity they had had (4 10). No wonder that Paul loved them and was proud of them and made their earnestness and sincerity and affection the standard of comparison with the love of others (2 Cor 8 8).

III. Characteristics of the Epistle.—It is a letter. It is not a treatise, as Rom, He, and 1 Jn are. It is not an encyclical full of general observations and exhortations capable of application at any time and anywhere, as the Ep. to the Eph and the Ep. of James and the Epp. of Peter are. It is a simple letter to personal friends. It has no theological discussions and no rigid outline and no formal development. It rambles along just as any real letter would with personal news and personal feelings and outbursts of personal affection between tried friends. It is the most spontaneous and unaffected of the Pauline Epp. It is more epistolary than any of the others addressed to the churches.

It is a letter of love. All of the other epp. have mixed feelings manifest in them. Sometimes a feeling of grief and of indignation is domi-

1. A Letter of Love nant, as in 2 Cor. Sometimes the uppermost desire of Paul in his writing seems to be the establishment of the truth against the assault of its foes, as in Gal and Rom. Always more or less fault is suggested in the recipients of the warnings and the exhortations Paul feels compelled to write to them. In Philippi alone there is no fault to be found. The only suggestion of such a thing is in the reference to the difference of opinion between Euodia and Syntyche, and while Paul thinks this ought to be harmonized, he does not seem to consider it any very serious menace to the peace of the church. Aside from this Paul has nothing but praise for his beloved brethren and prayer that their love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all discernment (1 9). He is full of thankfulness upon all his remembrance of them (1 3). He rejoices in the privilege of being offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith (2 17). The church at Philippi may not have been conspicuous in charisms as the church at Corinth was, but it had the fruits of the Spirit in rich measure. Paul seems to think that it needed only to rejoice in its spiritual possessions and to grow in grace and in the mind of Christ. His heart is full of gratitude and love as he writes. He rejoices as he thinks of them. His peace and his hope are triumphant over present affliction and the prospect of persecution and death. If this is his last will and testament to his beloved church, as Holtzmann calls it, he has nothing to bequeath them but his unqualified benediction. Having loved them from the first, he loves them to the end.

It is a letter of joy. It was Bengel who said, Summa epistolae: gaudeo, gaudete, "The sum of the ep. is, I rejoice; rejoice ye." Paul

3. A Letter of Joy was a man whose spirits were undaunted in any circumstances. He might be scourged in one city and stoned in another and imprisoned in a third and left for dead in a fourth, but as long as he retained consciousness and as soon as he regained consciousness he rejoiced. Nothing could dampen his ardor. Nothing could disturb his peace. In Philippi he had been scourged and cast into the inner prison and his feet had been made fast in the stocks, but at midnight he and Silas were singing hymns of praise to God. He is in prison now in Rome, but he is still rejoicing. Some men would have been discouraged in such circumstances. Wherever Paul had gone his preaching had been despised, and he had been persecuted. The Jews had slandered him and harassed him, and so many of his converts had proved to be fickle and false. The years had gone by and the breach between him and his brethren had widened rather than lessened, and at last they had succeeded in getting him into prison and keeping him there for years. Prison life is never pleasant, and it was far less so in that ancient day than it is now.

Paul was such an ardent spirit. It was more difficult for him to be confined than it would be for a more indolent man. He was a world-missionary, a restless cosmopolite ranging up and down through the continents with the message of the Christ. It was like putting an eagle into a cage to put him into prison. Many eagles would die in imprisonment. Paul was not moping. He was writing this Ep. to the Phil and saying to them, "The things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the progress of the gospel . . . therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (1 12.18). His enemies were free to do and to say what they pleased, and they were making the most of the opportunity. He could no longer thwart or hinder them. Some men would have broken out into loud lamentations and complaints. Some men would have worried about the conditions and would have become nervous about the outcome of the cause. The faith of even John the Baptist failed in prison. He could not believe that things were going right if he were not there to attend to them. Paul's faith never wavered. His hope never waned. His joy was inexhaustible and perennial. He was never anxious. Did he hear the sentry's step pacing up and down the corridor before his prison door? It reminded him of the peace of God which passeth all understanding, guarding his heart and his thoughts in Christ Jesus (4 7), standing sentry there night and day. The keynote of this ep. is "Rejoice in the Lord always: again I will say, Rejoice" (4 4).

Paul is old and worn and in prison, but some 20 t in the course of this short letter to the Philippians he uses the words, joy, rejoice, peace, content, and thanksgiving. It is a letter full of love and full of joy.

It is of great importance theologically. It is one of the paradoxes to which we become almost accustomed in Paul's writings that this simplest of his letters, most epistolary and most personal throughout, should yet contain the fullest and most important putting of the theology of the incarnation and exaltation that came from his pen. He has only a practical end

4. Importance Theologically

in view. He is exhorting the Philippians to humility, and he says to them, "Have the mind which was in Christ who emptied himself and then was exalted" (2 5-11). It is the most theological passage in the ep. It is one of the most doctrinally important in the NT. It is Paul's final contribution to the solution of the great mystery of the coming of the Saviour and the economy of salvation. It is his last word, at any length, on this subject. He states plainly the fact of the kenosis, the morale of the redemption, the certainty of the exaltation, and the sure hope of the universal adoration in the end. The most vital truths of Christology are here clearly stated and definitely formulated for all time. Jesus was a real man, not grasping at any of the attributes of Deity which would be inconsistent with real and true humanity, but in whole-hearted surrender of sacrifice submitting to all the disabilities and limitations necessary to the incarnate conditions. He was equal with God, but He emptied Himself of the omnipotence and the omniscience and the omnipresence of His pre-incarnate state, and was found in form as a man, a genuine man obedient to God in all His life. He always maintained that attitude toward God which we ought to maintain and which we can maintain in our humanity, in which He was on an equality with us. We ought to have the mind which was in Christ. He humbled Himself and became obedient. He was obedient through life and obedient unto death, yea, even unto the death of the cross. It is a great passage, setting forth profoundest truths in the tersest manner. It is the crowning revelation concerning Jesus in the Pauline Epp. It represents Paul's most mature thought upon this theme. See KENOSIS.

IV. Genuineness of the Epistle.—The genuineness of the ep. is very generally admitted today. It was in the Canon of Marcion. Its name occurs in the list on the Muratorian Fragment. It is found in both the Pesh and the Old Lat VSS. It is mentioned by Polycarp and quoted in the letter of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, in the Ep. of Diognetus, and in the writings of Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria. Baur made a determined attack upon its authenticity. He declared that it was not doctrinal and polemical like the other Pauline Epp., but that it was full of shallow imitations of these. He said it had no apparent motive and no connected argument and no depth of thought. He questioned some of the historical data and suspected gnostic influence in certain passages. Bleek said of Baur's arguments that they were partly derived from a perverted interpretation of certain passages in the ep.; they partly rested upon arbitrary historical presuppositions; and some of them were really so weak that it was hard to believe that he could have attached any importance to them himself. It is not surprising that few critics have been found willing to follow Baur's leadership at this point. Biederman, Kneucker, Hinsch, Hitzig, Hoekstra, and Holsten may be mentioned among them. The genuineness of the ep. has been defended by Weizsäcker, Weiss, Pfleiderer, Jülicher, Klöpper, Schenkel, Reuss, Hilgenfeld, Harnack, Holtzmann, Mangold, Lipsius, Renan, Godet, Zahn, Davidson, Lightfoot, Farrar, McGiffert, and practically all of the Eng. writers on the subject. Weizsäcker says that the reasons for attributing the ep. to the apostle Paul are "overwhelming." McGiffert declares: "It is simply inconceivable that anyone else would or could have produced in his name a letter in which no doctrinal or ecclesiastical motive can be discovered, and in which the personal element so largely predominates and the character of the man and the apostle is revealed with so great vividness and fidelity. The ep. deserves to rank alongside of Gal, Cor, and Rom as an undoubted product of Paul's pen, and as a coordinate standard by which to test the genuineness of other and less certain writings" (The Apostolic Age, 393). This is the practically unanimous conclusion of modern scholarship.

V. Place, Date and Occasion of Writing.—This is one of the prison epp. (see PHILEMON). Paul makes frequent reference to his bonds (1 7.13.14.17). He was for 2 years a prisoner in Caesarea (Acts 24 27). Paulus and others have thought that the ep. was written during this imprisonment; but the references to the praetorian guard and the members of Caesar's household have led most critics to conclude that the Rom imprisonment was the one to which the ep. refers. Philem, Col and Eph were also written during the Rom imprisonment, and these three form a group by themselves. Phil is evidently separated from them by some interval. Was it written earlier or later than they? Bleek, Lightfoot, Sanday, Hort, Beet and others think that the Ep. to the Phil was written first. We prefer, however, to agree with Zahn, Ramsay, Findlay, Shaw, Vincent, Jülicher, Holtzmann, Weiss, Godet, and others, who argue for the writing of Phil toward the close of the Rom imprisonment.

Their reasons are as follows: (1) We know that some considerable time must have elapsed after Paul's arrival at Rome before he could have written this ep.; for the news of his arrival had been carried to Philippi and a contribution to his needs had been raised among his friends there, and Epaphroditus had carried it to Rome. In Rome, Epaphroditus had become seriously sick and the news of this sickness had been carried back to Philippi and the Philippians had sent back a message of sympathy to him. At least four trips between Rome and Philippi are thus indicated, and there are intervals of greater or less length between them. The distance between the two cities was some 700 miles. Communication was easy by the Appian Way and Trajan's Way to Brundisium and across the narrow straits there to the Egnatian Way, which led directly to Philippi. There were many making the trip at all times, but the journey would occupy a month at least, and the four journeys suggested in the ep. were not in direct succession. (2) Paul says that through him Christ had become known throughout the whole praetorian guard (1 13). It must have taken some time for this to become possible. (3) The conditions outside the prison, where Christ was being preached, by some in a spirit of love, and by others in a spirit of faction, cannot be located in the earliest months of Paul's sojourn in Rome (1 15-17). They must belong to a time when Christianity had developed in the city and parties had been formed in the church. (4) Luke was well known at Philippi. Yet he sends no salutation to the Philippians in this ep. He would surely have done so if he had been with Paul at the time of its writing. He was with the apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, and so was Demas (Col 4 14). In this ep. Paul promises to send Timothy to Philippi, and says, "I have no man like-minded, who will care truly for your state" (2 20). This must mean that Aristarchus, Demas and Luke were all gone. They had all been with him when he wrote the other epp. (5) His condition as a prisoner seems to have changed for the worse. He had enjoyed comparative liberty for the first 2 years of his imprisonment at Rome, living in his own hired house and accessible to all his friends. He had now been removed, possibly to the guardroom of the praetorian cohort. Here he was in more rigorous confinement, in want and alone. (6) Paul writes as if he thought that his case would be decided soon (2 23.24). He seems to be facing his final trial. He is not sure of its outcome. He may die a martyr's death, but he expects to be acquitted and then to be at liberty to do further missionary work. This was not his immediate expectation when he wrote the other epp., and therefore they would seem to be earlier than this. (7) The ep. is addressed to all the saints in Philippi, with the bishops and deacons (1 1). These official titles do not occur in any earlier epp., but they are found in the Pastoral Epp., which were written still later. Therefore they link the Ep. to the Phil with the later rather than the earlier epp.

From these indications we conclude that this is the last of Paul's Epp. to the churches. Hilgenfeld calls this the swan song of the great apostle. In it Paul has written his last exhortations and warnings, his last hopes and prayers for his converts to the Christian faith. Its date must be somewhere toward the close of the Rom imprisonment, in the year 63 or 64 AD. Epaphroditus had brought the contribution of the Philippians to Paul in Rome. He had plunged into the work there in rather reckless fashion, risking his life and contracting a malarial fever or some other serious sickness; but his life had been spared in answer to the prayers of Paul and his friends. Now Paul sends him back to Philippi, though he knows that he will be very lonely without him; and he sends with him this letter of acknowledgment of their gift, filled with commendation and encouragement, gratitude and love.

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—The ep. is not capable of any logical analysis. Its succession of thought may be represented as follows: (1) Address (1 1-2). (2) Thanksgiving and prayer (1 3-11): Paul is thankful for their fellowship and confident of their perfection. He longs for them and prays that their love may be wise to discriminate among the most excellent things and that they may be able to choose the very best, until they are filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, unto the glory and the praise of God. (3) Information concerning his own experience (1 12-30): (a) His evangelism (vs 12-14): Everything had turned out well. Paul is in prison, but he has been indefatigable in his evangelism. He has been chained to a soldier, but that has given him many an opportunity for personal and private and prolonged conversation. When the people have gathered to hear, the guard has listened perforce; and when the crowd was gone, more than once the soldier has seemed curious and interested and they have talked on about the Christ. Paul has told his experience over and over to these men, and his story has been carried through the whole camp. (b) His tolerance (vs 15-18): Not only has the gospel found unexpected furtherance inside the prison walls, but through the whole city the brethren have been emboldened by Paul's success to preach Christ, some through faction and envy and strife, and some through love. Paul rejoices that Christ is preached, whether by his enemies or by his friends. He would much prefer to have the gospel presented as he himself preached it, but he was great-souled and broad-minded enough to tolerate differences of opinion and method among brethren in Christ. "In every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (1 18). This is one of the noblest utterances of one of the greatest of men. Paul is sorry that everybody does not see things just exactly as he does, but he rejoices if they glorify Christ and would not put the least hindrance in their way. (c) His readiness for life or death (vs 19-26): Paul says, Give me liberty or give me death; it will be Christ either way. To live is to work for Christ; to die is to be with Christ. "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Here is Paul's soliloquy in the face of possible martyrdom or further missionary labors.

We are reminded of Hamlet's soliloquy in Shakespeare. "To be or not to be"—that is the question with both Hamlet and Paul. Hamlet weighs evils against evils and chooses the lesser evils in sheer cowardice in the end. Paul weighs blessings against blessings, the blessings of life for Christ and the blessings of death with Christ, and chooses the lesser blessings in pure unselfishness in the end. They both choose life, but the motives of their choice are radically different; and Paul lives with rejoicing while Hamlet lives in despair and in shame. The aged apostle would rather die than live, but he would rather live than die before his work was done.

(d) His example (vs 27-30): Paul was a Rom citizen and so were they. He tried to live worthy of his citizenship and so must they. He had a still higher ambition, that he and they might live as citizens worthy of the gospel of Christ. He fought as a good soldier. He stood fast in the faith. He was in nothing affrighted by the adversaries. Let them follow his example. They were engaged in the same conflict. To them it had been granted to believe and to suffer in the behalf of Christ. Their faith was not of themselves; it was the gift of God. Their suffering was not self-chosen; it too was a gift of God. (4) Exhortation to follow the example of Christ (2 1-18): Let the Philippians have the mind and spirit of Jesus, and Paul will rejoice to pour out his life as a libation upon the sacrifice and service of their faith. (5) Reasons for sending Timothy and Epaphroditus to them (2 19-30). (6) Paul's example (3 1-21):

(a) In the repudiation of all confidence in the flesh (vs 1-7): There are certain dogs and evil workers who belong to the old Jewish persuasion who glory in the flesh. Paul does not. He glories in Christ Jesus and has no confidence in the flesh. He has much reason to be proud of his past, for he would rank high on his record among them. He was of the stock of Israel, the prince with God. He belonged to the race of those who wrestled with God and got the victory. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, the only one of the patriarchs born in the Chosen Land. The first king of Israel had been chosen from this tribe. It alone had been faithful to the house of David at the time of the Great Schism. It held the place of honor in the militant host of the Israelites (Jgs 5 14; Hos 5 8). It was a matter of pride to belong to this singly faithful and signally honored tribe. He was a Hebrew of Hebrews, and he belonged to that sect among the Hebrews that was notorious for its scrupulous observance of all the religious ritual, for its patriotism and zeal, for its piety and devotion. Among these Pharisees he was conspicuous for his enthusiasm. He was the chosen instrument of the Sanhedrin to persecute and annihilate the Christian church. No one could find fault with his legal righteousness. He claimed to be blameless as judged by their standard. That was his record. Who has any better one, in pedigree or in piety? All of these things Paul counts but loss for Christ. (b) In the maintenance and pursuit of spiritual perfection (vs 8-16). The word "perfect" is used twice in this paragraph. We read: "Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect; but I press on." Many of the authorities quote these words as indicative of Paul's humility in disclaiming any present perfection of character while he avows his purpose to strive on toward perfection as long as he lives. Such an interpretation is wholly aside from Paul's thought. He is not talking about perfection in patience and peace and devotion and character. That perfection he claims for himself and for the Philippians in this paragraph toward the close: "Let us therefore, as many as are perfect, be thus minded." The perfection of which he speaks earlier is the perfection possible in the resurrection life of the saints in bliss. He has not attained unto the resurrection from the dead and is not perfect with the perfection of heaven. That is the goal of his endeavor. He presses on to that mark. In the meantime he maintains that perfection of consecration and of faith that results in present Christian perfection of character and which is the only guaranty of that perfection to be revealed to those who attain unto the resurrection from the dead. (c) In heavenly citizenship (vs 17-21): Paul walks with his mind on heavenly things. There are those who mind earthly things. They are enemies of the cross, but he has sworn eternal allegiance to the cross. Their end is perdition, while his end is sure salvation. Their god is the belly, while his goal is the perfection of the spirit. Their glory is in their shame, while his glory is in Christ alone. "Brethren, be ye imitators together of me, and mark them that so walk even as ye have us for an example." Then "The Lord . . . shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation," the body of our earthly pilgrimage, the body that so often fails the racer to the goal and cannot keep up with the desire of his spirit, and will conform it "to the body of his glory," the perfect body of those who have attained to the resurrection of the dead. It is not "our vile body" that is to be changed. That gives a false sense in modern Eng. The body is not vile, and the Bible nowhere says that it is. It was Manichean or neo-Platonic heresy that matter was evil and the body vile. Plotinus blushed that he had a body; Jesus never did. The Christian will honor the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. It was the vehicle of the incarnation, and he honors it for that. Yet the body prepared for Jesus was the body of His humiliation. It bound Him to the earth. It wearied when He was most anxious to work. It failed Him when He most needed strength. Paul says that our bodies are like the body of Jesus of Nazareth now, and they shall be like the body of our risen Lord in due time.

(7) A series of short exhortations (4 1-9): This series ends with the command, "The things which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me, these things do: and the God of peace shall be with you." All these exhortations, then, are based upon his own conduct and experience and example. They had seen the embodiment of these things in him. They were to be imitators of him in their obedience to them. Therefore as we read them we have side-lights thrown upon the character of the apostle who had taught and preached and practised these things.

What do they tell us concerning the apostle Paul? (a) His steadfastness and his love for his friends (ver 1): He had a genius for friendship. He bound his friends to him with cords of steel. They were ready to sacrifice anything for him. The reason for that was that he sacrificed everything for them, and that he had such an overflowing love for them that his love begot love in them. They could depend upon him. (b) His sympathy with all good men and all good women and his desire that they live in peace (vs 2,3): The true yoke-fellow mentioned here cannot be identified now. He has been variously named by the critics, as Epaphroditus, Barnabas, Luke, Silas, Timothy, Peter, and Christ. There may be a proper name in the phrase, either Genisius or Syzygus. We are wholly ignorant as to whom Paul meant. (c) His constant rejoicing in the Lord (ver 4). (d) His sweet reasonableness ("moderation," AV, RV "forbearance," ver 5): So Matthew Arnold translates the Gr noun here. Tindale called it courtesy. It is a combination of forbearance and graciousness, of modesty and courtesy, of consideration and esteem such as was characteristic of Christ. Paul had it. There was a sweet reasonableness about him that made his personality a most winning and attractive one. (e) His freedom from anxiety (vs 6,7): Paul's fearless confidence was born on the one hand from his assurance that the Lord was near, and on the other from his faith in prayer. It passed all understanding how Paul was kept from all anxiety. It was the power of prayer that did it. It was the peace of God that did it. It was the Lord at hand who did it. (f) His habitual high thinking (ver 8): All that was worthy in the ideals of the Gr philosophers Paul made the staple of his thought. He delighted in things true and honorable and just and pure and lovely and of good report. He knew that virtue was in these things and that all praise belonged to them. He had learned that while his mind was filled with these things he lived in serenity and peace.

(8) Thanks for their gift (4 10-20). (9) Salutations (4 21,22). (10) Benediction (4 23). This is not a theological ep. and therefore it is not an esp. Christological one. Yet we count the name of Christ 42 t in this short letter, and the pronouns referring to Him are many more. Paul cannot write anything without writing about Christ. He ends: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit." The spirit of Christ and the grace of Christ are in the entire ep.

PHILISTIA, fi-lis'ti-a: The country is referred to under various designations in the OT: viz. פְּלִשְׁתִּים, p'lesheth (Philistia) (Ps 60 8 [Heb 10]; 87 4), אֶרֶץ פְּלִשְׁתִּים, 'ereṣ p'lishitim, "land of the Philistines" (Gen 21 32,34), גְּלוֹת הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים, g'loth ha-p'lishitim; LXX gē tōn Phulistiēim, "the regions of the Philistines" (Josh 13 2). The Egyp monuments have Puirsatha, Pulsath (Budge), Peleset (Breasted) and Purasati (HGHL), according to the different vowelings of the radicals; the Assyr form is Palastu or Pilistu, which corresponds very closely to the Egyp and the Heb. The extent of the land is indicated in Josh 13 2 as being from the Shihor, or Brook of Egypt (RV), to the border of Ekron, northward. The eastern border was along the Judæan foothills on the line of Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 9) with the sea on the W. It was a very small country, from 25 to 30 miles in length and with an average width of about half the length, but it was fertile, being an extension of the plain of Sharon, except that along the coast high sand dunes encroached upon the cultivated tract. It contained many towns and villages, the most important being the five so often mentioned in Scripture: Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron. The population must have been large for the territory, which enabled them to contend successfully with the Israelites, notwithstanding the superiority of position in the hills to the advantage of the latter. I. OT Notices.—The Philis were an uncircumcised people inhabiting the shore plain between Gezer and Gaza in Southwestern Pal (see PHILISTIA). The name Pal itself and Origin (Heb p'lesheth) refers to their country.

The word means "migrants," and they came from another country. They are noticed 236 t in the OT, and their country 8 t. The question of their race and origin is of great importance as affecting the genuine character and reliability of the Bible notices. In Gen 10 14 (1 Ch 1 12) they are reckoned with other tribes in Mizraim (Egypt) as descendants of Ham, and as cousins of the old inhabitants of Babylonia (ver 6). They are said to be a branch of the Casluhim—an unknown people—or, according to LXX, of the Casmanim, which would mean "shavers of the head"—a custom of the Phoenicians (forbidden to Hebrews as a rule), as known from a picture of the time of Thothmes III in the 16th cent. BC. They are also connected with the Caphtorim or people of Caphtor, whence indeed they are said to have come (Jer 47 4; Am 9 7). Caphtor was a "shoreland," but its position is doubtful (see Dt 2 23); the Caphtorim found an earlier race of Avim living in "enclosures" near Gaza, and destroyed them. In the LXX of this passage (and in Am 9 7) Cappadocia stands for Caphtor (Kaph-tōr), and other VSS have the same reading. Cappadocia was known to the Assyrians as kat-pai-uka (probably an Akkadian term—"land of the Kati"), and the Kati were a people living in Cilicia and Cappadocia, which region had a Sem population side by side with Mongols (see HITTITES) at least as early as the time of Moses. It is very likely therefore that this reading is correct.

According to the OT and monuments alike, the Philis were a Sem people, and they worshipped two Bab gods, Dagon (1 S 5 2) and Ashtaroth (31 10), both of whom were adored very early in Babylonia, both, however, having names of Akkadian and not of Sem origin. In Sem speech Dagon meant "corn," and was so understood in the time of Philo of Gebal, a Gr-Phoen writer who attributes the art of corn-growing to this deity. But the original name was Da-gān, and in Akkadian da is "the upper part of a man," and gān (Turkish kaan) probably means "a large fish." The new man deity was well known to the Assyrians, and is represented in connection with Sennacherib's worship of Ea, the sea-god, when he embarked on the Pers Gulf. Thus Dagon was probably a title of Ea ("the water spirit"), called by Berosus Oannes (u-ha-na, "lord of the fish"), and said to have issued from this same gulf. We consequently read that when the statue of Dagon at Ashdod fell (1 S 5 4), its head and hands were broken off, and only "the great fish" was left. In 1874 the present writer found a seal near Ashdod representing a bearded god (as in Babylonia) with a fish tail (see DAGON). As to Ash-toreth, who was adored in Philistia itself, her name is derived from the Akkadian Istar ("light maker"), a name for the moon-goddess and—later—for the planet Venus (see ASHTORETH).

2. Religion

The Philis had reached Gerar by the time of Abraham, and it was only in the age of the Hyksos rulers of the Delta that Can. tribes could be described as akin, not only to Babylonians, but also to certain tribes in Egypt, a circumstance which favors the antiquity of the ethnic chapter, Gen 10. We have 9 Philis names in the OT, all of which seem to be Sem, including Abimelech—"Moloch is my father"—(Gen 20 2-18; 21 22-32; 26 8-11) at Gerar, S.E. of Gaza, Ahuzzath ("possession," Gen 26 26), and Phicol (of doubtful meaning), with Delilah ("delicate," Jgs 16 4), Goliath (probably the Bab galu, "great"), and Saph (2 S 21 18), perhaps meaning "increase." These two brothers were sons of Raphah ("the tall"); but Ishbi-benob (ver 16), another of the family, perhaps only means "the dweller in Nob" (Beit Naba, N. of Gezer). The king of Gath in David's time was Achish ("the gift" in Bab), who (1 S 27 2) was the son of Maach, "the oppressor." According to LXX, Jonathan killed a Philis named Nasib (1 S 13 3.4, where AV reads "a garrison"). If this is correct the name (meaning "a pillar") would also be Sem.

Besides these personal names, and those of the cities of Philistia which are all Sem, we have the title given to Philis lords, seren, which LXX renders "satrap" and "ruler," and which probably comes from a Sem root meaning "to command." It constantly applies to the rulers of Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron, the 5 chief cities of Philistia. The fact that the Philis were uncircumcised does not prove that they were not a Sem people. Herodotus (ii.104) says that the Phoenicians acknowledged that they took this custom from the Egyptians, and the Arabs according to this passage were still uncircumcised, nor is it known that this was a custom of the Babylonians and Assyrians. The LXX translators of the Pent always render the name Phulistiēim, and this also is found in 8 passages of Josh and Jgs, but in the later books the name is tr^d as meaning "strangers" throughout, because they were not the first inhabitants of Philistia.

The Philis conquered the "downs" (g'ulōth, Joel 3 4) near the seacoast, and were so powerful at the time of the Heb conquest that none of their great towns were taken (Josh 13 3; Jgs 3 3). By the time of Samson (about 1153 BC) they appear as oppressors of Israel for 40 years (Jgs 13 1; 15 20), having encroached from their plains into the Sh'phēlāh (or low hills) of Judah, at the foot of the mountains. Delilah was a Philis woman, living in the valley of Sorek, close to Samson's home. In the last year of Eli (1 S 4 1) we find the Philis attacking the mountains near Mizpeh, where they captured the ark. Samuel drove them back and placed his monument of victory between Mizpeh and Jeshanah (Shen; see LXX; 1 S 7 12) on the mountain ridge of Benjamin. He even regained towns in the Sh'phēlāh as far as Ekron and Gath (ver 14); but at the opening of Saul's reign (10 5) the Philis had a "garrison" at Gibeah—or a chief named Hasib according to LXX. They raided from this center (13 17-23) in all directions, and prevented the Hebrews from arming themselves, till Jonathan drove them from Michmash (14 1-47). David's victory (17 2) was won in the Valley of Elah E. of Gath, and the pursuit (ver 52) was as far as Ekron. We here read that the Philis champion wore armor of bronze (vs 4-7), his spear head being of iron. They still invaded the Sh'phēlāh after this defeat, robbing the threshing-floors of Keilah (23 1) near Adullam at the foot of the Hebron Mountains (see 23 27; 24 1). David's band of outlaws gradually increasing from 400 to 600 men (22 2; 27 2), being driven from the Heb lands, accompanied him to Gath, which is usually placed at Tell es-Sāfi, at the point where the Valley of Elah enters the Philis plain. It appears that Achish, king of Gath, then ruled as far S. as Ziklag (Josh 15 31; 1 S 27 6) in the Beersheba plains; but he was not aware of the direction of David's raids at this distance. Achish supposed David to be committed to his cause (27 12), but the Philis lords suspected him and his Heb followers (29 3) when going up to Jezreel.

After they had killed Saul, we hear no more of them till the 8th year of David, when, after taking Jerusalem, he apparently went down to Adullam (2 S 5 17) and fell upon them in their rear as they advanced on his capital. He then destroyed their supremacy (8 1) as far as Gezer (1 Ch 20 4), and the whole of Philistia was subject to Solomon (1 K 4 21), though not long after his death they seem to have held the town of Gibbethon (15 27; 16 15) in the hills of Dan. Hezekiah smote the Philis as far as Gaza (2 K 18 8) before 702 BC, in which year (according to the Taylor cylinder) Sennacherib made Hezekiah deliver up Padii, king of Ekron, who had been carried prisoner to Jerusalem. The accounts in Ch refer to David's taking Gath (1 Ch 18 1), which was recovered later, and again taken by Uzziah (2 Ch 26 6). The Philis sent gifts to Jehoshaphat (17 11), but invaded the Sh'phēlāh (28 18) in the time of Ahaz.

In this age the "lords" of the 5 cities of Philistia are called "kings," both in the Bible and on Assyrian monuments. Isaiah (2 6) speaks of Philis superstitions, Ezekiel (25 15.16) connects them with the Cherethim on the seacoast. They still held Gath in the time of Amos (6 2), and Gaza, Ashdod and Ekron in that of Zephaniah (2 5), who again mentions the Cherethim with Philis, as inhabitants of Canaan or the "lowlands." The last notice (Zec 9 6) still speaks of kings in Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron and Ashdod at a time when the Ionians had become known in Judah (ver 13); but the Philis are unnoticed by Ezra or Nehemiah, unless we suppose that the "speech of Ashdod" (Neh 13 24) was their old dialect, which appears—like the language of the Canaanites in general in earlier times—to have resembled that of the Babylonians and Assyrians, and to have thus differed—though Sem—from the Hebrews.

Their further history is embraced in that of the various cities to which reference can be made under the articles pertaining to them.

II. Monumental Notices.—These are of great importance, because they confirm the OT statements from a time at least as early as that of Moses, and down to 670 BC. Recent excavations at Gezer show the early presence of two races at this Philistia city, one being Sem, the other probably Egypt. Scarabs as old as the XIIth Dynasty were found, and in the 15th cent. BC Gezer was held by Amenophis III. At Lachish also seals of this king and his queen have been found, with a cuneiform letter to Zimridi, who was ruler of the city under the same Pharaoh. At Gaza a temple was built by Amenophis II. The names of places in Philistia noticed yet earlier by Thothmes III are all Sem, including Joppa, Saphir, Gerar, Gezer, etc. In the Am Tab we have also (about 1480 BC) letters from chiefs subject to Amenophis III at Joppa, Ashkelon, Gezer, Lachish and Keilah which show us a Sem population, not only by the language of these letters, but also by the names of the writers. In the case of Ashkelon esp. the Sem rulers are found to have worshipped Dagon; and, though the name

Philistine Wagons.

"Philistine" does not occur, the race was clearly the same found by the Assyrians in 800 BC in the land of Palastan beside the Great Sea. These names include Yamir-Dagān ("Dagon sees"), Dagān-takala ("Dagon is a protection") and Yadaya (the "grateful") at Ashkelon; Būa ("asked for"), son of the woman Gulata, at Joppa; Yabnili ("God made"), at Lachish, with Zimridi—a name found also in Sabaean Arab.; while, at Gezer, Yapa'a represents the Bib. Japhia (Josh 10 3), and Milkilu ("Moloch is king") the Heb. Malchiel. Others might be added of the same character, but these examples are enough to show that, in the time of Moses and Joshua, the population of Philistia was the same that is noticed in the OT as early as Abraham's age.

When therefore scholars speak of the Philis as being non-Sem—and probably Aryan—invasers of the country, arriving about 1200 BC, they appear not only to contradict the Bible, but also to contradict the monumental evidence of the earlier existence of Sem Dagon-worshippers at Ashkelon. In this later age Rameses III was at-

2. Egyptian tacked, in Egypt, by certain northern Monuments tribes who came by sea, and also by land, wasting first the country of the Hittites and Amorites. Among them were the Danau, who were probably Gr Danai. They were exterminated in the Delta, and in the subsequent advance of Rameses III to the Euphrates. On a colored picture they are represented as fair people; and two of the tribes were called Pūrstau and Takarri, whom Chabas supposed to be Pelasgi (since l and r are not distinguished in Egypt) and Teucrians. These two tribes wear the same peculiar headdress. Brugsch supposed the former to be Philis (Geog., I, 10), but afterward called them Purosata (Hist Egypt, II, 148). The inscriptions accompanying the picture on the temple walls say that they came from the north, and "their home was in the land of the Pūrstau, the Takarri," etc. There is thus no reason at all to suppose that they were Philis, nor did they ever settle in Philistia.

The Assyrian texts agree with those already mentioned in making the inhabitants of Philistia Semitic.

Rimmon-nirari, about 800 BC, was the 3. Assyrian first Assyrian conqueror in Palastau ("by the great sea"). In 734 and 727 BC Texts

Tiglath-pileser attacked the Pilisti, and mentions a king of Ashkelon named Milinti ("my gift"), and his son Rukufti whose name resembles that of the Kenite called Rechab in the OT. The name of the king of Gaza was Hanun, or "merciful." In 711 BC Sargon took Ashdod, and speaks of its king Azuri, whose name recalls the Amorite Aziru, and of Ahimiti ("a brother is sent"), and the usurper Yamanu ("steadfast"), who fled before him. Sennacherib, in 702 BC, gives the names of cities in Philistia (including Eltekeh and Beneberak near Joppa) which are Sem. He notices Sidka (Zadok) of Ashkelon, and also Sarludari ("the Lord be praised"), son of Rukubti in the same city, with Milinti of Ashdod, and Padii ("redeeming") of Ekron, while Šil-b'el ("Baal is a protection") was king of Gaza. In 679 BC Esarhaddon speaks of Šilli-b'el ("Baal is my protection") of Gaza, with Milinti of Ashkelon, Ika-samsu ("the sun-god is manifest") of Ekron, and Abi-milki of Ashdod, who bore the ancient Philistia name Abimelech. In 670 BC, when Assur-bani-pal set up many tributary kings in Egypt, we find again the name Sarludari applied to a ruler of Pelusium, who may have been a Philistine. It is thus abundantly clear that the monumental notices all agree with the OT as to the names and nationality of the Philis, and as to their worship of Baal and Dagon; the conjecture that they were Aryan foreigners, arriving in 1200 BC, is not based on any statement of the monuments, but merely rests on a guess which Brugsch subsequently abandoned. It resembles many other supposed discrepancies between Bib. and contemporary records due to the mistakes of modern commentators.

III. The Cretan Theory.—This strange theory, which is apparently of Byzantine origin, would make the Philis come from Crete. It

1. Chere- still finds supporters, though it does thim and not rest on any Bib. or monumental Kretes evidence. The Cherethim (Ezk 25 16; Zeph 2 5) were a Sem people named with the Philis in Canaan. The LXX renders the word Krētēs or Krētoi; and, about 1770 AD, Michaëlis (Spicil., I, 292-308) argued that this meant "Cretans," and that the Philis therefore came from Caphtor, which must be Crete. The passages, however, refer to Philistia and not to any island, and the LXX translators, as we have seen, placed Caphtor in Cappadocia. The Cherethi—in the singular—is mentioned (1 S 30 14) as a people of Philistia (ver 16), near Ziklag, and their name probably survives at the present town called Keratiyeh in the Phili plain.

Yet, many theories are founded on this old idea about the Cherethites. Some suppose that Tacitus confused the Jews with the Philis as having come from Crete; but what he actually says (Hist. v.11) is that "the Jews ran away from Crete," and "the inhabitants are named Idaci [from Mt. Ida], which, with a barbarous augment, becomes the name of the Judaci." This absurd derivation shows at least that Tacitus did not mean the Philis. Stephen of Byzantium said that the god Marna at Gaza was like the Cretan Jove. Probably he had seen the huge statue of a seated Jove found near Gaza, and now at Constantinople, but this is late Gr work, and the name Marna ("our lord") is Sem. Stephen also thought that Minos—the port of Gaza—was named from the Cretan Minos, but it is an Arab. word Mineh, for "harbor," still applying to the same place.

No critical student is likely to prefer these later speculations to our present monumental information, even without reference to the contradiction of the Bible. Yet these blunders have given rise to the supposition that Caphtor is to be identified with a region known to the Egyptians as Keft, with inhabitants called Kefau. The latter are represented in a tomb of the XVIIIth Dynasty near Thebes. They are youths of brown color, with long black hair, and the same type is found in a Cypriote figure. They are connected with islanders of the "green sea," who may have lived in Arvad or in Cyprus; but there is no evidence in any written statement that they were Cretans, though a figure at Knossos in Crete somewhat resembles them. There are many indications that this figure—painted on the wall of the later palace—is not older than about 500 BC, and the Sidonians had colonies in Crete, where also pottery is found just like that marked by a Phoen inscription in Cyprus. The Kefau youths bring vases as presents, and these—in all their details—are exactly the same as those represented in another picture of the time of Thothmes III, the bearers in this case being Harri from North Syria, represented with black beards and Sem features. Moreover, on the bilingual inscription called the Decree of Canopus (238 BC), the Keft region is said to be "Phoenicia," and the Gr translator naturally knew what was meant by his Egypt colleague. Keft in fact is a Sem word for "palm," occurring in Heb (Isa 9 14; 19 15), and thus applicable to the "palm"-land, Phoenicia. Thus, even if Keft were related to Caphtor, the evidence would place the Phili home on the Phoen shores, and not in Crete. There is indeed no evidence that any European race settled near the coasts of Pal before about 680 BC, when Esarhaddon speaks of Gr kings in Cyprus. The Cretan theory of Michaëlis was a literary conjecture, which has been disproved by the results of exploration in Asia.

IV. David's Guards.—Another strange theory, equally old, represents David as being surrounded with foreign mercenaries—Philis and

1. The "Cherethi" and the "Pelethi" Not Mercenaries Carians—as Rameses II employed mercenaries called Shairtanau from Asia Minor. The suggestion that the Cherethites were of this race is scarcely worth notice, since the Heb kāph is never represented by sh in Egypt. David's band of Heb exiles, 400 in number, followed him to Gath where 200 Gittites joined him (2 S 15 18). In later times his army consisted of "the Cherethi" (k'ēthī, in sing.) and "the Pelethi" (p'ēthī), commanded by the Heb leader Benaiah, son of Jehoiada (2 S 8 18; 15 18; 20 7; 1 K 1 38.44), together with the Gittites under Ittai of Gath. These guards are never said to have been Philis, but "the Cherethi" is supposed to mean one of the Cherethim tribe, and "the Pelethi" to be another name for the Philistine. As regards the Gittites, the fact that they came from Gath does not prove that they were Philis, any more than was David himself because he came back from this city. David calls Ittai an "enemy" and an "exile," but it is probable that he was the same hero, so named (2 S 23 29), who was the son of Ribai from Gibeah of Benjamin. He had himself not long joined David, being no doubt in exile at Gath, and his tribe at first opposed David, taking the side of their tribesman Saul. Even when Ittai's men joined the Cherethi and Pelethi against Absalom, they were naturally suspected; for David still had enemies (2 S 15 5–13) among Benjamites of Saul's house. It is also surely impossible to suppose that David would have left the ark in charge of a Phili; and Obed-edom the Gittite (2 S 6 10) was a Levite, according to a later account (1 Ch 15 18), bearing a Heb name, meaning perhaps "servant of men," or "humble worshipper." It seems equally unlikely that, in later times, a pious priest like Jehoiada (2 K 11 4) would have admitted foreign mercenaries into the temple. In this passage they are called kārī, as also in 2 S 20 23, where LXX has Cherethi. The suggestion of Wellhausen that they were Carians does not seem probable, as Carians had not even reached Egypt before about 600 BC.

The real explanation of these various words for soldiers seems simple; and David—being a very popular king—is not likely to have

2. Meaning of These Terms needed foreign mercenaries; while the Philis, whom he had so repeatedly smitten, were very unlikely to have formed trustworthy guards. The word "Cherethi" (k'ēthī) means a "smiter" or a "destroyer," and "Pelethi" (p'ēthī) means "a swift one" or "pursuer." In the time of Joash the temple-guards are called kārī (2 K 11 4.19, Carites), which LXX treats as either sing. or pl., and rācīm or "runners" (see 1 S 22 17; 1 K 14 27.28; 2 K 10 25), these two bodies perhaps answering to the Cherethi and Pelethi of David's time; for kārī means "stabber." The term rācīm, or "runners," is however of general application; since Jehu also had troops so called (2 K 10 25). Evidently we have here two classes of troops—as among the Romans—the heavier regiment of "destroyers," or "stabbers," being armed with swords, daggers or spears; while the "swift ones" or "runners" pursued the defeated foe. Thus in Egypt we find, yet earlier, the ax-man supported by the bow-man in regular regiments; and in Assyria the spear-man with heavy shields defending the bow-man. We have also a picture of the time of Tiglath-pileser II representing an Assyrian soldier on a camel. The Pelethi or "pursuers" may have been "runners" on foot, but perhaps more probably mounted on camels, or on horses like the later Assyrians; for in the time of Solomon (1 K 4 28) horses and riding camels were in use—the former for chariots. It is clear that David's band, leaving the vicinity of Jezreel (1 S 29 1; 30 1), could not have reached Ziklag "on the third day" (a distance of 120 miles) on foot; so that the camel corps must have existed even before the death of Saul.

These considerations seem to make it evident that David's guards were native Hebrews, who had been with him as exiles and outlaws at

3. Native Hebrews Adullam and Gath, and that the Cherethi or "destroyer" only accidentally had a title like that of the Phili tribe of "destroyers" or Cherethim, who were not Carians, it would seem, any more than the "stabbers" were Carians.

The general result of our inquiry is, that all monumental notices of the Philis agree with the OT statements, which make them to be a Sem people who had already migrated to Philistia by the time of Abraham, while the supposed discrepancies are caused by the mistakes made by a commentator of the 18th cent., and by archaeologists of later times.

Born probably in the first decade of Augustus Caesar, who became emperor in 27 BC. He died possibly in the last years of Claudius

1. His Life (41–54 AD), more likely in the early years of Nero (54–65 AD). We have no exact information about either date. He was a native of Alexandria, Egypt. His relatives were wealthy and prominent, probably sacerdotal, Jews. He received the best Jewish education, and was trained also in gentile learning—grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, geometry, poetry, music. Enjoying ample means, he was enabled to devote his career to scholarship. The Alexandrian Jews wielded great influence in the contemporary Rom empire, and the prominence of Philo's family is attested by the fact that his brother, Alexander Lysimachus, was Alabarch of Alexandria. The single date in Philo's life which we know accurately is connected with their leadership. In the winter of 39–40 AD, he was spokesman of the deputation sent to Rome to protest against imposition of emperor-worship upon fellow-citizens of his faith. The mission failed, Philo, with his two colleagues, meeting rebuff, even insult. It was little likely that Caligula would heed grievances which included specifically dissent from worship of himself. Philo records his distaste for political activity, and, so far as we know, the Rom incident excepted, he devoted himself principally to letters. As a young man probably, he had undertaken a journey to Jerus, almost in the nature of a pilgrimage to the ancient shrine of his religion. He paid a second visit to Rome possibly after 50 AD, at all events, in the reign of Claudius. For the rest, our knowledge of his life is scanty and, sometimes, legendary.

The period covered by his career coincides with one of the most momentous epochs in history. For it witnesses, not only the foundation of the Rom imperial system, but also the beginning of the end of ancient classical civilization in its dominant ideas, and the plantation of Christianity. Preëminently an era of transition, it was marked by significant displacements in culture, the effects of which continue to sway mankind even yet. Minor phenomena aside, three principal movements characterized the time: the Pagan reaction, or reversion to forms of religion that had sufficed the peoples of the Rom empire hitherto—this manifested itself strongly with Augustus, and entered its decline perhaps with the death of Plutarch (c 120 AD); the appearance of Christianity; and what is known as Syncretism, or interfusion between the conceptions of different races, esp. in religion, philosophy and morals—a circumstance which affected the fortunes of Christianity deeply, found its chief exponent in Philo, and maintained itself for several centuries in the theosophical systems of the Gnostics and neo-Platonists. Thus, to understand Philo, and to realize his importance, it is essential to remember the internal spirit of his age. The “universalism” of the Rom empire has been so named because, within the political framework, various peoples and divergent civilizations commingled and came eventually to share something of a common spirit, even of a common language. Philo's prominence as a figure in the world of thought, and as an authority for the general culture of NT times, is out of all proportion to the fragmentary information available about his external career. Contemporary currents, subtle as they were, perplexing as they still remain, met and fused in his person. Hence his value as an index to the temperament of the period cannot well be overrated.

A Jew by nature and nurture, an oriental mystic by accident of residence, a Gr humanist by higher education and professional study, an ally of the Rom governing classes, familiar with their intellectual perspective, Philo is at once rich in suggestion and blurred in outline. Moreover, he addressed himself to two tasks, difficult to weld into a flawless unity. On the one hand, he wrote for educated men in Gr-Rom society, attempting to explain, often to justify, his racial religion before them. The ancient state religion having fallen upon inanition, he enjoyed unusual opportunity to point the merits of the Jewish faith as the “desire of all nations,” the panacea of which the need was everywhere felt. On the other hand, he had to confront his orthodox coreligionists, with their separatist traditions and their contempt for paganism in all its works. He tried to persuade them that, after all, Gr thought was not inimical to their cherished doctrines, but, on the contrary, involved similar, almost identical, principles. He thus represented an eclectic standpoint, one in which Gr philosophy blended with historical and dogmatic deductions from the Jewish Scriptures. The result was Philo's peculiar type of theosophy—we cannot call it a system. Taking the OT for text, he applied the “allegorical” method, with curious consequences. He taught that the Scriptures contain two meanings: a “lower” meaning, obvious in the literal statements of the text; and a “higher,” or hidden meaning, perceptible to the “initiate” alone. In this way he found it possible to reconcile Gr intellectualism with Jewish belief. Greek thought exhibits the “hidden” meaning; it turns out to be the elucidation of the “allegory” which runs through the OT like a vein of gold. Moses, and the rest, are not merely historical figures, the subjects of such and such vicissitudes, but representative types of reason, righteousness, the virtues, and so forth. The tendency to fusion of this kind was no new thing. It is traceable for some three centuries before Philo, who may be said to complete the process. It had been familiar to the rabbis, and to the Hellenistic philosophers, particularly the Stoics, who applied this method to the Gr poetical myths. Philo reduces it to an expert art, and uses it as an instrument to dissipate all difficulties. He believed himself to be thoroughly true to the OT. But, thanks to his method, he rendered it malleable, and could thus adjust its interpretation to what he considered to be the intellectual necessities of his generation. Nay more, he felt that, when at his best in this process, he became a vehicle of Divine possession. He says, "Through the influence of Divine inspiration I have become excited profoundly . . . then I have been conscious of a richness of interpretation, an enjoyment of light, a most penetrating sight, a most manifest energy in all that was to be done." Again, "I am irradiated with the light of wisdom," and, "an intellect is a Divine inspiration." Little wonder, then, that we have a strange mixture of philosophy and religion, of rationalism and piety, of clear Gr intellectualism with hazy oriental mysticism. Hence, too, the philosophy of Philo is subordinate to his explanation of the Scriptures, and compromise, rather than logical thinking, marks his leading positions.

After the death of Cicero (43 BC) a change, long preparing, asserted itself in ancient thought.

4. Changes and New Problems

Mixture of national, or racial, characteristics was consummated, and thoughtful men, irrespective of race-origin, became persons to each other. A reorganization of standards of ethical judgment was thus rendered inevitable, and Judaism came to interfuse more freely with Gr philosophy as one consequence. While it is true that "reason" preserved its traditional supremacy as the means to solve all problems, the nature of the chief quest underwent transformation. The old association of man with Nature gave way to a dualism or opposition between the world-order and another existence lying behind it as its originator or sustainer. The system of Nature having disappointed expectation, thinkers asked how they could escape it, and assure themselves of definite relations with the Divine Being. They sought the desiderated connection within their own souls, but as a distant ideal. This was the problem that confronted Philo, who attacked it from the Jewish side. Now Judaism, like Gr thought, had also experienced a change of heart. Jeh had been the subject of an idealizing process, and tended, like the Stoic deity, to lose specific relation with the world and man. Accordingly, a new religious question was bringing the philosophy and the faith into closer contact. Could they join forces? Philo's consequent embarrassment rooted, not simply in this fresh problem, but in the difficulties inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo being the most conspicuous mediator. He was familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timaeus. Here God was elevated above the world. His conception of the presence, or immanence, of the Deity in the world came from the Stoics. The Jewish religion gave him the doctrine of a righteous (pure) Deity, whose moral inwardness made relations with men possible. Moreover, contemporary angelology and demonology enabled him to devise a scheme whereby the pure Deity could be linked with the gross world, notwithstanding its ineradicable evil. Little wonder, then, that he compassed an amalgamation only, and this in consonance with the theosophical drift of the age. Nevertheless, he counteracted the deistic tendencies of rabbinical speculation by reference to Hellenistic pantheism, and, at the same time, counteracted this pantheism by the inward moralism of his national faith. The logical symmetry of the Gr mind was reinforced by Hebraic religious intuition. The consequence was a ferment rather than a system, but a ferment that cast up the clamant problem in unmistakable fashion. The crux was this: Man must surmount his own fragmentary experience and rise to an absolute Being; but, its absoluteness notwithstanding, this Being must be brought into direct contact with the finite. Philo was unable to reconcile the two demands, because he could not rise above them; but the effort after reconciliation controls all his thought. As a result, he concentrated upon three main subjects of inquiry: (1) the conception of God; (2) the manner of God's relation to the world; (3) human nature.

(1) Philo's doctrine of God, like that of the neo-Platonic school, which he heralded, is thoroughly dualistic. No doubt, it is determined

5. Three Subjects of Inquiry largely by certain human analogies. For example, God's existence is necessary for the control of the world, just in the same way as man's mind must exist to furnish the principle of all human action; and, as matter is not self-determined, a principle, analogous to mind, is demanded, to be its first cause. Further, as the permanent soul remains unchanged throughout the vicissitudes of a human life, so, behind the ceaseless play of phenomena, there must reside a self-existent Being. Nevertheless, the human analogy never extends to God in His actual Being. No human traits can attach to the Deity. Language may indicate such parallelism, nay the Scriptures are full of instances, but we must view them as concessions to mortal weakness. These accommodations eliminated, it becomes evident that man can never know God positively. Any adjective used to describe Him can do no more than point the contrast between His relationless Being and the dependence of finite things. That God is, Philo is fully persuaded; what He is, no man can ever tell. He is one and immutable, simple and immeasurable and eternal, just as man is not. "For he is unchangeable, requiring nothing else at all, so that all things belong to Him, but He, speaking strictly, belongs to nothing." This doctrine of the transcendence of Deity was an essential postulate of Philonic thought. For, seeing that He expels all the imperfections of the world, God is precisely in that condition of Being for which the whole creation then yearned. In a word, the dualism, so far from being a bar to salvation, was rather a condition without which the problem of salvation could neither be stated nor solved. Men stood in necessary relation to this Being, but, as yet, He stood in no relation whatever to them. Yet, men must return to God, but He abides so remote, in the realm of pure contemplation and completion, that He cannot approach them. Philo's familiarity with logical Gr thought debarred him from surmounting the difficulty after the manner of Jewish religion. An otiose reference to "God's choice," as distinct from His nature, could not suffice a mind trained in Hellenic methods. The question therefore was, How could mediation be effected?

(2) God's relation to the world.—At this point Philo's thought assumes a phase of great interest to readers of the NT. God, being above created things, is incomprehensible and immaterial. Accordingly, He cannot be connected with the world directly. Therefore He created it and sustains it by intermediate powers. These agencies were suggested to Philo by the Platonic Ideas. But he personalized them more or less and, as a characteristic addition, included them in the Logos. He substituted the term "Logos" for the Platonic term "Idea" on the basis of the Scripture phrase, "Word of God." The conception was influenced further by his Hellenistic psychological notion, that a word is a "shadow" of a deed. Accordingly, the Logos is the "shadow of God"—God being the "deed" whereby the "shadow" is cast. As a direct issue, the Logos presents two aspects. On the one side it is internal and indwelling; on the other, it is external and mediating. The scope of this distinction is indicated very well by the epithets which Philo applies to each aspect respectively. The internal Logos is the "Firstborn," the "Second God," the "Mediator," the "Ransom," the "Image of God," "Member of the Trinity," "High Priest." The external Logos "abides in man," is the "Prophet," "Shepherd," "Ambassador," "Artist," "Elder," "Interpreter," "Shadow of God." The former represents Philo's conception of the unity of the Logos with God, the latter his provision for the manifestation of the Logos in created things. He thus tries to preserve the transcendence of God equally with His immanence. No doubt, in previous times, the mysteriousness of the Divine nature had impressed itself upon men with at least as much force as now. But with one of two consequences. Either the particular finites and the Deity were mixed in inextricable confusion, as by oriental pantheism, or God was banished from the world, as by the extreme developments within Gr dualism. Philo attempted to combine the two tendencies, and was able consequently to face the obvious contradiction between the idea of an absolute Being and the cloudy conception of a multiplicity of phenomena in which this Being ought to be present somehow, despite transcendence. He demands a God who, in His exaltation, shall be a worthy Deity; this is the Jew in him. But he also demands a definite relation between this God and His creation; this is the Greek and, in part, the Oriental, in him. Thanks to the former, he could not be satisfied with mere naturalism; thanks to the latter, no fable or picture could suffice. A real mediator was required, who would link the world and its heart's desire. But Philo could not surmount one difficulty peculiar to contemporary thought. He was unable to connect God directly with creation and preserve His purity unsullied. Hence the obscurity which surrounds his conception of the Logos, likewise his vacillation with respect to its personality. So we find the different intellectual forces which he inherited playing upon him—now one, now another. Sometimes the Platonic theory of Ideas dominates him; sometimes he leans to Stoicism, with its immanent world-reason; and here he even seems to foreshadow the doctrine of the Trinity; again, the ramifications of rabbinical lore cause him to bestow upon the Logos a priestly function or an atoning office. No single aspect achieves supremacy, although on the whole mystical Platonism may be said to predominate. Thus, "The world of Ideas has its place in the Divine Logos, just as the plan of a city is in the soul of the master-builder." Accordingly, God's thought may take its place in the world by being impressed upon things; yet, on account of its subjective nature, it must be apprehended subjectively, that is, by one who is capable of entering this sphere. The Logos thus seems to exist entirely in the same realm as Deity; thus it can mediate between Him and creation only if an element proper to Deity be discernible in mundane things. In other words, the Logos mediates between God and the world, but partakes of the Divine nature only. This, in any case, is the inner logic of Philo's view. It accounts for creation, but has no power to persuade man to overpass the limitations placed upon him by his bodily prison. Thus the question of the personality of the Logos is never cleared. In so far as Philo needs Logos to connect God with the world, he inclines to a doctrine of personality. In so far as he makes it the principle of all activities within the world, he inclines away from personality. In short, we have a "world-soul." And, as a consequence, there is an inherent tendency to reduce all finite being to illusion. Indeed, one might term the Logos a reply in some sort to Aristotle's question—which of the Platonic Ideas could connect the other Ideas with sensible things? Salvation is conceived as wrought out, not by a person, but by an abstract essence flowing from Deity, an essence that found due expression rather in the cosmic order than in a person. While, therefore, Philo thinks in a cultural perspective akin to that characteristic of the author of the Fourth Gospel, two vast differences sway his doctrine. On the one hand, it is speculative, not ethically personal. On the other hand, it fails completely to determine the nature of his mediator in itself, vacillating in a manner which shows how vague and fluid the conception really was.

(3) Doctrine of man.—This appears further in the doctrine of man. Following current interpretations of Plato, Philo makes man partake in the rational nature of God, but denies that he embodies the highest species of reason. That is, the ideal man and the man known to us in common experience are distinguished. The former is rational as God is. The latter is partly rational, partly irrational. The body vitiates the original angelic purity of the soul and, similarly, reason is alloyed. And yet, although the higher nature becomes more and more debased as the years lapse, a seed of Divinity is present, ready to burst forth. Thus man must crush the flesh and its desires. At this point we note the effect of the Stoic ideal of imperturbability. When he has attained this apathy, man can enjoy the life of contemplation. This, in its turn, culminates in ecstasy, when the human soul attains sudden and momentary union with the Divine. For a "fair moment" man escapes the thrall of sense. Yet the doctrine remains intellectual even here. He "who escapes from his own mind flies to the mind of the universe, confessing that all the things of the human mind are vain and unreal, and attributing everything to God." Philo's anthropology therefore ends in contempt for this life, which is in no wise worth while, and in a counsel of perfection available only for a select élite. Accordingly, the conclusion of the whole matter is, that he never saw how the Divine and the human can be united, although he stated the factors of the problem with great clearness, and felt profoundly the urgency of a solution. His gospel was for the children of culture. He saw the eternal in the temporal, and hoped that good might lurk in evil. But he never understood that "love for a Divine Person" might be so diffused throughout a human soul as to render evil and unreality the means to the attainment of good and to the revelation of truth. The salvation he contemplated was from self, not in self. Hence, as he asserts himself, harmony with God "is an incomprehensible mystery to the multitude, and is to be imparted to the instructed only." Nor is this wonderful. For a God who is the reasonable "form" of the world; a "matter" which begins as an indistinguishable mass and ends as a "second principle"; and objects of sense rendered apparent by the operation of many curious intermediate forces, ranging from "angel-words" to the human soul, constitute a combination beyond the reach of any save the "initiate." More practicable is Philo's conception of the moral life—as a warfare of the soul against passion, pleasure and sensuality. Yet, even this contest is hopeless unless it be waged with the equipment of the "philosopher athlete." Escape from the "prison-house" of flesh would seem to be consequent only upon profound knowledge.

The probability is that Philo's works were written previous to his Rom embassy. They show how he tried to apply Gr philosophical conceptions to Jewish beliefs, history, and usages exclusively. The voluminous remains which have come down to us appear to belong to three commentaries on the Pent and the Mosaic Law.

In all likelihood, they are portions of Philo's popular presentation, written for the instruction and information of educated Hellenistic circles rather than for the trained "initiate." The treatises most important for Philo's religio-philosophical views are as follows:

On the Creation of the World; On the Allegories of the Sacred Laws; On the Unchangeableness of God; On the Confusion of Languages; On the Migration of Abraham; On the Meeting for the Sake of Receiving Instruction; On the Life of the Wise Man Made Perfect by Instruction; The Unwritten Law; Abraham; On Special Laws; On Rewards and Punishments; That Every Man Who Is Virtuous Is Also Free; Concerning the World; and the Fragments. Some 8 works attributed to Philo are in dispute. Most conspicuous of these is Concerning the Contemplative Life, with its ascetic view of morality, and its description of the ideal community of the Therapeutae.

PHILOLOGUS, fi-lol'ô-gus (Φιλόλογος, Philôlogos, "fond of learning," "learned"): The name of a Rom Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 15). His name is coupled with that of Julia, who was probably his wife or sister. Philologus and those united with him in this salutation formed by themselves one of the "house churches" or groups in the Christian community. The name is found in inscriptions connected with the imperial household, with reference to one of which Bishop Lightfoot has the following note: "It has been supposed that the name Philologus was given by the master to the freedman mentioned in this inscription, as being appropriate to his office [Friedländer I, 89, 160]. . . . If so, some light is thrown on the probable occupation of the Philologus of St. Paul" (Phil, 177, n. 1).

LITERATURE

Only found in Col 2 8; lit. the love and pursuit of wisdom and knowledge. In its technical sense, the term is now used for the conscious endeavor of thought, by speculative process, to interpret the whole of human experience, as a consistent and systematic unity, which would be the ultimate truth of all that may be known. The term is also used, in a wider sense, of all interpretations of experience, or parts of experience, however obtained, whether by revelation, intuition or unconscious speculation. No hard-and-fast line can be drawn between the two kinds of philosophy. Some of the ruling conceptions of speculation, such as God, spirit, order, causation, true and false, good and evil, were not discovered by reason, but given in experience.

(1) Intuitive philosophy is universal. The human mind has always and everywhere furnished itself with some kind of explanation of the universe. From the lowest animism and fetichism up to the higher religions, ideas are found which served men as explanations of those features of experience which attracted their attention. They were often regarded as given by vision, intuition or some other method of revelation. In the higher religions, the mind reflected upon these ideas, and elaborated them into systems of thought that bear some resemblance to the speculative theories of western thought. In China, both Confucianism and Taoism developed theories of human life and destiny that bear some resemblance to Stoicism. The religions of Assyria and Babylonia enshrined in their legends theories of the world and of man and his institutions. In India, men's belief in the Nature-gods gradually developed into pantheistic Brahmanism, which reduced the multiplicity of experience into one ultimate being, Brahma. But the desire for moral salvation and the sense of pain and evil produced a reaction, and led to the pessimistic and nihilistic philosophy of Buddhism. In Persia, the moral consciousness awoke earlier, and the attempt to systematize the multiplicity of polytheism issued in the dualistic philosophy of later Zoroastrianism. The whole realm of being was divided into two kingdoms, created and ruled by two lords: Ahura Mazda, the creator of light and life, law, order and goodness, and Anrô Mainyûš, the author of darkness, evil and death. Each was surrounded by a court of spiritual beings kindred to himself, his messengers and agents in the world (see PERSIAN RELIGION [ANCIENT]). Of all these religious philosophies, only those of Assyria and Babylonia, and of Persia, are likely to have come into any contact with Bib. thought. The former have some affinity with the accounts of creation and the flood in Gen; and the influence of the latter may be traced in the dualism and angelology and demonology of later Judaism, and again in the gnostic systems that grew up in the Christian church, and through both channels it was perpetuated, as a dualistic influence, in the lower strata of Christian thought down through the Middle Ages.

(2) Speculative philosophy belongs mainly to western thought. It arose in Greece about the beginning of the 6th cent. BC. It began with the problem of the general nature of being, or ontology. But it was soon forced to consider the conditions of knowing anything at all, or to epistemology. These two studies constitute metaphysics, a term often used as synonymous with philosophy in the stricter sense. Speculation about ideal truth again led to inquiries as to the ultimate nature of the kindred ideas of the good (ethics) and the beautiful (aesthetics). And as these ideas were related to society as well as to the individual, the Greeks developed theories of the ideal organization of society on the basis of the true, the good and the beautiful, or politics and pedagogics. The only branch of speculation to which the Greeks made no appreciable contribution was the philosophy of religion, which is a modern development.

The progress of philosophy in history divides itself naturally into three main periods: (a) ancient, from the 6th cent. BC to the 3d cent. AD, when it is almost exclusively Gr, with some practical adaptations of Gr thought by Rom writers; (b) mediaeval, from the 3d to the 16th cent., where some of the ruling conceptions of Gr thought were utilized for the systematization of Christian dogma, but speculation was mainly confined within the limits of ecclesiastical orthodoxy; there were, however, some independent Arabian and Jewish speculations; (c) modern, from the 16th cent. to the present time, in which thought becomes free again to speculate upon all the problems presented by experience, though it only realized its liberty fully in the hands of Locke, Hume and Kant.

Gr philosophy was the only speculative system that could have had any influence upon Bib. thought. Its main development was contemporaneous with the later OT writers, but the two peoples were in every way so remote from one another that no interchange of ideas was probable.
